TO THE MAGNANIMOVS AND

Vertuous Lord, Anne D'Urfe, Marqueſſe of Bauge, Baron of Caſtle-Morand, Lord of Urfe, Gentleman of the Kings Chamber, and Bayliffe for his Maieſtie, in the Forreſts Countrey.

Here hath bin a great and long diſpute (woorthy Lord) among the Learned, concerning the true definition of Nobility. Some haue held opinion, that this matchleſſe Ladie, keepeth her ſeate in the Soule only; or elſe, with the Soule and Bodie together. Some other are of the minde, that her abyding is in Prudence: Others, in Iuſtice: And others, in the goodneſſe of manners. There are alſo ſome few, who ſay; that they know no other Nobility, but ſuch as proceedeth from Vertue. And if any one contemne Riches, voluptuous pleaſures, glory; yea, and life it ſelfe, hee is held to be more Noble, then all the Kings and Princes in the world. So that they are perſwaded, that al other things whatſoeuer which are in Man, are nothing els but Fortune, and meere preſumption of the wealthy and proud.

Againſt whom alſo, there are diuers and contrary opinions. For, wiſe Plutarch affirmeth, that the calumny is falſe, which vniuſt Sophiſters haue impoſed on Nobility. For they will admit no other kind of proofe, euen in things which are notorious and apparant to euerie eye: Albeit, to haue a good race of Houndes or Horſes, they will ſeeke after the goodlieſt and worthieſt. Likewiſe, they ſtriue to haue the beſt ſeeds for their grounds, to produce the rareſt plants and Hearbes: and yet (like Sots as they are) they dare maintaine, that Nobility by blood, is nothing auaileable to following ſucceſſion, becauſe the Originall came from the barbarous, or deſcended of the Ciuilized French; not crediting, that in the Generation of Children, the Fathers do diſtribute vnto them, ſome ſeeds and principles of Naturall vertue.

Ariſtotle repelleth their opinion, and ſtanding on much ſounder termes; ſpeaketh againſt them in this manner; That which Euripides teacheth (ſaith hee) is not true, to wit; That the honeſt minded man is only Noble, and not he that deſcendeth of an ancient race, and is borne of generous Parents: Becauſe that in the definition of Nobility, the valour & Vertue of our Elders are comprehended, Nobility it ſelfe being nothing elſe, but a certain Vertue of that Generation, which being lawdable of it ſelfe, ought to be followed with great affection. Wherefore, he is worthy of praiſe & commendatien, that employeth all his endeuor and diligence, to acquire the nobleneſſe of Generation; to the end, that afterward, worthy and valiant men may be deriued from him. So that at all times, and as often as the Originall of ſuch generation, finds it ſelfe to bee commendable, it ought iuſtly to be tearmed Noble. For, ſuch a beginning, beareth in it ſelfe both a naturall power and vertue, to beget and produce many other anſwereable, and like vnto it ſelfe. Therefore, when ſuch a man is met withall in any nation, as is of ſuch worth, that he can extend and ſpread his vertue to many ſucceeding Ages: his deſcendants and off-ſpring will be naturally generous, and of the beſt and manlieſt manners.

Contrary wiſe, he that is bad & wickedly bred, doth commonly beget as lewd and bad children: according to whom (beſide his euill examples) they will deriue from him the like wicked habitude. And therefore the Prouerb was not vnaduiſedly ſpoken: Of a bad Crow, coms as bad an Eg. By this reaſon I hold, that al thoſe whom we behold to be plunged in the gulfe of vices, and make miſchiefe their chiefeſt commendation, although they be neuer ſo great Lordes, they are but meere vſurpers of Nobility, beeing no way deſcended of Noblemen, but rather of Cham, and haue nothing elſe but the bare name of Nobilitie. Whereas on the contrary, they that are noted no way to degenerat from the vertue of their anceſtors, but truly haue followed them, euen from Father to Son (as we commonlie vſe to ſay) are ſaid to be of noble ſtem & ſtock, and diſcended of the poſteritie of Sem. Hence it enſueth, that in the world there are many men, Noble, Magnanimous, valiant, and like vnto their famous progenitors: among whom, you hold the place and ranke of a moſt worthy, honourable, and vertuous Lord, imitating ſo directly the tracts of your predeceſſors, that you may well be ſaid, to be Nobility and vertue it ſelfe. If it were needfull, to come to the Antiquity of Nobilitie, by the Fathers ſide, you are deſcended of the houſe of Vrſe, many whereof, haue held the very goodlieſt Eſtates and dignities in this Kingdome, and all by their moſt ſignale merits of vertue. What ſhall I ſay, concerning the pietie of your great Grandfather, M. Peter D'Vrſe, Great Maiſter of the Horſe. The Churches & Monaſteries builded by him, doe make ſufficient teſtimony of his deuout zeale. What ſhall I ſay of your Grandfather, M. Claudius D'Vrſe, Knight of the Order, Gouernor to Meſſieurs les enfans de France, Ambaſſador for the King to his Holyneſſe, & a curious obſeruer of Antiquities? Your houſe by him builded, the Statues of Marble, and ſo great number of Medalles, which he cauſed to be brought from Rome, do amply ſpeake, how great a friend and louer he was of Vertue. As for your Father M. Iaques D'Vrſe, Knight of the Kings Order, Captain of fifty men of Armes, Bayliffe of the Forreſts, and Gouernor of the ſaid Country. The memory of his vertuous deportments is ſo freſh and recent, as it would appeare ſuperfluous further ro remember them.

By the Mothers ſide, who knoweth not, that you are deriued of the illuſtrious houſe of Sauoy, allied to the bloud-royall of France? But as touching your perfections, I would haue the whol world to know it, that you are one of the very beſt Poets in France, as more then 100. choiſe Sonnets can teſtify, which you haue pleaſed to ſhew me. A matter redounding to your no mean honor, in not hauing atained to 18. years of age, when you made them: you are (beſide) inriched with ſo happy a memory, that you haue (ad vnguẽ) al the Poetical fictions, with an abſolut expoſition of thẽ, as wel in Ouids Metamorphoſis, Homers Iliads, as alſo diuers other authors.

Now in recompence of the gracious communication of your Poems, & for the ſeruice I iuſtly owe ye, I dedicate this Book to you, collected out of many Authors, Greeke, Latine, Italian, Spanish, &c. from whom I haue traduced moſt ſinguler things, appertaining to the ſeueral intention of each Chapter, hoping to continue them on, till they compleat the number of 30. Bookes. Receiue then this former Volume, with like loue and good wil, as I ſalute your graces with my humble recommendations, praying God to ſend your Honor a long and a happy life.

From Montbriſon this 11. of March.

Your humble Seruant
Anthony du Verdier.

TO THE RIGHT VVORSHIP-full, Learned, and moſt Iudicious Gentleman, Sir THOMAS BRVDENELL, Baronet, all Happineſſe moſt heartily wiſhed.

SIR, this VVorke, ſo long ſince promiſed, and now (after much Paine, Coſt, and deare Expence of time) in part perfected, comes in al Humility to kiſſe your Hand: making no doubt of as kind acceptance, as it tenders it ſelfe in free and vnfaigned affection. It is not vnknowne vnto me, that thoſe ſeuerall Natiue tongues, wherein all thoſe Arguments do ſpeake themſelues, are much more familiar and readie to you, then they can receyue in English any Ornament by mee. Neuertheleſſe, I hope it shall not anie way be diſtaſtfull to you, that others may be benefited by the meanes of your Happineſſe: and that which is thus effected for your ſake, may (from a perticuler good) extend it ſelfe to a generall.

377014

To runne into multiplicity of Wordes, when one onely is ſufficient to the Wiſe, may be but the Badge of my Folly, and an abuſe vnto your Generous patience. And therefore, committing this Labour, and my ſelfe, vnto your Fauourable Conſtruction, with whatſoeuer remaines in mee, by you to bee Commanded, I ceaſe: wishing the Happineſſe of you and yours as entirely, as any good that can happen to mee and mine.

Your Nameleſſe Well-willer, deſirous to be knowne to none

but your Selfe,

To the Reader.

I Know (Gentle Reader) that (uſtome commands an Epiſtle to thee, for Fauourable Acceptance, and honeſt Entertainment of ſuch a great Labour. But I am (at this time) forced to Write vnto thee, both on the behalfe of my ſelfe and the Printer: in regard of many Eſcapes, which vſually chanceth in Printing, by reaſon, that immediately after the Bookes beginning, ſickneſſe & other infirmities, did bereaue him of his ſight. If therefore any thing do or may appeare offenſiue, either in Method or Matter, I would not haue thee diſpleaſed in any thing whatſoeuer, or that any Argument thorough the whole Booke, ſhould be (in the leaſt degree) preiudiciall to thee. Therefore, accept it with like Loue and Kindneſſe, as it is ſent vnto thee, in Honeſt Affection and

The First Booke.

Of God.

CHAP. I.

SAint AVGVSTINE expounding that saying of DAVID, Dixit insipiens in corde suo, Non est Deus; The foole hath said in his heart, There is no God: doeth most euidently declare, that there is not a more miserable conditiō on the earth, then that of Atheists. For there is no Nation so barbarous, but it beleeues that there is some Diuinitie; or holds opinion, that there must needes be an Essence of a first efficient cause, the producer of all thinges else whatsoeuer; because the vertue of the God-head hath such powerful efficacie, that it very manifestly declares it selfe, to al such as haue the lest tast of Reason. Aristotle writes, That all thinges, as well superiour as inferiour, were at the first well ordained, and are still much better gouerned, by the opinion and iudgement of one onely, than of many together: because it is very necessarie, that by and from that sole beginning, all things should bee continued, ordered, & disposed. And heereupon was it, that Cicero and Varro made a meere mockery at the plurality of Gods. Damascene, considering with himselfe, how the whole World was so well ordered and ruled; saide: It was impossible, that things so contrarie and dissemblable, could alwaies consort and agree together, but by the gouernment of one onely Commander.

Neuertheless, wee behold so much contrariety & dissimilitude in this world (as of Heat to cold, Light to darkenesse, each of these contending for particular Regiment) as no vnitie or concordance in them can be expected, but darkneſſe wold continuallie haue the vpper hand, and neuer yeild any admittance to light: whereas we now perceiue, that the one in equality enſueth the other, by courſe or compaſſe more infallible then a clock, conſonant to the times & ſeaſons ſo well appointed by God. Heat alſo wold alwaies repulſe the Cold, and rule in an ouer violent extremity, beyond the abilitie of any ſufferance: whereby we may gather, the vrgent neceſſitie, that there ſhold be one alone, by whoſe commaund they ought to bee directed, and conſtrained to keepe that equalitie, which he hath aſſigned them.

The neceſsity of one onely commaunder ouer al things

Moreouer, it is the propertie of God, to be perfect in all thinges; All Iuſt, Almighty, al Mercifull, nothing being any way oppoſite or contrary vnto him. So that if there ſhould bee many Gods, it muſt then enſue as an eſpeciall Maxime, that they muſt needs be all alike, or different in their powers. If they be all alike, or equall, why then they can be but al as one: for diſsimilitude maketh the diuerſity of things onely. For this cauſe, is Ieſus Chriſt all one with God his Father, being wholly equall and like vnto him. But if there wer many Gods, diſſemblable or differing in their equality; it is apparant that they could not be iuſtly called Goddes, if there bee any imperfection in one, more then is in the other. For, he that is abſolute & moſt perfect, muſt needs be God, in regard that there is no imperfection found in him; and then, the other (being impotent, or imperfect) cannot bee tearmed Gods, but muſt needs ſubmit their vtmoſt power, to the others perfect priuiledge. It is neceſſary therefore, that there ſhould be but one God only, as (in very truth) there is no more then one; who is eaſie enough to be knowne by his Workes and effects, as the ſole beginning of all things: and yet notwithſtanding hath no beginning or ending. He created all thinges of nothing; he is inuiſible, and cannot be any way ſeene in his eſſence, according as Saint Paul ſaith; Quem nullus hominum vidit, ſed nec videre poteſt: Whom neuer man ſaw, neither can ſee.

The abſolute perfection of God in all things whatſoeuer.

Ieſus Chriſt is all one with God his Father.

A note worthy obſeruation.

God is eaſily knowne by his Workes.

God is inuiſible.

1. Tim. 6, 16.

Saint Iohn, in the firſt Chapter of his Goſpell ſaith; Deum nemo vidit vnquam, vnigenitus Filius, qui eſt in ſinu Patris; ipſe enarrauit, no man hath ſeen God at any time, the onely begotten Sonne, which is in the boſome of his Father, he hath declared him. And Ieſus Chriſt is the Image of the inuiſible God, becauſe God the Father (as Chryſoſtome ſaith,) Hath no forme, quality, or any body. And if he be all in all, and by all, why then it is moſt certaine, that hee can communicate himſelfe and appeare to the ſight of men (according to his owne pleaſure) by any thing ſubiect to him, without any imitation of himſelfe. But if wee ſpeake of the Sacred Scriptures, we ſhall finde there mention to be made of head, lips, mouth, armes, feete, eyes, eares, and other members of God; yet are not theſe things to be carnally vnderſtood, and according to the killing Letter, as ſome Iddiot ignorant people are drawn to beleeue, who do imagine, that God (in his Nature) is like vnto man, that he is ſeated on high in heauen vpon a Royall ſeate, and in a certaine place, ſomewhat anſwereable to the ſaying of Eſay; Cœlum ſedes mea, terra autem ſcabellum pedum meorum, The Heauen is my Throne, and the Earth is my foot-ſtoole. And as the ſame Prophet ſpeaketh in another place, Vidi Dominum ſedentem ſuper ſolium excelſum & eleuatum, I ſaw the Lorde ſitting vpon an high throne, and lifted vp. No, no, theſe things are otherwiſe to be vnderſtood, and his high Maieſty comprehended figuratiuely, and according to the quickning ſpirit.

Eſay 6, 1.

If any man (ſaith holy Anſelme) doe beleeue that God hath human members and motions, or perturbations of ſoule, as wee haue; aſſuredly, hee doth but forge meere Idols in his heart. And therefore, wee are to knowe, that ſuch phraſe and manner of Language in the ſacred Scriptures, is properly vſed, to make our rude and dull vnderſtanding, the more apprehenſiue of the vnſpeakeable Maieſty and greatneſſe of the Lord and Father of all Worlds. For, he being iuuiſible, and yet willing to manifeſt himſelfe vnto his people, doth accomodate his preſence to men, by an Analogie of ſuch things as are moſt frequent and familiar to them. For example, when it is ſaid, That God ſpeaketh in vs; It is to be vnderſtood, that hee is diſcouered, manifeſted and reuealed in our hearts. Or, when God ſpeaketh; that is, his inſpiring (into (into the spirits of the iust) his wil, or reuealing vnto them succeeding things, as he did vnto the holy Prophets. The hand of the Lord (in sacred writ) plainly signifyeth his might, power, and assistance; as God answered Moses, saying; The hand of the Lord, is it shortned? And S. Luke speaking of Saint Iohn Baptist, saith; The hand of the Lord was with him; that is to say, his power and helpe. Sometimes the hand of God is taken for his vengeance, as in Exodus, Et viderunt Egyptios mortuos super littus maris, & manum magnam quam exercuerat Dominus contra eos; And Israell saw the Egyptians dead on the Sea bank, and the great hand which the lord had shewed vpon them.

The right hand of God, that is, the Son of God, otherwise called the glory of his Father; the euerlasting blessednesse, or, euery creature exalted vp to heauen, and on earth: euen as by Gods left hand, the Reprobate Creatures are vnderstoode; as the Deuill, the wicked and peruerse. The face of God, that is, the inuisible essence of the Godhead of his Sonne; whereof God speaking to Moyses by his Angel, saide; Non poteris videre faciem meam, non enim videbit homo, & viuet; Thou canst not looke vpon my face, for there shal no man see me, and liue. And a little after, Videbis posteriora mea, faciē autem meam videre non poteris. Thou shalt see my backe parts, but my face shal not be seene. As if he would haue said, Thou shalt see mine incarnation in the latter dayes, but my God-head or Diuinity thou canst not see.

The feete of God, doe signifie the incarnation of his sonne, being subiected to the God-head, as are the feete to the head. For as by the heade the Diuinity is vnderstood; euen so, by the feet is the humanity expressed. Sometimes by Gods feet, the holy Preachers and Doctors of the Church, are signified, of whom it is writtē in Deuteronomy. Qui appropinquant pedibus eius, accipient de doctrina illius, They that come neere his feet, shall receiue his Doctrine. By the finger of God (in the singuler number) the Holy-Ghost is figured, according to that place in Exodus; Et dixerunt malefici ad Pharaonem; Digitus Dei est hic; Then saide the Enchanters vnto Pharaoh; This is the Finger of GOD. And IESVS CHRIST himselfe, in Saint Luke, saith; Si in digito Dei eijcio Dæmonia? &c. If by the Finger of God I cast out Deuils? &c. In like manner is it of the other Corporall partes and mouings of the spirit, attributed to God, which euermore are to be interpreted spiritually; as S. Iohn Damascene very well declareth in these wordes: Multa igitur quæ ad Deum spectant tenui quadam & obscura cognitione percipiuntur commode, & propriè nequeunt efferri. Itaque loquemes de ijs quæ supra nos sunt, cogimur vti verbis nobis congruentibus. Ex quo fit vt Deo & somnū & iram, & securitatem, & manus, & pedes, & alia eiusmodi tribuamus. There are many thinges which concerne God, that in signification doe carrie an obscure construction, and cannot properlie be deliuered. Wherefore, in speaking of those which are aboue vs, we striue to vse apt and congruent wordes to our capacity; whereby ensueth, that sleepe, anger, ease, hands, feete, and other such like, may seeme to be ascribed vnto God.

The wrath or anger of GOD, is not any disquiet or perturbation of his Soule, but (according to Saint Augustine.) It is a Iudgement, whereby the sin of anger is punished. For when it is saide in Genesis; Pœnituit eum quod hominem fecisset in terra; The Lord repented that he had made Man in the Earth: It is not to be vnderstood, that God repented himselfe as a Man dooth, for any thing displeasing him: for iudgement of all thinges is to bee fully defined, as the fore-knowledge of them is sure and certaine. And the sacred Scriptures in vsing such wordes, doe not yet implie any such signification. For when the Word Diuine (Iesus Christ himselfe) spake to his Apostles, and likewise to the Pharisies; his speech was many times by Parables, and making comparison of heauenlie thinges, euen by such as were most familiarlie knowne vppon Earth. Whereupon we reade, that one while (in the Gospell) he cals himselfe a Treasure, another time a Shepheard; sometime a Lambe, then againe a Lyon; in one place a Light, in another, a Vine, a Rocke, the Way, &c. And for as much, as there is great difference betweene him and vs, therefore it is verie necessarie, that he should be vnderstood of Men by some especiall Accident; that is to say, by the meanes of reason and such knowledge, as they are best able Origen, contra Celsum Lib. 6.

God is not limited or confined to any prescribed place, but where himselfe best liketh to be.

The Eternall Father of Heauen then dooth neuer goe in any knowne way, neyther walkes or wanders; hee neuer sleepes, or rayseth himselfe from slumbering, but continueth alwayes in his place, or where his minde best liketh to be. He cannot be touched or seene; yet he clearely seeth and vnderstandeth all thinges: not with any Corporeall eyes or eares, but by absolute power, which cannot sufficientlie be expressed. He beholdes and knowes all actions in this World, nothing euer being, or can bee hidden from him: yet notwithstanding, hee neuer mooueth himselfe, or can be mooued by any power, neyther can bee comprized or contained in any place; no, not within the whole circumference of the wide World, because he was before the Worldes were formed, as much as to say; as from all Eternitie. He hath no neede of Name, or of any thing else, for (as Trismegistus saith;) God is one, and one hath no need of any Name.

God hath no Name.

God then hath no Name, because he is onely and alone, nor is there any vse (with vs) of any propper vocable, but onely for peculiar difference from the multitude, to the end, that each person may be distinguished by his apt appellation. But because that GOD is euermore one and alone; his true Name is GOD, which in-effable Name in Hebrew, consisteth in one Word, composed of foure Letters, יהוה IEHOVAH, of which descendeth the Verbe היה, HAIAH, Fuit, which is as much to say; as He was, is, & shall be, and which absolutely declareth his true propertie, for God hath beene alwayes, and shall bee eternally. Aeternitas enim nec tempus est, nec vlla temporis pars: For Eternitie is not time, neyther any part of time. And almost all Nations and Languages, doe especiallie write and pronounce the Word (whereby the Name of GOD is specified) with Foure Letters, which is a number euen and perfect, because he hath no imperfection in him.

All Nations write & pronounce the Name of God with foure Letters.

Beside our proofe already made of the Hebrewes; The Persians doe write the Name of God with Foure Letters, ωρὼ; The Wizards of Persia ὀρὼ; The Arabes, Alla; The Assyrians, Adad; The Ægyptians, θωὺθ, or θεὺς; The Græcians, ΘΕΟΣ ἀπὸ θεῖν, à currendo, of running; Quod vbique dum opus sit accurrat, adsit, opemque ferat; siue ab vrendo, quod improbos habitus comburat, quando, ex ea re & ignis consumens dicitur. That euerie where (while neede requireth) he runneth, is there present, and giueth helpe: Or else of burning, that he will burne the dwelling of the wicked, when he is saide to be a consuming fire to them.

B. Westhmer in pirasm. diuin. Script.

The difference of Godsname in varietie of writing it.

So doth Gregorie the Great, (called the Diuine) interpret it in his second Prayer to the Sonne. Or whether it be of the Verbe θεωται, as much to say, as to contemplate. The Latines breaking the Greeke word, in stead of θεὸς, say Deus; The French-men, Dieu; The Spaniards, Dios; The Italians, Idio; The Dutch, Gott; The English and Scots, Godd; with a double Letter d, as hath been obserued in Antiquitie. There are some likewise, that doe yeelde another reason, and say; that the Name of God is contained in Foure Letters, to demonstrate thereby, that it is hee who hath made and formed all thinges, that they are composed of Foure Elements, and that hee made also the Foure Elements themselues, which doe rule ouer all thinges created in this World. But Moyses asking of God, by what Name he would be called; God gaue him this answere: Ego sum, qui sum; I am that I am, I am he that is: the Hebrewes say, Ero qui ero, expressing thereby his Nature, that hee is Eternall, without any ending; as if they would say (speaking in his person) I am truelie hee that is, and with me there is no change or alteration. Then sending Moses to the Hebrewes, to be their Guide, Prince, and Conducter, hee commaunded him to tell them: that He which is, or I am, hath sent me vnto you. Now because wee are are not able (of our ſelues) to comprehend him, or to attaine vnto the intire knowledge of him, in regard of the imbecillity of our frail vnderſtanding: we finde in the Scriptures many Epithets and appellations, anſwerable to the manifold effects of his power, rule, and diuinitie.

He is called α and ω, Alpha and Omega, which are the firſt and laſt Letters of the Greeke Alphabet: becauſe hee is both the beginning and the end, and yet there is neyther beginning nor ending in him. His Epithets are, Almightie, Strong, Great, Incomprehenſible, Vncircumſcribde, Vnchangeable, Truth, Holie of Holies, King of Kings, Moſt powerfull, wonderfull; and diuers other beſide. Some haue thus defined him. GOD is a Spirit, holie and true, of whom onely and cheefly proceede the beginning, the action and mouing of all thinges that are: To whom, and to the Glory of whom, the end and concluſion of all thinges are referred. Cicero (ſo well as hee could) defined him in manner following. Deus mens eſt quædam ſoluta & libera, ſegregata ab omni concretione mortali, omnia ſentiens & mouens, ipſaque prædita motu ſempiterno. God is a certaine intelligence, or Spirit, free and ready, ſeparated from all Mortall mixture or concretion, knowing and mouing all thinges, and hauing in himſelfe an eternall motion.

Holy Iuſtine Martyr, in his Dialogue with Tryphon the Iew, defines God in this order. I call Him God, that hath Eſſence of himſelfe, and is continually permanent in one and the ſame kind, without receiuing any change, and hath giuen both beginning and forme to all thinges created. PHILEMON (as the ſame Martyr declareth) deſcribes him verie breefely thus;

What thing is God? Truely, him God I call; That (being vnſeene,) is he that ſeeth all.

All which Definitions, and many more beſide, can giue vs no true knowledge of the Eſſence of GOD, becauſe it is wholly Incomprehenſible. Therefore he cannot be truly deſcribed or defined, as very learnedly the Philoſopher Symonides anſwered. For he being demanded by Hierom, What God was; and hauing a whole dayes reſpite graunted him to returne his anſwere; when that time would not ſerue him, but three dayes more were allowed him; at laſt, when he came to make his reply to the queſtion, he ſaid; The more I ſtriue to conſider what God is, the more difficult I finde the matter to be. The Philoſophers ſay, that definition may wholy ſpecify the proportion of a thing; or his kinde, quality, difference, or ſome peculiar Accident: all which ſeuerall thinges are not to bee found in God, which is the reaſon, that he cannot bee defined or comprehended. Wherefore I will conclude this point with Saint Auguſtines opinion; Solus Deus eſt altiſſimus, quo altius nihil eſt: Onely GOD is moſt High, aboue whom there is nothing higher. And in another place; Quid eſt Deus? eſt id quod nulla attingit opinio. What is God? It is that which no opinion can reach vnto.

CHAP. II.

Of the works which God created in ſix daies, and what day the Angels were created; with diuers other high and ſpeciall matters, worthy our knowledge.

IN the beginning GOD created Heauen & earth, and when the Earth could not appeare or bee diſcerned, (being couered with an huge profound darkeneſſe, becauſe that darkeneſſe was vppon the deepes; that is to ſay, vpon ſome confuſion, not diſtinguiſhed from the Earth and the Water, and the Spirit would walke vpon that Chaos aboue the Waters; to wit, vppon the Earth, which was hidden vnderneath them:) GOD commaunded Light to bee made, and when the Light was cleare, he diuided this bright ſplendour from the darknes; naming the one, Day; and the other, Night: The beginning of the Day, Morning; and the beginning of the Night, Euening. All this was done the firſt day, which Moyſes tearmeth to be one day. On the ſecond day, he placed the Firmament of heauen, aboue all other things of this worlde, and ſundering it from the reſt, ſeated it alone by it ſelfe, as in a particular ranke or limit: & roofing it round about with congealed yce, tempered it ſufficiently with a moiſt and watry Nature, to the end, that the earth might be duely watered.

The third day.

The third day, hauing commaunded the Waters into their meet abyding, he cauſed the dry Land to ſhew it ſelfe, enguirting (as in a Girdle) all the Earth with the Seas: and the very ſame Day, the Plants (with their Seedes) came foorth of the Earth.

The fourth day.

The fourth day, he fixed two great Lampes or Lights in the Firmament of Heauen: the one exceeding in greatneſſe, to gouerne the Day; and the other ſomewhat leſſe, to rule the Night: theſe were the Sun and Moone. Then did hee alſo ſpangle it with Starres, by whoſe influences, and hidden Vertues, he commanded that the reuolutions and ſeaſons of the yeare ſhould be obſerued.

The fift day.

The fift day, hee ſent Creatures abroad, both to flye and ſwimme: the Fowles aloft in the Aire, and the Fiſhes beneath in the Waters; vniting them ſeuerally by a deſirous inſtinct, to meete and company together, onely for the propagation of encreaſe, and multiplying in their ſeperate kinds.

The ſixt day.

The ſixt day, he created the foure-footed beaſts, Male and Female, tame and wilde. The ſame day alſo hee formed Man, which day is called, the tenth of the Calends of Aprill. For, it was neceſſary (ſaith Adon Arch-Biſhop of Vienna) that the ſecond Adam, ſleeping in a viuifying death, onely for the ſaluation of Men: ſhould ſanctifie his Spouſe the Church, by thoſe Sacraments that were deriued out of his ſide, euen vpon the ſelf-ſame day, not only of the Week, but alſo of the month, wherein he had created Adam our firſt Father, & (out of one of his ſides) had brought foorth EVA his wife; to the end (that by her helpe) mankind might be encreaſed.

Adon in his Chronicle.

An eſpeciall note, woorth Obſeruation.

Behold, how the Father of all Eternity created this World, and made it of viſible matter, and which (in regarde of the beautie and adornment) is ſo called by the Greekes, κόσμος that is to ſay; Fayre, or Beautifull. Man he made by the Workemanſhip of his owne hands, not onely to liue and enioy the goods of the earth; but for a more eſpecial and principall end, to wit; that hee might bee known and magnified of him. This creation of al things, was fully perfected in ſix dayes, for the compleate perfection of the number ſixe, not that anie ſuch length of time was needfull to GOD, or that hee could not haue created all things together, as he did (in this ſpace) by conuenable moouings, according as Salomon (in his Eccleſiaſticus) ſaith he did. Qui viuit in æternum, creauit omnia ſimul. He that liueth for euer, created all things together. Whereunto Saint Baſil, Saint Auguſtine, Saint Dioniſius, S. Ambroſe, Bede and Caſsiodorus do conſent, ſaying: That God created, or brought forth al things together.

Conſent of the Fathers.

Peter Lombard, ſir-named Maiſter of the Sentences, in the ſecond diſtinction of his ſecond Booke, by Authoritie deriued from Eccleſiaſticus, maketh this expoſition. The bodily Nature and matter of the foure Elementes, was created with the ſpirituall creature, that is to ſay; with the ſoule, and with the Angels, who were created together. To maintain this, he brings in the iudgement of S. Auguſtine, vppon this place of Geneſis, ſaying; That by Heauen and earth, ought to be vnderſtoode, the Spirituall and Corporeall Nature, which was created at the beginning, to wit, of time. Heer you may note then, how the ſcriptures are to be cõprehended, & they to be ſought into generally ouer, without inſtance vpon any curious wreſting. In another place of the ſame Booke of Eccleſiaſticus, it is ſaide, Prior omnium creata eſt Sapientia: Wiſedome hath bin created before all things. Yet heereby is not to be vnderſtood, either God, or his ſon, who is the Wiſedome of the Father. For, God was not created at all; the Sonne was begotten, & therefore neither made or created: and all the holye Trinity is but one Wiſedome, which hath not beene made, created, or begotten, but proceeding.

Ieſus the Sonne of Syrach, hee vnderſtandeth by this Wiſedome wherof we ſpeake, the Angellical Nature, often termed in the Scriptures, Life, Wiſedom, and Light: for the Angels are called, & ſaide to bee vnderſtanding. And albeit they were created ſo ſoone as Heauen and Time, yet are they neuertheleſſe, ſaid to be firſt created, by reaſon of their order and and dignitie, being (indeede) moſt worthy Creatures. Nor were theſe Angelicall powers created for any neede, or neceſſitie that God had of them: but to the end, that he might be contemplated, praiſed, and that his liberalitie ſhould be more aboundantly knowne.

But why then is it written, that God created all thinges together, ſeeing in the beginning of Geneſis, it is ſaide; that God produced theſe bodily ſubſtances, by pauſes and diuerſity of daies? Dioniſius Ribellus, a religious Monke, hath heereunto made a very profound aunſwere; whoſe very wordes therefore I was the more willing to ſet downe, that the learned and curious (in ſo high queſtions) might be ſatisfied. Omnia hæc ſimul creata ſunt, vel materialiter, ſeu quantum ad eorum materiam, vel exemplariter, vel in genere, vel ſimilitudine. De iſto enim ſunt tres opiniones, vno dicentium; quod omnia vno inſtante à Deo producta & condita ſunt in materijs & ſubſtantialibus formis ſuis: & formatio ſequens intelligatur quantum ad formas accidentales. Omnia inquam, id eſt omnes principales partes mundi, ſcilicet corpora cæleſtia & elementa. Alia opinio eſt dicentium, quod Cælum empyreum cum Angelis, factum ſit cum informi materia corporalium rerum, & poſtea in opere ſex dierum, materia illa diſtincta ſit per formas ſubſtantiales: ſic tamen, quod fuit informis, id eſt, generali forma corporeitatis actuata. Tertia eſt, quod omnia ſimul producta ſint, cum primis individuis ſpecierum perfecta in ſubſtantialibus et accidentalibus formis, & ſex dies ſint vnus dies ſex rerum diſtinctionibus repreſentatus: quæ opinio ſubtilior & naturali rationi conſonantior reputatur. Sed aliæ duæ videntur ſcripturæ Geneſeos amplius concordare. Nam & gloſſa hic ait: Rerum ſubſtantia ſimul eſt creata, ſed non ſimul per ſpecies eſt formata: & ſimul exſtitit per ſubſtantiam materiæ, non ſimul apparuit per ſubſtantiam formæ.

The anſwere to a very ſerious obiection

Dioniſ. Ribellus in Lib. de creat. Mund. Chap. 2.

¶ All theſe thinges are ſaid to be created together, eyther Materially, in regard of their quantity of matter; or Exemplarily, eyther in kinde or likeneſſe. Of theſe there are three opinions; one ſaying, that al things (in one inſtant) were by God brought forth, and builded in their materiall and ſubſtantiall formes, and the formation of them is to be vnderſtood, according to accidentall ſhape or faſhion. I ſay all, that is, all the principall partes of the World; to wit, Celeſtiall, and Elementall bodies. Another opinion ſaith, that the higheſt Heauen with the Angels, were made bodily thinges of indigeſted matter, and afterward, in ſixe dayes labour or worke, that matter was diſtinctly made into ſubſtantiall formes: but yet ſo, that the indigeſted matter, beeing before in generall forme, receiued ſpeedie and bodily ſhape. The third is, that all thinges were created together, in their firſt vndiuided kindes, perfected in ſubſtantiall and accidentall formes, and ſixe dayes were but one day, diſtinctly repreſenting ſixe ſeuerall thinges. Which opinion, to more ſubtile and naturall reaſon is accounted conſonant. But the other two doe more fully and amply concord with the Scripture of Geneſis. For the Gloſſe it ſelfe ſaith; The ſubſtance of thinges were created together, but not formed together in their ſeuerall kinds: and together they were digeſted by ſubſtance of matter, but yet appeared not together in ſubſtantiall forme.

Moreouer, after Moyſes (in his firſt Chapter of Geneſis) hath declared, what thinges were created on each of the ſixe dayes: Wherefore, then in the ſecond Chapter of the ſame Booke, doth hee ſpeake but of one day onely, by way of Epilogue (as it were) to all that he had diſtinctly deſcribed before? Saying. Iſta ſunt generationes cæli & terræ, quando creatæ ſunt, in die quo fecit Deus cælum & terram. Theſe are the Generations of the Heauen and the Earth, when they were created, in the day that the Lord God made the Earth and the Heauens. Seemes he not (in theſe words) to maintaine a great contradiction? If all thinges were made in ſixe dayes, how can it be ſaide then, in one day onely? Heereunto I anſwere, that in this place, we muſt not take the dayes according as they denoate the diſtinction of Times, for God (as I ſaide before) had not any neede of time: but by reaſon of the workes of perfection, which is ſignified and compleated by the number of ſix, which firſt is accompliſhed in his partes. And therefore, the reaſon of the number is not to bee miſprized, as being of any ſlender dignitie. For Auenzoar the Babylonian ſaith; That he which knowes to number well, knoweth directly all thinges. And it was not ſpoken in vaine, but to the praiſes of God; Omnia in menſura & numero, & pondere diſpoſuiſti. Thou haſt ordered all thinges in meaſure, measure, waight, and number. And it is saide in Ecclesiasticus, *Arena maris, & pluuiæ guttas, & dies seculi quis dinumerauit? Who can number the sands of the sea, & the drops of the raine, and the daies of the world? who can nũber the height of Heauen, the bredth of the earth, and the deapth? But onely the Workeman of them, and the all-ruling wisedome. Of the seauenth day.

Wherefore Moſes nameth one day onlie after the other ſixe.

Wherefore God sanctified the seauenth day.

Concerning the seauenth day, which is also among the Hebrewes a name of perfection, and by them much celebrated: God reposed himselfe from all his workes, and sanctified it. Not as if hee were weary, or ouer-spent with trauell; but because he ceased from making any other new Creature, hauing already created whatsoeuer he would, and the nature and formes whereof, had neuer beene before. For this reason also, the Iewes doe take truce with their labours, on such a day as they tearme their Sabbath, calling it by an Hebrew Word, which signifieth rest. In stead whereof, we that are Christians, doe solemnize Sunday, which is the first of the Sabbaths, and the eight day, because that our Sauiour Iesus Christ, Sonne of the euer-liuing GOD, arose againe from the dead vpon the like day. The Hebrewes held in great honour the Septenarie number, because of the Sabbath, and it hath beene an especiall religious Mystery: the praise and renowne whereof, Gregorie Nazianzene, a Greek Author, discourseth in an Oration that he made of Pente-cost. Aulus Gellius, and Macrobius, haue also at large described the efficacy thereof. Chalcidius saith, that the Pythagorians commended this number, as the most naturall, absolute, and perfect.

How the number of seauen is framed.

The number of Three is the first imperfect number: the number of Foure is two whole paires, and of these two is the number of Seuen composed. And for this reason, it is often taken and vsed for vniuersall and infinite. Wee read, that God saith in Leuiticus: Addam correptiones vestras septuplum propter peccata vestra: I will punish you seauen times more,

Leuit. 26, 18.

according to your sinnes. And the Royall Psalmist saith; Eloquia Domini, eloquia casta, argentum igne examinatum, probatum terræ, purgatum septuplum. The words of the Lord are pure wordes, as the Siluer tryed in a Furnace of Earth, and which is fined Seuen fold. And we haue the like in many places of Scripture.

Psalme 12, 6.

There are also great Mysteries for Christian Religion, contained in this Septenarie number, wherby the whole perfection of the Church is signified. Herevpon was it, that Saint Iohn wrote to the Seuen Churches of Asia; declaring (by this meanes) that hee writ to the flowing fulnesse of one onely. The Wise-man in the Prouerbs saith: Sapientia ædificauit sibi domum, excidit columnas septem. Wisedome hath built her house, and set Seuen Pillars vnder to support it. There are Seuen gifts or gracious workings of the Holy-Ghost, whereof the Prophet Esay in diuers places maketh mention. God also betooke himselfe to rest the Seuenth day; but yet wee must not thereby vnderstand, that God had done any actuall labour in his working: for he onely but spake, and it was done; yea, by an Eternall Word, and not a Temporall. But the rest of God, doth (indeede) signifie the rest of them that rest in God: euen as the ioy of the House, implyeth nothing else, but the ioy of them that doe, or are to reioyce in the house; neuertheless, it is not the House onely that makes them ioyfull, but some especiall matter thereby presupposed. This is then the manner of speech, when we would signifie or expresse the thing contained, by the matter which containeth, and by the efficient, that which is already done. For when Moyses saide, that GOD rested or reposed himselfe: very conuenably is vnderstood thereby, the repose and quiet of them that rest in him, because he onely is the cause of their rest.

Dan. 3, 57, 58 59.

Pſalme 148, 1

To ſay that the Angels were created after all thoſe other thinges, which are reckoned to be made in the ſixe dayes, were an abſurdity moſt intollerable. For God ſaith in Iob: Cum me laudarent aſtra matutina, & iubilarent omnes filij Dei: which wordes are thus tranſlated, and very ſignificantly; When the Starres of the morning praiſed me, all mine Angels, or the Sonnes of God, extolled mee with a loud voyce. And the Starres were made the fourth day, but yet the ſame Saint Auguſtine is of this opinion: That the Angels and incorruptible Soules, were created the firſt day, and that the Soule of Adam was created before his Bodie, like as the Angels were, and afterward diuinely infuſed. For when God ſaid; Let there be Light, and there was Light: the Creation of the Angels is vnderſtood in that Light, and without all queſtion to the contrary, they were and are, made partakers of the Light Eternall, which is the ſelfe-ſame vnchangeable Wiſedome of God, and the Word Diuine, by which, all other thinges were made. So doth Rupertus expound that place, in his Booke of the workes of the Holie-Ghoſt, ſaying, Videtur nonnullis Lucem tunc eſſe factam, non aliam quam aeris illuſtrationem: ſed melius magni & nominatiſſimi patres intellexerunt naturam Angelicam lucis nomine ſignificatam. Nec pro ſimilitudine, ſed prorè vera Angelica creatura dicta eſt Lux. There was then no Light at all ſeene to bee made, none other then the Ayres illuſtration: But great and many worthy Fathers haue better vnderſtood it, that the Name of Light ſignified the Angelicall Nature. Not for any ſimilitude, but for a certaine truth, that when Light was commaunded, the Angels were created.

The Angels were not created after all other thinges.

And when it is ſaide; That God ſeparated the Light from the Darkneſſe, by that diuiſion is likewiſe vnderſtood, the dreadfull and terrible Iudgment of God againſt the Deuill; Becauſe that from whence the Light came, thence alſo deſcended the Darkeneſſe; to wit, the euil Angels: who were created good in nature, but they would not continue in that excellent puritie. And therefore, of bright ſhining Angels of Light, thorough their own ſinne, they were made blacke Deuils of Darkneſſe.

CHAP. III.

Of the good Angels, and of their Orders and Offices.

HAuing diſcourſed in the precedent Chapter, of the Creation of the Angels, I hold it now very meete and requiſite, to ſet down in this ſucceeding Chapter, a breeſe, but neceſſary obſeruation, concerning the diuiſion which the Thalmudiſts haue made of them; as alſo vvhat Dionyſius Areopagita, and other Chriſtian Authors, haue written of the Angels, who are the Miniſters, Meſſengers, Ambaſſadours, and Legats of God, for vvhich reaſon they are named in Greek Αγγελοι. They are vvithout bodies, or compoſition of matter, Corporeally impaſſible, but not in ſpirit: for the Scripture ſaith, that they glad or reioyce themſelues, greeue themſelues, loue, and feare. They are altogether good by Creation and Subſtance; and ſome haue beene made euill by Election; and therefore, are ſeparated from them that continue good ſtill. But my purpoſe is, to diſcourſe (in this place) of the Good Angels onely, and of the Celeſtiall Hierarchie, vvhich conſiſteth of nine ſeuerall Orders of Angels.

they constitute to bee those Angels, by whom God diuided or dispersed the Chaos. The third, אראלים Aralim; They are they, by whom the Name of GOD is conioyned or formed היהוה Haiehova, and by them God distributeth fluxible matter. The fourth חשמאלים Hacemalim: They are those Angels, by whom God formeth and shapeth bodies. The fift Order, שרפים Seraphim, by whom God appointeth and sendeth forth the Elements. Of the sixt Order, are מלכים Melachim; By these Angels, God ordereth and produceth Mettals. The seuenth, are אלהים Elohim: These are those Angels, by whom God bringeth forth Hearbes, Rootes, Plants, and all vegetables. Of the eight degree, are בני אלהים Bene Elohim: by this Order of Angels, God disposeth all kindes of Beasts and Animals. The ninth and last, are כרובים Cherubim: by these Angels, doth God shape and produce mankind, or Men.

The Diuines and Schoole-men, doe diuide the Celestiall Hierarchie of Angels, into three Classes or Companies, and nine seuerall Orders. The first, second, and third Orders, are of the first Classe or ranke. Of the first Order, are the Seraphims, who are the very neerest vnto GOD; according as mention is made of them in the sixt Chapter of Esay. The second, are the Cherubims, as in the same place of Esay, Ezechiel the 6. Psalme 28. 79. The third, the Thrones, as Saint Paule in the first to the Colossians. The fourth, fift, and sixt Orders, are of the second Classe. Of the fourth order, are the Dominations: Of the fift, the Principalities; and of the sixt, the Powers. The seuenth, eight, and ninth Orders, doe appertaine to the third Classe. Of the seuenth, are the Vertues: Of the eight, the Arch-angels; And of the ninth, the Angels.

The Orders of the first and second Classe, are for the contemplation and disposition of those thinges, which the others are to act and put in effect. They of the third Classe, their Office onely is Action and Execution. These good Angels, doe often and many times giue fauour, ayde, and assistance to men inuisibly; And sometimes do appeare vnto them, in such forme, as is fitting to the Mystery, and as best may be conceiued by him, to whom such a liberall grace is granted. As in elder times they appeared in the forme of a Wheele, of Beastes, of a Man hauing Wings, of young men, of Sheepheards, and such like Figures. Sometimes also, GOD makes vs to vnderstand his will, onelie by the voice of his Angels, without any visible sight of them: as appeared by Hagar, who onely but heard the Angel speaking from Heauen to her, shewing her the water, and fore-telling the manners and actions of the Infant Ismael. In the like manner, Abraham onely heard the Angel speake vnto him, letting him vnderstand the will of God, and yet hee sawe him not. By the like inuisible meanes, the Prophet Habbacuk (enstructed by the voyce of an Angel) was caried in the ayre by the haire of his head, and set vpon the Denne wherein Daniel was imprisoned, to bring him sustenance to eat. And so did the Lord speak by his Angell very plainely, three times vnto young Samuel, foretelling him the death of the High-Priest Heli, and his Children.

Without voyce also or speaking, the Angels do deliuer the pleasure of God, as many times in Dreames, and other manner beside. For our Soules beeing Spirits, and the Angels Spirits also, they haue no neede of any Instrument or Corporal Organe, whereby to communicate together whatsoeuer GOD hath commaunded, the spirituall proportion (onely) being sufficient to performe it. God likewise doth (otherwhiles) enstruct vs in his will, by visions and apparitions: as when God (by a Vision) caused Abraham to come forth of his House, to the end, that he might behold the Heauens, and count the nũber of the Starres; which only was but to shew him, how hee would encrease and multiply his Seede. By the Vision of the flaming Bush, Moyses apprehended the admirable secrets of vnreuealed matters. By the Vision of the Wheeles and Beastes, Ezechiel fore-tolde many thinges to happen. Saint Peter, by the Vision of the vncleane Beasts, had a reuelation, not to refuse trauaile for saluation of the Gentiles. And Saint Paul, by the Man of Macedonia, which (during the night time) hee beheld in a Vision, had had certain assurance, that God had called him to Preach the Gospell in Macedonia. Iudas Machabeus in like sort, expounding his Vision, whereby God had reuealed vnto him, the Prayers which Onias the deceased High-priest in his life time had made; armed all his people, with hope in God, to win the victory against Nicanor.

2. Macha. 15, 12.

And yet let me tell you, that Visions haue not beene reuealed to all men, as indifferently, or without especiall respect; but onely to holy persons elected of God, according as the Psalmist saith; God in a Vision hath spokē to his Saints. And all this hath been done by the Ministery of his Good Angels. And of those elect Vessels it is written; Videbunt filium hominis venientē innubibus Cæli, cum virtute multa & maiestate. Et mittet Angelos suos cum tuba & voce magna: & congregabunt electos eius à quatuor ventis à summis cælorum vsq; ad terminos eorum. They shall see the Sonne of man come in the clouds, with power & great glory. And he shal send his Angels with a great sound of a Trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect, from the foure Windes, and from the one ende of Heauen to the other. Then, as it followeth, when he commeth in his Glorie, and all his holy Angels beeing with him: he shall sit vpon the Throne of his Maiesty, to iudge the liuing and the dead, and shall separate the good from the euill. The one shall haue life eternall, and enioy this Theory in endlesse contemplation of God: and the other shall be thereof depriued, and depart into Hels perpetuall torments.

Visions haue not beene reuealed to all men.

CHAP. IIII.

Of this Earthlie, or Terrestriall Paradise, and of the foure Floodes thereto belonging.

MOYSES, proceeding on in his History of Genesis, from the originall beginning and birth of all thinges, saith; That GOD planted a Paradise in EDEN towardes the East, and there placed Man whom he had formed before. He caused also to grow out of the ground, all kind of Trees, both pleasing to the eye, and good to feed on, beside the Tree of Life. But the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, that he had appointed to grow in the midst of this Paradise. This word Paradise, is a Greeke word, descending neuertheless from the Hebrew Language, or much rather of the Persian or Chaldean, which calleth it PARDES, the Name whereof is vsed in certaine places of Scripture, and is as much to say; as A Garden of delights, an Orchard or place of pleasure, wherein nothing is wanting, to recreate the eye. Of this Name, Aulus Gellius writeth thus. Vinaria qua nunc vulgus dicit, sunt quos Greci παράδεισος appellant; That which the vulgar tearme the haunt of wilde Beasts, is that which the Grecians call Paradise.

Luke 23, 43. 2 Cor. 12, 4. Apoc. 2, 7.

Eden is a Region of Syria, known to the people of god from the time of the Prophets.

The holy Scriptures doe also denote by this Name, the Seate or habitation of the blessed; according as is expressed in Saint Luke. Et dixit illi Iesus, Amen dico tibi, hodie mecum eris in Paradiso. And Iesus said vnto him: verily I say vnto thee, to day thou shalt bee with mee in Paradise. The Apostle Saint Paul learned the very same Title, in his writing to the Corinthians, by these wordes. Scio hominem in Christo (siue in corpore siue extra corpus nescio: Deus scit) raptum huiusmodi vsque ad tertium cælum. Raptus est in Paradisum, &c. I know such a man (whether in the body or out of the bodie, I cannot tell, GOD knoweth) which was taken vp into the third Heauen. How that he was taken vp into Paradise, and heard wordes which cannot bee spoken, which are not possible for man to vtter. And in the Apocalypse. Vincenti, dabo edere de ligno vitæ, quod est in Paradiso Dei mei: To him that ouer-commeth, will I giue to eate of the Tree of Life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God.

Luke 23, 43.

Moreouer, that which in the Latine Interpretation, is saide to be Paradisum voluptatis, the selfesame holy Scripture speaks it thus in Hebrew, GANBEEDEN, which is so much to say; as The Garden in Eden; which the seauenty Interpreters haue translated, παράδεισον ἐν Ἐδέμ, Garden in Eden. The Chaldean Version is the selfe-same, whereby it plainely appeareth, that Eden is the proper name of the place where GOD (at first) had planted the Garden of delights: Not by taking the Grafts or Plants (saith Rupert) from from any other place: but (by the power of his Commaundement) made them there firſt of all to ſprout and bloſſome out of the Earth.

The Riuer in Eden, diuided into foure ſtreames or Currents.

This Garden is watered by a Spring or Riuer, which at the breaking from his maine head, doth diuide it ſelfe into foure ſeueral ſpreadings, or extenſions, and ſo do make foure great current waters or floods. One of theſe branching Armes, or wide ſwift Channels, is called פישון Phyſon, which is as much to ſay; as Multitude, or Many. And of the Grecians it is named Ganges, receiuing nineteene Riuers into the Lap thereof, and it enuironeth the Country of India, which Moyſes calleth Euilath, in regard of Euila, the Sonne of Iectan, and ſo diſchargeth it ſelfe into the Sea. Gold is ſaide there to create it ſelfe (as it were) likewiſe Bdelion, and the Onix ſtone. The Name of the ſecond Flood or Riuer, is גיחון which in Greeke is called Γεὼν, Geon, or Gihon; otherwiſe tearmed Nilus. This Riuer watereth all Æthyopia, it batheth all Egypt, and afterward ſhoots it ſelfe into the Mediterranean Sea. The third Flood, is היחל Hidechel, otherwiſe Tygris, by Interpretation; and it carries that name, onely in regard of his ſwift paſſage, ſtreame, or current: For they of Medea, doe giue the ſelfe-ſame Title to an Arrow. It is otherwiſe alſo called, Diglath; and paſſing along by a part of the Parthians, it enters into Aſſyria, and Meſopotamia, and afterward buries it ſelfe in the Red-Sea, which Iaques Phillip of Bergamo, holds to bee ſcarcely true. The fourth Flood, is הוא פרת Hu, Euphrates by Interpretation, which Ioſephus calleth Phora, that is to ſay; Diſperſion, or fructifying. It glides betweene Aſſyria and Meſopotamia, bedewing the Countries of the Armenians, Cappadocians, Syrians, Arabians, and Chaldeans, and ſeeking there to finiſh his race, ſhuts it ſelfe vp in the Perſian Sea, and not in the Red Sea; as Quintus Curtius, Herodotus, and Dyodorus, haue imagined.

There are three ſeuerall opinions concerning this Paradiſe, deliuered by Saint Auguſtine, in his learned labour vpon Geneſis. The firſt, doe vnderſtand Paradiſe to be Spirituall onely. The ſecond, hold it to be Corporall. And the third, ſuppoſe it to conſiſt of both; And yet theſe Doctours cannot agree in the ſcituation or certaine being of this Paradiſe. Saint Auguſtine (conſenting with Ioſephus) will haue it to bee in the Eaſt. Thereunto alſo, venerable Bede giues his allowance, adding moreouer; That it is round engirt with the Ocean Sea, ſeperated from the other parts of the World, and ſcituated vpon a Mountaine, whereon no man is able to goe, and ſo high (withall) that it toucheth the verie circle of the moon, and whereunto the Waters of the Deluge could neuer reach or come neere. Auicen, Polybius, and Eratoſthenes, are of another minde from Beda: for they ſuppoſe this Terreſtriall Paradiſe, to bee vnder the Equinoctiall, in a more temperate Region then any other. But this is contrary to the cenſure (almoſt) of all our elder Writers, who doe hold, that vnder the way of the Suns paſſage, there neuer was any habitation. For the Equinoctiall cuts the Zona torrida, euen through the middeſt, and toucheth the Zodiaque in two points; to wit, in the two Signes of Aries and Libra, where very good temperature is ſaid to be, the day being equally twelue houres all the whole year in light, and as many houres alſo of darkneſſe. Now they that take Paradiſe to be in the Eaſt, doe not farre differ from this opinion: becauſe the Equinoctiall circle hath both his Eaſt and Weſt degrees.

There are ſome, who by the flaming or burning Sword, doe vnderſtand the fierie Zoane of Heauen and Earth, euen there where the lightning breaks forth, & kindles the Thunder. Some Doctors ſay, that the exceeding temperature which is in this place, dooth cauſe ſuch continual welfare and health, that whoſoeuer happens to come there, can neuer dye: and therefore it is ſaide, that Henoch and Helias are yet liuing there. The certaine place of this Terreſtriall Paradiſe, cannot be truely gathered out of the holie Scriptures; albeit the Septuagint or ſeuen Interpreters, haue commonly traduced it to be in EDEN, and on the Eaſt-ſide. Other ſpeculatiſes, do affirme it to be in Syria, but Iohannes Scotus is none of that number, who ſaith; that in what place ſoeuer it is ſcituate, it may be ſaid to be in the Eaſt. Quilibet enim punctus in terra, poteſt intelligi eſſe ad orientem, in comparatione ad cœlum, vel reſpectu diuerſorum ſituum terræ, praterquam reſpectu duorum polorum; qui ſunt immo-

In whatſoeuer place of the Earth it is, it may be vnderſtood to be in the Eaſt, in eſtimation or regard of the Heauens, or reſpect of the Earths diuers ſcituations, beſide the view of the two Poles, which are immoueable. Saint Ambroſe ſaith; How can we deſcribe the ſcituation of Paradiſe, which we haue neuer ſeene? And if we could ſee it, yet ſhould we (neuertheleſſe) be reſtrained from reueuling it to others.

S. Ambroſe in Lib. de Paradi. & in Epiſt. Sabin. 42.

The things then that concerne this Garden of delights and happineſſe, doe out-ſtretch the ſenſe & capacity of men. Wherefore Franciſcus Georgius ſaith; That Moyſes the wiſe deſcriber thereof, hath but lightly gone ouer the report of ſuch important matters, and yet vnder Metaphors too, tending alwaies to an analogicall ſenſe: Conſidering, that this Garden, not Terreſtriall (as the vulgar doe imagine) but rather Diuine and Heauenly, was planted by the Diuine and heauenly Worke-man, not in this periſhable Earth, but in the Land of the liuing, figured by the Land of Promiſe. And this is the reaſon, that ſuch as would willingly diſcouer ſomewhat, concerning the ſecrets hidden vnder the Veile of the holy Hiſtory, haue wholy referred (whatſoeuer can be ſaid of Paradiſe) to thinges of eaſier apprehenſion, and conuerted the fruitful trees thereof, into good manners of Life, and call it the Paradiſe of the Soule, wherein all vertues ſhould haue the ſureſt plantation:

Fran. Georg. in Hermo. Cant. 1. Tom. 7. Cap. 21.

Philo Iudaic. in Lib. de Plant. de Noa.

By the Eaſt (where they ſuppoſe it to bee ſcituated) they vnderſtand the moſt reſplendiſhing Wiſedome, perfectlie cleare, and truelie Orientall. And look how the Sunne (being riſen) diſcouers all his bright beames vpon the heauens; in like manner, haue the vertues ſuch ſhining beames, as they doe thereby penetrate into the Soule, and make it of a moſt glorious luſter. This Paradiſe may likewiſe repreſent, or deſigne, the life of the bleſſed; or elſe the Church: And the foure Riuers flowing thence, bee compared to thoſe foure royall vertues: Prudence, Fortitude, Temperance, and Iuſtice: Or elſe the four Goſpels; or the foure Elements. The Trees may ſignifie all profitable diſciplines, or the liues of the Saints, their ſuper-excelling fruites, with the holy Manners and religious Workes of the good and vertuous. Philo Iudaic. 1. Lib. de Allegor. Leg.

In breefe, there is no one that can deny, but this Paradiſe may (Allegorically) be transferred vnto ſpirituall occaſions; as the two Teſtaments was figured in two Children, which Abraham had: by his Hand-maid Hagar the one, and by Sara his Wife the other. As Ieſus Chriſt was ſignified and deſcribed, by the Stone and Rocke which Moyſes ſmote, from whence the truth of holie Scripture (like the Water) iſſued forth. Philo the Iew, and many more beſide him, haue conuerted the whole Narration of this Paradiſe, into a ſpirituall vnderſtanding, reſerving (neuertheleſſe) the verity of the Hiſtoricall diſcourſe in his bodily Carracter. For the holie Doctours, doe hold by a common conſent, that this Paradiſe hath been made in ſome certaine place of the World, and was planted with all kinde of flouriſhing and fruitfull Trees. And it appeareth, that Homer tooke the ſhape of the Garden of Alcinous, by ſome former deſcription made of Paradiſe, and it may bee truely gathered; that his excellent repreſentation thereof, hee borrowed from Moyſes, in his ſetting downe the order of the Garden of Paradiſe. Euen as Ouid hath done the like, when he deſcribeth the Golden time or age of Saturne, when the Earth did then bring forth all her rich encreaſe, without any labour beſtowed thereon. Why then this Terreſtriall Paradiſe may truly be ſaid to be vpon earth, and it behoueth vs to credit the truth of that holy Hiſtory, which is ſo much and often recommended vnto vs, by ſo faithfull a rehearſall, of all things that were done in elder times.

CHAP. V.

Of the difference betweene the Celeſtiall Kingdome, and that of Paradiſe: Taken out of the iudgement of Moyſes Bar-Cepha.

THere is a great difference and contrariety, betweene the Kingdome celestial,& the forenamed pleasant place of Paradise. For the Kingdom Celestiall is much aboue the Firmament of Heauen,& Paradise is vnder the Firmament, vpon Earth. Therefore the Realme or Kingdome Celestiall must needes bee Spirituall, and Paradise appertaineth to the Body and the minde. Moreouer, the pleasures of the Celestiall Kingdome, doe consist in the visible beholding of God, and eternall beatitude receiued with the glorious Angels: But the delightes of Paradise onely doe concerne, the sight of pleasant desireable Trees, their entising fruits, as also the great & admired floods, which continually water and bedew it.

Read Moyses Bar-Cepha the Syrian, in his Commentary written of Paradise.

Furthermore, the Celestiall Kingdome hath neuer beene seene by any Mortall eye, nor heard by any eare, or euer entred into the heart of Man, according as the Apostle Saint Paul plainly telleth vs: But Paradise hath beene visible to ADAM, and EVE his Wife, euen to their very bodily eies; it was vnderstood by their eares, and comprehended in their euident knowledge. Beyond all this, they are both seuerally distinguished, not onely in the Law, but likewise in the Gospell. In the Law, the holy Father Moyses, in the Booke which we vse to call Genesis, as much to say; as the Birth of all thinges, maketh mention of Paradise; and there hath described it by notes and markes: but hee hath not spoken so much as one word, concerning the Realme Celestiall of the Kingdome of Heauen. In the Gospell, our Lord and Maister Iesus Christ, as also his Disciples, and Saint Iohn Baptist, in their Sermons and Preachings, haue exhorted all Mortals to repentance; because the Kingdome of Heauen was at hand: but they neuer saide, that Paradise was at hand.

The Celestial Kingdome no Mortall eye hath at any time seene. 1 Cor. 2.7.

Finally, there is this difference more betweene them; that after the Resurrection, the Iust shall ascend vp into the Celestiall Kingdome, and there enioy vnspeakeable felicities, according to the true and faithfull promise of God himselfe. But no man (after the Resurrection) shall enter into this Paradise, which must remaine voyd of all Inhabitants.

Of the Law & the Gospell, distinguishing both Paradise and the Celestiall Kingdome.

The main and principall difference betweene them.

To conclude this point, all learned Doctours doe assure vs, that the Kingdome Celestiall (or of Heauen) and this Terrestriall Paradise, are two seuerall distinct things. And among those learned Fathers, there is one named Iohn, whom Moyses Bar-Cepha (for his honor) dooth name in his Oration, because of his worthy writing, concerning the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill: And likewise vpon those words, which Christ spake to the good Theefe, saying; This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise. And another also, called Seuerus, in his two and twentith Oration of Epithronius.

The learned Fathers distinguishing this Argument.

CHAP. VI.

Of Hell, and of the Fire that is said to burne there continually.

THE word Hell, is taken in holy Scripture by diuers significations. In Hebrew it is called שְׁאוֹל SCEOL, which is as much to say, as a Graue or Sepulcher. Sometimes likewise it is taken for the dead, by a figure tearmed Metonymia: Also for death it selfe, as the Prophet Dauid saith in his 18. Psalm; Dolores inferni circundederunt me: præoccupauerunt me laquei mortis; The sorrowes of the Graue haue compassed me about, the snares of death ouertooke me. In the New-Testament, by the Gates of Hell, the power of death is vnderstood, which (by the meanes of sinne) are bent continually against vs. Moreouer, Hell is signified (in those blessed Bookes) to be the estate or condition of them, that haue incurred iudgement of the Diuine displeasure, which bringeth with it the true death; according as it is spoken by Iesus Christ himself, speaking to the citty of Capernaum: Vsque ad infernũ demergeris: Thou shalt be thrust downe, euen to Hell. Also of the wicked Rich man, who lifting vp his eyes (when hee was in the torments of Hell) saw Abraham a farre off, and Lazarus in his bosome. To speak yet more of the New Testament, which containeth the Mysteries of the Olde; Hell is there likewise vnderstood, to be the reward and receptacle of the wicked: and Paradise, and the bosome of Abraham, for the happy habitation of the the Saints and iuſt perſons, after they haue put off their corruptible bodyes, and are cloathed with their eternal condition.

The graue compared to the eſtate of the damned.

And not without great reaſon, is the Graue compared to the deplorable eſtate of the miſerable and damned. For what thinges elſe are to bee found in Graues, but Death, darkneſſe, and noyſome ſauours, anſwerable to that which Iob ſaith. Antequam vadam, & non reuertar, ad terram tenebroſam, & opertam mortis caligine. Terram miſeriæ et tenebrarum, vbi vmbra mortis, & nullus ordo, ſed ſempiternus horror inhabitans. Before I goe, and ſhall not returne, euen to the Land of darkneſſe it ſelfe, and into the ſhaddow of Death. Into a Land (I ſay) darke as darkeneſſe it ſelfe, and into the ſhaddow of death, where is no order, but the Light is there as darkeneſſe, and there eternall horror dwelleth. Such (in like manner) is the quality of the Reprobate, when God hath denounced the iudgement of condemnation againſt them: for then they are ſeazed on by Death and endleſſe darkneſſe.

Some are of the minde, that Hell is in the middle part of the Earth, and 3245. Miles vnder the vpper part thereof. And the learned ſay, that it is vnder the Earth, by interpretation of the Name, which is plurally ſpoken Inferi, as beeing in the inferiour partes of the Earth. It is called Gehenna, which is as much to ſay; as, Fire of the Earth, or the Land of Fire: For γῆ in Greeke, is Earth, or Land of Fire, whereof our Fire is ſaid to be but a meere ſhaddow. God himſelfe is ſometimes tearmed in Scripture to be Fire; as in Zacharie, and Deuteronomy: GOD is a Fire, deuouring or conſuming; Yet he neither conſumeth or deſtroyeth his Friends: but he is ſaide to eate them; as much to ſay, that hee receiueth, and turneth them into himſelfe. And it is Plutarchs opinion, That God is a Spirit fiery, or of fire, not hauing any forme, but transforming into himſelfe whatſoeuer he pleaſeth, equalling himſelfe to all things, and all thinges to him. Which he doth, not by the Elementary fire, but by himſelfe, or by the Seraphicall enflaming, which is ſomething neere to this diuine Fire. But he puniſheth the wicked with a very ſtrict Fire, full of torments, but neuer ſhining or conſuming: And hence is it, that ſuch as are afflicted and tormented with this fire, are ſaid to bee in vtter darkneſſe.

We muſt needes confeſſe then, that the wicked are tormented by Fire, by teſtimony of the truth it ſelfe, euen Ieſus Chriſt, ſaying; Omnis arbor quæ non facit fructum bonum, excidetur, & ignem mittetur. Euery Tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewen downe, and caſt into the Fire. Nay, it is further added, that it ſhall bee burned, with the Fire which God hath prepared for the Deuill and his Angels. This Fire did God neuer ordaine for our damage or deſtruction, neyther ſhall any one bee therewith tormented, except his own ſinnes doe kindle and light the Fire. As wee may learne by the Oracle of Eſay, ſaying: Walke in the light of your Fire, and in the flame that your ſelues haue lighted. Now albeit, that this Fire hath beene prouided by God, yet notwithſtanding, no man ſhall ſuffer or feele the torment thereof, if the ſparkes of his enormous ſinnes do not ſet it a blazing. For looke how we kindle a fiery Feauer in our body, by offenſiue meates, exceſſe in drinking, or immoderate labours in this life time: euen ſo do we kindle both in ſoule and body, (when after death they ſhall bee reunited) the torments of this quenchleſſe Fire, by the ſuperfluity of our wicked workes, and depraued affections. The ſuper-abounding torment whereof thus flowing in Men, dooth boyle, fry, and fiercely encreaſe their paine, that by their own lewdneſſe firſt lighted this fire.

An excellent comparſon of a burning Feuer, and the vnquenchable Fire.

Why then (to follow the opinion of the Pythagorians) the Fire which is large in extendure, and brightly burning, makes him a happy man that hath a wide and ſpacious heart, by walking in the Commaundements of God. As contrariwiſe, a ſmall and narrow Fire, ſo made by their owne bad and vile diſpoſition, that haue their hearts hardened, & cleſely ſhut vp againſt all goodnes (like to the forging Anuile) is made obſcure, darke, and torturing, euen according as the Sunne or Fire ſoftens or hardneth the diuerſity of thoſe ſubiects, that from eyther of thē do receiue their warmth or cooleneſſe. The Doctrine of the ſame Fire of bliſſe and torment, is not much varrying from the holy Scripture: becauſe in Deuteronomy it is called, a Fire deuouring; & in the ſame place alſo, a Fire, bleſſing, beautifying, and transforming. And in Exodus we reade, that the Law was giuen in a viſible flame of Fire. Quia ecce (ſaith the Prophet Eſay) Dominus in igne veniet, & quaſi turbo quadrigæ eius, reddere in indignationem ſuum, & increpationem ſuam in flamma ignis. For behold, the Lorde will come with Fire, and his Chariots like a whirlewind, that he may recompence his anger with wrath, and his indignation with the flame of Fire. For the iuſt and godly, he ordained the Fire from the Worlds firſt conſtitution, but to be to them, in ioy, ſplendour, and reioycing: which Fire alſo hee appointed for the wicked and rebellious, to bee to them a ſeuere affliction, torture, and puniſhment. But this tormenting Fire is ordained euerlaſting; as not onely appeareth by the ſentence of the higheſt Iudge, ſaying; Goe ye wicked into euerlaſting Fire, But likewiſe by the Prophet Eſay, who ſpeaking of the Carkaſſes of them that had greatly ſinned againſt God, ſaith; Their Worme ſhall neuer dye, or their Fire euer be extinguiſhed. By which words, the Prophet plainly declareth both the one and the other torment; to wit, the Interiour, and Exteriour, and that they are both to be Eternall.

The inward and outward torment is Eternall.

Now preſuppoſing this Fire to bee Eternall (according to the common receiued opinion) and our Soules and wicked apprehenſions, or intelligences, being wholly ſeparated from our Bodies, Saint Gregory makes a quicke riddance of it, in this Nature; Imagine (ſaith he) this Fire to torment the wicked, as an Inſtrument of the ſupreame Iuſtice. But yet he leaueth to bee preſuppoſed, how this Fire ſhould be an Inſtrument, and (in mine opinion) whether it tormenteth by his owne proper forme, or whether it bee agitated by ſome other means: as by a Sythe, or Hammer, cutting or ſmiting continually vpon the wicked? Aſſuredly, it is ſome-thing ſtrange, that Saint Gregory hath beene doubtfull in this caſe; conſidering, that (elſe-where) he ſaith, The Angels and Dæmons haue bodies, but yet ſo thinne and ſlender, as (in compariſon of ours) they are ſaid to be without bodies; whereof (in this caſe) there need no difficulty to be made. Our latter Diuines, ſome of them are of opinion, that the wicked Spirits and Soules are tormented with a Corporeall Fire, as by an obiect moſt diſproportionable, and greatly moleſtuous. And the Academickes hold, that all the euill Dæmons haue one body; whereunto conſenteth Saint Baſile, Nazianzene, and the ancient Doctours mutually, from whom Saint Auguſtine diſſenteth not, neither is different. For he, in his Booke vpon Geneſis, rendreth a reaſon, how the euill Spirits do become in that manner: Becauſe (ſaith he) they haue moſt ſubtile Bodies. And a little after, he ſaith; The Dæmons are Ayrie and Fiery Creatures, who being actiue, are not ſo thin or ſlender, as the Terreſtriall and Watry Creatures. Some others ſay, that not onely the Angels, but Soules alſo, being ſeparated from their Bodies, haue ætheriall Bodies. But if wee had ſtudied in Saint Paules Schoole, who had his enſtruction in the third Heauen, we could eaſily vntye theſe knots. For he teacheth vs, that the warre between the Spirit and the Fleſh, is denounced by ſuch a Law, as whoſoeuer conquereth, ſhall giue his properties and qualities to the vanquiſhed, and the conquered ſhall be cloathed with the Nature of the Conqueror. Becauſe of ſuch as in the Spirit ſhall become victorious, he ſaith; Cum autem mortale hoc induerit immortalitatem, &c. When this corruptible hath put on incorruption, and this Mortall hath put on Immortalitie, &c. And a little before; It is ſowen a ſenſuall or naturall Body, and is raiſed a ſpirituall Bodie. So then, the Soule being cloathed with the Nature of the Body, ſhall be tormented by the Corporeall Fire; like as the Body, cloathed with the Nature of the Spirit, ſhall receiue Beatitude together with the Soule.

Origen, and the ancient Academicks, do aſſigne another puniſhment to the damned, and ſay: It enſueth by a deordination or confuſion of thoſe partes, which ought to bee well ordained, diſpoſed and aſſembled. For like as when the Members of ones Bodie are diſioynted or broken in their Nerues and Bones, we feele a generall torment and greeuous anguiſh: Euen ſo, when the Soule ſhall bee out of this order of Hermony, wherein it was Created by GOD himſelfe to doe well, and liue profitably; ſhe ſhall ſuffer suffer paine and punishment by that same deordination and confusion. Answerable to that which Saint Augustine saith: Thou (ô Lord) hast appointed it, and it must be so, that euery disordered Spirit shall be a punishment to it selfe. Of this torment that ariseth from the disorder of the Soule, which ought euermore to be concordant to God; many other things are said, not onely by S. Hierome, Saint Augustine, S. Ambrose, and diuers other Doctours; but likewise by Proculeius, Hierocles, and others, among whom, Cicero writing against Cateline, saith; Thine owne iniquities, shall not they appeare like so many furies before thee? The Prophets also say the very same: Vnderstand (saith Ieremy) and know, that this is a most bitter and wretched thing vnto thee, because thou hast forsaken the Lord God. And the same Esay affirmeth; The Heart of the wicked Man (saith he) is like vnto the boyling Sea, which neuer can take rest, but as the billows, so do they redound and regorge, to his griefe and dolour; for there is no peace to the wicked, saith the Lord.

August. de Ciuit. Dei. Lib. 3. Cap. 9.

The before-named Authors, doe describe another reason of this torment, which they gather to be engendred of a wicked Idoll or representation. For our soule or Spirit, calling to remembrance those thinges, whereof the imprinted some shape in her selfe, euen at the time when the sin was committed, shall see and discerne before her own eyes, some History (as it were) of her transgressiõs. And then must the conscience be hurried with her owne piercings, The verie thoughts accusing one another (saith the Apostle) whereof are begotten some torments, euen by those bad affectiõs. And they shall be punished by the hot fierie flame of wicked embracings, oblique loue, and selfe-wounding indignation: or by the pale-freezing fire of Enuy, or else consumed by frenticall sadnesse. It is no maruell then, if the supreme Iudge of all, doe thus torment the wicked in Hell, giuing them much greater paine, then the most cleare light, or brightest beames of the Sunne can do to bleared eies, scarrified or any way else offended: And with-holding also from them his benigne influence, whereby all thinges are filled with goodnesse, leauing them in their own vile deordination. For euen he himselfe, that will be seene (of the good and vertuous) to their ioy & comfort in the resurrection; will be likewise to those euill doers, their dismall paine and endlesse consumation.

Another reason of this tormenting Fire.

The Soule seeth an Historie of her owne offences.

The highest Iudge tormenteth the wicked in Hell.

This is that whereof the Prophet Ezechiel speaketh, saying that hee saw the Lord; A lumbis eius & desuper, & à lumbis eius vsq; deorsum, vidi quasi speciem ignis splendentis in circuitu: Euen from his loynes vpward, euen from his loynes downeward, I saw as a likenesse of fire, and brightnesse round about. The Lord then is one while a bright and beautifying fire, making the iust to glitter and shine, like to the Stars, or as sparkles of fire: another while, he is a boystrous storming Fire, to the Children of Leuy. One while he is a consuming fire of Wood & Straw, to wast, destroy, and ruinate (as Ioell saith) Speciosa deserti, The Pastures of the Wilderneesse; that is to say, the wicked Actions committed by them that are forsaken by the Grace of GOD, and the heauenly influxion which would haue made them appeare bright and glorious: Another while also, he is a blacke burning and tormenting Fire, and as Ioell else-where saith; Ante faciem eius ignis vorans, & post eum exurens flamma; A Fire deuoureth before him, and behind him a Flame burneth.

God is (to the good) ioy, and comfort, but to the wicked, endlesse sorrow.

Ezechi. 1, 27.

God is one while a bright gladsom Fire, and another while a darke deuouring Fire.

Ioel. 1, 19.

Ioel. 2, 3.

Now whether this Fire be incorporeall or no, that only is best knowne to God, and yet Origen prooues it to bee inuisible, by the iudgement of the Apostle: This Fire (saith hee) is of such substance, that being constituted inuisible, it yet burneth visible thinges, according as the Apostle saith. For the things which Men see, are Temporall; and those which bee not seene, are Eternall. If then this Fire be Eternall where with they are punished that separate themselues from GOD: it falleth then vpon necessitie, that it must be also inuisible, because by the opinion of the Apostle, the onely thinges Inuisible, are Eternall. And it is not to bee Wondred at, (saith the same Origen) that this Fire is both Inuisible and tormenting, because no Man can see the heate or warmth which is accedentall to the Body, and yet it measurably tormenteth them sometimes, that are but indifferently molested with that Fire, which is of a quite contrary sort or kind, to the Fire which we haue in common vse here on Earth.

Whether this Fire be incorporeall or no. Orig. in Hom. 9.

The fire eternall is Inuisible.

Orig. vbi supra.

Nothing is of greater torment in this World, then our visible fire Neuertheleſſe, it is compared to ours, in regard, that there is nothing in this world, which giueth a greater torment then the viſible Fire: and if we doe deſire to ſhun the other, which torméteth eternally, let vs take good heede, that there be no eternall euill diſpoſition in vs; but rather ſuch, as we may receiue the ſupreame Fire in ioy, or (at leaſt) in conſuming away our wood and ſtraw, the inordinate deſires and appetites of this life. And ſo by expurgation of the Scum, or Dregges and Droſſe of the Mettall; we may ſhine like bright Veſſels of pure Golde, fit to be placed in the Celeſtiall Clouds, and in the dwelling of the eternally bleſſed.

CHAP. VII.

Of Man (the Image of God) to what end he was created: with the ſignification of thoſe two words, Image of God, and Similitude or Likeneſſe of God.

The World is as the Shop of God, declaring his heauenly workes.

WHen our good and gracious GOD, by admirable prouidence had Created the whole World, and all that therein is compriſed (which is nothing elſe, but euen a Shop (as it were) wherein the bright Beames of the Diuine Wiſedome doe ſhine and are made manifeſt.) Preſently, for a full accompliſhment of his worke, hee formed Man in his owne Image or reſemblance, to conſtitute him, as Emperour and Maiſter of all thinges that he had ſo excellently created on Earth. To the ende, that Man knowing the Dignity of his Creation, and how much hee was obliged to his Maker, might bee the more incited, to loue and ſerue him in al his powers, and ſhould imploy himſelfe in acknowledging ſo great a benefit, as to be made according to the ſemblance or Image of God. Not proudly to preſume or ouerweene, that the ſhape of God is anſwerable in forme to his owne; for this Word Image is not ſo vnderſtood, concerning the exteriour forme or ſimilitude: but rather, according to the ſpirituall intelligence, of the more precious part, which is the Soule.

How Man is ſaid to be made after the Image of God.

For looke how God (by his increated power) is wholly God, and in all places viuifieth and gouerneth all thinges, and (as the Apoſtle ſaith) Wee moone, liue, and haue our being in him: Euen ſo, the Soule giueth life in the Body, to euery part thereof. And now behold how ſhe is ſaid to bee the Image of God, like as in a Trinity. For albeit, that (by Nature) ſhe can bee but one, yet it is moſt certaine, that ſhe hath in her ſelfe three ſeuerall Dignities; to wit, Vnderſtanding, Will, and Memory. And looke how the Sonne is begotten of the Father, and the Holy-Ghoſt proceedeth both of the one and other: In like manner, is the Will engendred of the Vnderſtanding, and Memory hath her procreation from them both. And euen as the three perſons of the Trinitie are but one God; ſo the three powers of the Soule, are but one only Soule. Seeing then that wee are Created in the ſemblance or likeneſſe of God, and that this is an vndoubted Maxime; That euery like delighteth in his like: Wee ſhould euermore wiſh, to bee vnited with our ſimilitude, which is God. And looke how much theſe earthly thinges are far off from GOD; euen as farre doe wee eſtrange our ſelues from him, when we ſet our affections on thoſe matters which are not giuen vs to vſe, as our cheefeſt good, or Summum Bonum: but to this end, that knowing the goodnes of the Creator, who hath ſo willinglie prouided vs of all things neceſſary, we ſhould be free from all occaſions of excuſe, and make the larger confeſſion of his benefits, powred in ſuch abundance vpon vs.

The three dignities that the Soule hath in her ſelfe.

Euery like taketh delight in his like.

Earthly matters are not giuen vs for our chiefeſt happineſſe.

Man then was Created, to the end that he might acknowledge his God, and in knowing him, to honour him; and in honouring, to loue him; and in louing, to ſerue and obey him: and all this to no other end, but that finally he might attaine to that end, for which he was created; to wit, the fruition of his God and Maker. For this cauſe, he made him with an erected and vpright Body; not ſo much for his diſſimilitude frō the bruti ſh Beaſts, who are crooked, bended and looking downe vpon Earth: as to mount vp his vnderſtanding, and eleuate his eyes vnto the Heauens, his originall, ginall, to contemplate there Diuine occasions and permanent, leauing the Terrestriall as vaine.

The end and intent of mans Creation.

But if we shall better and more largely declare, the difference, betweene the Image and similitude of God, to make some vnity and concordance betweene them; let vs then set downe the Exposition which Hugo de Saint Victor hath made thereon. As in the Elements (saith he) two thinges are diuers in themselues, and the one far off differing from the other; as in the fire wee behold two dissenting things; to wit, brightnesse, and heate; the brightnesse not beeing heat, nor the heate brightnesse; because the brightnesse is seene and glittereth, and the heate is onely felt, yet burneth; the brightnesse not burning, or otherwise felt, but by sight, nor the heat shining, or to bee seene: Euen so, two diuers thinges are likewise to bee discerned in the spirituall Creature; namely, the Image of God, and the semblance or similitude of him, which two doe somewhat differ and are vnlike. For, according as the spirituall Creature is made in the Image of God, so she shineth by knowledge; that is to say, according to intelligence and vnderstanding, the spirituall Creature is the Image of God; And according as she is made in the likenesse of God, so she heateth her selfe by loue and dilection; that is, answerable to will and behauiour, she is semblable to God. Now, the Author and Maker of this spirituall Creature, ordered, that one part thereof should alwaies remaine simple and wholly spirituall, as the Angels: and that the other should be commixed, as the Soule of Man which dwelleth in the Body.

Origen is of opinion, that the Image of Iesus is Man, and that for this cause it is said, that he is made in the Image of God: For the Sonne is the Image of GOD. Others are of the minde, that the Holy Ghost is vnderstood by the Word Similitude: but truely, in the Image, and in the likenesse of GOD, is nothing else meant, but that Man is also the similitude of God. Man is the Image of God, saith Saint Paul. This may likewise referre it selfe vnto nature; but Similitude or Likenesse must then order it selfe, by those thinges wherewith Nature is endewed; to wit, Immortality, Vertue, and Wisedome, which doe make a man like vnto God. Thomas Aquinas, that great and learned Diuine, expoundeth the present case in this manner. Man is made in the Image and likenesse of God, according to his Soule, whereby he excelleth all vnreasonable Creatures. In the Image, that is to say; in Memory, Intelligence, & Dilection. In Likenesse, that is, in Innocency and Iustice, naturally disposed in the Soule. Saint Augustine in his Book of the quantitie of the Soule, saith; The Soule is made like vnto God, he hauing Created it immortall and indissoluable. Thomas Aquinas proceeding on in his last Narration, hath these wordes. The Image then, is as concerning the forme; and the Likenesse, is as concerning Nature. Whereby it appeareth, that Man is made (in regard of his Soule) according to the Image and Likenesse, not onely of the Father, or the Sonne, or the Holy-Ghost, but of the whole vndiuided Trinity together.

But God bestowed vpon Man when hee Created him, three especiall good gifts, and principally to be made reckoning of. The first is, that he gaue him his owne Image. The second, that he made him after his own Likenesse. The third, that he gaue him Immortalitie of Soule, if Man had continued in the obedience of his Creator. Which three great blessings (saith Hugo de S. Victor) were giuen by God vnto man, and both (Naturally, & by Originall Iustice) vnderstood then to be in him. Two other guifts also he enriched man withall, as exteriour benefits; the one, vnder him; the other, aboue him: Vnder him, the World; aboue him, God; the world, as a visible good, yet transitory; God, an inuisible good, and eternall. In this neather guift (to wit the World) Man was created in the higher; that is, in God, Man is to be blessed. God hath beene and is aboue Man, by condition; and aboue the World in Dignity: diuiding himselfe from the inferiour world, to draw him vp to the Soueraigne and Superiour.

There are also three principall hurts or euils, which doe abuse and corrupt the three fore-named blessings; to wit, Ignorance of Goodnesse, Couetousnes of Wickednesse, and Infirmity or sicklines of the Body. Thorow Ignorance, the Image of God hath beene, and is defaced in vs; and so by Couetousnes, is the likenesse of God: By Infirmity & sickenesse, the Immortality of the Body. For these three diseases, there are likewise wise three principall Remedies; to wit, Wisedome, Vertue, and Necessity; to the end, that by three Soueraigne helpes, three dangerous harmes may be auoyded. To ouercome Ignorance, we are to make vse of Wisedome; to Mayster the Vice of Auarice or Couetousnesse, we must imploy the contrary, bounteous Vertue; and with Necessity, to tread downe Infirmity. Wisedome, is to vnderstand things as they are, without idle curiosity: Vertue, is an Habitude of the Soule after Nature, conformable to Reason. I call Habitude a quality, which (without great difficulty) cannot be remoued from her place and Subiect. Euen as we tearme disposition to be another quality, which easilie is to be elbowed out of his abiding. By the Word Subiect, we vnderstand the vertue of the Soule, wherein the same Vertue (which is a Quality) maketh her residence. Necessity, which is tearmed Absolute, is, as when without it, nothing can be done: As, without feete a Man cannot goe; without food, he cannot liue; and without naturall sustenance, he must needes dye. There is another kinde of Necessity, which is called Conditionall: As, for a Mans easier trauailing, a Horse is expedient; and for a more delicate degree of Life, Partridges, Quailes, and other Dainties, may be accounted requisite.

The vse of the three Remedies, in their seuerall degrees.

Of absolute Necessity.

Of Conditionall Necessity

For these three forenamed Remedies, all Arts and Disciplines haue beene inuented: To attaine Wisedome, the Theorique (which is Contemplatiue) hath beene found out: For Vertue, the Practique (which is Actiue) came into vse: And for Necessity, the Mechanicke onely was inuented. For after that ADAM had sinned, He, his Children, and Kindred, were necessarily constrained to the search of thinges: to know Plants and Hearbs; to plucke vp roots and eate them, to labour the Earth, by the sweate of their Browes to get graine for food, and this Necessity they naturally learned, as afterward to grind the Graine, to make it in Paast to bee baked: to kill wilde Beastes, and feede on their Flesh, and then to cloth themselues with their Skinnes. To builde little Habitations, thereby to auoyde the iniury of Weather. To plant Vines, daily adding inuention vpon inuention, either in finding out diuersity of viands, and then as variable orders of dressing them. To erect big Houses, to beate with Hammers, to File, to Sowe, to make Garments of Linnen, Woollen, Silkes of sundry collours, and other admired kindes of Habit. To buy, sell, and Traffique one with another. And Iohannes Ludouicus Viues saith, in his Booke called The Introduction to Wisedome: Vtile indumentum excogitauit necessitas, preciosum, luxus, elegans, vanitas. Necessity found out Garments, profitable, precious, light, neate, and vaine.

Theorique hath three partes; Diuinity, Philosophy, and Mathematical skil. Practique is diuided into solitarines, priuate and publique: Or else into Ethicall, Oeconomicall, and Politicall. How much more then, was the first Man a Lord of all the World, and as the Grecians say κόσμοπολίτης, Being the new workmanship of God, endued with all Vertues, Maister of all the Beasts of the Earth, of the Waters, and of the Ayre, with all Creatures to them belonging, he had the whole World (as his Inheritance) in Possession. And did not God declare a great signe of loue to him, when he diuided parts with him? CHAP. VIII.

Of the Age of Man, and why in the first age of the World, Men liued longer, then now they doe in these later times.

In the first Age Men liued longer then now, by many yeares.

IT is well knowne, to all them that haue beene studious in the holy writings, that in the worlds first Age, and before the generall Deluge (for Sinne) had ouer-whelmed the whole Earth; the life time of Man was much differing in length, from the breuitie wherein wee now behold it. For it is most certaine, that ADAM liued nine hundred and thirty yeares; SETH, nine hundred and twelue; CAINE, or CAINAM (as some call him) nine hundred and ten. So descending afterward frō one to another, we find, that he that liued least time of account, attained to the reach of seauen hundred yeares. But now in these our daies, we see very few arriue at eighty, or ninety years of age: which date if any one happen to exceed, it is esteemed rare and maruailous; so that, we liue not the tenth part of the former life time. Wherefore the learned, both Diuines and naturall Philosophers, that haue seriously discoursed on this Argument, finding Nature (our productresse) to bee the very same teeming Mother with them then, and that those first Men liued naturally heere so long time, and not miraculously: they grew heereat into no little amazement, and therefore began to make curious Inquisition into the causes and reasons.

The shortest life time was seauen hundred yeares.

The iudgement of Diuines & Philosophers in this case.

Marcus Varro and others grew doubtful of the yeares in length.

To Marcus Varro, and an infinite number of other like Questionists, this worke of Nature appeared to bee so strange, that they grew into an imagination by themselues, supposing the yeares of that ancient time, to be none such as are in these moderne daies. But that coniecture was meere idle follie, and an error ouer great, as also inexcusable, vaine, & absurd, as shall be shewn in the following Chapter, after we haue first discoursed in this present, some causes, with the aduise of Graue, Wise, and Learned Authors.

When I looke into the Obseruations of others, and then make a discent from them into mine owne priuate opinion, I take the principall reason, why Men liue not now so long as ours Elders then did, to be this: That they had no such causes or accidents, as now (in vs) doe beget many infirmities, whereby both Age and Death doe soone steale vpon vs. Heere-withall it behooues vs to consider, that ADAM and EVE being the first Parents of all mankinde, were created by the hand of God, without any other meanes or helpe: wherefore it is to be presumed, that he made them of a most excellent complexion, perfect simpathy, and such proportionable humours, as must needes yeelde a reason for their healths continuance, so many years together. By means whereof, the Children that came from Parents of such rich perfection, and likewise their Off-spring succeeding to them againe, that naturally had the benefit of so long life, must needs resemble their first Deriuers, in selfe-same good and sound constitution, as being descended of most excellent matter; vntill such time, as by the alteration of Ages (whose propertie is to change & impaire all thinges) the condition of Man began feebly to decline, yeelding vp his daies to be few in number.

Our fore-fathers had no such infirmities as now we haue.

Adam and Eue made by the hand of God onely.

The alteration of Ages impaireth all things.

In those times also, they had one thing which greatly auailed for the lengthening of life, and which now to vs is very contrary & hurtfull. That was, great temperance in drinking, as well in quantity as in quality: Likewise their small variety of meates; for they neuer had so many sorts or diuersity of dishes, as now we haue; neyther knew they any such plenty of idle inuentions. Nor doe we any where finde, that the eating of Flesh was knowne (before the flood) to Men. Moreouer, it is held by common opinion (but yet most certaine) that Temperance in drinking, and little change of meates.

Flesh not eaten before the Flood.

that Fruits and Hearbs (in those times) were of farre greater vertue and substance (beyonde all comparison) then now they are or can be; by reason they grew out of a new & vnwearied earth, and not any such as now it is; weake, worne, and vtterly fainting. For that vniuersall ouerflow and invndation, bereft it of his former purity and fatnesse, making it more brackish, barren and vnfertile, by the Waters generall passage ouer it, which continued for many weekes together.

The Deluge made the Earth more barren then before.

These reasons are so weighty and iudicious, as each of them may be sufficient to conclude (though many more be ranked with them) that it was no matter of maruaile, but rather meerely naturall, for Men to liue longer then, then now they doe or can. It is further to be obserued, and we may boldly credit it for a truth, that ADAM was acquainted with the vertues, in all Hearbes, Plants, and Stones, and his Children so well profited therein by his instruction, as neuer could any (since then) attaine to the like perfection. All these then thus concurring; partly for the health and support of life, and partly for continuance in soundest temperature, expelled all danger of diseases to happen, onely by meere vse of common growing simples, detesting the venomous compounds of this Age, which in stead of purging and purifying Mens bodies, do weaken; yea, and oftentimes kil such as take them.

Adam knew the vertue of all Hearbes, Plants, and Stones.

Beyond all this, in those first yeares of the Worlds infancy, the health and life of Men, was much strengthned and supported by course of the Heauens, as also the influence of the Starres and Planets; they being farre more beneficiall and auspicious then, then now they are. For then there had not past half a quarter so many Aspectes, Coniunctions, Eclipses, with infinite other Cælestiall Impressions, whence haue come the causes of changes, variations, & strange alterations vpon Earth, and among the Elements themselues, that were the principall Motiues to life and health in those daies; as contrariwise they are the occasions of infirmities and death now. But to go somwhat further, then whatsoeuer yet hath beene said, as grounded only vpon naturall reason; I dare maintaine, that the very cause of so long life in our fore-fathers, proceeded from the vnspeakable prouidence of God; whose will it was, to haue their life time stretched out to such length, and that the fore-mentioned occasions, should mutually be aiding one to another; this being the onely intent, that of two Sole-Persons, many more might bee borne, the Earth inhabited, and mankind multiplyed.

The life of Man much holpen by the course of heauen.

The prouidence of God was the onely cause of our fore-fathers long life.

We see beside, that Men liued not so long after the Flood as they did before, as being (perhaps) in Gods secret counsell so determined: yet NOAH was permitted to enter the Ark, and there God saued more Men and Women, then at the first he had created, that the World might yet againe be the sooner inhabited. Saint Augustine discoursing on these matters, saith; That our fore-fathers had not onely a benefit beyond vs, in health and length of life; but in the stature of their bodies, as manifestly is remembred of them in diuers Bookes. And their Bones haue beene found vnder great Mountaines, as also in sundry Graues & Sepulchers, which haue beene beleeued for a certainety, that those Bones belonged to Men liuing before the Flood. The same Saint Augustine also affirmeth, that hee being at Vtica, a Citty of Affrica, sawe there the Bones of a dead Mans Body, and the very Iaw-Bones were so big and weighty, that they would haue counterpoysed them of an hundred Men, now liuing in this Age of ours.

GOD saued more in the Arke, then he created at the beginning.

August. de Ciuit. Dei. Lib. 15.

The differēce of stature in out fore-fathers.

Aug. vbi supra.

Neuertheless, although our life time be so shortned, yet we neede not make any complaint thereof, for in applying that breuity to euil manners, or offence of God, the Lord hath shewne himselfe most mercifull to vs, in cutting off so large a limit, then which, we can acknowledge no greater a benefit. And yet, if we would deuoutly apply our selues to his seruice, he hath allowed vs (in this little) time enough for it. For so great is Gods goodnesse and fauour towards vs, that he accepts our good desires and humble wils, for full, sufficient, and absolute payment.

We haue no cause to complaine of our liues shortnesse.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

¶ That the opinion of such, as supposed the yeares in elder time, to bee shorter then now they are at this instant, is vtterlie false. Of the first Citty that euer was in this World. Finally, that our Auncient fore-fathers had more Children, then those which are remembred vnto vs in the holy Scripture.

The doubt of some, concerning the years of our fore-fathers, to be shorter then now they are.

BEcause it hath seemed to some, that the life time of nine hundred years, in our first Parents, should bee a matter impossible, in regard that they could not comprehend, and reach to the causes and naturall reasons, which haue beene alleadged in the precedent Chapter, as the onely occasions of their so long continuance. And (in not daring to deny the iust number of so many yeares, euidently specified & maintained in sacred writ) they wold yet insinuate a supposition, that those elder yeares, were shorter, then in these Moderne times they are; whereby the aduantage of their long life (out-reaching ours so farre) comes much short of the opinion by vs receiued: we must therefore settle our selues, to a full resolution of these imaginary conceptions. And yet we will examine part of their follies, in that some others among them, would perswade and assure vs, that one of our yeares now, carries equall quantity with ten of those in old time. Nay, there be others, who haue maintained, that each monthly course of the Moone now, stood with them then for a full and compleate yeare, which they pleased to call by the name of Annus Lunaris.

One of our yeares now, supposed as long as ten of the first world

A yeare of a monthes length.

Other Dreamers bring in as dry an assertion, that three of our moneths, made them vp one whole yeare; by means wherof, one of our years should iump iust with foure of theirs: for in such manner did the Chaldeans, and likewise the Arcadians deuide their yeares, according as Lactantius recordeth. Marcus Varro, a Romaine, most learned in many matters, only (heerein) is somewhat blame-worthy, because he held, that these Anni Lunares, deriued their number from one Moones coniunction vntill the comming of another new Moone, which may consist of twentie nine daies, and some odde houres beside. Pliny likewise esteemes it but as a fable, that Men (in the Worldes none-age) should liue so long; and saith, that the Arcadians (according as wee haue already declared) numbred their yeares by three of our months. There is also among vs Christians, a certaine Booke of the Ages of the World; the Authour nameth himselfe Heliconiensis, wherein he witnesseth himselfe to be of the same opinion.

Lactan. in 2. Lib de Diuinarum Institutionum.

Pliny held the long life of our fore-fathers for a fable.

Heliconiensis of the same mind

Notwithstanding all this, it is a case most plaine and apparant, that those yeares deliuered vs in holy Scripture, were none other, then these are in our time, and if there might be imagined any difference, yet it was not sensibly to be perceiued: and therefore, all opinions held to the contrary, are vaine, ridiculous, and meerely fooliſh. For it is so directly prooued by Iosephus, as also Lactantius Firmianus, but especially S. Augustine, in a more distinct and better manner, whose reasons and authorities, are sufficient to confound all former grosse and false opinions.

Lib. 1. de Antiquit. Cap. 2. August. Lib 2. & 15. de Ciuit. Dei.

That euery Moone made a yeare.

Concerning the first allegation; to wit, that each seuerall Moone (in that Age) made them vp a full compleat yeare, accounting alwaies from the one coniunction to the other: how can this be but an impudent error? Because we know very certainly, that so much time doth not containe fully thirty daies: Which being graunted as they argue, then it must needes follow, that Men in this present Age doe liue longer, then they did vpon the worlds Creation, for neuer any Man liued then, twelue hundred yeares, which (by such account) nothing surmounteth this Age of ours. And yet it is to bee iustified, that some (among vs) haue liued an hundred years; some also (though fildome) an hundred & twelue yeares: which would amount to more then thirty hundred yeares, if wee should account them so by the course of the Moone.

No Man liued one thousand two hundred yeates.

We may well ioyne this to their errour, whose opinion was, that ten of those elder yeares, did make vp fully but one

Ten old years supposed to be but one of ours.

one of ours now. But might their conieƈture paſſe for currant, then Men ſhould bee capable of Generation, at ſeauen, eyght, and ten yeares of age, which is quite contrary to all naturall Philoſophy. To approoue this, wee read in Geneſis, that SETH the Sonne of ADAM begat ENOCH, he being then an hundred and fiue yeares old. If ten of thoſe yeares, had anſwered (by equall proportion) but to one of ours now; it muſt needs then follow, that Men in the Worldes firſt Age, did beget Children, at ten yeares old and a halfe of our inſtant account. CAINE alſo begetting MELALEELL at ſeauenty yeares of his age; by our reckoning, muſt needes be a Father at ſeuen yeares old of our time: Nay, we muſt fall to a farre lower account, if one of our yeares ſhould hold leuell with twelue of the firſt Age, according to ſome others idle imagination.

Gen. 5, 6.

Gene. 5, 12.

But more cleerly will we yet reueale their groſſe abſurditie, & by that which enſueth, ſquaſh in peeces their vnexcuſable errour. For if their ancient yeare were but the tenth or twelfth part of ours now; it muſt then conſequently enſue, that their yeare then conſiſted not of twelue months, or (at moſt) that their month had but three daies in it. Which is apparantly falſe, becauſe the manifeſt Text of the Scripture ſaith: That the generall Flood began the ſeauenteenth day of the ſecond month; whereby we may plainly perceiue, that the Months then, were none other then now ours are. As for the opinion of them, who hold, that the old year made but the fourth part of our Moderne account, and that their yeare conſiſted but of three months onely: the ſelfe-ſame Scripture doth approoue it likewiſe to be falſe, becauſe in the fore-named place it is ſaid, concerning Noahs Arke; That in the ſeuenth month, in the ſeuenteenth day of the month, the Arke reſted it ſelfe on the Mountaines of Ararat, or Armenia. Afterward followeth, that the Waters ſtill decreaſed vntill the tenth Month, and the very firſt day of that Month, the heads and tops of the Mountaines, each where diſcouered themſelues. This very plainly demonſtrates their abuſiue opinion, that would haue the Ancient year to be but three months long; becauſe becauſe mention is heere made, both of the ſeauenth and tenth Moneths. We may well ſee then, that the yeare in that Age had twelue Months, according as in theſe times our yeare now hath; for when hee there nameth the tenth Moneth, he doth not tearm it to be the laſt Month.

An anſwer to a moſt groſſe abſurdity, concerning the old yeare.

Gene. 7, 12.

An anſwer to the ſecond friuolous obiection.

Gene. 8, 4.

That the auncient yeare ſhould be but three Months long.

With as little diſcretion it is ſaide, that the Moneth then contained but three daies only; conſidering, the Text it ſelfe expreſly nameth the twenty ſeauen day of the Month: Much leſſe then could it be ſaide, that the day conſiſted then but of two or three houres, becauſe it is likewiſe ſet down in the ſame Text; That the Windowes of Heauen were opened, and the raine was vpon the Earth, the full ſpace of forty daies and forty nights. Whereby it remaines very euident, that thoſe daies were naturall daies, of xxiiij. houres in length, and the Monthes and yeares ſo long as now they are; or the difference ſo ſmall, that it was not ſenſible. I ſpeake this the rather, becauſe they then accounted the courſe of Heauen, as now we do, and this order hath euermore beene obſerued among the learned, as well Hebrues as Ægiptians: among whom Moyſes was borne and bred, who was the Author & Hiſtoriographer of thoſe holy Bookes, wherein the long liues of our fore-fathers are written.

That the Moneth ſhould be but three daies onely.

Gen. 7. 11, 12.

The Hebrues and Egyptians obſerued the ſame order we doe.

Now, albeit we ſhould conſent to the cenſure of many, who did holde, that the Hebrues meaſured their months by the ordinary courſe of the Moone, and that the full year contained then twelue Lunary Months, and each Month had in it twenty nine daies, and foureteene houres; little more, or little leſſe, by which reaſon, the yeare ſhould be ſhorter by twelue daies, then that which we now meaſure by the courſe of the Sun; to wit, three hundred, threeſcore, fiue daies and ſixe houres: yet cannot this difference (any way) make doubtfull or vncertaine, the Liues and Ages of our elder Fathers. For it is a matter of no moment, that in nine hundred or a thouſand years, twenty or thirty ſhould be exempted, becauſe the Lunary month was not compleated in thirty daies. By this authority then, we may be aſſured, that the nine hundred and thirty yeares which ADAM liued, and the nine hundred dred likewise of others, were such as the hundred seauenty and fiue of Abraham, and as the seuenty or eighty which men liue now-adaies; for whosoeuer beleeueth otherwise, is in a mighty error.

August. de Ciuit de lib. 15. ca. 9.

There is also another consideration to be noted, alleaged by S. Augustine to this purpose. Put the case (saith he) that the Scripture makes no mention, that Adam and his Sonnes had any other Children, before them which are expresly named: yet is it most certainely to be affirmed, that both (before and after) they had diuers and sundry beside, for they had Children in their yonger daies, whereof no mention is made in Scripture. And to make more ample proofe thereof, it is saide; That Caine built a Citty, the first that euer was in the World, according as Iosephus reporteth, saying; That it was beautified with diuers Towers, engirt with wals, and he called it after the Name of his Son Enoch, which was then but newly borne vnto him. This may appeare to haue small shew of truth, there being then in the world but three or foure Men onely; for the Scripture makes mention to vs of no more. But well we know, that to the building of a Citty, the help of a great nũber of men is necessarily required: yet notwithstanding, the Text names but the principall heades of the builders; as appeareth, in saying; That their Sons & Daughters begat diuers others, which in no place of Scripture are named at al. We see, that the holy Euangelists haue done the very like, in setting down their Euangelicall History. For S. Mathew, treating of the Genealogy of Christ, according to the flesh, beginneth at Abraham, and numbring on to Dauid, saith; Abraham begat Isaac, neuer speaking of Ismaell. Then afterward, Isaac begat Iacob, yet sayes nothing of Esau; albeit they were their first borne Children. Because, he hauing no other intention, but to descend from one degree to another (euen to Dauid) who was not of the Linage of Ismael, therefore he made no reckoning of Ismaell. Then againe, Iacob begat Iuda, and his Bretheren, yet was not Iuda the first borne Childe. So that discourfing thus of the Generation, he accounted none but them onely, by whom he descended iust to Dauid. A proofe sufficient, to encite all Aduersaries to beleeue, that Moyses did the like in his History, and that our fore-fathers had diuers other Children, beside those which are spoken of, and named in the holy Scriptures.

Adam had more Childrē then those that are recorded in Scripture.

CHAP. X.

Wherefore the Deuil made choise of the Serpents shape when he tempted the first woman, and came not to her in any other forme.

THe proud Angell, first Author of all euill, beeing cast downe from Heauen, cunningly coueting to traine himselfe into Mans society, because hee was falne from Heauen, thorow his insolent offence, therefore his hatred not a litle against him. & to the end that his subtilty might be the more couert, he made choise of a Serpent in the Terrestriall Paradise, where, with Adam and his Wife, all other earthly Creatures orderly conuersed, not hauing any discord together, or being any way harmfull, but all (as well the sauage as domesticke) acknowledged man for their Lord & Maister, to serue his turn withall. For this Serpent, being a glyding Creature, that could turne and writh it selfe euery way; This false Angell (as S. Chrysostome saith) Found to be best fitting for his hellish enterprise and deuillish intended worke, to bee his Organe to speake by. And hauing (in spirituall mallice) subiected this Serpent to himselfe, by meanes of his Angelicall presence, & more excellent Nature, abusing it as an Instrument of falshood and treachery, he would thereby speak to the woman, addressing himselfe first of all to her, she being the weaker body, and least able to resist him.

The Deuils inueterate hatred against Man.

Chrysost sup. Gen. Hom. 15.

For hee knew his strength was ouerfeeble, and his craft as yet scarse currant to deceiue the Man, but he must needes faile; except he could seduce him by the error of another. For as Salomon took it to be no errour, when he fell to the seruice of Idols, and became an Idolatour, through the perswasions of Women his Concubins; So Adam cõmitted the offence of transgressing Gods commandemẽt, not as she did that spake the truth beeing seduced; but as hee yeelded for com-company; wherein he was no leſſe faulty, hauing ſinned with conſent and perfect knowledge.

This wicked Angell (perhaps) had a better will to haue come to the woman in the ſhape of a Doue, if God would ſo haue permitted it. But venerable Bede ſaith: It was not lawfull for the euill Spirit, to make that forme odious to Man, wherein the Holy-Ghoſt onely ought to appeare. It is not to be thought (ſaith Saint Auguſtine) that the Deuill did (of himſelfe) chuſe the Serpent, to tempt thereby: but (as his deſire was to tempt) hee could not, but by ſuch a Creature, as was permitted him ſo to doe. For will to hurt may be in any one, but the power commeth from God: he was therefore permitted to tempt by the Serpent, to the end, that therin the woman might take heed of his ſubtilty that tempted. And for this cauſe it is written; Sed et Serpens erat callidior cũctis animantibus terræ; The Serpent was more ſubtile, then any Beaſt of the Field.

The Serpent vnderſtandeth no words, neither was partaker of reaſon, like as Man was: yet is hee (notwithſtanding) called, moſt crafty, in regard of the ſubtilty of the Deuill. He hath ſpoken, like as Balaams Aſſe did; but it was by the Deuill, and the Aſſe by the good Angel. For good Angels & euill Angels work like operations, but then they are to diuers effects; Before the Serpent was made the Deuils Organe (ſaith Rupertus) for the perdition of man, he might haue beene tearmed moſt wiſe and prudent. For in another edition of the Bible, it is thus ſet down; And the Serpent was wiſe aboue all the Beaſts, &c. But after that the Serpents wiſdom was combined with the malice of the Deuill, and that it ſerued as an apt Inſtrument for death; he might (by better right) be tearmed cautelous and crafty. And before that his prudence lent any ayde and ſeruice to the Father of lying, he was ſuch as the Diſciples of Ieſus Chriſt ought to imitate, as he himſelfe witneſſeth, ſaying; Eſtote ergo prudentes, ſicut Serpentes; Be ye therfore wiſe, as Serpents.

Petrus Comeſtor, in his Scholaſticall Hiſtory ſaith; That at the time when the Serpent tempted the Woman, he was ſtraite, and went vpright like a Man; but afterward (by the curſſe) he was caſt down to the earth, to glide along thereon. Venerable Bede ſaith; The Deuill choſe a Serpent, that had a face like to a Womans, Quod ſimilia ſimilibus applaudunt; That like might be pleaſing to like. Nor is the Serpent crafty or venomous, becauſe God ſaid; Maledictus es, Thou art curſſed: But God (euen in iudiciary equity) denounced him that ſentence for his wicked deſert, and declared, that he was made odious to all the other Beaſts and creatures of the earth. And why? Becauſe he had bin the Deuils Miniſter, to the perdition of him, who had bin Created to Signorize and beare Maiſtry ouer all Beaſtes in the World. Pythagoras tels vs, that the Serpent is engendred of the Marow which is in the Back-bone of a dead Man. And I remember, that (not long ſince) I read a good Authour, from whom I collected theſe two verſes:

In Graues, ſome hold that Serpents, for a certainty are bred.

If this be credible (as ſome haue very conſtantly auouched) a very great reaſon may be thence deriued; to wit, that as the death of Man enſued by the Serpent, ſo the Serpent receiueth life by the death of Man. Moreouer, it is neceſſary to bee knowne, and well worth the obſeruation: that thoſe paines and puniſhments, pronounced by God vpon the Serpent, he did in like manner ordaine for the Deuill, according as Rupertus expoundeth them in this manner. *Sub nomine Serpentis, quem inuaſit Diabolus, ipſe percutitur, & qui per ſuperbiam ſuam ſimilem ſe altiſſimo fore putauit, propter malitiam ſuam infimæ Creaturæ quam ipſe vitiauit, iudicatur fieri pœnaliter ſimilis. Rupert. ſup. Geneſ. Lib. 3. Ca. 2.

The Serpents wiſedome ioyned with the Deuils malice

Math. 10, 16.

Pet. Comeſtor. in Hiſt. Schol. ca. 2

The Deuill is smitten by the selfe-same meanes of his temptation.

Deuill made his inuasion, himselfe is smitten. And because (in his own pride) he imagined to bee afterward like vnto the most high: for his malicious dealing, by the meanest Creature which he abused, to the same punishments is he adiudged. Vpon thy breast, said God, shalt thou go. As if he would haue said: Like as this creeping Creature, whose wilinesse is abused, is to goe vpon his breast or belley; So (thou Deuill) because thou art a rationall Spirit, shalt alwaies beare the weighty burthen of thine owne reasonable folly. And which way soeuer thou turnest thee, thine intentions shall euermore be spent in vaine downward, and be still trodden vpon by contraries. Earth (I say) shalt thou eat, and not Heauen; That is, not such as haue their conuersation in Heauen, but such as trust to their earthly knowledge; they shall be as meat vnto thee. And then it followeth in the Text; Inimicitias ponam inter te & mulierem, & semen tuum, & semen illius: ipsa conteret caput tuum, & tu insidiaberis calcaneo eius. I will put enimity betweene thee and the Woman, and betweene thy Seed and her Seed: He shalt break thine head, and thou shalt bruise his heele.

Gene. 3, 15.

Great enmity betweene the Womans seed and the Serpent.

Great enmities (in very deed) haue the Woman and her seed with this kind of creature; to wit, the Serpent. The seed of the Woman, that is Iesus Christ, who hath broken the head of that auncient Serpent the Deuill, As much to say; as the very print of his steps, hath abased al his vtmost practises. If the Woman do not daily actually break the head of the Serpent; yet is it neuertheless in her power continually to do it. For, if the naked sole of the foote of the Woman, can preuent the teeth of a Serpent; or, treading vpon his head neuer so lightly, forthwith he instantly dyeth: what shal we then say, when the like is not to bee done (so soone and readily) by great leuers, Mallets, and Hammers, nor yet by Swordes, how sharpe soeuer they be? If on the contrary againe, the Serpent (who is so hainous to Man, that all his ayme is at his heele) do but fix his teeth on the neather part of the sole of the foor, he presently kils the man; because so soone as the venome of his bit dooth but touch the blood of a Man, it disperseth it selfe immediatly ouer all the body, and so the Serpent kils the enemy to his Nature, which is Man:

The naked sole of a Womans foote, is present death to a Serpent.

A Serpent byting a man by the sole of the foote, forthwith kils him.

Wherevpon the Poet Lucan said;

Noxia Serpentum est admixto sanguine pestis,
Morsu virus habent, et fatũ in dente minantur.

Lucan Lib. 9.

So hurtfull are the Serpents teeth,
they pestilent the blood
Of Man in byting, and his death can haraly be withstood.

Why then, looke how many kindes of Serpents there be, so many seuerall venoms there be, so many colours, so many torterings; and as many diuersities, so many dangers; yea, so many deaths. It shall not be any great sweruing from the matter, if now wee declare (in this place) what is signified by the flaming Sword, and the Cherubins set for the safety of Paradise. We vnderstand by the flaming Sword, the sentence of the Iudgement of God, which is said to be flaming: In flamma ignis dabitis vindictam; In flaming Fire rendring vengeance, saith the Apostle. Vndoubtedly, the Iudgement of GOD, is the Iudgement of the flame of Fire, for auengement of them that haue liued wickedly. Cherubin, is the Name of the Angelicall forces, that were placed without the Garden of Paradise, to guard the entrance to the Tree of Life; plainely to demonstrate, that wee cannot haue accesse to the Kingdome of Heauen, except we first passe through the fierie tryals of infinite afflictions, and be examined by the Ministry of the holy Angels. Saint Paule saith; Si quis autem superaedificat super fundamentum hoc, aurum argentum, lapides pretiosus, ligna, fœnum, stipulam: Vniuscuiusque opus manifestum erit, dies enim Domini declarabit, qui in igne reuelabitur, & vniuscuiusque opus quale sit, ignis probabit. And if any Man build on this Foundation, Gold, Siluer, precious Stones, Timber, Hay, Stubble: Euery Mans worke shall be made manifest, for the day shall declare it, because it shall bee reuealed by the Fire, and the Fire shall try euery mans worke, of what sort it is. How can wee otherwise gather from these wordes, but that they may bee applied to the Flaming Sword, placed at the entrance of earthly Paradise? As signifing, that we must passe through the fires of many sharp afflictions, which try our actions to the vttermost; how, and in what maner they haue bin done; and being thus examined in those fierie tryals,

So many kinds of Serpents, so many perils to mans life.

Of the flaming Sword.

2 Thes. 1, 8.

Of the Cherubins.

1 Cor. 3, 12, 13.

His application of the flaming Sword, to our passage through many fiery afflictions.

the words of the Pſalmiſt may be ſpoken to vs. Quoniam probaſti nos Deus, igne nos examinaſti, ſicut examinatur argentum. For thou (ô God) haſt prooued vs, thou haſt tried vs, as Siluer is tryed.

Pſal. 66, 10.

And by good reaſon are the Angels there placed, called Cherubins; that is to ſay, Fulneſſe of Knowledge: becauſe they are filled with Knowledge to Iudge, knowing whatſoeuer is written of vs in the Books; that is to ſay, they haue ſtored vp in memory whatſoeuer we haue done, either good or euill. They read them ouer daily, & at length, wil be rehearſed that which is written in thoſe Bookes, according as it is ſaid in Daniel; And the Bookes were opened. The Fire of this brandiſhed flaming Sword, is vnacceſſible of vs Mortals. For they that haue gone vpward the Riuer of Nylus, to finde the Spring thereof, haue beene hindred from the effect of their deſire, in regard of a ſmouldring fiery vapour, which they haue not beene able to endure: as Lucan ſaith, diſcourſing on the fiue Zones of Heauen; Nilum videre calentem; It is hot to ſee Nylus.

Why the Angels are called Cherubins.

Dan. 7, 10.

Lucan Lib. 10.

And becauſe we are entred into this diſcourſe, which appertaineth ſo eſpecially to the third Chapter of Geneſis; let mee not forget, what I haue not long ſince read, in an Italian Authour, called Leo Hebraico, a great Philoſopher, who in his Philoſophy of Loue, doth make an Allegoricall and Morrall ſenſe of moſt of that Chapter, which out of Italian I haue thus tranſlated. The Serpent (ſaith he) is the carnall Appetite, which inciteth and firſt deceiueth the Corporall Feminine part. It is called Corporall, when it is found any way deuided from the intellect, which is tearmed the Huſband, reſiſting againſt his ſtrict & ſeuere Lawes, to acquaint her ſelfe with carnal Delectations, and darken her Natiue ſplendour, with acquiſition of ſuperfluous and abounding riches or treaſures. Then by ſenſuality (which is the Tree of knowing good and euill) ſhe ſhewes him thereby, that their eyes are to bee opened; that is to ſay, that they would know many thinges of that Nature, as thoſe are, which is ſhewne them in the Tree of good and Euill, and (which before) they knew not at all; to wit, many ſubtilties, cautels, and other notices, appertaining to Lubricity and Auarice.

Leo Hebraico in his Philoſophy of Loue.

See Saint Ambroſe, his 42. Epiſtle, where he declareth, wherefore Moyſes figured carnall delectation in the ſemblance of the Serpent.

See alſo the ſame Authour, in his Book of Paradiſe. Lib. 4. Cap. 15.

Hereof they neuer dreamed before, vntill it was tolde them, that they ſhould be herein like vnto God; to wit, in an abounding Generation. For, as God is the intelligent, and the heauens are productiue cauſes of Creatures to Men heere on earth: euen ſo man, by means of continuall Carnall Meditations, attaineth to the encreaſing of a great Linage. In which point, the Feminine bodily part, not only ſuffers her ſelfe to be ruled and guided (as reaſon requireth) by her vnderſtanding Husband: but ſhee drawes him further alſo, euen into the quagmire of Corporall occaſions, to eate (with her) the Fruite of the forbidden Tree. Whereupon, immediatly their eyes are then opened, not onely their intellectuall eyes, (which they ſhould rather ſtill haue kept cloſed) but thoſe beſides of corporall fantaſie, concerning carnall and laſciuious actions. And by this meanes, they perceiue thẽſelues to be naked; that is to ſay, they know the diſobedience of carnall deeds to the Intellect: and therefore, procure to couer the Generatiue Members, as ſhamefull Rebels to reaſon & wiſdome.

God is the intelligent, and the Heauens the producing cauſes of Creatures.

Afterward it is ſaid, that hearing the voyce of God, immediatly they hid themſelues; as much to ſay, that knowing and acknowledging what Diuine thinges they had forſaken, they grew aſhamed, and ſo ſubſequently to ſin, ſucceeded the pain. Alſo the holy Hiſtory, doth ſeparately recite the appointed puniſhments; of the Serpent, of the Woman, and of the Man. The Serpent was curſſed, beyond any other beaſt or creature, to crawle along vpon his belly, and to eate duſt all his life time; enmity being put betweene the Woman and her race on the one ſide, and the Serpent & his race on the other ſide. So that Man ſhould breake the head of the ſaide Serpent, and the Serpent bruiſe the heele of the Man. Whereby may bee vnderſtood, that the carnall appetite of Man, is much more immeaſurable, then in any other Creature. And whereas the Serpent drags his belly on the earth, it implyeth, that hee thereby makes the hart of man to encline to earthly things, ſhunning ſuch as bee high and heauenly. And to eate duſt all his life time, becauſe hee nouriſheth himſelfe with thoſe thinges which are more baſe and abiect

After Sin the puniſhment neceſſarily enſued.

The Serpent curſſed, and no Creature elſe.

The reaſon why the Serpent drags his belly on the earth, and what is thereby ſignified.

and abiect then dust. As for the hate & enmity betweene them; it signifieth, that the carnall appetite soileth the corporall part, & defaceth it by ouer-flowing excesse, whereby doe ensue many bodily imperfections; as also diuers kinds of death. Likewise, by this means, the carnall appetite becommeth defeated, enfeebled, loosing it selfe by the intemperance of the complexion, and diseases of the body.

The Woman sentenced to plurality of paines.

As for the Woman, who was punished by plurality of paines in her Conceptions, & to bring forth her children with teares and lamentations, and yet to haue desire to her Husband, he hauing the only absolute power ouer her: Of this we may say, that a lasciuious life procureth the anguish of the Body all pleasures to be dolorous, & their whole race or off-spring filled with pain, trouble and afflictions. Neuertheless, she louing the Intellectuall part, as beeing her Husband: in him remaines the intellectuall power (aboue her) to rule and temper it, apteſt to the actions of the body. In the next place commeth the Man, who hauing heard and giuen consent to the wordes of his Wife, and eaten the fruite of the forbidden Tree; he must also be punished. God said vnto him, that the earth should be accursſed for his take; In trauaile and paine should he Till it all his life time; It should bring forth Thornes and Thistles to him; He should feede on the Hearbs of the field, and eate his Bread in the sweate of his Browes, vntill hee were returned into that earth, frō whence he had bin taken.

The sentence pronounced against the Man.

Hereof we may easily apprehend the Moral meaning; to wit, that Terrestriall thinges are curſsed to the Intellect. They are meats of sadneſse, greefe, and heauineſse; that is to say, they striue to make Immortality partaker of Mortall things, and (by accident of earthly actions) they do wound and pierce that supreame part, euen with Thornes, as it were. His food should be the Grasse & Hearbs of the field (which meat belongeth only to brute Beastes) because he gaue ouer his better life, soly to sensuality. Then, if he will eate any Bread, he must do it in the sweate of his Browes, labouring and trauailing: As much to say; As, if he haue a desire to eate Mans meat, & not that as the Beasts do; or, if he would differ from them in manly actions; it should be very difficult for him so to doe, because of the contrary habitude, which he had already taken in brutish sensuality. It is also saide vnto him, that all these perturbations shal happen to him for his sin, vntill such time as he returne into the earth, from whence he was at first deriued. And so much the rather, because beyond all other thinges, (created only Mortall) he was made immortall: yet coueting to be but Earth and Dust (in hunting after Corporall sinnes) this is the occasion that he must returne into dust, euen as he was at the beginning, resembling (in Mortality) the other Beasts of the earth. Whereby we gather, the pain & damnatiō of him, that giues himselfe wholy to sensuality.

Terrestriall thinges are dangerous to the vnderstanding part: as appeareth in the degrees of Mans punishments.

Sin the onely cause of Gods feuerite against Man.

The Text continuing on, saith; that Adam named his wife Euah; which name by Interpretation, is a talking, babling Creature: And Wife, because shee was the Mother of all things. To let vs vnderstand, that he named the Corporall part by a name common to brute beasts, in regard she was the cause, to produce all brutish abuse in Man. It denoteth withall, that God subiected their Intellect, and (of Contemplatiue) it became Actiue, basely to vnderstand and listen to the Bodies actions. Heerevpon they began to enstruct their vnderstanding in Arts, to make Garments of Beastes skins to couer them. Then are they expulsed out of Paradise, to goe labour in the Earth; that is to say, Contemplation was taken from them, and they must now vnderstand Terrestriall things: neuertheless, power was yet left them, to eate of the Tree of Life, and so to liue eternally. To which effect the Text saith; That God placed on the East side of Paradise, the Cherubins and the flaming Sword, to guard the way of the Tree of Life. Where, the Cherubins doe signifie the two Angelicall intelligences concerning Man; to wit, the Agent, and the passible. And the flaming Sword which shaketh without Intermission, signifieth our humaine fantasie; who returning from the Corporal, to seek the glorious light of the spirituall, gaines thereby this perswasion, that at length, leauing the corrupt way of Dust and Ashes, she may humbly attain the spirituall way to the Tree of Life, to liue in Eternity Intellectually.

Man bereft of Contemplation, is left subiect to earthly occasions.

CHAP. XI.

Of Death, and that God neuer was the Maker or Authour thereof.

AFter that our first Parents were expelled out of Paradise, they were brought vnder the subiection of Sin and Death, and (in them) all their whole posterity thereunto appointed. For Death is common to all Men, as it is said in the Law Licet, in Code, De pact is. And all Men must dye, concerning their Bodies. The Royall Prophet Dauid saith; Quis est homo qui viuet, & non videbit mortem? What Man liueth, and shall not see Death? Statutem est omnibus semel mori; It is ordained to all Men once to dye: So saith the blessed Apostle Saint Paule: And a Greeke Poet saith;

Ρητὸς ἅπασι καὶ θανεῖν ὁ φείλαι.

All Mortall men to dye is necessary.

Death (saith Saint Augustine, in his Booke against the Pelagians) Is nothing else but a priuation of life, hauing a Name, and no Essence. As hunger is said to bee defect of food; Thirst, lacke of Drinke; Darknesse, the absence of Light: euen so, Death is but a Name for want of life. There may be another diffinition made of naturall Death, as to say; that it is the separation of the Soule and the Body, and Plato makes vs such a diffinition thereof: As in like manner doth Aulus Gellius, saying; σῶμα τε καὶ ψυχῆς διάστασις. Death then hauing a Name without Essence, God was not the Creator thereof, neither cause nor Authour, for all things that God made, had Esience. Which tearme of Essence, comprehendeth that which is, or that is to be born. Most true it is, that for the punishment of Sinne, God pronounced the sentence of death against Man: but there is great difference, betweene pronouncing the sentence of Death, and to bee the cause of Death. They are the wordes of Salomon, and not mine; Deus mortem non fecit, nec lætatur in perditione viuorum. God hath not made Death, neyther hath he pleasure in the destruction of the liuing. Creauit enim, vt essent omnia, & sanabiles fecit nationes orbis terrarum; For he created all thinges, that they might haue their beeing, and the Generations of the World are preserued. But in another place he saith; Inuidia autem Diaboli mors intrauit in orbem terrarum. Through enuy of the Deuill came Death into the World.

Man made subiect to Sin and Death.

Aul. Gel. in lib. 17. de Noct. Attic. Cap. 8.

God Further made Death, not is the Authour thereof. Wisd. 1, 13, 14

Wisd. 2, 24.

The Deuill then being the Authour of Sinne, is also the Authour of Death, by Sinne. The Deuill could incite Man to sin, but he could not constraine him to yeelde consent. ADAM could keepe himselfe well enough from tasting the Tree of Life; but Gods will was, that he should not sinne, and so (consequently) would not haue him to dye. But leauing Life, and taking Death, and following then the free liberty of his will, he made himselfe Mortall, and his fault and disobedience was the cause of Death to him, and all men else beside. The Apostle Saint Paule saith; Propterea sicut per vnum hominem peccatum in hunc mundum intrauit, & per peccatum mors: & ita in omnes homines mors pertransit in quo omnes peccauerunt. Wherefore, as by one Man Sin entred into the World, and Death by Sinne: and so went Death ouer all men, forasmuch as all men haue sinned.

The Deuill is the Author of Death, by being the Author of Sinne.

See Iustin Martyr, in his answeres to the Orthodoxi-call questions 32. Quest.

Rom. 5, 12.

We haue then nothing more certaine or assured, then Death; neuertheless, the day and the houre thereof is most vncertain to vs: when, in what place, or how a Man is to dye, that only is in the Will, Power, and Knowledge of God. It is an wholesome and profitable thing for a Christian Man, to haue Death in his remembrance by continuall Meditation, and very often to thinke thereon: in regard, that as the forgetfulnesse of Death, is the cause of a Mans falling into Sinne, so the Memory thereof, turneth him quite from Sinne. Iesus the Sonne of Sirach saith; In omnibus operibus tuis memorare nouissima tua, et in æternum non peccabis. Whatsoeuer thou takest in hand, remember the end, and thou shalt neuer sinne. And the Kingly Psalmist saith; Cogitaui dies antiquos: & annos æternos in mente habui. Et meditatus sum nocte cum corde meo & exercitabar, & scopebam spiritum meum. I considered the daies of old, and the yeares of ancient time. I called to remembrance my Song in the night, I communed with mine owne heart.

Nothing more certaine then Death, but the time vncertaine.

A Christian Mans Meditation da lie, should be of Death.

and my Spirit searched diligently. Plato affirmeth, That the life of a wise man, is meditation on Death. Therefore watch and pray, for ye know not at what hour the Lord will come; let vs so labour, that he may finde vs ready, to drinke the same bitter draught, whereunto (in our first Parents) we are made subiect.

CHAP. XII.

The strange opinion of the Ægyptians, concerning the scope of a mans life time, iudging it by the proportion of the heart.

THat whereof I am now to speake, may seeme a noueltie to many, and fabulous to diuers others, because it is a matter very difficult to be prooued: Nor do I purpose to binde my selfe, to iustifie or maintaine the truth thereof; albeit (in my iudgement) their authority that haue written on the same Argument, may graunt it for true, or very likely. Pliny, and Marcus Varro, discoursing on the time of a Mans life, do affirme; that the learned Ægiptians had found out by experience, that Man (according to the course of Nature) could not liue aboue an hundred yeares. But if any one happened to out-step that limitation, it was iudged by particular influence, and power of the Starres, a thing (in Natures worke) very strange and maruailous.

Plin. in lib. 11. de H. natu. Cap. 56. Marcus Varro.

The Egiptians by experience found out, that man could not liue aboue an hundred yeares.

The Foundation of this their setled perswasion, they gathered and conceiued by the hart of a Man, which hauing made proofe of many times, by order of Anatomy; they thereby attained to the knowledge of very wonderfull secrets. For, say they; when a Man Childe is a full yeare old, his heart poyzeth the weight of two of their Drams: Foure when hee is two yeares old, and so onward (as many yeares as hee liues) his heart encreaseth in weight a couple of Drammes yearely. So that when hee commeth to the age of fifty yeares, his heart then weigheth an hundred drams. But thence forward, it is not more ponderous, but proportionably diminisheth his weight (ratably euery yeare) by two Drammes, euen according as before it encreased. So that at the age of an hundred yeares, the heart (by continuall decreasing) becomes to bee nothing in poize; and then (consequently) the man of necessity dies, if (by some other accidentall occasion) he dye not before: Because there are so many kinds of seuerall occasions, which can and do customarily hasten death, before men arriue at halfe the time of making this experiment in themselues.

A secret worthy obseruation.

The Heart of Man decreaseth in weight as it increased

If this do seeme strange to any of vs, yet let it be held for infallible, that the Egyptians obserued it as most certaine, according as these recited Authors doe auouch, beside others likewise liuing in our times; as Cœlius Rodiginus alledging Dioscorides, speakes thereof (among other) many notable things. The like doth Petrus Crinitus, in his Book of honest Discipline. Galiot de Nargni, in his Booke of Man; and Cornelius Agrippa. I thought good to acquaint you with these seuerall Testimonies, because (with many) the matter is hard to be credited; therefore let euery man lend beliefe, as to himselfe seemeth best.

Cæl. Rodig. li. 10 Lect. ant. Cap. 16. Pet. Crinit. in lib. de D isp. Galiot Narg. in lib. de Hom. Cor. Agrip. in 2 de fcient. Philo.

And in regard we are now discoursing on the Heart of Man, wherin doth consist such infinite excellencies, euen in that one litle part, because we would be loath to handle one point single or alone; let vs learne somewhat of that woorthy Philosopher Aristotle, who saith; The Heart of Man is lodged on the left side in his body, but in all other creatures els, it is naturally in the midst of their brest; and this doth he affirme in his first Book of the nature of Beasts. It is also a common receiued opinion among naturall Phylosophers, that the very first part which is formed of Man, is the Heart, as the maine roote of al his other members; the Spring or Fountaine of Natural heat; & it is also the only member, that last looseth his mouing, and dyeth in man. It is a member so Noble & Delicate, as it can endure no touching, but presently the man dies.

Arist. in lib. de nat. animal.

The first part that is formed of man, is his Hart, it liueth first, and dieth last.

Pliny reciteth another maruaile, which yet he maintaineth to happen many times; to wit, that men haue bin found with their Hearts rough or Hayrie; and he that hath it so, is a valiaunt man, and stoutly disposed. As was experimented in the dissection of Aristo-

Plin. lib. 11 cap. 37.

Aristomenes slew 300. men in one battell, with his owne hand.

menes, who with his owne hand slew (in one battaile) three hundred Lacedemonians; and escaping (afterward) manie great perils, only by meanes of his great valour, being dead, he was opened, and his heart found to be very hayry. Suetonius Tranquillus, in the life of Caligula, (and Pliny also saieth the same) that if a man dye by poyson, his Heart cannot bee burned, although it be throwne into the verie hotteſt fire; according as was verified by the Hart of Germanicus, the Father of Caligula; and the like hath bin tried, by such as haue died of Cardiaca, the Heart-ake, which some do term the falling sickneſſe.

Sueto. Tranquil. in vit. Calig. Plin. lib. 11. c. 37

If a man bee poysoned, his heart cannot be burnd with fire.

Moreouer, it is to be noted, that the strength of Laughter or laughing, abideth in the little Skinnes or Celles of the Heart In approbation whereof, ancient Historians writing of the Romain Gladiatores, Fencers, or Sword-players, do affirme; that they being wounded in those folds, or thinne Wrappers of the Heart, thinges haue falne out at those Wounds, like little Threds, and they haue dyed in extreamity of Laughter. Now, euen as ioy or laughter proceedeth from the Heart, so likewise is Sadneſſe and Melancholy thence derined sensibly; and good or euill immaginations in like manner. Our Words are begotten in it; And many are of Opinion, that it is the principall seate and residence of the Soule: which seemes to be confirmed by the saying of our Sauiour himselfe, That badde and wicked theughts do come out of the Heart. And that which enters at the Mouth, defileth not at al, because they are but thinges indifferent. Likewise, venerable Bede, in his Commentaries vpon Saint Marke, saith; The cheefeſt seat of the soule is not in the Braine, according as Plato hath maintained; but in the Heart, agreeing with the speeches of our Sauiour Christ.

The seate of Laughter is in the heart.

Sadneſſe and Melancholy also commeth from the hart.

CHAP. XIII.

The Reason wherefore Man goeth vpright. Why hee is more waighty fasting, then when he hath taken som sustenance: And the cause why he is heauier when hee is dead, then being aliue: With many other speciall Obseruations.

CONtemplatiue occasions, which do concerne the cõposition of men, are welneer infinit. Lactantius Firmianus hath thereof Written a Booke by himselfe, only touching that argument, & so haue diuers other learned men done the like. And in truth, there is one thing (among the plentifull store of others) that deserueth perticuler consideratiõ in the knowledge therof, that is; wherefore God hath made all other creatures (Man only excepted) with their heades stooping or bending downward, with their eies (for the greater part) looking to the earth: & not only sensitiue creatures, such as are bruite beasts, but likewise the vegetatiue Bodies; as Plants, Trees, and such like, who haue their heads & foundations within the earth, and their armes or braunches highly extended. As for man, he onely was created with his eies vp toward heauen, his face aloft, and his body strait, in eleuated proportion. Now albeit, for a full and compleat reason in this case, it were sufficient to aledge the wil of God to haue it so; yet it seemeth beside, to relliſh and taſt of some hidden Misterie or secrecy, and therfore it wel deserueth to haue further speculation.

Why GOD made all creatures else, but Man, looking downeward.

A hidden secret and Mystery in the composition of Man.

To begin then with our very disposition; me thinkes it teacheth vs by manifeſt apparance, that we were not created or borne for the earth; but rather, that the purpose of our creation, was to imitate and contemplate high and celeſtial matters, which are not cõmunicable to other creatures, neither are they capable of them, or any (but man only) worthy to behold them. God made all the beasts with their heads deiected; declaring thereby, that man had the rule & command ouer them. One of these reasons is most elegantly noted by Lactantius Firmianus, saying; God hauing determined to make man for Heauen, & all other creatures for the earth; he created man of a reasonable soule, straite, and with an erected body, disposed to Celeſtiall Contemplations; to the end, that hee might admire their effects, and hold in reuerence the place of his Originall, and the Countrey of his Natiuity. The other Beaſtes hee made Base, Crooked, and bending downe vnto the Earth, because they haue no participation in Heauen. Aristotle who had not so much as the very glimpse

The disposition of man declareth hee was not borne for the earth.

Lactan. Firm. lib. 8. de Oper. Dei.

Arist lib. 2. de Animal.

glimpse of light, concerning faith, saith; That only Man (among all other Creatures) goeth vpright, because that his substance & best part thereof, are Celestiall, and not Terrestriall; and that the Office of Diuine Spirits, is to vnderstand and know. But heerein man could neuer haue knowne how to exercise himselfe, if he had had a heauy, huge, and deiected bodie, because the waight and burthen of such corporall sense, doth nothing but make the vnderstanding dull and slothful. The learned Thomas Aquinas, forgetting nothing in discussion & examining, leaues not this question without determination. For, in his exposition vppon Youth and Age he saith; For two causes was man formed vpright towards Heauen. The one, to be the most perfect of all the creatures, & to be he that most partaketh and neerest approacheth to the quality of Heauen. The other, because that in the proportion of his body, he is more hot then any other Beast; & the Nature of heat, is, to lift vp it selfe. All other creatures do containe a meane, as lesse participating of the Cœlestiall quality, and lesse haue they of this heate, whereby to eleuate themselues: for this cause, they are not in disposition or shape like vnto the glorious Image of Man.

Them. Aquin. in Sum. cap. 10. Quæst. 9.

Two especiall causes why mã was made Vpright.

The Platonists opinion concerning mans going vpright

Heerein it appeareth, that Thomas Aquinas followed the opinion of the Platonists, who held, That heate and the Spirits of man (wherin he aboundeth more then any liuing thing, regard being had of the proportion of his body) are the causes why he goeth elcuated and vpright, as he doth. For, by meanes of the strength and vigor of his Spirits and Blood, he listeth and vprighteth himselfe: wherein also hee is holpen by the composition of the Elements, whereof man is composed in such equality and measure of waight, as he can erect and mount vp himselfe. And something else there is in this case to be considered, to wit; that partly in regard of his soule, and partly of his body, man is moued to the loue and contemplation of Heauen; therefore, hee ought to thinke & consider of nothing, but high, spirituall, and good matters; and contrarywise, to contemne and despise base earthly businesses. Neuertheless, many times we are so affected to the abiect respect of worldly considerations, that when our eies and countenances are fixed on Heauen, our hearts and spirits are too too low humbled vpon earth.

Concerning the propriety of the Spirits of man, whereof we haue now treated, Pliny aledgeth another thing, which though it be not of such importance as the others are, yet it cannot but giue pleasing and content to such as know it not, or haue not so much as dreamed, on that which dayly experience maketh manifest: he saith, That a man being dead, waigheth heauier then when hee is liuing; and the same he maintaineth in al other kinde of Creatures. Hee likewise affirmeth, That a man that hath eatē any thing, weigheth lesse then he did when he was Fasting. Erasmus in a certaine Problem of his, doth say as much, with diuers other notable things, alledging the same Reasons as Pliny doth; which are all grounded on the Essence of the vitall Spirits, and the Ayre, which comforts & cheers them vp, as we haue before approued. The like is said of a man fasting, that his waight is then more ponderous, then when he hath eaten; albeit it appears in common iudgement, that he should be then lightest, because refection hath more charged him.

A further Relation concerning the Spirits of man.

Plin. in Hist. Nat. lib. 7.

Eras. in Probl. 5. & 6.

That a man is heauier fasting, then when he hath fed.

And yet notwithstanding, it is so for certaine, and there is no maruell to bee made thereat, for drinking and eating do encrease those vitall Spirits which giue cherrishing to man, enlarging and multiplying naturall heate within him. And hence commeth it, that when one man essaieth to lift vp another from the ground, if he that is lifted vp be so pleased, he may make himselfe the heauier, by breathing forth abundantly the inward Ayre in his body: but if he retain and hold it in, hee makes himselfe then to be the lighter. So when a man runneth, he retaineth his breath onely, to hast him away the more speedily: for, the Ayre beeing a very light Element, coueteth to raise him the loftier in running, euen vnto his ayery place of abiding.

Eating and drinking doe cheare vp the spirit of Man.

A familiar triall of a mans weight.

Experience heerin may be a present Tutor, by any Skin or Bladder, which being throwne into the Water empty, and not blowne vp with Ayre, sinketh of it selfe forthwith to the bottom: but let it bee filled with ayre, which is the breath of man, it floateth lightly on the face of the water. Pliny also telleth vs, that that a body dead in the water, if it be of a man, in rising, he hath his face vp towards Heauen; but if it be of a woman, she ariseth with her face downeward; wherein she may giue some honour to Nature, for so wise and discreete a prouision, so to conceale the vnsightly Secrets of the Woman. Beyond al this, there is yet another naturall reason, to wit; that a Woman weigheth heauiest in her fore-part, by reason of hir brests; and a man heauiest behinde, because of his shouldets.

A Bladder not blowne with winde, sinketh of it selfe.

A man drowned, ariseth with his face vpward, but a woman hath hers downeward.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the supreame Dignity of the Head aboue all other Members of the Body. That it is an euill signe to haue a little Head, or a straite breast. And whence it came, that it is accounted as a courtesie and honor, to take off the Cap or Bonnet, in saluting one another.

IF it bee such an excellent preheminence, that Man among all other creatures hath his bodye of vpright stature, and his face aduanced to beholde Heauen, as his Hart also to meditate on Heauenly Matters; why then vndoubtedly, the head, which is the most eminent, lawdable, & highest part among all the others members, by reason, ought to haue aduantage & authority aboue the rest. And in verie deed, all the other parts are but as guardes and obedient Seruants to him; because, so soone as any harme or annoyance happeneth to the Head; presently the Foot, the Hand, the Arme, and all the other Members beside, do naturally endeuour for his helpe and defence. For in him consisteth the security of them all; in regard, that if the head bee diseased, all the other parts of the bodie, do feele the smart thereof.

The Head ought to haue preheminēce ouer the other members.

Saint Ambrose giues vs an especiall Commendation of the Head, sayeng; The facture and composition of the Bodie, is a meere example of the whole world. And as Heauen is the most eminent and principall part, and the ayre and the other Elements thereto inferiour: so is the Head of Man supreame to the other parts, as being their Gouernor, Lord and Maister; because they are but as a Castle or Cittadell, seated vnder a maine Rocke, in the midst of a Citty. In him lodgeth wisedome and Industry, which gouerneth euery part of the body; from him, both power and prudence is deriued, and (as Salomon saith) The eyes of the Wiseman is in his head. Lactantius Firmianus saith, The Lord there placed the Head of man, to the end, that in him might remaine the Empire and Gouernement ouer all the Beasts. Galen giues the Head the principality ouer all the other members of man. And Plato in his Timeus, nameth it The whole Body of Man. Being then of so great importance, and the Sanctuarie of the bodies Sences, and Powers; it were necessary that his forme and greatnesse, should be proportionable & fitting for such a potent priuiledge.

Belike it was vpon this Reason, that Paulus Eginetus saide in the first of his Bookes of Physicke: The ouer-litle Head of a man, is a signe that hee hath very little Iudgement, and wanteth a good Brain. The same Reason is alledged by Iohannes Alexandrinus, saying; The little Head is as vnhealthfull, as the straite brest lockt vp and chested: Because that as the breast is the lodging of the Hart and Lunges, who cannot (without great danger) endure a strict enclosure, in regard that the hart beeing narrowly shut vp, cannot conueniently mooue it selfe, but looseth and diminisheth his Natural heate; and beside, decayeth al digestion: Euen so, in like manner, it behoueth, that the Head or dwelling place of the Organs, belonging to so many powers and vnderstandings, should be of a competent proportion. Galen affirmeth the very same, & maintaineth, That a little Head, is a manifest token of little intelligence, and an vnstable Brain; So that a Head of a good and indifferent proportion, signifieth a free and liberall vnderstanding.

And if a man haue his Head cut off, whereby he cannot mooue or goe; yet, it is not through defect of respiration, but because all his Nerues are cut in sunder in the supream place; and they are the Instruments and wayes of all the Bodyes Motions, euen as they are in all other Creatures liuing. roes roes saith, That he saw a poore vnfortunate Patient, who hauing his Head taken off, walked too and fro (for a small while) in sight of all the people. It is also written of Dionisius Areopagita, that after his Head was smitten off, hee walked certaine paces. Some say, it was a league and more from the place of his Execution, but this was more myraculous, then Naturall. Among all other liuing Creatures (as Pliny auoucheth) Man only, and a Horse, do becom soonest Hoary and white-headed, especially towards their latter daies. Man, because he hath his Head rounder, higher aduanced, and cleaner from putrifaction, is therefore the more sure & strong in his Head; where contrariwise, who so sauoureth most of imperfect moysture, is commonly of weakest and slendereſt Iudgement or capacity.

Plin. lib. de Animal. 11. Man, and a Horse becom white-headed

Many famous men that could daily go bare-headed, in raine, stormes, or heate.

We read of diuers worthy and valiant men, who haue had their Heades so solid, sound, and well affected, that they could go daily bare and discouered. As among others: Iulius Cæsar, Hannibal of Carthage, and Masanissa king of Numidia, who wold neuer couer his Head, either in his oldest age, nor yet for rain, snow, rough stormes and winds, or parching Heat of the Sun. We read the like also of the Emperours, Adrian and Seuerus, with diuers other of the same disposition. And seeing we haue spoken so much of the Head, methinkes it were good likewise to know for what reason, and whence it ensued, that it was reputed for a courtesie, when one man tooke off his Bonnet or Hat before another, in signe of Reuerence; and that it was so conceiued, if a man discouered his head: we will therefore not forbeare to speak somwhat thereof, although it may seem but of slender consequence.

Of the Reuerence of Vailing the Bonnet.

Plutarch saith in his Problemes, that in his opinion, this is the reason. In Ancient time (saith he) he which offered sacrifice vnto the Goddes, kept his Bonnet on his Head al the while. And that Princes and worthy personages, to do courtesie and Honor to the Sacrificer, in regarde of his high function, would (in humble manner) discouer their heads before him: because it should not appeare, that they would presume to paragon his supreame authority, or equalize themselues with the Goddes; but satisfied both thus, in honouring their Sacrificer. He further tels vs, that it was the vse, that when a man met his enimy, or any other that he hated, if his head had beene bare before, either by heate or otherwise, he would instantly couer it, in despight (as it were) of him. And yet he thought it fitting, that before his Prince or Frend, he should be bared.

Men would couer their Heads, meeting their enimies.

Marcus Varro, agreeing with Pliny, saith and maintaines it; that at the first beginning heereof, it was not doone in regard of awe or reuerence, that men discouered their Heads in the presence of Magistrates: but only, that through want of wearing their Bonnets, they might make them-selues more healthfull, strong, and hardy; for which cause only, and to shew themselues such, they bared their heads; and not for any duty, as hath bin imagined. Galiottus of Nargni, is of opinion, that when a man discouereth his head to do any one honor, he giues therby also to vnderstand, that in baring the principall, best, and most worthy member of Man, he offers and puts himselfe into his power, whom he salutes; as saying and confessing to bee his Inferiour.

Plin. lib. 28.

Men did not bare their Heads to Magistrates for reuerence, but to make themselues hardie and strong.

Galiot. de Nargni. in lib. de Hom.

Lodouicus Cælius alledgeth and rendereth almost the selfe-same reason; saying; In regard the Head is the principall of all the other Members, and whereunto they serue and obey for his defence: euen so, is it a sign of honor and reuerence, when that supreame part discouereth it selfe in humilitie. All which notwithstanding, let the causes be as they are taken, yet it is both hurtfull and scarse commodious, to bee thus continually reuerend to men. And much better were it, that these Reuerences and salutations for duty, respect, or whatsoeuer, by courteous language might be performed only.

Baring of the Head, is a discommodious kinde of curtesie.

and Science of the liuing God onely. True it is, that the good Angelles haue an intelligence of future occasions, yet not in their owne Nature, but according as God giues it them by reuelatiõ. The Deuils also do sometimes foresee what is to ensue, yea a long time before it hapneth; by disposition of the celestiall and inferiour bodies; like as men do sometimes foretell by knowledge in Astrology, bad and sterile seasons, from fruitfull and plenteous. As Thales Milesius (by meanes of the Starres) foretolde the abundance of Oliues which should be the yeare following. Somtimes likewise, the euill Dæmons or Spirits, doe presage future matters, by coniecture only, and then their predictions do euer fall out to the contrary. For it is their habit and custome, to mingle lyes with trueth, to the end, that they may the more easily perswade the falshoode. Euen in like manner, as they vse to do, that are preparing a poyson, they mingle it with Wine, Hony, or some sweet thing, that the deadly venome may bee couered & hidden vnder the sweet shaddow: & it doth not a little delight those peruerse spirits, when they can any way abuse the credulity of men, by lying, in their Mystical prædictions of things to happen.

Arist. Polit. lib. 1. cap. 7.

The Deuilles mingle lies & truth togither only thereby. to deceiue men.

Wee finde it written in the second Booke of Kings, that an euill spirit being desirous to deceiue Achab King of Israel, said to the Eternall; I will go out, and be a false Spirit in the Mouthes of all his Prophets. Wherewith the Prophets of Achab being instructed, they and the lying Spirit assured him, that hee should haue the victory against the Assyrians. And yet notwithstanding, Achab was slaine in that battell, according to the words of the true Prophet Micheas. Porphirius saith, That the Goddes do often lye, & that the certaine foresight of future thinges, is not only oblique and vneuen to men, but likewise most vncertaine to the Goddes themselues, being full of many ambiguities. Nor indeed were the Gods of the Gentiles (wherof Porphirius thus spake) any other then wicked Dæmons or Spirits, as plainly may be noted by the name of Belzebub, as much to say, as God or lord of Flies; the Idoll of whom, was adored by the Accaronites.

2. Kings 2, 22

The Gods of the Gentiles, were meerely lying Deuils.

Moreouer, the Deuils are said to bee learned, and haue knowledge in the Sacred Scriptures, as appeareth in the gospell of S. Mathew; where it is declared, that Sathan brought our Sauiour into the holy Citty, and hauing set him vpon the Pinacle of the Temple, he said vnto him; Si filius Dei es, mitte te deorsũ: Scriptum est enim, quia angelis suis mandauit de te, & in manibus tollent te, ne forte offendas ad lapidẽ pedem tuum. If thou be the Son of God, cast thy selfe downe for it is writtẽ, that he wil giue his Angels charge ouer thee, & with their hands they shal lift thee vp, lest at any time thou shouldst dash thy foot against a stone. Which allegation of scripture, Sathan had borrowed, or rather stoln from Dauid, in his 91. Psalme, where the verie words are likewise set downe.

The good Father Athanasius recordeth, that an holy Religious man, discouered diuers subtilties of the Deuil, and acquainted therewith sundry of his louing Brethren, saying vnto thẽ, among other of their qualities, in this manner: It is their custome also, to sing very melodiously, and yet are not seene; With their impure mouths (O horrible guile) they meditate and talke of holy Scriptures. When wee are reading in them, like Ecchoes they wil often make aunswere to our last wordes, &c. Heereby wee may perceiue, that those vnclean Spirits do vnderstand the scriptures, but they apply them (by false exposition) to their own wicked purpose.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the sign of the Crosse, that it was in great estimation long before our Sauiour Iesus Christ was crucified thereon. Also, how before Letters were known or inuented, the Egyptians wrote their mindes by Figures, Carracters, and Hieroglyphickes, applying them to many notable vses.

LOng before our Sauiour and Redeemer Iesus Christ suffered vpon the Crosse, the signe of the crosse was regarded and esteemed, as a Prognosticke sign, fatall and ominous to some. But the Egyptians caused it to be engrauen on the breasts of their Idol Serapis, which they reuerenced and honoured noured as their God. But for our better manifestation, how much this Figure hath bin respected; it is expedient first to know, that the ancient Arabians, who were most skilfull in iudgement of the Heauens, and the powerfull influences of the Starres, did vse to make (for many causes) Images and figures Carued in Stones, Mettals, Rings, & other things, for obseruation of certain pointes, and dayes of marke or note, whereof we purpose to speake in more conuenient place. Among all which signes, they most especially affected that of the Crosse, as attributing more efficacy and Vertue thereto, then they did to any of the other; because therby they compassed the knoledge of darke secrets, which with great curiosity they concealed to themselues, and hardly woulde impart to their children or deerest friends.

The signe of the Crosse highly respected by the old Arabes.

I purpose not to meddle with the opinion of Marsilius Ficinus, describing it in diuers manners, because the price of our redemption was paid thereon; but doe meane to consider the figure of the Crosse in it selfe meerely. For in Geometricall contemplation, it is allowed to be a most excellent & perfect figure, because it containeth (in it self) an equal length and largenesse. It is composed of two straite lines, euery way equall; the ioynture whereof, as it is taken by his Center, shapeth by his points & vtmost reaches, an absolute perfect roundure. It containeth foure seuerall corners, directly each way extended, wherein is the greatest effects of the stars, because they haue the greater force and Vertue when they are extended to their extreamities, and come neerest to the corners of East, West, North, and South: and being so seated, their very splendor then shapes it selfe in signe of a Crosse, if with wary iudgement it be duely considered. Moreouer, I could shew the reason wherefore the Egyptians so esteemed it beyond all their other markes and figures, & what signification they made therof: but my meaning is to speak first of some other of their Images, as also of their Hierogliphicall Caracters, with their purport and interpretation.

Marsil. Ficin. in lib. de trib. vit.

The figure of the Crosse in Geometry, like the foure Corners of the world.

Before the Egyptians knew any letters, they wrote their intentions by Figures, Carracters, and Ciphers of diuers things; as Birds, Beasts, Trees, or by some of their owne perticular members; wherin they grew to be so prompt and ready, as they quickly apprehended the signification of any thing, onely by the frequent vse made thereof; the Father first instructing his Sonne, and so discending from one succession to another, as is witnessed by Cornelius Tacitus, Strabo, and Diodorus Siculus, from whō, and from many places of Plinie, I haue Collected some scantlings of their reasons.

What the Egyptians did describe their minds by, before they knew letters.

First of all, by the Gripe, they vnderstood Nature, because (say they) of that kind of Fowle, they neuer knew a male: the same affirmeth Amianus Marcellinus. By the Hawke or Falcon, they intended such things as were to be done quick & expeditiously, figuring this their meaning, by the swiftnesse and celeritie of the Foule. By the Bee, they vnderstood the Dignity of a King; because (sayde they) a King ought to haue both Hony and a sting. By the Basiliske or Serpent, that round circkled it selfe with his taile in his mouth, they figured the reuolution of the year, because it endeth where it beginneth. The Wolfes head, pointed at time being past; in regarde, that Beast hath no memory, but is all for the instant. The Lyons head, figured the time present, because of his power and imperious command. They set downe the head of a Dogge, licking his chaps with his Tongue, whereby they presented time to come, for euermore, our succeeding hopes do make vs to cherish them very carefully. The Oxe, signifyed the Earth, in regard of the great labour of the Beast. Iustice was Caractred by the Storke, for they alledged, (and many more haue affirmd as much) that this Bird dooth Iustice and Equity to his begetter, feeding and cherishing him in his age, as the other first had norished him, and brought him vppe diligently in his Nest.

man, who was a dilligent obſeruer of iuſt actions. By the ear they vnderſtood memory. And a man that was of exquiſit memory, of him they gaue notice by the ſhape of a Hare, hauing both her eares wide open, and her eies bent forward. And thus could they diſcourſe on all things, by practiſe and experience in ſuch like reſemblaunces, euen aſwell as if they had beene written to them in Letters.

We returne now againe to our former ſpeeches of the Croſſe, holding it ſomewhat memorable, that among ſo many other ſeueral ſignes, it only ſhold be the moſt euident and knowne Carracter. And they placed it on the breſt of their Idoll God, to ſignifie their future hope of Happineſſe; and prognoſticating (as it were) ſo long before, what vniuerſall vſe ſhould afterwardes bee made thereof; as in adorning the wreaths and Diadems of Emperours, Kings, and other Potentates; the beautie of their ſtampes and Coines: but eſpecially, the diſtinguiſhing of Chriſtians, from barbarous Infidels. So ſpeaketh Ruffinus in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and Petrus Criuitus the like, in his ſeuenth Booke of honeſt Diſcipline, as alſo Marſilus Ficinus before alledged. But contrariwiſe, among the Romain Iewes, and other ſuch like people, the death of the Croſſe was reputed moſt ignomious. And Conſtantine the Emperor, was the firſt that prohibited the condemned to death, from being any longer crucified; becauſe GOD had myraculouſly ſhewne him in a Croſſe in the aire, with promiſe (vnder that Standard) to conquer; whereof making triall, he fought with his enemy Maxentius, a great perſecutor of the Chriſtians, & vanquiſhed him in the field, acording as it is witneſſed by Euſebius. So much ſhal ſerue to be ſpoken concerning the ſign of the croſſe, without any ſuperſtitious opinion therof, or any friuolous worſhppe yeelded therto, as too many (miſtaking the true meaning) fondly & vainly do; but in all times it hath beene almoſt a cuſtome, to draw error out of good intentions, and to wound with abuſe, things meerly indifferent in themſelues.

CHAP. XVII.

The excellency of Secrecy, & with what care it is to be kept: Diuers good examples are produced, apt to the intended purpoſe.

ONe of the principall partes, that makes a man knowne to bee wiſe indeed, is his intelligent ſtrength and ability to couer and conceale thoſe ſecrets, which (by anothers truſt) are committed to him, with ſound retention likewiſe of his owne ſerious affaires and priuacies. They that will reade the auncient Hiſtories of times long paſt, ſhal find a great number of vertuous attempts, that neuer reached their endes and aimes (were it either in peace or war) but were ſhaken in ſhiuers, bruiſed and defeated, only through defect of ſecret concealment; and yet, beſide ſuch vnhappy preuention, infinit great euils haue thereby enſued. But amongeſt all other examples, let vs conſider one more notable, and excelling all the reſt, deriued euen from God himſelfe; who ſo eſpecially preſerueth his own ſecrets to himſelfe, that he would neuer let any man know what ſhould betide or happen to morrow; neither could they that liued in the Ages paſt, imagin or diuine what ſhould befal vs in theſe our dayes; wherby we may eaſily diſcern, that God himſelf is wel pleaſed with ſecrecy. And albeit, that (for mans good) he hath reuealed ſom things, yet impoſſible is it at any time to change or alter his determination; in regard whereof, the reuerend wiſemen of elder times euermore affected to perform their intentions ſecretly. We read that Cato Cenſorius often ſaid to his friends, that of three things hee had good reaſon daily to repent himſelfe, if he fel into the performance of al or any one of them. The firſt, if he did diſcloſe any ſecret, to any one whatſoeuer; but principally to his wife. The ſecond, if he aduentured on the water, & might keepe himſelfe on dry land. The third, if he ſhould let any day neglectly eſcape him, with omiſſion of ſome one good action or other. The later two are well worthy obſeruation, but the firſt concerneth our inſtant argument. Alexander hauing receiued diuers letters of great importaunce from his Mother, after hee had read them in the preſence of none but his deare friend Epheſtion & him-

Phillippides his answere to K. Lisimachus.

When King Lisimachus made offer to the Poet Phillippides, of whatsoeuer hee would make request, the Poet replyed: O King, the very greatest good deede thou canst do me, is, neuer to acquaint mee with any of thy Secrets.

Anthonius Sabellicus, concerning the historie of Captaine Cremignola, & the Venetians.

Anthonius Sabellicus, concerning this purpose, declareth a notable & meruailous example. In the time of Pope Eugenius (saith he) the Siegnory of Venice had a Captaine named Cremignola, by whose disloialty and treason, their army had receiued the ouerthrow. Whereupon, the Senate iudiciously consulted together, what might best be done in a case so desperate. Some were of opinion, by an instant mandation to call him home; and being possessed of him, to let him know the vertue of their Iustice. But others dissented, and held it against both honor and pollicy. Finally, it was concluded, that a maske or ignoraunce (as yet) shoulde mussle all, and not so much as suspition of his delict, any way be conceited; but purpose should bee made seruant to more apt opportunity: & howsoeuer delay excused the errour, yet death in the end should close vp all.

Eight months secrecy contained among many.

This determination was deferred, and slept for the space of 8. months, but shut vp in each brest with such secrecy, as his eares (in all that time) could reach no supposition therof. This was (questionlesse) a matter of no mean maruel, considering there were so many Senators; among whom, diuers were much indered to Cremignola; some by propinquity in blood; others in friendship; & most of them by desertfull affection. Beside, many of them were poore, and poueries eies being commonly bent on gifts & rewards (whereof there was no want in the Captain) might haue bin an easie benefit, & his best fortune. All which notwithstanding, this honorable seal of Secrecy, was set with such assurance vpon euery soule, that the 8. moneths hauing consumed themselues, he was verie kindly recalled home to Venice, entertained with all embracings and affectuous Ceremonies. But on the morrow, hee was surprized, condemned before the Senat to forfeit his head, and he paide it by imediate performance. This may wel serue for a remarkeable president to all our modern States, their Senators, Iudges, and Counsellours, least it fall out with them, as it hath done to many, who forthwith haue discouered such secrets, as (in greater wisedome) they ought to haue concealed. In reproofe and iust check of whom, I will rehearse a pleasant discourse, deliuered by Aulus Gellius in his Attick nights, and by Macrobius in his Saturnals, according as followeth.

An especiall president to al States, for retaining secrecie.

Aul. Gel. in Attic. Noct. Macrob. in Saturn.

The Senators of Rome, at their vsuall sitting in the Senat house, had constituted a custome among themselues, that each man (hauing a Sonne) so soone as he was able to walke with his Father, he might bring him with him to the Senat, to abide or depart as occasion best required. Nor was this fauour generall, but extended only to Noblemens sons; and lasted til they were seuenteen years old: and the intent was, that by beholding the discreet behauiour of their Fathers, they might make the better apprehension thereof afterward, vntil they attained to riper yeares of gouernment, to be instructed in affaires of the weale-publicke. All which time, they were so well taught and tutord, as, whatsoeuer was discourssed in Counsell, it was concealed in them from publick reporting.

A worthy kind of education for the sonnes of Noblemen.

One time, beyond all other, the Senate sat in consultation of a very serious and important cause, so that their rising was much later, then before had bin accustomed: and the conclusion was referred ouer vntill the next day, with expresse charge of Secrecy in the meane while. Among other Noblemens Children, that had bin there in this waighty Businesse, was the yong son of the graue Senator Papirius, whose family was one of the most noble & illustrious in al Rome.

The child being come home, his Mother (as women are highly affected to nouelty) intreated him to tell her, what strange case had bin that day debated in the Senate, that had power to detaine them so long beyond their vsuall houre? The Vertuous Noble youth tolde her, it was a Businesse not beseeming him to speak of; & more (as al Noblemens sons else) he was commanded to silence. She hearing this answere, according to the immoderate heat of weomens desires, became more earnest in stricter inquisition into the case, & nothing but intelligence thereof might any way content hir. So that, first by faire speeches & entreaties, with large and liberal promises she practised to break open this poor little Casket of secrecy; that, not preuayling, to stripes & violent threats was hir next flight, because force may compel, where lenity cannot. The admired Noble spirit, finding a Mothers threats to be very harsh, but hir stripes more bitter then any thing beside, comparing his loue to hir as his Mother, with the duty he ought to his father; the one mighty, but the other more impulsiue: he layes her & her fond conceit in the one scale; his Father, the Senate, himselfe in his yong budding reputation, and the serious iniunction to secrecy in the other; and finding her currant waight, as being his Mother, but lighter then wind, being thus gone out of hir selfe: whetting his tender wit vpon the sandy stone of her edging importunity; to appease her, and preserue himselfe sound (as out of a kind of constrained vnwillingnesse) resolu d her thus. Madam, & deare Mother, you may well blame the Senat for their so long sitting, at least for calling in question a case so impertinent; For, except as many Senators wiues may be there present, as Senators that consult thereon, there can be no hope of conclusion. I speake this but out of my young apprehension, for their grauity I know may easily confound mee. And yet, whither Nature or duty so instruct me, I cannot tell, albeit it seemeth good to them, that for encrease of people, & help to the weal-publick, the Senators only should bee allowed to haue two wiues, or else their wiues two husbands: I shall hardly vnder one roofe call two men by the name of Father, I had rather call two women by the name of Mother. This is the question Mother, & to morrow it must haue determination.

The Mother hearing this, and by his vnwillingnesse reuealing it, beleeuing it for infallible; her blood was quickly fiered, for this was Tinder apt enough to take. And (as commonly) such suddain heats do admit no consideration, but hurry the sences & faculties to further rashnesse: So shee, requiring no other counsel, but such as hir selfe, flings forth to the other ladies & Matrons of Rome, and by the bellowes of hir breth, blowes them al vp into as brainsicke a passion. And, which is rare, for a Parliament of women to be gouernd by one speaker, yet, the affaire being so vrgent, the hast as pertinent, and the case (on their behalfe) meerly indulgent: the reuealing woman must prolocute for her selfe, & all the other women. And such a din is the next day at the Senat doore, for admission to sit with their Husbandes in this woonderous consultation, as if all Rome had bin in an vprore. Their minds must not be knowne before they haue audience, which (though against all order, yet necessity inforcing) being granted, such an Oration was made by the woman-speaker, with request that women might haue two Husbands, rather then men two wiues, that could scarsely content one: as (vpon the Riddles solution) the Noble youthes secrecie being commended, the Ladies (with folly and impudence confounded) I guesse, that with blushing cheekes they thence departed. Neuertheless, for auoiding the like inconuenience, it was determined, that thence-forward the Fathers shold bring their Sons no more into the Senate; only yong Papirius was freely allowed, & his discreet policy to conceale the Senats secrets, not only applauded, but himselfe with Titles of honour dignified and rewarded.

Vndoubtedly, old men of these dayes, may make good vse of this young rare wisedom, and consider with themselus, that if a priuat secret do merit such concealment, much more then deserus that, whereon the whole weale publicke dependeth, especially among men of years and mature iudgement. Marcus Brutus, Cassius, and all the rest that had Conspired the death of Iulius Cæsar, because in their eyes it seemed expedient, for benefit & liberty of their country; vppon their vowed determination, wold neuer yet disclose it to Cicero, one of their most intimate friends, and that desired (more then any of the other) the extirpation of tirany out of Rome; not for any distrust they had in him, but because he was reputed scarse a good secretary. Fuluius imparted an important secret to his wife, which the Emp. Octauian had before committed to his trust, but being dis-disclosed by her, it came at length to the Emperors eare, which procured the Senator such a check from his Lord, for being no sounder to himselfe, that falling into dispaire vpon this disgrace, he resolued to kill himselfe. But imparting first his minde to his wife, to let her know what a shame she had done him, she made him answere; That he had no reason to be offended with her, because (during the long time they had liued together) till then, he had found no intelligence of her shallow Capacitie. But if he had made any proofe before, his beleefe could not haue bin abused, by crediting her. Neuertheless, since hee had bin the motiue of this hir first offence, she would make no further reference to him, but inflict the punishment vppon her selfe: whereupon, imediatly she slew her selfe in his presence; so did her Husband very quickly after.

A rash reward for breach of Secrecy.

We read in the life of the Emp. Nero, that a conspiracy of his death beeing made in Rome, as a matter most requisit for the Romans, and the whole State beside, in regard of his cruelties: The man that had vndertake to do the deed, meeting (by chaunce) with one, who was led to prison by the tirants command; and falling into a present consideration with himselfe, of the Emperors nature, that whomsoeuer he caused to be apprehended, could not escape death (as the present example of the prisoner approued, who wept bitterly because he could not auoid his hard lot) forthwith he stept to him, and (neuer remembring the important case which he was bound by Oath to conceale) said in his ear; Pray that thy life may be spared but till to morrow, for if thou canst escape this day, I dare assure thee, Nero himselfe shall not put thee to death. When the prisoner heard this, suspecting the case to be as it was indeed, and coueting to saue himselfe, reuealed it to Cæsar, willing him to haue especial care of his life. Hereupon, Nero caused him to be instantly attached that had spoken with the prisoner, and (by means of torments) forced him to confesse the whol coniuration; so by putting him to death the purposed plot was ouerthrowne.

A strange example vpon the breach of Secrecie, by the very sight of a prisoner.

Now Pliny reporteth an example to the contrary, of one Anaxarchus, who being taken vpon the like occasion, bit his tongue off in the midst betweene his teeth, because he would not disclose the secret complot; and afterward, he threw it in the Tyrants face. The Athenians caused to be erected in Brasse, the Statue of a Lyonnesse, in honor of a publique knowne Woman, named Lyonna; for a memory of her constancy, in keeping secret an especiall Conspiracy: and the Figure was made without a tongue, to declare Secrecy thereby. The Seruants and Slaues of Plancus are likewise much commended, because no Torments could preuaile, to make them confesse to their Maisters Enemies, (who searched narrowly for him, and faine would haue slaine him) in what place hee had hidden himselfe. The Slaue of Cato the Oratour, perceiuing some Offence by his Maister committed, by Torments was in like manner laboured, to reueale his abyding; but nothing could preuaile against his setled constancy, to be Secret.

Quintus Curtius telleth vs, that the Persians helde it is an inuiolable law, to punnish most greeuously (and much more then any other Trespasse) him that discouered any Secret. For confirmation whereof, hee saieth; That King DARIVS beeing vanquished by ALEXANDER, and not knowing (in Flight) where to hide himselfe; at length, when he had found out a place to his owne liking, no Tortures whatsoeuer, or liberall promises of recompence, could preuaile with them that knew it, or compell them to disclose it vnto any person. Hee saith moreouer, that the Persians were of this Opinion, that no man ought to commit any matter of Consequence, to him that could not truely containe it.

Secrecie then is very necessarie in all things and occasions, but especiallie in Warre; and our most excellent and ancient Captaines, did euermore most iustly obserue it. Phillip, son to Antigonus the successour of Alexander, in the presence of diuers others, demaunded of his father, when the Army shoulde march on? whereto the K. angerly answered; Art thou so deafe, that thou canst hear a trompet as other men shal? whereby he gaue him to vnderstand, that he had offended in such a demand, which deserued no other answere in the presence of witnesses. There was a certain Tribune, in the Army of Cecilius Metellus, who asked of him, what hee intended concerning the warres yſſue? To whome Metellus replied: If I thought that my ſhirt knew what I haue purpoſed, I would immediatly burn it heere before thee. Horace amõg his Conuiuiall Lawes, would haue euery man keepe ſecret whatſoeuer was done or ſaid. For this cauſe the Athenians were wont (when they met at any Feaſt) that he who was moſt auncient among them, ſhould ſhew to al the reſt the doore whereat they had entered, ſaying; Take heed, that not ſo much as one word paſſe out from hence, of whatſoeuer ſhall heere be done or ſpoken.

To approue this true, when Ariſtotle was demanded what thing appeared moſt difficult to him, he anſwered; To be Secret and ſilent. To this purpoſe, S. Ambroſe in his Offices, placeth among the principall foundations of Vertue, the patient guift of ſilence.

The GOD of Silence was alſo honoured by the Egyptians, and painted with his Finger vpon his Mouth, as Catullus and Ouid in like manner haue written. Whereby we may eaſily gather, what reuerend reſpect hath beene made of Secrecie, in regard they honoured it as a God. Salomon ſaith in his Prouerbes, that a King ought to drink no wine; for no other reaſon, but becauſe, where drunkenneſſe is, there can be no containing of Secrecy. And (in his opinion) he is vnworthy to raign, that cannot keepe his own Secrets. He ſaith moreouer, That he which diſcouers ſecrets, is a Traitour; and he that concealeth them, a faithfull Friend.

Salomon would haue a king to Drinke no Wine, for diſcloſing his ſecrets.

dispatch, that they might returne home againe; Agis King of the Lacedemonians made them this answere: You shall say to the Abderites, that wee heard yee all the huge while you were willing to speake.

A tedious Orator talking with Aristotle, well aunswered.

Vpon a time, a certaine Oratour talked with Aristotle, and was so prolixe in his speech, as himselfe acknowledged his owne errour, and made his excuse, in concluding thus; That he desired pardon, because he had held so long discourse with so wise a Philosopher. Aristotle aunswered him pleasantly: Good friend, thou hast no cause at all to aske pardon of me, because I tooke no heede of what thou saidst. Wherein Aristotle returned him a iust requitall, and replyed aptly to our present purpose. Wee haue another example of too much pratling, by them that robd, and afterward kild Ibycus the Poet; for as thy halde him along thorow the Fieldes, farre enough from being seene, or heard of any body; he espied a Flocke of Cranes flying in the Ayre, to whom he cryed aloud, saying; You Cranes shall beare witnesse what they doe vnto me. After his death, no knowledge (in a long time) could be gotten, who were faulty in so foule a fact: vntill a certaine day, when a publique solemnity being made in the same Fielde, whereat two of them that had murdred Ibycus happened to be present. Suddenly, a great noyse of Cranes was heard aboue in the Ayre, which one of them perceiuing, scoffingly said to his fellow (not thinking any stander by had heard him;) Hearke Fellow, these are the witnesses, that Ibycus said should disclose his death. This being ouer-heard, by one too neer them, yet doubtful what he should imagine of such words, he began to suspect some euill; whereupon, he aduertised the Iudges and Gouernours what hee had heard. In breefe, the two Gallants were apprehended, and confessing the truth, Iustice was executed on them; This ensued through their liberall talking, without circumspection. Therefore a Man ought to regard well what he will say, while hee is maister of his owne minde; and withall, to respect both the time and persons present. Hecates the Greeke Orator, was on a time reprooued, because (beeing at a merrie Banquet) he spake neuer a word, which checke being heard by Archimedes, hee replyed thus for him: Me thinkes thou shouldst learne to vnderstand, that they which know well how to speake, do also know at what time to be silent.

Example of them that kild the Poet Ibycus.

A notable example.

The iust reward of lauish talking.

Heere might be alledged infinite examples, of perrils, ignominies, and death, hapning at diuers times to Men, onely by reason of too much talking. Wherefore, a Man should be very circumspect before hee open his mouth, least that which he speakes, do redound to his owne preiudice. Great Cato the Censor, from his Child hood, was naturally sober in speech; whereof he being reprehended by many, who tolde him that he was too strict in Taciturnity, he thus answered them: I am not offended to bee reprooued for my restraint of speech, seeing no man hath occasion to detect my life: for then, and not else would I breake silence, and then it should be knowne how I could hold my peace. Isocrates in the Book which hee wrote to Demonicus, saith; There are two times for speaking; the one, when occasion dooth necessarily require it; the other, when a Man knowes whereof hee speakes. Plutarch compares them that talke (without knowing what, or whereof) to emptie vessels, which alwayes do sound louder then those that are filled.

It is declared to vs, by Zeno the Philosopher, that Nature gaue vs two ears, and but one tongue: for no other reason, but to heare much, and speake little. Horace giues vs councell, to shun such as are busie in many demaunds, because themselues are but Questioners, and needlesse Pratlers. Suetonius reporteth (in confirmation of other mens Arguments, to the same intent) that the principall cause, which moued Octauius to fauor Mecenas so much, was; because he vsed to speake sildome, and then but little too, giuing himselfe wholly vnto silence. Cicero affirmeth, that Cato the Oratour, would neuer set downe any of his Orations in writing, saying; I can repent my selfe of any thing that I haue said, but I would not haue my writing come to reproofe, because that it cannot be any way denied. And because in reprehending ouer-much talking, I would be loath to fall into the same errour, I will be silent, concluding thus with that Graue Philosopher Seneca: I haue many times repented my selfe for speaking, but neuer because I held my peace.

Of the famous Philosopher Plutarch; his learned Letter to the great Emperour Traiane, and diuers of his singular comparisons.

Plutarch was one of the most excellent Morall Philosophers that euer liued; and beside, hee was a true Historiographer. Hee was Schoole-Maister to the good Romaine Emperour Traiane, born in Spaine, euen at the time that the Romain Empire was more great in Power and Possessions, then euer it had beene before, or after. This Emperour was the best and iustest of all the rest, and one that would diligently listen to the councell of his Maister: who fearing, least Traiane should be forward to any errour, or doe any thing vnworthy the good Discipline which hee had taught him: one day among others, he sent a letter vnto him, wherein these following enstructions were contained.

The Emperor Traiane, was the best of all the Emperors Plutarchs Letter to the Emperor Traiane.

I know very well, both modestly and simplicity with-helde any desire in thee to the Empire, although thou didst euermore in merit out-go it, by thy vertue and perfection in manners: which made thee so much the more worthy of it, by how much thou soughtest least meanes to enioy it. So that I attribut all to thy vertue and good Fortune, which will enlarge and heighten my contentment, when I shall see thy faire Graces shine in thy Gouernment: for if thou doe otherwise, I make no doubt of thy falling into daunger, and that thou wilt giue occasion of reproach towards me. The danger concerning thy selfe, is, that Rome could neuer endure a bad and cruell Emperour; and mine is, that people are alwaies ready, in imputing the Schollers faultes to the Maister. Wee haue two noatble examples to confirme this; the one, of Seneca, against whom all Neroes wickednesse was daily murmured; and the other, of Quintilian, who bare the rebuke of his Schollers ryot and excesse. I am assured, that if thou doe not forget thy selfe, but first will take order with thine owne affections, referring all thine actions to vertue: thou canst do nothing but what is good and perfect. The rules which thou ought st to obserue, that the manners of thine Empire may be mended, they are taught thee by my Bookes, if thou list to follow them: Plutarch may so be Authour of thy life; if otherwise, I call this my Letter to witnesse, that it was not by my councell or aduise, that thou didst any thing to the preiudice, and damage of the Commen-Wealth of the Romaine Empire. So God preserue thee.

Seneca reproued for Nero, and Quintilian for his Schollers.

This Letter had such power ouer Traiane (with the helpe of his owne vertuous inclination) that he becam a most excellent Prince. True it is, that before he was called to the Empire, hee was a Man of good manners and vertues: so that, although this Dignity had neuer before beene permitted to strangers, yet so it happened, that Nero his Predecessour (albeit hee had a great Kinred in Rome, and Traiane was a Spaniard:) yet hee (notwithstanding) elected Traiane to succeed him in the Empire, whereby Nero wan himselfe Grace and good opinion. For Traiane gouerned so iustly, and was a man so vertuous, that after his decease, when they went to elect and institute a new Emperour: the people alwaies desired of God, that he would giue him the goodnesse of Traiane, and the fortune of Octauian.

What Traiane was before he was Emperor.

The rare Iustice of Traiane in his gouernment.

Plutarch then seeing a man of rare and especiall vertues, filled his workes with Learning and singuler examples; that any man (how well read soeuer he was) might thence deriue good Rules and Instructions, for guiding him to an happy and vertuous life. He had a great Grace in his cõparisons, wherof I haue made obseruation of a few, according as they follow. He that abaseth himselfe, and forsaketh vertue, for any mishap that may betide him: is like vnto a Childe, who seeing something taken from him where with hee sported, in a rage casts away all the rest out of his hand, though it were neuer so sweete and delicate to feed on.

Plutarch his witty and learned comparisons.

As he that is amorous of a Woman, doth continually repute her to be faire, though some Wart or Scar may somewhat impaire her countenance: So a true louer of Vertue, albeit he beholde the vertuous despised and ill intreated, will neuer thinke of her waies the worsse, worſe, or giue ouer for any diſgraces whatſoeuer.

Of Vertue.

Of Enuy. As Kites or Rauens can neither more or leſſe hurt a liuing Body, but worke their tyranny on the dead: So hee that hateth any Man, lookes onely vpon his dead Vices, and neuer lifts vp an eye to his good and vertuous Actions.

Of Temperance. As Water moderateth the heat and fury of Wine: Euen ſo in a Common-Wealth, old Men ought to temperate with good councell, the angry and fiery ſpleenes of ſuch as are young.

Of Diſcretion As a poore Slaue or Seruant, is moſt ioyfull when hee gets free from the power of a ſharpe and cruell Maiſter: So ſhould an old man reioyce, to eſcape the bad inclinations and diſordered affections, which alwaies are the daungerous companions to youth.

Of Negligence. As a Blinde man growes quickly angry, and ſticks not to call him Blinde, who (againſt his will) happens in meeting to harme him: Euen ſo wee complaine on our ill fortunes, though they come by our owne occaſions, and worthily whip vs with our owne Rod.

Of Prouidence. As through fault of quenching a ſmal ſparke, a great fire is kindled, which conſumes the whole Houſe: So thorow want of prouidence, againſt the ſedition of a few particulars, ſometimes the whole State happens to be ruined.

Of Phiſicke. Plutarch tels vs moreouer; That hee who is ſubiect to Phiſitions, Purgations, and Medicines; reſembleth him, that being baniſhed from the Cittie of Men wherein he was borne, is forced to ſeeke his fortune among hard-welcomming Strangers.

Of Wilfulnes He that craues councell and aduiſe for his errour, and then amends it not: is like vnto him, that needs will haue his Impoſtume opened, and yet cannot endure to haue it purged and healed.

Of Folly. He that learnes Morall & Politick Philoſophy, and knoweth not how to make vſe of it: is like him that lights a Lamp, and feedes it not with Oyle to doe him ſeruice.

Of Wickedneſſe. As the Worme is engendred at the Trees foote, and encreaſing with it, at length deſtroyes it: Euen ſo a bad man, boſtreth his lewdneſſe vnder the fauor of his Prince, and in the end becomes an ingratefull Traytour to him.

Of Talking. Newes that are reported by a Foole or Ieſter; is like Corne put into a moiſt veſſell, where it gets a competent greatneſſe, but quickely breaketh and commeth to nothing.

CHAP. XX.

The Originall and beginning of the Art Military, or Warre: Who they were that firſt intruded one vpon anothers Gouernmẽt. Of the Inuenters alſo of diuers kinds of Weapons, eſpecially of Artillery, and ſuch like.

IT is a matter ſufficientlie manifeſt, that warre, ſtrife, & diſcord among Men, took their Originall from the ſinnes of our fore-fathers; and it remaineth to perpetuall remembrance, that of ADAMS firſt Sonnes, one killed the other. So that Originall Iuſtice being thus loſt, afterward there neuer wanted debates and ſtrife among Men; whereby it appeareth, that Warre and Enmity began in our firſt Parents. But the Science of Warre, or Military Art, as alſo the manner of making Warre, practiſed by a number of many, againſt as many (albeit his beginning came from Sinne, and his beſt part; yea, oftentimes his end is cruelty, blood, and impiety) yet hath it beene held in ſuch reputation; that both the Art it ſelfe, and thoſe skilfull therein, haue beene preferred by Men, beyond all other matters of Prudence and Induſtry, and hath riſen (by degrees) to bee aboue all other degrees.

War deriued it ſelfe from the ſins of our firſt Fathers.

To whoſe opinion many Poets do conſent; therefore, they contrary herein the auncient Originall, which Ioſephus attributes thereto, in the firſt Booke of his Antiquities; for there hee aſſures vs, that in the firſt Age, and before the Deluge, Tuball taught the Art of Warre.

Tuball was the only Man of his time, and that by great paines and endeuour, hee firſt inſtructed the Millitary Art. Others are quite oppoſite hereto, and ſay; that it was firſt knowne after the Flood: therefore it is hard to know the particular Author, whatſoeuer he was. Neuertheleſſe, it ſeemes, that from the beginning, wars and quarrels (which aroſe among Kings and Princes) grew rather vpon ambition, & deſire of honor, then any intent to bereaue or depriue the goods of one another.

Ambition and Honour the cauſe of contention.

Iuſtine, and Trogus Pompeius ſay, that Ninus King of the Aſſirians, was the firſt that ſ ided an Army from his Kingdome, onely vpon greedy Auarice, and deſire to ſubdue anothers Territories. The Pretor Fabian certifies as much, in the beginning of that little ſcantling which wee haue of his Hiſtory; and the like doth Saint Auguſtine. King Ninus ſo well gouerned both himſelfe and his Army, that he ouercame many Cities and Countries, leauing them to his ſucceſſours, and ſo they continued to his Poſterity, according to the Computation and Record of Saint Auguſtine, Euſebius, and Diodorus Siculus, for the ſpace of thirteene hundred yeares, ſtil deſcending downe from Father to the Sonne, and no want or defect of Heires in ſucceſſion, in the whole courſe of three and thirty Kings; or (according as ſome others do maintaine) for thirty ſix Kings, euen vntill the ful power and rule came to the lubricious Monſter Sardanapalus, in whoſe time the Empire was loſt, and fell then into the Poſſeſſion of the Medes.

Ninus was the firſt that led an Armie.

A long diſcent of continuance from Ninus, gotten all by rapine.

Ninus then, according to the Teſtimony of our recited Authours, was the onely firſt victorious Conqueror; and yet we read, that (before his time) there had bin Wars; but (as we haue ſaid already) it ſeemeth that it was not attempted, for the diſpoſſeſſing Men of their Goods, Lands, and Inheritances, ſut for an affection after the Worldes honor and eſtimation: as we find recorded of Veſſor King of Ægipt, who would needs ſtart out of his owne Kingdome, againſt Tanais the Scythians King. Tanais (bound in honor to meete him) hapned to be the Conquerour: and yet did not he bereaue Veſſor of his Crown or country, or any other of his Goods, as King Ninus made it his vſuall cuſtome to do. Therfore it ſhould appeare, that he was the firſt, that made and inſtituted lawes to be obſerued in Armies and Battailes, allowing the victor to be Maiſter of the Lands & poſſeſſions of the vanquiſhed.

There were Warres before the time of Ninus.

Veſſor King of Egypt, warred againſt King Tanais, & was ouerthrowne for his labour.

Ninus made the firſt lawes for Armies.

Now concerning thoſe Weapons (as well defenſiue as offenſiue) where-with they put their attempts in execution, & purſued the ſpleen of their violent fury: it is not to bee doubted, but that at the beginning of thoſe Wars, they vſed no Weapons of inequality or aduantage. But (as the Poet Lucretius reporteth) they began with byting and ſcratching, teeth, and nayles; and afterward fell to Stones and Staues: euen as yet to this day, many barbarous Nations vſe to do. For (as yet) they had not reached to the height of hate and mallice in men, to force Iron out of the earths Intrals, and therewith to graſpe at their Neighbors goods. Pliny affirmeth, that in the firſt Wars of the Moores with the Ægiptians, they fought onely with Cudgels and Staues: but afterward they grew to further practiſe, and inuented ſuch diuerſity of Weapons, onely to hurt and offend one another, that it was accounted very ſtrange to behold, how men endeuored to kil and murder one another.

The firſt Order of weapons, Teeth and Nailes.

Plinie. in Lib. 7. Cap. 16.

Concerning the men that were Inuenters of theſe deuiſes, the opinion is very diuers. Poets in their fixions do tell vs, that Mars the God of Armes was the enginer of them. Pliny recordeth, that the Ætolians were the firſt that euer carryed any Launce to the Fielde; and likewiſe ſaith, that the Lacedemonians firſt inuented the Head-peece, and the Sword and Axe for defence thereof. But Herodotus attributeth the deuiſing of the Helmet and Shield, to the Egiptians: as alſo the Arming Coat of Maile, and the Breaſt-plate, to a man of Miſena, named Mydas; and Darts were deuiſed by one borne in Ætolia. It is likewiſe maintained, that Pentheſilea Q. of the Amazones, was the firſt that fought in field with the Axe & Club: and that Scythes, the Son of Iupiter, was the firſt Inuenter of Bow and Arrowes, but it is thought to be Perſeus; and Diodorus holds it to be Apollo.

the Art Military, were they that first inuented Slings, for conueyance of stones against their Enemies, because they had no other Weapon of defence for themselues. Thus Men (we see) according to the times, necessity, and variety of their owne mindes, haue found out and deuised diuers weapons and Instruments: which neuertheless (in my conceit) the very same Weapons haue bin likewise inuented in other places, not much differing from the instant Times, without any intelligence or knowledge the one of the other. Therefore, that I may not bee troublesome to the Reader, I leaue to wade in further search of opinions; albeit, they are much pertinent to our present purpose: as to set downe who were the deuisers of sundry sorts of Engines, and Warlike Instruments, for battering of Walles, Forts, and Bulwarkes, wherein there is likewise as great difference in opinion. For Eusebius affirmeth, that Moyses was the Deuiser of those huge and great Engins of Warre. Plutarch tels, that Archytas of Tarentum, and Eudoxus brought and reduced these Artes to full perfection, and that they found out many Instruments, for the breaking downe of Wals and greatest Buildings.

The self same weapons haue bin deuised in diuers places, and at one instant.

In Lib. 9. de præparat. Euangel.

The Beliers (and beside according to Pliny) found out the vse of the Sword at the siedge of Troy: but Vitruuius is of the mind, that it rather cam from the siedge of Athens. The Scorpion or great Crosse-Bow, where-with they would hurle huge Stones into Towns; in Plinies iudgement, was inuented by them of Creete and Syria. The people of Phœnicia, were the first that releeued themselues with the Engines of repulse and sharp piercing: but yet all these Inuentions were light, triuiall, and of slender importance, because they are farre surpassed in rigour and cruelty, by deuise of Powder for the Cannon, and other such like Artillerie. These are said to be first deuised by a Germaine, whose Name we finde no where recorded, and deseruedly (in my minde) as beeing vnworthy of any remembrance. The first that made vse of them, as Blondus & Raphaell Volateranus doe affirme, happened to bee the Venetians, against the Genewaies, in the yeare one thousand three hundred and eighty. And yet according to better Iudgement, and partly I am of the same opinion, that this inuention is of more ancient standing: because in the Chronicle of Alphonsus, the eleauenth King of Castile (euen he that conquered Algazara) it is found recorded, that he being at the siedge of the saide Citty, in the yeare one thousand three hundred forty three; the besiedged Moores did then throw forth of certaine Thundring Engines or Weapons, which were made of hollow Iron, like Morters or Troughes in them, diuers annoyances among their enemies; and this was forty yeares before the time whereof Blondus speaketh.

The vse of the Sword, deuised at the siedge of Troy.

All former inuentions were nothing, in comparison to shot and powder.

Blondus, and Raphaell Volateranus, concerning who first made vse of shot and Powder.

The Moores besiedged at Algazara, by the King of Castile.

Againe, long time before that also, in the Chronicle of the saide King Alphonsus, whose fortune was likewise to Conquer Tolledo in Spaine, the Lorde Don Pedro Bishop of Leon, writes that in a Battell by Sea, which was betweene the King of Tbunis, and the Moore, King of Seuile, whom King Alphonsus highly fauoured: the men of Thunis had certaine Tonnels or Bombards of Iron, & there-with they threw abroad strange thundrings of Fire, which needes must be Artillery; Although it was not in any such perfection, as vse and time hath made it now to be: and this was foure hundred yeares since, and more.

CHAP. XXI.

The rare fortune of two Women, who by wearing the Habite and Garments of men, with Actions and Gestures sutable thereto, attained to two mightie Dignities, the one to be Pope of Rome, and the other Empresse.

I Make no doubt, but that many haue heard of a Woman, who was made Pope of Rome, yet because al men do not know in what manner it was, and beeing one of the most especiall matters of maruell happening in those times; I am the more willing to speake thereof, according to the extract made out of the truest Historians. Shee was borne in England, and in the time of her youth, she had acquaintance with with a learned Man, of whom finding herſelfe to be beloued, with no leſſe affection then ſhe bore to him, ſhe vndertooke the habite of a Man, & calling hir ſelfe by the Name of Brother Iohn, left her Countrey, and went to remaine with him in the Citty of Athens, where the Academies and generall ſtudies then flouriſhed. There for a certaine ſpace ſhe ſoiourned with him, and attained ſuch a liberall flowing Spirit towardes learning, that with-drawing her ſelfe thence afterward to Rome: ſhe read there publiquely in the Schooles, in the habit and degree of a Doctour. By which reading, beſides diuers daily diſputations, ſhe wonne ſuch an vnaccuſtomed conceit of her Auditory, that ſhee was reputed for one of the very chiefeſt learned Men of that time; yea, and gained ſuch aduancement by the riſing of degrees, that the Seat Apoſtoliciall beeing in intermiſſion (by reaſon of the death of Pope Leo, the fourth of that Name, in the yeare of our Sauiour, eight hundred fifty two, and beeing taken to bee a Man by Nature) ſhee was choſen to be great Byſhop of Rome; and Pope vniuerſal, to gouern the Church, wherein ſhe held the Seat for the ſpace of two yeares, thirtie dayes, and (as is thought by ſome) ſome few others beſide.

She read in the publique Schooles in Rome, as a Doctour.

Pope Leo the fourth dying, Ioane was choſen Pope.

Being in this ſupreame Dignity, which is a ſtrange Spur to very bold attempts, (eſpecially in a Sexe ſo fraile by nature) forgetfull of her former carefull and ciuill carriage; ſhe affected the company of one of her Attendants, vpon whoſe truſt and faith relying, ſhee not onely diſcloſed her imperfection of kinde, but alſo acquainted him with ſo much familiarity, that there grew an alteration in the ſuppoſed Grand-Pontifexe; euen ſo much, as (in ſecret) might bee ſaide, great with child. Neuertheleſſe, ſhe couered this Crime with ſuch Art & cunning, as none but her Minion onelie could any way reueale it. But that high and ſupreame power, which continually hath an eye vpon the cloſeſt wickednesſe (in Iuſtice) permitted the meanes to bring it to immediat correction. For as ſhe was carried in the vſuall ſolemnity, to viſite the Church of Saint Iohn de Laterana: the time of womens denounced trouble ſuddenly came vppon her, and vnder ſuſpition of a contrary ſickeneſſe (but indeede the fruites of her Louers diſeaſe) ſhe was there deliuered of a Male-Child (though ſome ſay Female) euen betweene the Church of Saint Clement and the Theater, improperlie called Coliſeus, and there the Mother & Child died both inſtantly together, and were likewiſe ſo buried, without any pompe or ſolemnity.

The frailtie of a woman Pope.

Pope Ioane was deliuered of a Childe, in her ſolemne proceſſion to S. Iohn Laterana.

For which vnexpected accident, the common opinion is, that a new order was determined for proceſſion of the ſucceeding Byſhoppes; which was, to ſhunne that former way, becauſe it had giuen à note of ſo great ſcandall, and therefore they muſt paſſe through another ſtreete, in deteſtation of a Fact ſo horrible.

And yet in regard of this reaſon, they haue ſet downe an obſeruation, that when any one comes to bee enſtaulled Pope, they haue a Chaire purpoſely made open, like a Cloſe-ſtoole, and by their paſſage vnderneath it, it is ſecretly and aſſuredly knowne, if Habet teſticulos, hee bee a Man or Woman. And many Authors diſcourſing hereon, doe make an vndoubted certainety thereof. Platina onely ſaith, that they haue a rich appointed Chair (but of the ſame faſhion as is vſed in common neceſſities) to the end, that hee who is to bee elected Pope, may (without further queſtion) be knowne for a Man. What is ſaide heereof beſide, as by the ſame Platina, Martinus in the liues of the Popes, Sabellicus, and S. Antheninus in his Hiſtories, they do all agree to the ſame effect. I finde alſo written, that in the ſayde Streete, there is an Image or Statue of ſtone erected, which declares the childs birth, and death of this impudent and ſhameleſſe Woman.

The order of the Chaire for enſtalmẽt of Popes.

But notwithſtanding all this, let the accident bee held very ſtrange, as it is indeede, yet during the time that this Woman abuſed the World, it was no reproch vnto the Church of God, neyther did it become any iot blemiſhed in Faith, becauſe ſhee can neuer want her true Head, which is Ieſus Chriſt, who ſtill beſtowes on her the Influences of his Graces, and the bleſſed effects of the Sacraments; And ſo long as ſuch a head doth protect hir, the Sacraments continue in their powerfull vertue, to ſuch such as soundly receiue them, and with firme Faith, because Christ supplies (by his Grace) all other defects. Admit this woman, nor any other, can be capable of receiuing or giuing any one Carracter of orders, or absoluing any one, but that whatsoeuer was then done by her or them, it standes to no effect or purpose, as wee haue already said: yet the Spouse of Christ, standing clear and vntainted of any corruption, hath still recourse to the onely Head Christ, who euermore hath an especiall care of her and hers. Yet this we may say concerning her, that questionlesse, her Wisedome appeared to be maruailous, onlie in this respect, that for so many yeares, and in such degrees of Estate, she could so well maintaine her credit.

But that which Theodosia, the Empresse of Constantinople did, is woorthy of as great admiration, because the minde of the one, was but to faigne her selfe a Man; and the other, to bee reputed a Man; notwithstanding, euery one knew her to be a Woman. For the Empire beeing vacant, by the death of her Brother Zoer, and her Husband Constantine, she being at that time entred into Religion: knew yet so well how to manage the State affaires, that she tooke vpon her to be Emperour, and (in his place) was feared and obeied. For without the helpe of Father, Husband, or Brother, she gouerned the Empire most nobly in peace and prosperity, for the space of two yeares, and then died, to the great greefe of her Subiectes, and in the time of Pope Leo the ninth, and the yeare of our Lord, one thousand and fifty.

CHAP. XXII.

The first beginning of the Amazons, and of many notable thinges by them not onely attempted, but likewise boldly put in execution.

ALthough I haue not bound my selfe to any direct or absolute order, concerning my first intended purpose in this worke, but doe write of thinges according as they present themselues, or els as they please me in Collection; yet notwithstanding, by this ensuing Chapter, I shall not much differ from the last declared Subiect, where I discourssed of two hardy and aduenturous Women, and the vnusuall fortunes that did befal them. For which cause, I holde it not amisse in this very next place (maintaining still the last argument) to speake of the Amazons, who were as woorthy as any other in the Worlde whatsoeuer. Albeit, there are many Men, that take a delight in abasing the perfection of Women, taxing them with leuity, wantonnesse, softnesse, and many other imperfections: yet I cannot but confesse, that there are men, who doe exceed thē in a thousand greater defects. For to speake no more then meerly Iustice requireth, Women haue gone beyond men in all kindes of vertues, or (at least) not giuen place to them in any thing; either in Loue, Loialty, Charity, Deuotion, Pitty, Affability, Temperance, Mercy, and all other vertues that can be alleaged. And if among them, some one bad and imperfect body hap to be met withall, a thousand worse are easily found among mē; and it is a case so plaine and apparant, as it were needlesse heere to insert any examples.

Men take a pleasure in disgracing the vertues of Women.

Women haue equalled Men in all perfections whatsoeuer.

In one thing (perchance) men will claime some superiority aboue them, that they haue the aduantage of them in martial disposition, whereunto women are not so apt and able, because that in such an exercise, ther is required fierceneesse, cruelty, and many other stormy qualities, which (by nature) they cannot vse, neither hath it pleased God (if it be lawfull to say so) to make them thereto prompt or able. Yet notwithstanding, to the end that men may know, that enen therein also (when they list to imploy themselues) they can stand equall with them; yea, and (if neede be) somewhat surmount them. For there hath bin found many women, that haue performed admirable things in Armes. And becaus rehearsall of many commendable Histories to this purpose, doth require too long a discourse; it shal suffice to speake of the Amazons, who were most vvarlike vvomen, and (vvithout the counsell or aduise of any Man) did vanquish diuers powerfull Armies, conquered great Countries, Cities, & Prouinces, which continued long time after in their rule and possession.

Men more apt to Armes, the Women: and yet women (when they please) as able as Men.

Concerning the abiding of the Amazones, according to the opinion of Authors.

Many learned men both Ancient and Modern, haue approued their Histories to be very certaine. Diodorus the Sicilian, he affirmeth them to haue two seuerall Prouinces of the World; the one was in the Asiatique Scythia, a Prouince in the North parts of Asia, which was very great, and contained in it many other Prouinces. Ptolomey did deuide it into two partes, by the Mountaine Imaus*, and it is at this day (in mine opinion) that which is cled Tartaria, in Asiaticke Scythia, and different from that Scythia which is in Europe. The other was in Lybia, a Prouince of Affrica, and (as one saith) that it was long before that of Scythia. But because most commonly, Authors (speaking of the Amazones) doe vnderstand and meane them of Asia; it is of them that I am determined to speake, and I will principally follow Iustine & Diodorus, who haue written most distinctly of them.

*A Mountain parting India from Scythia.

Of the Scythians a warlike Nation, who first were gouerned by two Kings.

The Scythians were very warlike men, of whom wee haue good testimony in many Histories, they had (in their first yeares) two Kings, to whom they yeelded al obedience, and were in order gouerned by them. Neuertheless, because it is the naturall propertie of Dominion, quickly to wax proud, and not to allow any equall or companion: there happened betweene these two Kings so great question and controuersie: as at length it grew wholly to a ciuill warre. In which difference, one side remained Conquerour in the end, and two men (of greatest note) on the contrary faction; the one beeing named Plynus, and the other Scolopith, were banished thence, with a great number of their Adherents; who with-drawing themselues to the limits of Cappadocia, in the lesser Asia, in despite of the Inhabitants of the Country, they made their abode along the Riuer * of Thermodon (now called Pormon) which entreth into the Euxine Sea, otherwise called * Pontus. There making themselues Lords of the Country, and of the neighbouring parts, they raigned there for some certaine yeares, vntill such time as the Country people and their Confederates, finding themselues to bee greatly offended, made a conspiracy against them, & assembling themselues secretly together, did so cunningly by deceipt ouer-reach them, that (in the end) they slew them all.

*Pormō was so called o. Themiscyra, a country or Pontus, bordring vpon Cappadocia.
* The Sea betweene Meotis and Tenedos so called of Pontus the son of Neptune.

The tidings of their death comming to the eares of their Wiues, remaining in the former Country, procured them to extreame greefe and heauinesse, and preuailed so with them, that (albeit they were Women) they tooke vpon them such a manly courage, as, concluding to reuenge the death of their Husbandes, they rose vp in Armes, and grew to bee very expert therein. Now, to the end, that in this fortune they might bee all equal, and the sorrow common, without any exception: they slew some other of their Husbands, that remained behinde when the other were banished. And then mustring themselues into a mighty Army, they left their dwelling, refusing mariage with many that earnestly therto required them. When they were arriued at the Countrey of their Enemies, (who made slender account of it, notwithstanding they had sufficient aduertisement) they tooke them vnprouided, and put them euery man to the Sword; heereof is deliuered credible testimony, by Pomponius Mela, Propertius, and Claudian in the rape of Proserpina. And they do further signifie, that this being done, they tooke vpon them the gouernment of the Country, abiding (at their beginning) along the Riuer Thermodon, in the place where their Husbands was slaine.

Women rise in Armes, to reuenge the death of their Husbands.

Pomponius Mela, Lib. 1. Propertius & Claudian, in rapt. Proserpin.

Now although that diuers Authours doe differ, concerning the first place of plantation or seating, where these Amazons made their dwelling; yet neuertheless it is a constant truth, that the beginning of their raigne, and the certaine place of their habitation, was by this Riuer: but of their surmounting afterward to many other Prouinces, diuers opinions are deliuered, which at large are discussed by Strabo, and others. But in these places they fortified themselues, and wan sundry other neighbouring Countries, making election of two Queenes among them; the one named Marpesia, and the other Lampedon. These two worthy Women, deuided their warlike Troop into two parts, continuing with great concord, and each assisting the other with boldnesse and hardiment, to defend the Countries which they had conquered. In the end, to make their name more famous and dreadfull (such was the folly and credence of weak Men in those times) they feigned themselues to be the Daughters of Mars, according to the affirmation of Iustine, and Seruius vpon the Æneidos, and Valerius Flaccus, in part of his fourth Booke of the Argonauts.

Iustine. Lib. 5. Seru. sup. Enei. Valerius Flaccus, in Lib. 4. Argonaut.

Afterward, these wonderfull women liuing in this manner, with peace and vpright Iustice among them, they began to consider on the succession of time, that through want of Daughters to succeede them, Warre and Time would at length deuour them: whereupon, they purposed to contract Marriage with certaine of their Neighbours, whom Pliny reporteth to be called Gargarians, vppon condition, that at a certaine time, their Husbands should meet them in a place conueniently appointed, and there to keepe them company for diuers daies, vntill they could guesse themselues to be conceiued with child; which done, they were to returne againe to their owne Habitations. If they hapned to be deliuered of Daughters, they would bee Nurses to them, & breed them vp in aptnesse of Armes, with all other manly exercises: as to ride Horses, runne swiftly, Hauke, and Hunt. But if they were Male Children, then they would send them to bee educated by their Fathers, except they pleased to reserue some one or two only. Diodorus saith, that such Male Children as they kept with them, they wold writh and bruise their Armes and Legs; so that in no wise they should bee able to carry Armes, and therefore they serued to no other vse, but to spinne, sow, weaue, and performe such other like feminine qualities.

Plin. lib. 6. cap. 7.

The order obserued among the Amazons for increasing their gouernment, and education of their Children.

Now because these Amazons did much helpe themselues in their Warres with Bowes and Arrowes, and finding that in this & other exercises of armes, their Dugs or Breastes were a very great hinderance to them: They vsed to burn off the right Pap, both of themselues and their Daughters; and thereuppon they were called Amazons, which signifieth in the Greek tongue, No Breasts; albeit some other doe giue another Etimology to this name. Encreasing still on by course of time, to be in number both many and mighty, they made great prouision for Armes and warlike Actions, and leauing their Country (which seemed somewhat too little for them) to the custody of such as they reposed trust in, they wandred abroad, displacing & conquering all such, whom they found to be rebellious against them. Hauing passed the riuer Tanais*, they entred into Europe, where they subdued many countries, and so directed their course towards Thrace: from whence they returned (afterward) with great spoiles and victories, and re-entring Asia, brought diuers other Prouinces into their obedience; which were so many, that Ammianus Marcellinus saith, they went so farre as to the Caspian Sea.

Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 22. cap. 13.

They builded and peopled infinite goodly Cities, among which is comprised (according to the opinion of diuers Authours) that of Ephesus*, so much renowmed, because it had bin alwaies the cheefe Citty of their Empire, and the principall of all other, on the borders of Thermedon. They vsed in their warres, to defend themselues with Targets, which (according as it is saide by Virgill) were made in resemblance like halfe Moons. Martianus Capellus declareth, that at their entrance into battaile, they founded strange kindes of Flutes, to harten and embolden their followers to the fight, euen according as the Lacedemonians were wont to doe. In large extendure did the fame of these Women spread it selfe, euen to the time that Hercules, Theseus, and many other valiant men liued in Greece. This Hercules was commaunded by Euristhenes King of Athens, that he should go with a strong power of armed men against the Amazons, & that he should bring away the Armors of their two Queenes, which then were two Sisters; to wit, Antiopa and Orythia. Vpon this commaund, Hercules (swelling with desire of honour) accompanied with Theseus, and others his deare Friendes: tooke Sea, and sayling by the Pontique Sea, landed in the most commodious place of the Riuer Thermedon, which hee entred so couertly, and at a time of such aduantage, as Orythia (one of the two Queenes) was gone out of the Country, with the greater part of her Women, to war and conquer a new found Countrey: ſo that he found Antiopa, neither doubting or knowing the leaſt note of his comming. By meanes whereof, Hercules and his Followers found the Amazones vnprouided, and although they betooke themſelues to Armes, & immediatly ſtood vpon their owne defence, with ſuch diligence as ſo ſhort warning gaue them leaue: yet were they neuertheleſſe vanquiſhed, throwne into diſorder, and many of thē ſlaine, and the reſt ſurprized: among whom were two Siſters to the Queene, whereof the one was named Menalippa, priſoner to Hercules; and the other Hyppolita, in like bondage to Theſeus. Some Hiſtorians ſay, that they were conquered on a certaine day appointed for the battaile: And that afterward theſe two Siſters were vanquiſhed in the Duello or ſingle combat, one to one; but herein I follow the opinion of Iuſtine and Diodorus.

Menalippa and Hyppolita Siſters to Antiopa, Queene of the Amazons.

The Queene Antiopa perceiuing this ouerthrow, and that her Noble Siſters were in this manner taken; ſhe came to a compoſition with Hercules, to whom ſhe gaue her Armor to cary to King Euriſthenes, vpon condition, that he ſhould deliuer backe her Siſter Menalippa. But Theſeus, notwithſtanding all Royall offers made him, by no meanes would returne his Priſoner Hyppolita. Hercules hauing thus compaſſed his intention, returned home with his company. Theſe newes comming to the knowledge of Orythia (then abſent from her Country, (as we haue heard already declared) no tidings euer came to her of more griefe and diſgrace; ſo that (growing iealous of a greater danger) ſhe returned home ſuddenly with her Amazones. The greater part of them (iumpping with her in opinion) perſwaded the Queen Antiopa, to reuenge this their iniury vppon the Grecians. Whereupon, they prepared great prouiſion for war, and after they had aſſembled and marſhalled the greater number of their Amazones, they ſent to entreat Sigillus King of the Scythians, to lend them aſſiſtance: who then ſent them his Sonne Peaſagoras, with a great multitude of his ableſt Horſe-men. Being thus by them ſtrengthned, the Amazones entred Europe, and proceeded on to the Limits of Athens, doing much damage all the way of their paſſage. But Peaſagoras entred into a priuate quarrell with the Queene and her Women, by means whereof, the Scythians could not be drawn to fight, but withdrew themſelues apart; which ſo weakned the power of the Amazones, as they were not able to endure the rough encounters of the Grecians, but perforce muſt yeeld to their hard fortune, beeing ſubdued and vanquiſhed, and the moſt part of them cruelly maſſacred. Such as could eſcape, fled to the Camp of the Scythians, who tooke them into their defence, and ſo returned backe into their owne Country, where afterward they liued not ſo potent as before.

Peaſagoras quarrelleth with Orithya and her Amazones, which cauſed their ouerthrow.

In following time it fortuned, the Grecians paſſed into Aſia, when they attained to that memorable Conqueſt of Troy, at which time raigned as Queene ouer the Amazones, a worthy Woman named Pentheſilea, who remembring the former wronges receiued by the Grecians: went with a mighty band of her Amazones to ſuccour the Troyans, where the Queen did performe very rare deeds of Armes. But the Troyans beeing conquered as faſt as they ſallied forth (wher they found the Amazones fighting in their aſſiſtance) they were almoſt all ſlaine: Pentheſilea perriſhed by the hand of Achilles; whereuppon, ſo many as remained aliue, returned home into their Countrey, with ſuch ſmall ſtrength (in regard of what they had bin before) that very hardly could they defend and keep their ancient poſſeſſions.

And ſo they continued vntill ſuch time as Alexander the great went into Aſia, to make war vpon the rebellious Hyrcanians: At which time, one of their Queens named Thaleſtria, accompanied with a great number of her Amazones, left her Countrey, with deſire to ſee and know that powerfull Conquerour. And comming neere the place where hee was, ſhe ſent an Ambaſſadreſſe vnto him, to attaine ſafe conduct for her ſight of him; giuing him to vnderſtand, that the renowne of ſo great a perſonage, had forwarded her deſire to beholde him. Which beeing vnderſtood by Alexander, he royally ſent her his ſafe conduct, by meanes whereof, after ſhe had ſelected ſome of the principall of her Amazones, to the number of three hundred Ladies (as ſome report) and left the reſt in in place conuenient: in very honourable equipage she went to Alexander, of whom shee was most graciously entertained, with extraordinary affability, & offered her whatsoeuer remained in his power, so that very instantly he desired her, to demaund what she pleased, and it should not be denyed her.

The answere of Thalestria to Alexander.

She answered in this manner: I come not (great Alexander*) to desire Landes, Rule, or Dominations, because I haue sufficient of mine owne, but onely to know a King so much renowned; of whom I haue heard such matter of marvaile, that I come (if thou please) to accept thee as my Husband, and to haue Issue by thee, that I might boast of an Heire sprung from the Loynes of so excellent a Prince. And King, thou canst not mislike my Linage or discent, beeing euery way as generous as thy selfe, and of so high Parentage as deserues no disdaine. Withall, I promise thee, that if the Gods doe graunt me a Daughter by thee, I will bee Nurse to it mine owne selfe, and make her mine onely Inheritour. But if it be a Sonne, then will I send it to thee nourished as great* Alexander shall appoint it.

Alexanders answere to Thalestria.

Alexander replyed, if she would goe along to the wars with him, & he wold respect her as his honorable Companion: But she shaping an excuse, replyed; that she could not go with him, but to her shame, and in daunger to loose her owne Kingdome; wherefore, again she requested him, to grant her desire. To conclude, she kept company with Alexander for the space of thirteen daies, in modest (and yet secret) conuersation: which time being expired, and her leaue admitted, she returned to her Country againe.

The decaying of the Amazons Empire.

But, as it is the naturall property of time, to consume al things; euen so the raigne and power of the Amazons, grew afterward to a diminishing: so that decreasing still by little and little, it fell at length to be wholly extirpated. This hath beene generally helde for a true History, and for such doe I heere insert it. Tregus Pompeius affirmeth it, and so doth Iustine, Diodorus, Orosius, Martianus Capellus, Quintus Curtius, Herodotus, Iulius Solynus, Polihister, Pomponius Mela, and Ammanus Marcellinus, with many other auncient Authours, besides those that are Moderne. Onely Strabo, after he hath reported this History, he seems to distrust the credit thereof. But whosoeuer shall reade the History of Bohemia (which Pope Pius the second hath written very truely, and with such painful diligence) and ther perceiueth how these Women long time helde the Dominion of Bohemia, ouer-spreading the whole Countrey & making very often and necessary warres, this History of the Amazons will no way seeme incredible to him.

Pius Pap. 2. in Hist. de Bohem.

We read also in the life of the Emperour Claudius the second, who triumphed ouer the Gothes, that in the battell which he had against them, there were taken ten Souldiers that fought verie valiantly: who being disrobed of their Garments were found to be Women, and it was held for an vndoubted opinion, that they were discended of the Linage of the Amazons.

Claudius the second, his wars against the Gothes.

What might we also say of the Maid of France, whom the French-men called the Pucelle de Vancouleur: There is hardly any Man, neuer so meanely read in Histories, but is acquainted with the many battailes fought by her, wherein she had the charge of a Captaine; as also how many times she was in the Fielde, as valiant as any man in the world could be. I could yet name many other Women, but I must needs let them sleep in silence, to obserue the breuity which at first I promised.

¶ Of the Antiquitie of Constantinople, and how it became Conquered by the Turkes.

AMong all the famous inhabited Cities of the World, there was neuer any (after Rome) that hath beene seene of so great strength & honor, as Constantinople very highly renowmed both by the Grecians and Latines. Strabo calleth it Magnificent; Pliny and Iustine tearme it most Noble; scituated in a most excellent and fertile soyle, ennobled with great personages, and sumptuous Buildings. It was a long time the cheefe Citty and Seate of the Empire, wherein hath beene held many generall Councels, for destroying and exterpation of infinite Heresies. Many noble and notable occasions haue therin happened, both in the prosperity and tribulations thereof: and yet (as we too well knowe) it is fallen into captiuity, whereof wee will breefely declare the whole History.

The scituation of Constantinople, in the straight of the Sea.

It is a Cittie in Europe, seated in the Countrey of Thrace, being plentifull in Fertility, great in Circumference, and very mighty in power. Her plot and Plantation is on the narrow Sea, betweene Asia and Europe, at the entrance of Pontus, or the Euxine Sea; called the great Sea. For which cause, Ouid calleth it the Port of two Seas, because it standeth in a narrow, or straight. Constantinople (according to Ptolomy) containeth three and forty degrees of Latitude; that is to say (for their better apprehension who are herein ignorant) that it is distant from the Equinoctiall, three and forty degrees, there, where the Poole is eleuated, and in the sixe and fifty degree of longitude of the Meridian, which passeth the Island of the Canaries. The first founders of this Citty (by common opinion, and of the best Authors) were the Lacedemonians. Orosius saith, the Spartans, with Pausanias their Captaine and King: Albeit, Eustachius (according as Volateranus also reporteth) that it was founded by a Captaine of the Megarians, named Bizeus, and after whose name it was called Bizantium. Diodorus and Polybius doe say, that it was called Bizantium, after the Name of a Captaine, that laid the Foundation thereof. Neuertheless, Pliny affirmeth, that at the first it was called Ligos, and not Bizantium.

The first founders of Constantinople.

But that it should be true, that Pausanius founded it; Iustine iustifies it: The like doth Paulus Orosius, and all the Moderne Writers, deliuering the reason of the building it. For (say they) Pausanias beeing wandring with his beggerly followers through the Worlde, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, to know where he & they should make their abiding and had this answere returned him; That hee should remaine face to face with the blind. This he vnderstood to meane the Megarians, who dwelling in Calcidonia, in a bad barren place, hauing forsaken the side of Constantinople, which was good and fertile. The selfesame is deliuered by Strabo; albeit hee doth not name the founder. But in what time soeuer it was, Eusebius speaking thereof, saith; that it was builded very neere to the time of the thirtith Olympiade, euen then when Tullus Hostilius raigned in Rome. At the first beginning, it was but a small thing, as all other new erected Townes were wont to bee; and for a certainety, it was somewhile subiect to the Lacedemonians; or, as others say, to the Athenians, vntill such time as those two great Estates contending together, it had leysure to growe rich, encreasing both in wealth and power, and by meanes of their dissention still continuing, it enlarged it selfe to some more greatnesse.

Strife betweene the Lacedemonians and Athenians, gaue encreasing to Constantinople.

Afterward, it flourished it such sort, with the liberty which it had, and the fruitfulnesse of the soyle, that Phillip K. of Macedon, Father to Alexander the great, grew enamored of her beauty & mighty riches, and concluded to Conquer it; whereto (for his better attainement) he laid a long time of besiedging, and yet could not take it. One day, Leo a notable Sophister, had conference with king Phillip, and the same was afterward written by Philostratus, in the History of the Gymnosophists. For as Phillip continued his enterprise: with a very huge Army of choise selected men. Leo a learned Sophister, dwelling in Bizantium, went vnto him, and spake in this maner: Tell me King Phillip, what iniury hast thou receiued of Bizantiū, that hath moued thee to make Warre vpon her, with such violent fury? I haue receiued (aunswered Phillip) not any iniury of the Citty, whereby to prouoke me as her Enemie: but because shee seemes more beautifull to mee, then all the other Citties of Thrace; as enamored of her perfections, I would faine Conquer, and make her mine. Kings that are amorous (aunswered Leo) and would be beloued where they place affection: doe labour to compasse their intent with sweet Musick, pleasing speaches, guifts, and such like kinde behauiour; and neuer striue to enforce them, by rough tearmes and rude Warre.

not compasse his desire, but left it in far greater strength and liberty, then it was before. Afterward, by succession of time, when the Romains began to make warre in Greece, they entred into league and amity with the Bizantians, and many times were supplied with their helpe and kindnesse, in sundry warres & stout foughten battails, which strēgthned stil her florishing prosperity; and also augmented her buildings and wealth. A long while after, the Romain rule comming to the gouernment of Emperors, (Seuerus then raigning) the Tyraut Pessenius (enemy to the Emperor) tooke possession of this Citty of Bizantium. By meanes whereof, Seuerus sent thither a great Army to besiedge it: but hauing not strength enough to surprize it by assault, they compelled him by Famine to yeeld himselfe; but first, the wals and goodly fortifications were battered, spoiled, and throwne downe vnto the ground, & so were all the goodly buildings. In briefe, the Tyrant had taken from them all their publick and priuate possessions, which he had wholy giuen away to the Parintians; and nowe after this besiedging of it by the Romaines, there remained nothing of the former estate, but a very poore desolate Citty, wherein few or none desired to dwell. The parts and fragments of the destroyed wals and Houses, which remained to be seene in lamentable ruines, were of such an excellent kind of Stone, cut and squared with such admirable Art, that hardly could their ioyntes and closures be discerned.

Pessenius the Tirant, enemy to the Emperor Seuerus, got possession of the Citty.

Bizantiū spoyled by the tyrant.

This Calamity beeing ouer-blowne, and the Emperor Constantine raigning at Rome (euen hee that was surnamed the Great, Sonne to S. Helena the Queene, that founde the Crosse of our Sauiour Christ) he determined to passe into the East, being mooued and meerely compelled thereto, by diuers Angures or Wizzards, concerniug an Eagle, which broght him (as it is said) a cord between her Tallants, wherewith this Bird had measured out a new Habitation for him in another Countrey. Whereupon he concluded, to haue old ruined Bizantium againe re-edified, to honour it with another Name, and to make it the chief City of the world. By this means it was restored to her former estate, with such a large surmounting of Houses & faire Buildings, as she stoode in contention with Rome for beauty. There he erected sumptuous Pallaces, goodly Churches, and high Towers; thither also he transported the Empire, with his Court, the Consuls, Senators, and all other Magistrates and Officers. Now, albeit he had amplified it in such forme and greatnes, that it seemed a new Rome, and so hee would haue had it called: yet notwithstanding, the voyce of the people so far preuailed, that the name of the Emperor must needs be giuen it, and so it was called Constantinople. The historians that then liued, & soone after, doe say, that the greatnes and sumptuous shew thereof was such, as it could not bee described without much prolixity.

An Angurie of an Eagle to Constantine the Great.

Bizantium re-builded by Constantine, & made as faire as Rome.

Bizantium called Constantinople, after Constantines name.

The Emperor Constantine liued there many yeares, in the height of prosperity; so did the other Emperours likewise that succeeded him. There they continued the Empire, some in peace, others in warre, vntil such time, that (after a large expence of yeares) by diuers fowle sinnes committed by the Cittizens, occasioned thorowe prosperity, ease, and ydleneesse, and partly by the weakeneesse and negligence of the Emperors, the greatneesse and power thereof began to decline. So that hauing endured many misfortunes of fire, Pestilence, and terrible Earth-quakes, (the History whereof were too long to recite) there hauing also passed ouer eleauen hundered yeares of the Christians holding it in possession. This famous Citty (that alone ruled ouer so manie Nations, that was rich in Gold and Siluer, honored with approued auncient excellencies, incomparable Churches, admyred Monuments, and raised out of the dust of Oblivion by Gods permission, by Constantine; and afterward, by another Constantine, Sonne also to an Empresse, named Helena) was besieged by Mahomet King of the Turkes, Lorde of the Lesser Asia, and of many other Regions and Prouinces, the grand-Fathers Father to Solyman, that liued when I wrote this History; the Predecessours of which Mahomet, had before that time Conquered the greater part of Greece.

Constantinople begins againe to decline her glory.

Constantinople besiedged by Mahomet the Turke.

The siedge was laid against this Cittie with such power and perseuerance, and maintained with so violent fury, that after after many bloody Battels, & by course of as many Months while the siege continued, after the deth also of infinit worthy men, as well on the one side as the other, the Turke appointed the last day of Battaile, to be the nine and twentieth day of May, in the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, fifty three (some say fifty two) the Emperor Frederick raigning then at Rome, thirde of that name, and he gaue them battaile by breake of day. In which extream fury, the inhabitants being no longer able to resist the huge multitude of their Enemies and the impetuous storme; at length, the Cittie was surprized in the assault; and some Authours Record, that it was in this manner:

The Turke assigneth his last day of battell.

The manner how Constantinople was conquered by the Turke.

The Emperor being giuen to vnderstand, that the Turke had abandoned the Cities Pillage for three dayes together, after many woorthy Orations made, he went out of the walles with a great number of his people, to defend the Barbacanes or Subburbes, which were of as high mounture and strength, as the walles of the Citty. And he went himselfe in person, to counsell and giue order what was to bee done, causing the Citties Gates to be fast shut after him, to take from his people all hope of Flight.

And euen now, did there happen the very fiercest and most cruell Battaile, that euer was seene since the inuention of Warre, with al kindes of Armes and Instruments for fight, as well for defending, as assayling. It seemed as if the very Heauens would haue split in sunder, with the noise and outcries of the Soldiers; and the earth looked like a Shambles, couered ouer with the Bloude of the slaine and Wounded. The Emperour on the one side, and the Turke on the other, added Spirite with their chearefull Wordes, to the great Encouragement of their armed Troopes, being themselues euer formost or hindmost, according as occasion and need required.

Of Iustinian the valiant man of Genoway on whom the people much relyed.

Among the Valianteſt Warriors, that boldly stood for defence of the Barbacanes, there was a Genoweſe, named Iustinian, vppon whose Vertue and Valour the people within the walles not a little depended, in regard of his skill and manly power; and because in al the precedent battailes, he had bin stil the principall occasion of the Cities safety. Neuertheleſſe, after a long resistance, beeing sore wounded, and his bloud abundantly streaming from his hurts, he forsook the place that he defended, to haue some Medicines applied to him in the Citty. Which when the people perceiued, their courage became imediately quailed; and worde thereof beeing brought to the Emperor, hee ran after him, instantly desiring him to return & make good his place, shewing what necessity stood vpon his presence. But no conditions or promises whatsoeuer, could cause him to go backe: be it, that either it so pleased God, that his corage should faile him, or else that hee could no longer beare the griefe of his woundes, but (hauing them dresst) intended to returne; the Gate was opened to him, and Chirurgions called to giue what help they could. In the meane space, his folowers that defended his quarter, not hauing him with them, began to shrink backe and giue ouer the place.

Iustinians departure disharmeth the people.

The Turkes no sooner beheld this aduantage, but they fell afresh to a much more dreadfull assault; and contrariwise the Christians were so weake and out of hart, that being able to resist no longer, they turned their backs, seeking to shelter themselues in the City. The Gate remaining open, (wherat Iustinian had entred) in expectation of his return; the Turkes mingled themselues among the Christians, and entering the City with them, went vp vppon the wals, and did pittiful massacres vpon the Christians. The Emperor (as some report) hauing changed his habit, to the end hee might not be knowne, was slaine by the enemies. Others say (among whom is Pope Pius the second) that as he desired to retire into the Citty, grieuing to see his people in such disorder, he was thrown down by the flying multitude, & being greatly trampled vpon by their passage ouer him, he died vnder the feete of his own followers, euen in the very gate of the City. But be it howsoeuer, his body was knowne by the Turkes, who cut off his head, & fixing it on a Lances point, caried it (as their victories trophe) thorow the Camp, & after, into the City.

The Turkes driue the Christians to flight, and enter with them mentable misfortune) he seeing the City taken, fled away by the Sea, and dyed in a little Island, either of the woundes he had then receiued, or of some other disease; albeit he had it once in his own choise, to haue died honourably in the place where he had liued with so much Fame and Credit. The Turkes beeing thus entred the Citty, left no kinde of bloody cruelty vnperformed, that malice or villany could deuise. All the houshold and Kindered of the Emperour, both Men and Women, were (without mercy) put to the sword; & in like sort they dealt with all the people, except such as escaped, or whom they tooke to their slauish seruitude.

The tirany of the Turkes in their Victory.

And heer I may not forget one notorious detestable action; for they could not content themselues, to execute their barbarous malice vpon Christian Men and women, but hauing gotten a goodly Image of the Crucifixe of Christ, they (in a shameleſse mockery) would needs performe another Crucifying thereof, vpon a Crosse made foule and filthy by their own beastly ordure, representing a new passion of our Sauiour; and ouer his head they wrote this Inscription: THIS IS THE GOD OF THE CHRISTIANS, with many other abhominable blasphemies. In this manner, that Noble Citty of Constantinople fell into the hands of the Disciples of Mahomet, the sworne Enemies to Iesus Christ, as yet they doe continue. I would it pleased God, that euen as ther hath bin in her wals many mutations to her great misfortune, that once againe it might bee regained, to serue to his Glory, and the generall good of Christendome.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of what Nation and race the Impoſture Mahomet was, and at what time his Sect had his first beginning.

HEre is a variation among the Historians, concerning of what Stocke or Parentage, as also of what country the false Prophet Mahomet was. Platina saith, that he was of a Noble lignage. Pomponius Letus, a very diligent Author (whom I meane to follow in this Chapter, principally in his abridgement of the Roman History,) He writes, and so doe diuers others beside, that he was of ignoble Race, Obscure and vile, and so indeede we may safelieſt credit; because so wicked a man hauing nothing in him worthy of Memory, but a pride in Malice, Lewdneſse, and Iniquity, could neuer bee deriued from any Noble Blood. Some say, that he was an Arabe; Others, a Persian: but this is a matter of small moment, & yet both may haue some good colour of Reason, because in those times, the Persians had Dominion ouer Arabia. As for his Father, let him be either Noble or a Villaine, sure it is, that hee was a Gentile, an Idolater, and no Christian, much leſse a Iew, according to Platina, and all the rest. As for his Mother, most Authors are of Opinion, that shee was discended of Abraham, by the Linage of his Sonne Ismael, whom hee hadde by his Handmaid Agar: and therefore, she was Iewish, and obserued the Lawes of the Ieweſse, for euery Father then delighted to instruct his Children in his owne Law.

The Nation and parentage of Mahomet.

This Mahomet, was of a quicke and liuely spirit, very soone apprehending whatsoeuer was taught him: but being yet very young, and left as an Orphant, was by a casuall aduenture, taken as a Slaue to the Scenites, who were then in that Countrey, as now at this day the Arabes are in Affrica. For they hadde no certaine place of abiding, neither any setled Goods or possessions, but liued in Common, vnder Tents and Trees, doing dayly Thefts and Robberies. Hee was afterward sold to a rich Merchant, named Adimoneple, who for the delight he had to see him so young, well featured, and quietly disposed, would not vse him as a Slaue, but rather as his owne Sonne. Mahomet being thus fortunately entertained, managed his Maisters Affayres with great care and diligence, making a mighty returne of profite, by trading dayly both with Iewes and Christians. Moreouer, by reason of this frequent conuersation, he learned sufficient in either of their lawes. While matters thus continued, the Merchant his Mai-

Maister died, without any children, leauing his Widdow very rich, aged about some fifty yeares; and she (according as I finde in the Chronicles of Constantinople, which agreeth with the opinion of some others) was of Mahomets Kindred, and named Ladigna. She hauing made proofe of his person, & his sufficiency, (euery way) took him to bee her Husband, making him (of a poore wretch) a rich Lord.

Mahomet marrieth his Mistresse.

It fortuned at this very time, that there trauailed vppe into those parts of Arabia, a Christian cowled-Monke, named Sergius, a man of very euill nature, and who (for his Heresies) was fled out of Constantinople. Being come thither, he fell in acquaintance and amity with Mahomet, who already began (as puffed vp with Ambition) to thinke on great matters, and yet by very oblique waies. For he had an accute spirit, and was wel entred into Magicall Sciences, so that by the Counsell and helpe of Sergius, he resolued to perswade the Gentiles, that he was a Prophet; and to that end, hee performed diuers sleights of Magicke, whereby his Wife, and they of his own house were first abused. Heere we are to vnderstand, that he hadde a disease (somewhat straunge to such as knew it not) which indeed was the falling sickenesse, wherat his wife and the rest waxing amazed, desired to know some reason thereof; and he would answer them, That the Angel of God vsed often to come and conferre with him, and hee could not (as being a mortall man) endure his Diuine presence, but fell into this Agony and alteration of spirit; but by these frequent visitations, he had instructions what to do, according to the will and direction of God. He was likewise so subtle and cautelous, that by meanes of his wife, who did constantly credit him, and made such straunge reports to her Neighbors, as also, the chiefest of her friends and Kindred, that they grew by little and little to believe him, and (among the Gentiles) hee attained vnto an especiall reputation.

Sergius the hereticall Monk commeth acquainted with Mahomet.

Mahomet wold becom a Prophet, and was a great Magician.

Soone after, his wife died, so that he remained her vniuersall heire, in verie wealthy possessions, and huge sums of Money, which made him much bolder then he was before: and therefore, by assistance of Sergius the Monke, he published himselfe openly to be a Prophet, saying; that he was sent of GOD, to giue new Lawes to the world. And because he was very learned in al the laws, he practised so industriously, that he accorded partly with the Iewes, to possesse their affection, and partly with the Christians, not to make them his Enemies. Hee likewise held consent with many Heretickes then liuing, to compasse their fauour; with Macedonius hee denied the Holy-Ghost to bee God; & approued the multiplicity of Wiues, with the Nicholaitans. On the other side, hee confessed that our Sauiour and Redeemer Iesus Christ, was Holy, and a Prophet; and allowed that the Virgin Mary was also holy, and woulde much extoll her. With the Iewes hee helde Circumcision, and other Ceremonies: and generally, he permitted in his false Religion, all Vices of the flesh in absolute Liberty. In all which, beeing made potent and no way contradictory, they were written altogether in a Booke, named Mahomets Alchoran.

Mahomet publisheth himselfe to bee a Prophet, by helpe of Sergius the Monke.

The variety of opinions maintained by Mahomet.

Now because he distrusted the sufficiency of his cause, he did forbid to all men whatsoeuer, not to dispute his ordinances on paine of death, saying; that they ought to bee obserued by force of Armes throughout the World. At the beginning of these things, he was much frequented with the vulgar multitude, and men apt to be abused by his grosse perswasions. They flocked together in huge troupes, to bee acquainted with him, for all carnal vicious men were his chiefest fauourers, and being no meane number of them in the world, they grew to a very great Sect, and by their means and assistance, he assaulted the Confines of Arabia, and made himselfe Lorde of much wealth. This was done, in the year of our Lord, about 620. Heraclius being then Emperor of Rome, and holding his seat at Constantinople. Boniface the fifte, being then Pope and great Byshop of Rome: and after him, Honorius his Successor.

The Disciples and cheefest followers of Mahomet.

This Newes comming to the Emperor Heraclius (as Platina testifieth) he prepared to redresse it; & partly did so, by entertaining in pay the Scenites of Arabia, a warlicke people, and who had fauoured Mahomet. The Emperour dispersed them into sundry places, and they preuailed this new Sect, but leaues it off before it was finished.

uailed so well by their power, that this new Sect (for a time) became indifferently assuaged: but it was a great errour in him, that he did not still pursue them, or seeke such meanes, as might root vp that wicked generation, who deliuered such Diuelish Doctrines abroad. For proceeding on no further in his enterprize, it did the more harme that he had begun it; because through defect of keeping promise with the Scenites, and paying them their accustomed wages; they (in meere despight) ioyned with Mahomet, and elected him to be their Captaine, because he was of great reputation, and held to be a Prophet of God. They grew to such boldnesse and strength, that they assailed the people and Countries belonging to the Romain Empire, and entring Syria, conquered the Noble Citty of Damas, with all Egipt, Iudea, and the Lands neighboring therabout, perswaded the Sarasins, (a people of Arabia) that the Lande of Promise appertained vnto them, as the Legittimate Successors to Father Abraham.

Mahomet with his Confederates, do enter the bound of the Romaine Empire.

Mahomet beholding such prosperous successe, and ayming to Maister all the World, he proudly attempted to warre vpon the Persians, who were then verie mighty: but at the beginning it went not well with him, in regard hee was vanquished; and some say, that it was in the very first battaile. Afterward, hauing recomforted his troopes, & inlarged them with a greater number, he set vpon the Persians againe, brought them into subiection, and inforced them to embrace his Religion. Now, albeit the Emperor Heraclius was heereof aduertised, yet he offered no such assistance as he ought to haue done, for hee might haue stifled this Brat in the verie breeding: but nowe, it was a matter much more difficult, for hee had conquered Cosroes the potent King of Persia, taking from him the Crosse of our Sauiour, which he had broght from Ierusalem into Persia, as a safe defence for it, that it might not fall into the handes of Mahomet, and the Agarians his Complices.

Mahomet warreth vpon the Persians, and is foyled at the first.

The reason why he tearmeth them to be Agarians, because they called the Christians so in scorne.

I tearme them Agarians, because that they which followed Mahomet, and tooke part with him, wold cal the Christians Agarians, in derision and mockery, saying; that neither they, nor Mahomet, had taken their Originall from the line of Sara, the Wife of Abraham; and therfore ought not to be cald Sarasins, as after Saraes name, but rather they shold bee called Agarians, as deriuing their sourse from Agar, the Hand-maid of Abraham. To conclude, after Mahomet had run thorough many strange & horrible things, he was poisoned, and died in the fortith yeare of his age, (some say at the age of thirty foure yeares) in the yeare of our Lord (according to Sabellicus) 633.

The death of Mahomet, and the time whē.

And because, Mahomet had often tolde his partakers, that (after hee was dead) he should mount vp to Heauen, they kept his body for certaine dayes aboue ground, vntill such time, that it sauoured most horribly, stinking euen like his soule; & then, it was put into a chest of Iron, and they carried it to the Citty of Mecca in Persia, where it is adored of all the people of the East; yea, euen of the greater part of the world, and that for our sinnes.

Mahomets body carried to Mecca, where it is worshipped of the greater part of the world.

Caliphs succeeded Mahomet in the Empire, and Haly after Calypha. These two, did greatly augment the power & Sect of Mahomet, and so from time to time, by diuers orders and successions; but especially by the sinnes and Cowardise of the Christian Emperors in those times, this pestilence hath spread ouer the world, euen to our dayes. But by the care and good dilligence of that Noble Emperor Charles the fift, we were once very graciously deliuered, euen when the great Turke Solyman, came with an Army of about 600000. men, to enter the Countries of Hungaria and Austria, with intention to conquer al Christendome. Against which enterprize, the Emperor Charles presented himselfe in person, hauing but a small moity of men with him, in comparison of the multitude broght by the Turk, yet were they all well chosen, and able fighting men. At the report whereof, the Turke left his enterprize, with losse of many of his people, as hee did also the second time, in the yeare, 1557. when he came by Sea, and by Land, against Italy; and surprized some places in the kingdome of Naples.

The happy deliuerance by Charles the fift, from the Turkes intended spoile.

There are some Authors, who haue written the original of Mahomet, much different from this which I haue heere set downe, and say, that he was a theefe vpon the High-waies, and by the means of great robberies, attained to his greatnesse; but indeede, they carrie slender credit, and therfore their opinion is disabled. The most part, and all the best Writers, do agree with our discourse. Platina is one, in his liues of the Popes. Blondus, in his Booke of the Roman Empires declining. Baptista Ignatius, in his abridgement of the Emperors. CHAP. XXV.

The Originall and beginning of the Turkes, how they came to their Gouernment, and what Princes haue ruled among them.

THE mighty Dominion of the Turkes, which at this day is so great & dreadful: likewise the Lignage and Family of the Ottomans & Kings; they are but nouell, and of no Antiquity, albeit the Turkish people haue bin of long continuance; so that it is a matter almost meruailous, that in such short time they should be so hugely augmented. For it is not aboue* two hundred and fifty yeares, that they were knowne to begin and get a Name. Behold therefore, how it may well be credited, that they were sent as a scourge by Gods permission, to chastise his vnthankful christian people, euen as heertofore, he sent an Antiochus, a Nabuchodonosor, a Cyrus, and such other, to oppresse and vex his elected children. And because the Christian Church hath receiued by them one of the most memorable persecutions and losses that euer she had, I held it not much differing from my purpose (especially, hauing made mention of the Original of this Sect) to speake somwhat more thereof, as briefly as may be. As the like hath bin done by Æneas Syluius, Raphael Volateranus, & Nicholaus Secondinus, far more distinctly then any of them before named. Also, Frances Philelphus, in a Letter which hee wrote to Charles 8. K. of France: & Antonius Sabellicus in his History. From all which Authors, I haue collected what I will briefely set downe. But principally, I do obserue Paulus Iouius, in a particuler Tract by him Written, concerning these people and Turkish Nation, not forsaking Plinie, and Pomponius Mela, in the end of his first Booke.

To begin with these two last recited Authors, they say, That their Original came from the * Sarmates, which are on the Confines of Scythia, at the vttermost entrance into the Caspian Sea, and that they liued sauagely in vast Fieldes, hunting for victuals to maintaine their Liues: Of which Sarmates or Scythians, it is certain (all other opinions left) that the Turkes (to this very instant) haue receiued their Originall. And all such as say or thinke, that they were discended of the Troyans, do but abuse themselues. It would seem to them, that because the Turkes haue ruled Troy, and that the Troyans were named * Teucres, that the Turkes had thence their first deriuation: But indeed, they are issued of the Sarmates, whom all out Ancients hold to bee Scythians, and so did they call them. But in former times long since, their proper name was Turaces. Pliny and Pomponius Mela do title them so, but since thē, they haue bin called Turks; and so commonly are they vniuersally tearmed. These people (as Otho the Arch-byshop affirmeth in his History) about 800. yeares after the Natiuity of our Lorde (albeit some others write that it was before) would needs depart out of Scythia into the lesser Asia, which to this day, in regard of their name, is cald Turky, where by robbing and spoiling they conquerd some few Princes; and then (as people barbarous and voide of Faith) they embraced the wicked sect of Mahomet, as the very first that presented it selfe vnto them, and seemed most conformable to their detestable customs. Thus this people, by reason of their multitude and sauage fiercenes, became dreadfull to the world, & soone surprized many Cities.

Asia Minor, now called Turky.

Some hold, that they intruded vpon Persia, Armenia, and Media, but howsoeuer it was, it is most euident (among al other thinges) that they inhabited the Lesser Asia, according as we haue already declared: yet not by meanes of any King, or any other chief notable head among them, but coupled themselues in in companies together, sustaining and defending one another, for a long space in that Countrey. Some of the most aparant or best note among them, wold call such supply of men as they best fancied, and with them they would goe to seize on Townes and Countries.

Solyman first named himselfe King of the Turkes.

Among those of boldest spirit, there was one named Solyman, who got to himselfe the Realme of Cilicia, and part of the bordering limits. In those dayes, Duke Godfrey of Bullen, accompanied with diuers other christian Princes, passed the Seas (with such powers of men as they had assembled) to Conquer the Holyland. Against whom, Solyman (with his followers) came very forwardly, but they were all vanquished and scattered. By which means, the Turkes remained a long time without any Captaine or Commander of name among them; & therefore were little respected, vntill in the yeare, 1300. that another then named Ottoman (a man of base discent) began againe (by little and little) to gaine some reputation among them, for that he was a very valiaunt man, mighty of body, fortunat, and of an ingenious subtle spirit. This fellow, took occasion to aduance himselfe, for the discourse hee held with them, and strengthning himselfe with a multitude of able men, hee conquered and made himselfe Lorde of many Countreyes; aswell of his owne, as others of his neighbors. Being by this meanes become somwhat powerful, he left vnto his successors the raigne & authority, which continueth to this day by the linage masculine among the Turkes.

Duke Godfrey of Bullen, his iourny to the Holy-Land.

Ottoman the second man of name among the Turkes, and the second K.

He hauing raigned 28. yeares, died, in the yeare 1308. Bennet the 11. being the Pope of Rome. Ottoman thus deceased, a son of his, named Orcan, succeeded him; a man no lesse strong and valiaunt then his Father, but rather more industrious and better aduised in his Conquestes. Moreouer, he was a notable inuenter of many Engines & Instruments for war; magnanimious, and very bountifull to all men; in regard whereof, he so much augmented the raigne of his predecessor, and the number of his men of war, that (beside the Countreyes which his father had commanded in Asia) he vsurped vpon Bythinia, & the Kingdome of Constantinople. And in the lesser Asia, he subdued Hyrcania, Phrigia, Caria, and other potent Lands. When hee had raigned twenty two yeares, in assaying a Cittie, he chanced to be wounded; of which hurt he died, in the yeare, 1350. when Clement the sixt was Bishop of Rome.

Ottoman was very fortunat in all his Attempts.

Orcan the Son of Ottoman succeedeth him in rule, being the third King.

The great Conquests of Orcan, and his death.

He had to be his successor, Amurath the sonne of a Christian woman whom he had espoused, she was Daughter to the King of Celicia, now called Caramania. This Amurath was much different from his Graund-Father, and Father; for he was a mocker, a man double and false, weake of his person, and of wicked inclination; Ambitious, and very desirous to enlarge his Empire, whereof he had very faire occasion offred him, when the Emperor of Constantinople was in strife with diuers Princes his subiects who greatly fauoured the Lord* of Bulgaria, which is a portion of the ancient neather * Mysia. For the Emperor was then constrained, to request aide of this Amurath King of the Turkes, who sent him fifteene thousand woorthy men of Warre, by whose helpe the Emperour ouercame his Enemies. And leauing part of these fifteene thousand Turks in his Countreyes, when hee had sent home the rest, Amurath got aduertisement (from them) of the peoples disposition. By meanes whereof, hee determined to visite Greece, vnder colour indeede, that he would helpe the Emperor against his Aduersaries. Hereupon, he leuied three score thousand footmen & a great number of Horse, with which strong power, he made himselfe Lorde of * Callipolis (which I thinke should more properly be called Gallois, because it was builded by Gallyans) and of other strong Fortresses therabout, as also the Cittie of * Adrinople, now tearmed Andronople.

Amurath Son to Orcan, was the fourth K. of the Turkes

* A Countrey by Hellespont bordering on Troas.

* A Cittie in Thrace by the Hellespont.

On the otherside, the great Lord & Maister of Bulgaria, named Marcus, after he had prepared such an army as was possible for him to do, with the aide of Lazarus the Despote of Seruia (which is a Prouince on the limits of Thrace, anciently called the higher Mysia, & assisted also with the Princes of * Albania, hee went against the Turke, where fighting a great battell, the Christians were in the end vanquished, and almost all slain. Thus Amurath (in despight of the Emperour) continued Lord of a great part of Thrace, and alſo of Greece. When he had liued 23. yeares; a Slaue (that was Seruant to Lazarus Lord of Seruia) traitorouſly killed him, in the yeare, 1373. Hee left two Sonnes; the one, named Solyman, and the other Baiazeth; which Baiazeth, ſlew his Brother Solyman, and remained Prince alone: of a ſinguler Wiſedome, & high reſolued courage. He was extraordinary diligent, and of great iudgement in Warre, very ready in effecting what he had commaunded: And for this cauſe hee was called generally, King of the Sunne.

Amurath was traiterouſly murdered.

Baiazeth killed his elder Brother Solyman to rule alone.

Baiazeth fift King of the Turkes.

So ſoone as he began his raigne, hee determined to make war vpon the chriſtians, in iuſt reuenge of his Fathers death, and with admirable ſpeede (hauing prepared a very powerfull Army) paſſed into Greece. Firſt of all he ſet on Marcus, Lord of Bulgaria, who ioyning battell with him, was there ſlaine, with the greater part of the Nobility of Bulgaria and Seruia. Three yeares after a victory ſo famous, hee returned againe vpon the Chriſtians, and made moſt cruell warres in Hungaria; but firſt of al in Albania and Vallachia, which is a great Countrey, in ancient times ſtiled * Dacia, and it extended it ſelf in length euen to Hungaria: from whence he brought home into Turkey, a very great number of Chriſtians, and there made them Slaues.

Bulgaria and Seruia won by Baiazeth.

* Deuided into four parts, Valachia, Bulgaria, Seruia, and Tranſyluania.

Seeing himſelfe to bee poſſeſſed of the greater part of Greece; that is to ſay, of the old city and Country of * Athens, of Boetia and Arcania; hee then came & laid ſiege to the great City of Conſtantinople; which was the reaſon, that the Emperor (in perſon) went to entreate the Weſterne Princes, to fauour him with their needfull aſſiſtance. To help a caſe ſo deſperat, Charles the 7. gaue ayd of 2000. Lances, amongſt which faire Troope, were two French Gentlemen of worthy note, that ioyned their power with Sigiſmond King of Hungaria, who afterwards was Emperor, and had likewiſe prouided a great Army for the ſame enterprize. With them tooke part the Deſpotes of Seruia, the grand Maiſter of the Rhodes, & a great number of other Chriſtian Princes. Whereupon, Baiazeth leauing his attempt for Conſtantinople, marched ſuddenly with 300000 men, to meet theſe Chriſtians, who were about an 100000. whereof there were 20000. Horſe. Being met together, they had a wonderfull bloudy battaile, wherein the Chriſtians were conquered, and the greater number of them ſlain, by reaſon of the baſe Flight of the King of Hungary, and the Maiſter of the Rhodes; as for the French-men, they wer all ſlaine, or taken: and this battell was fought in the yeare 1395. being the Eeuen of S. Michaell.

*Betweene Macedonia, & Achaia, builded firſt by Cecrops, and called Cecropia, but called Athens of Minerua, who in Greece, was named Athene.

Baiazeth leaueth his ſiege to meete the Chriſtians power.

After which Victory, Baiazeth returned againe to his former beſiedging of Conſtantinople, which hee reduced to ſuch hard extreamity, as (without anie doubt) he had taken it, but that Newes came to him of Tamburlaine the Great, (of whoſe life and actions, we ſhall diſcourſe heereafter, by it ſelfe) that (with a meruailous Army) he was entred into his Countries of Aſia and Turky, and there already had ſurprized many goodly Citties, Townes, and Prouinces. Wherfore, truſſing vp bag & baggage, he returneth into Aſia, where preparing to the Fielde his very ableſt power, hee went to encounter this preſumptuous Enemy.

Baiazeth goeth againe to beſiege Conſtantinople.

Great Tamburlaine entreth into Aſia, and cauſeth Baiazeth to giue ouer his ſiege.

Now, did the two moſt potent Princes in the whole world, make a meeting day in Martiall armes together; where, to ſpeake of the dreadfulnes of the fight and wonderful ſlaughter on both ſides, it may much eaſier be imagined, then in any breuity reported. But fortune was aduerſe to Baiazeth, for his power was vanquiſhed, and himſelfe taken; Nay more, he endured the moſt vile & ſtricteſt impriſonment that euer was. For, Tamburlaine led him in triumph along with his army, in a great cage of wood; (or of Iron, as ſome others report) & at euery time he mounted on his horſe, he made the ſhoulders of Baiazeth his foot-ſtoole. Moreouer, when he ſhould eat, he made him to lie vnderneath his Table; to the end that he ſhould feede on nothing, but what he caſt down to him, euen as if he had bin a Dog. And in this manner, this Prince ended his life, who had bin the moſt aduenturous, moſt renowned, & more feared, then any other that was in his time. Tamburlaine Conquered Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, with many other countries in the Dominion of Turky: and from thence, he went and made war vpon the Soldan of Egipt.

The calamitie of Baiazeth, beingconquered by Tamburlaine.

The

Bajazeths children taken by Gallies of Christians.

The Children of Bajazeth, who escaped from the battell wherein their Father was taken, in their flight towardes those parts which they commaunded in Greece; were surprized vpon the Sea by certaine Christian Gallies. But if such extremity had bin shewne them, as was necessarily required: those harmes had bin preuented, which after followed. For Calapine being one of them that was deliuered, comming to name himselfe Lord in the Empire of his father, began to strengthen himselfe, and mustering vp his people together, fortifying also his holds in Greece and Thrace: the Emperor Sigismond made offer to hinder him, to the end he might not come vpon him againe; and also to reuenge on him, the battel hee had lost against his Father; whereupon he leuied his forces, and made against him very valiauntly. Calapine prouiding to encounter him, apointed the day for fight, wherein Sigismond was againe vanquished, & escaped from the battell by Flight: this was 3. yeares after his first discomfiture. Afterward, Calapine hauing sufficiently spoyled the country of Seruia, he returned to his owne Prouinces, where hee raigned six yeares, and died in the time of Pope Alexander the fift.

Calapine sixt King of the Turkes.

The Death of Calapine.

Calapine left two sons, the eldest named Orcan, and the other Mahomet; but Orcan was slaine by his Vnckle; because he would haue had the gouerment himselfe. Neuertheless, Mahomet obserued so discreet a cariage, that hee slew the murderer of his Brother, & got the Empire into his owne hand. Soone after, he made strong Warre vpon the Christians in Valachia, and passed thence into Turkey, or the Lesser Asia, where hee reconquered the Landes and Prouinces which Tamburlain had gotten from his Grandfather. In which war, he spent 14 yeares of his raigne, and died in the year 1420. during the High Priest-hoode of Pope Martine the fift.

Mahomet seauenth King of the Turkes.

Amurath eight King of the Turkes, a fortunate Prince

After Mahomet, succeeded a Sonne of his called Amurath, a very fortunate Prince: for he being at the death of his Father in Asia, assembled a mighty power of Soldiers, and in despight of the Emp. of Constantinople (who much laboured to resist him) he entred very far into the Christians Countries. He took diuers Cities in Seruia, conquered the kingdom of Epire (at this day called Romania) & made diuers courses into Hungaria, then into Albania, which is a part of ancient Macedonia. In which enterprises, albeit he receiued many shrewd endamagements, yet such was his fortune, that hee still continued victory; beside much wealthy profit, and great store of Horsses. He besiedged also the Cittie of Belgrade in Hungaria, on the riuer of Danubie; but yet he could not take it, wherfore he was compeld to raise his siedge, with great slaughter of his men.

Amurath besiedged Belgrade.

Not long after, Ladislaus K. of Polonia and Hungaria, came with a great Armie against him, which when hee heard, hee sent before him, one of his chiefest Captains, conducting a potent company of men; and the two Armies ioyning in battell, Ladislaus (after much resistance) becam the Conqueror, with a wonderfull massacre of the Turkes. By meanes whereof, and becausse Amurath was aduertised, that the K. of Caramania made warre on him in Asia, he was forced to make peace with Ladislaus: which peace while Amurath was fighting in Turkey, was broken, by perswasion of the Emperor of Constantinople, Pope Eugenius, the Venetians, and Phillip Duke of Burgundy, who altogether in one vnanimity, bound themselus by oath, so strongly to defend the straits of the Sea, at the entrance into Europ and Asia, that Amurath could not passe with his Troops, to succor those parts which were afflicted, and so Ladislaus should haue leysure to win, & make himselfe sole-Commander of them. Amurath hearing of this bolde enterprize, returned very powerfully, and in despight of the Christians Army, passed the straits, and after, came to present Ladislaus the battaile: wherein the aduenture was so doubtfull for Amurath, that hee saw no remedie but Flight. Neuertheless, one of his valiant Bathaes cõpelling him to stay, they got the victory, and Ladislaus lost his life, on S. Martius day, in the yeare, 1440.

The ouerthrow of the Turkes by Ladislaus King of Poland.

Amurahs powers disapointed of passage.

King Ladislaus slaine in the field, and the Christians vanquished.

After this great conquest made in Hungary, he set vpon the kingdom of Morea, in elder times called Peloponnesus, where the Famous old Cities of Lacedemon & Corinth were; and hauing broken down the wall at entrance into the Prouince, which contained sixe miles in length, he entred into the Ionian Sea: As also, the the Ægean, where he conquered al, except ſome few coaſting places. This he did, when he had raigned 31. yeares, and died in the yeare, 1450. Hee firſt ordained the band of Ianiſſaries, which were reuolted Chriſtians, who are the principall ſtrength of Turky. By reaſon of his death, his Son Mahomet came to ſucceed after him in the Empire. But ſome ſay, that his Father reſigned it to him in his life time, feeling himſelfe far ſpent and aged.

This Mahomet was excellent in all things, only he was ſomwhat too cruel. At the beginning of his raigne, to the end he might attempt ſome matter, anſwerable to the greatneſſe of his mind, he determined firſt of all to conquer the Citty of Conſtantinople: and the better to accompliſh his purpoſe, hee leauied mighty powers of men, as well by Sea, as on the Land, wherewith he beſieged it, and wonne it alſo, according as wee haue declared in the former diſcourſe of that Citty, and all other places in Obedience to that Empire. Which done, hee came againſt the Citty of Belgrade, but it was defended by the ſtrength of a woorthy Hungarian Captaine, named Iohn Vauoida, who in many valiant Battels, vanquiſhed great numbers of the Turkes beſt Captaines, and now alſo, he compelled him to raiſe his ſiege, after diuers ſore wounds and loſſes, & to leaue his beſt Artillery behinde him. Theſe things not proſpering to his purpoſe, he ſent one of his Baſhaes to ſpoil Morea, which had entred into rebellion againſt him, by the aſſiſtance of the Venetians, and to rumate the Iſle of Negropont, in former times cald Euboea, with Mytelene and Lemnos, an Iland in the Archipelagus, bordering on the Egean ſea. Then he entred the Prouince of Boſsina, which is part of the vpper old Myſia, and into Seruia, where he tooke the King & commanded his head to be ſmitten off.

Hauing gottē al theſe victories againſt the chriſtians, he croſt into Aſia againſt Vſanaſſanus the puiſant K. of Perſia, bidding him two ſeuerall battailes; In the firſt whereof he was vanquiſhed, but after, remained conqueror. This buſineſſe ended, he determined to ſet vppon the Emp. of Trebiſand, which is one of the coaſts of ancient Capadocia, on the ſhore of Pontus, or the Euxine ſea, winning the Empire, and killing the Emperour himſelfe. So ended all the gouerment which the Chriſtians had in thoſe Countries. He ſent alſo a potent army (vnder Conduct of a valiaunt Captaine) into Italie, which paſſed on to *Carinthia and *Iſtria, euen to the lands of the Venetians, who ſent a ſtrong power to withſtand him: but in the conflict, the Chriſtians were vanquiſhed, and there periſhed many of the Nobility of Italy. Moreouer, he ſent another army againſt the Iſle of Rhodes, but beeing able to compaſſe nothing there, he withdrew again. Then he ſent the like army to the kingdom of Naples, conducted by one of his Baſhawes, named Acomath, who won the City of Ottanta, which was in the Turkes poſſeſſion aboue a yeare, to the great ſcandall and damage of Italy.

Afterward, with an army of 300000 men by Land, and 200. Gallies, accompanied with 300. armed Shippes, he ſet forward to make war againſt the Great Soldan of Egypt, but he was preuented by death on the way; by means whereof, the enterprize went not forward, but was preſently ſtaide. And hauing raigned 32. yeares, he died of the Collicke, in the year 1481. By whoſe death, the Citty of Ottanto was recouered, and Pouilla alſo releaſed from the Turkes, which was a great comfort to Italy, in no meane feare and wofull Calamitie; which indeed was ſuch, that Pope Sixtus, in whoſe time this terrour happened, determined to withdraw himſelfe downe into Fraunce (the Auncient recourſe of the Romaine Church,) for that there was ſmall hope of defending Rome againſt him. And it is reported, that in the Warres of this vnhappily too fortunate Mahomet, there dyed (aſwell by Weapons, as other violences, which were acted and vſed in the ſaide Warres) more then three hundred thouſand men.

Two Sonnes remained as Heyres to this Mahomet; the one, being Named Baiazeth, and the other Zizim, becauſe their Elder Brother died before their Father. Each of theſe ſons ſought the apteſt meanes, to get poſſeſſion abſolutely of the Kingdome. Zizim had the helpe of the Soldan, & ſome ſtrong Baſhawes, likewiſe another part of the Baſhaws & Ianiſſaries fauored Baiazeth: on on the other side, a Son to this Baiazeth, called Corcutus, was created grand Signeur in Constantinople. Whereupon, Baiazeth made such quicke speede thither, & carried with him so strong a power, that he took such sufficient order with his son, as the Empire was his own. Vpon this good successe, he returned again into Turky against his Brother & droue him to Flight among the Christian forces; and finally, he died in Italy, Baiazeth remaining then Lord alone. Within 3. yeares after, hauing prepared a puisant Army, hee passed along on land, by the Riuer Danubie, & hauing performed many disma stratagems, he returned home. Then sent he a strong power against the Soldan of Egipt, with whom he was exceedingly offended, for giuing aid to his Brother Zizim. The Soldan also sent an Army to meete him, which was much lesse then that of the Turkes, & yet they had the victory, with a great slaughter of the Turkes. Which when Baiazeth vnderstood, he took truce with the Soldan, and made war vpon the Christians, wherein he sped so wel, that he won the Citty of * Durace in Albania, and that of Vallona, which bordereth on the coast, & frounteth Pouille. Hee sent also a great number of men into Hungary, against whom the Princes came with their forces, but were foiled to their great losses.

The Soldane vanquisheth Baiazeths Army.

In these times, he did much harme to other Countries of the Christians; and ayd being requested of him by Lewes D. of Millaine (who made warre vppon the Venetians, that ioyned themselues with Lewes king of France) he sent him a stout Captaine with 10000. horse, who passing along by Frioly, without resistance, tooke, burnt, and made hauocke of the Country, euen so far as the Mountains which front Venice. The year following, in person he conquered the city of * Modon in Morea, with other Sea-coasting places held by the Venetians, and labouring to make a deuastation of all, his intention was hindered by the Duke of * Sessamum, who being a Spaniard, by the helpe of a stout company of Spaniards, called him to battell, and there ouercam him, conquering also for the Venetians, the Isle of * Cephalonia; by means whereof, the Turke was forced to take Truce with them, which euer since hath continued, euen to our time. And in this narrow straite, ceased the fury of Baiazeth, for then he quite gaue ouer warre (seeing himselfe aged) to rest & betake himselfe to study. In his time, began the Empire of the Sophy in Persia, which hath bin, and is, a great bridle vnto the Turkes, and hindereth them from doing such endamagement to Christians, as they haue done, and wold do. For these two mighty Princes, are continual enemies one to another: Which hapned, thorow a man named Ismael, that called himselfe a Prophet, and published a new manner of Alchoran, contrary to that which was inuented by Mahomet; by whose meanes he leuied a very powerfull army, wherwith he vanquished certaine Bashawes, which Baiazeth had sent against him, and so put himselfe into ful possession of Persia, with diuers other wealthy Prouinces beside; since when, he hath much inlarged his Dominions. But to our former purpose.

The Original of the Persian Empire, and the hate betweene them and the Turks.

This Baiazeth had three Sons: The first named Acomath, the second, called Corcutus, who (as wee haue already declared) gaue himselfe into his Fathers hands at Constantinople, and resigned vp the Empire. The third, was named Selim, great Grand-father to the Turke now raigning. And albeit this Selim was yonger then the other, yet had he a more manly spirit. This fellow, seeing his Father olde and decrepite, determined to take the kingdome from him, and put himself in possession thereof: which the better to effect, hee acquaints himself with the Great Tartarian, and makes his Daughter his Wife. No sooner came an inckling heereof to the other Brothers, but each of them went seuerally about the like purpose. It appeared for lawfull in the eye of Acomath, because he was the eldest Sonne, and in reason the Succession appertained vnto him. On the other side, Corcutus pleaded, that hee once had possession of the gouernment, and resigned it in dutie to his father, who being now old & vnable to rule the kingdom, he ought in reason returne it to him againe. The Old man perceiuing these busy disputes, and the daungers thereby like to ensue: became greatly perplexed, specially at the disobedience of his children. During these intercourses, diuers murmurs & tumults arose, wherin many of the chiefest partakers Baiazeth had three sonnes, Acomath, Corcutus, and Selim.

kers in either faction, died and miscarried. Neuertheleſſe, Selimes ſide, (albeit he was the yonger Brother) continued yet of beſt ability: becauſe (vnder colour of begging pardon, and making peace with his Father, as alſo defending himſelfe againſt his eldeſt Brother, who made war with his Father) he caried his courſes ſo currantly; and preuayled in ſhort while, to win the harts of the Ianiſſaries, and the other ſtouteſt Warriours, that (by their helpe) he took the Kingdome from his Father, compelling him (perforce) to renounce it; whereupon, he baniſhed him from Conſtantinople, and in the end (continuing in exile) procured him to be poiſoned. Thus died Baiazeth, in the yeare, one thouſand, fiue hundred, and twelue. And in this manner, came the Turkiſh Empire into the hand of Selim, a Traitour and Parricide.

Baiazeth baniſhed and poiſoned by his Sonne Selim.

Selim the 10. King of the Turkes, a traitor and Parricide to gaine the Kingdom.

He cauſed himſelfe to bee Crowned with great ſolemnity, euen the very ſame day, which fell out to be ſo cruell and bloody to Rauenna in Italy. So ſoon as he ſaw himſelfe ſeated to his owne contentment, he began to diſtribute the Riches and Iewels of his Father, to his Ianiſſaries and Valiaunt men of Warre, which made him the better eſteemed, and the more ſtrong in power. Soone after, hee went into Turky againſt his Brothers; where firſt of all, he ſlew diuers Children of ſome other Brothers of his, deceaſed in the life time of his father; and followed ſo fiercely on his Brother Corcutus, till hee got him into his hands, and then he murthered him. Acomah the eldeſt Son, acquainting him ſelfe with the Sophy and the Soldane, by their meanes prouided himſelfe of a great Army, wherwith he gaue his Brother battell, wherein hee looſing the day, was taken, and afterward ſtrangled.

Selim the murtherer of both his Brothers.

Thus this Wicked Tyrant, hauing ſlaine all of his owne bloud, liued without iealouſie of his Kingdome; and becauſe he held the Sophy and the Soldan in diſdaine, hee made peace with Ladiſlaus then King of Hungary, and confirmed his league with the Venetians. Then preparing a very great army, with no meane forces of Artillery, hee went againſt the Sophie; who truſting in his happineſſe and proſperity, made heade againſt him with a ſtrong Army, & wel prouided. Notwithſtanding, when it came to bee diſcided by battell, which was very ſharpe & violent for the time: the Sophy was foyled and Wounded, glad to ſaue himſelfe by Flight, which meruailouſly augmented the honor and reputation of the Turke by this ſucceſſe: and this diſcomfiture hapned the 24. of Auguſt, in the yeare 1514. The yeare following, he being addicted wholly to warre, would goe againſt a great Lord, whoſe Regiment was at the Mountaine Taurus; and albeit he was a very valiant Prince, yet was hee ſo hotly purſued, that falling at length into the Turkes hands, he put him to death, and tooke poſſeſſion of all his iuriſdiction.

The Sophy of Perſia, vanquiſhed by Selim.

This done, hee concluded to make the like war vpon the Soldan, and bringing his army neare the Coaſt of Suria, gaue it out in common report, that hee wold once more try his fortune againſt the Sophy. But the Soldan, who was not void of ſuſpition, had euermore in readineſſe a mighty power of men, able to encounter the greateſt Lorde, that would reſiſt againſt him in Suria. In the end, theſe two puiſſant Princes came to accoſt each other, and met neer the City of Damas in Suria; and after certaine skirmiſhes paſt on either ſide, the battell was giuen the 24. of Auguſt, in the yeare one thouſand, fiue hundered and ſixty, vppon the like day as the Sophie had before by him bin vanquiſhed. This Battel was for a long while maintained very woorthily on both parties; but in the end, the victory fell to the Turkes, by reaſon of the great diſtruction which their Artillery made vpon the Soldanes people: and likewiſe, becauſe a Captain (the Gouernor of Alleppo) ioyned with the aduerſe ſide, and yet would not fight neither he nor his men. In this Battaile the ſoldan was found dead, without any wound, but onely by being among the great throng of horſes, hauing attained to the age of ſeuenty ſix yeares. The Turke tooke poſſeſſion of all Suria, and likewiſe Paleſtine, with Iudea, and going towards Egipt, in purſuite of his victory, he reſted for diuers daies in Ieruſalem, where hee viſited the Holy Sepulchre; and paſſing further on, hee made himſelfe well prouided of Goats skins, and filling them with Water, they ſerued for his iourny through the Deſerts Tomombeus the new Soldane of Egypt, conquered likewise by the Turkes.

By this time, the Mammeluckes and other men of Warre, that had escaped from the battaile, and were retyred home to Ægypt, had elected themselues a new Soldane, a Gouernour of Alexandria, named Tomombeus, who came in person against the Turkes with a very huge Army. The battaile beeing appointed, it was (by the report of very good Authours) the most crüell and daungerous fight that euer was: notwithstanding, by the wonderfull multitude and power of the Turkes, Tomombeus was conquered, and with-drawing himselfe to the grand Cayre, they fought there two daies and two nights together, without any repose or intermission. So that loosing the Citty, he fled ouer Nylus, and labouring to re-enforce fresh meanes for encounter, he was surprized by certaine Traytours, and deliuered into the Turkes power, who put him to death. After Tomombeus was dead, the Turk (in short while) got possession of the most auncient and mighty Kingdome of Ægipt, where he left (as also in Suria) such order as was best to his owne liking. Then returned hee in great tryumph to Constantinople, where his Sonne welcommed him backe from his warres, and there he dyed of an Impostume, in the month of September, one thousand fiue hundred and twenty, hauing raigned eyght yeares, and liued forty sixe. This Tyrant was of such great and vndaunted Spirit, as hee was neuer noted to be fearefull of any thing.

The death of Tomombeus by Selim, and his seazing on Egypt.

He had but one Sonne named Solyman, who succeeded him in the Empire, and was Crowned the same day and yeare, that Charles the fift Emperour, was heere in Christendome. But so soone as the death of Selim was known in Suria, a great personage named Gazellus (who was Gouernor) rebelled, and made himselfe Commaunder of Tripoly and Baruth, with other neighbouring Townes and Cities, drawing many Mammeluckes and other Nations to his faction. Against whom Solyman sent a Bashae, named Ferrat, who vanquished Gazellus, and put him to death, reducing Suria to quietnesse, and Ægypt also, which began to mutiny. The yeare following, Solyman went in person to war vpon the Christians, and laid siedge before the Citty of Belgrade, which was the Port and cheefe defence of Hungaria, and had beene before in vaine attempted by his Predecessours: but king Lewes being then ouer young, and gouerned by the Princes of his Countrey; made no such resistãce as was needfully required. Wherfore, by force of Arms, the Citty was taken by the Turke, although it cost much blood, and many liues of his people. When he had accomplished this enterprise, hee went againe in person (contrary to the opinion of al his Bashaes) and would needs besiedge the Isle of Rhodes, with an innumerable multitude of Men and Artillery, both by Land and Sea, and hauing conquered the Isle, hee brought his Campe before the Citty, in the yeare one thousand fiue hundred twenty and two, in the end of the month of Iune. During this siedge, there was then performed such Noble and heroycall deeds of Armes, as it is impossible to make any small abridgement of them, or sufficiently to extoll the vertuous valour of the besiedged. But in conclusion, after some sixe months hardy resistance, the great Maister and Gouernor of Rhodes, named Phillip de Villiers, of the French Nation, was constrained to surrender it vp to the Turk, being vnable any way longer to defend it. Heereon, the Turke returned triumphantly to Constantinople, not a little glorying in so great good fortune. And three yeares after, which was, in one thousand fiue hundred twenty and sixe, hee entred Hungaria with a wonderfull Army: against whom King Lewes (badly councelled) went in person with his power, betweene Buda and Belgrade, at which place (being too confident of himselfe, and hauing ouer few Men) he gaue the Turk battaile, wherein hee was vanquished, and founde dead, drowned in a Ditch. The battaile was the same yeare, the eight and twentith day of August, when as the Turke tooke Buda, and diuers other neighbouring places, still returning home Victor. After which, once more hee came into Hungary, when Charles the fift, Emperor, gaue him resistance.

Solyman the Son to Selim, eleauenth King of the Turkes.

CHAP. XXVI.

That the death of Man or Woman, is to bee reckoned happy or vnhappy, according to the quality and estate wherein the party dieth: with sundry examples of the death of many.

The iudgement of a mans death, is according to the estate he dyes in.

THat a Man is to dye once, is a matter common to all Men, but to know when, how, or in what manner his death shall be, is not by any meanes reuealed to him, or euer hath beene in former times: for that mainely consisteth in the good or euill condition of death, and ought not eyther to bee called good or vnfortunate, but when a Man (in that estate) is not found as hee ought to be. Death therefore lyes oftentimes hidden in wayes, walkes, or houses, where men suspect or least looke for him; and sometimes (like his Wife) lies with him in Bed: for which cause, hardly should a moment of life time be spent, without due and intire consideration thereof. Examples tending to this purpose, are infinit, whereof I purpose to produce some very notable: albeit, the effectes of death are not to be wondred at, in regard they continually happen day by day.

Aulus Gellius. Valerius Maximus.

Aulus Gellius, and so dooth Valerius Maximus also, set downe, that in Italy there is a Town called Crotonna, neer to Calabria, where a Man was borne, named Milo, who was so excellent, able, dexterious, and skilfull, either in action belonging to Playes, Wrastling, Dancing, and all sprightly kinds of exercises, as he was not to be equalled by any, but in all such delights he bare away the victory: so that of him it was commonly said, that no Man, eyther in strength, agility, or otherwise, could in his time be found to deale with him. This man, walking one day on the side of a Mountaine (beeing with-drawne out of the common high-way to refresh himselfe) among other Trees he beheld an Oake, which had two great branches or armes falne off and lying by, and had beene begun to be cleft by some labouring Man;

Of Milo, the excellent man in all qualities who hauing left his Wedges in the Stock, it remained wide open extended by their stretching. Hee being desirous to finish the Mans labour, sets his hands to the braunch to teare it in sunder, and opened it so much by his strength, that the Wedges fell quite out. But whether (as it might bee) that his strength fayled him, or the Branch was ouerweldy for him, pausing a little to breath himselfe, the rift clapt it selfe so suddenly close together againe (except his hands, being now betweene in stead of the Wedges) that by no meanes could he help himselfe, neyther came any passenger that way to helpe him. So that it was his hard fortune, to starue there and dye a most miserable death, worse then can easily be imagined, for he was a prey to wild Beasts, & thus ouerthrown in trying his owne strength.

When Men will try their strength wher they need not

But if this death of Milo, may (as it deserues no lesse) appeare to be strange: that then of the Poet Æschylus may bee thought little lesse; for hee walking one day out of a Towne in Scicily where he dwelled, to take the Ayre of the fieldes, and comfort himselfe in the warmth of the Sunne, because hee felt his ioynts somewhat chill by standing, tooke this to be his wholesomest recreation. Hee beeing aged, white headed, and balde withall, sat downe vpon on high place, where the Sunne might haue greatest power to heat him, and being bare headed, an Eagle (by accident) was houering aloft in the Ayre, holding a Tortuise in her Tallents, and espying the bald head of Æschylus, which shee imagined to bee a stone, forthwith let fall her burthen from an high, to breake the Tortuise vpon that supposed stone, that afterward she might deuoure the creature. The Tortuise falling iust vppon the Poets head; cleft it so farre, that instantly he dyed. A matter of no meane maruaile, because he sat so high, and openly discouered, as it might seeme impossible, that any thing whatsoeuer, should from so high light vpon his head.

The strange death of the Poet Aeschylus

That which is ordained, cannot be auoyded.

Baptista Fulgoso, in his learned Booke of extraordinary examples, declareth the vnfortunate death of a King of Nauarre, named Charles. This Prince was old and very sickly, feeling great anguish in all his Nerues, and (for this disease) by aduise of most excellent and skilfull Phisiti-

Baptist. Fulgo. in lib. de Exemp

The strange deathot Charls K. of Nauarre.

Phisitions, there could not any likely remedy be found but one onely, which was thus: His body was to bee round wrapped about with a Linnen Cloath, that first had beene well steept in Aqua-vitæ, and then it must bee sowed somewhat strait about him. The party that performed this businesse, hauing fullie ended his labour, and wanting a Knife or Sheares ready to cut the thred: took the Candle to burne it in sunder, and the thred flaming to the Cloth, caught such sudden holde on the same and the Aqua-vitæ, that before any meanes of help could be applyed, the King in this flame was burnt to death. Thus was he cured of that extreame paine, and all other diseases he had beside.

Philemon died with extream laughter.

The death likewise of Philemon was in a merry manner, for he seeing an Asse draw neer to a Table, & feed vpon Figs that were serued in a dish for himselfe & others, fell into such an extream laughter, that his life ended in his laughing. Wee see then what slender assurance there is of Life, when a man may loose it in a laughter. It is also recorded, that Phylistion the Commicall Poet, dyed laughing. And many man haue dyed with excesse of ioy, among which number was Dyonisius the Tyrant, Sicilie, Diagoras, and the Romaine Lady, seeing her Sonne returne from the battaile, where she heard he was slaine. The accident also happening to Cratis the Goat-heard, was very strange; for he sleeping vnder a Hill side among his Goates, an Hee-Goat killed him, in iealousie of his She-Goat, wherewith this Cratis had diuers times peruerted the course of Nature. This is faithfully affirmed by Ludouicus Cælius, and Volateranus, who do alleage for their authority, diuers good Greek Authors.

Phylistion died laughing.

Dyonisius the Tyrant, Diagoras, and a Roman Lady, dyed with excesse of ioy.

Cratis the Goat-heard kild by a He-Goat.

I forbeare to speake of diuers other kindes of Death, as that of Pope Boniface, who died in Prison with extreamity of hunger; that also of Richard the second, King of England: or that of the Arch-Byshoppe of Magunce, who was kild and eaten vp by an huge multitude of Rats: or that of Decius the Emp. of whō Æmilius Victor writeth, that being very victorious, yet he was found dead, drowned in a Lake. In which manner diuers haue dyed in our time; as Lewes King of Hungarie, and Sforza the Father of that worthy Captain Frances Sforza, who drowned himselfe to saue one of his Pages. Andrew the King of Prouence dyed by the hand of a Woman, who (being assisted by other Women) hung and strangled him. The Emperour Tiberius was likewise poysoned by his Wife Agripina. And therefore Emperours, Kings, Princes, and great Lords, haue beene euen as subiect to vnfortunate and vntimely deaths, as the verie poorest or most wretched person, albeit (in vaine) they sometime purposed to preuent such inconueniences.

Diuers that haue died many strange deaths.

CHAP. XXVII.

How many Popes of Rome there hath beene since Saint Peter; And wherefore the Names of the Popes are still changed: As also, by what authority they haue beene vsually elected.

ONE of the most excellent Histories, and deserueth among Men to be remembred, is the liues of the cheefe Byshops or Popes of Rome, who if Saint Peter were the first (because there hath beene much doubt and question about it) are tearmed his successors, and Vicars of Christ. I meane all them that haue beene Byshoppes of Rome, in successiue order from the first, who in regard of our purposed discourse, we will admit to be S. Peter, and so proceede by the obseruation of some Authors. And first we are to consider, that sometimes these chiefe Byshops haue beene absent from that Cities seat, yet Rome ceased not to bee the principall Seat, though the Byshop were absent, as belonging to the deputation of Saint Peter. But returning to our intent; there hath been in Rome two hundred and one and twenty Byshops and Popes, as I haue gathered from the beginning, to Iulius the third of that Name, who was then Pope, when I made this collection, among whom haue beene most excellent and learned Doctors.

Many haue doubted whether Peter was Byshop of Rome, or no.

Two hundred twenty & one who haue bin Popes to Iulius the third.

But me thinkes it is a matter of some maruaile, and needes must haue some Mystery

Myſtery in it, that not any one of them in ſo long a time of ſucceſſion, attained to ſuch length of time as S. Peter did: for it pleaſed God, that as he exceeded al other in ſanctity, ſo held he poſſeſſion of this dignity much longer then any other, for he liued twenty fiue yeares after the death of Chriſt. The firſt ſeauen he remained at Antioche, and the following eighteene at Rome (as it is ſaid) where he confirmed his Seat. And I haue read, by the opinion of ſome, that not any one of his ſucceſſors after to enſue, ſhould enioy ſuch length of time, as hee then did. There is alſo another thing, whereof I haue made obſeruation in the liues of the Popes; which is, that from the beginning, to this very day, there is not any one found, that (in the change of his name) hath bin called Peter, or that his name was ſo before the change: whereby (ſay ſome) that God would permit the Name of Peter to none other, but onely to him on whom he founded his Church.

S. Peter liued twenty fiue yeares after the death of Chriſt.

No Peter but the firſt amóg all the Popes.

But I know not (ſaith a very learned Writer) from what Authours this laſt opinion may be deriued, becauſe I can produce ſeauen (at the leaſt) whoſe Names before the changing, were Peter. And theſe were they. Innocentius the fift; Iohn the two and twentith; Celeſtine the fift; Gregory the eleauenth; Boniface the ninth; Clement the ſixt; and Alexander the fift, without adding hereto one Anti-Pope.

Claud. Vſſel. in 19. Lib. de Pont. Chap. 12.

Now, it is good to vnderſtand whence proceeded this mutation of their names, and vpon what occaſion. Let me tell you then, that Pope Gregory the fourth being dead, in the year eight hundred forty two; the next election of Byſhop and Pope of Rome, was made of a worthy Romain, of Noble blood, honorable diſcent, & very gratious behauior, whoſe name was Hogs-face, or Swines-face, chuſe ye whether. Now, in regard that this name ſeemed very harſh, rude, and vnfitting a place of ſuch Dignity, they remembring withall, that our Sauiour had changed S. Peters name: they would now alſo begin that order, and changing his name, called him Sergius, according to the Name of his Father. And from hence came the cuſtome, which is yet obſerued to this day, that hee who is elected Pope, may make choiſe of what name he wil, or fancieth beſt: But albeit hee altereth thus his name, yet they hold an eſpeciall order, that he muſt accept the name of ſome one of his Predeceſſors. And Authours to iuſtifie this, are Platina, Matheus Palmierus, Euſebius, and others.

The originall of changing the Popes names, and vpon what reaſon.

The new Pope muſt be named after ſom one of his predeceſſors.

We are moreouer to know, as we find recorded in the beſt Hiſtories, that vntil the time of Conſtantine the great (who gaue ſuch wealth and large priuiledges to the Romain Church, becauſe many of the Byſhoppes had ſuffered the death of Martyrdome) there was no ſuite made for the place, neither were any very deſirous of it; but contrariwiſe, by force or faire meanes, they were conſtrained to vndergo the charge; becauſe in thoſe times they were aduanced to that Dignity, onely by the Prieſts in the Romaine Church. But when the Emperors began to bee Chriſtians, and likewiſe many worthy Cittizens of Rome; the election then was made by them, when the Cleargy had made preſentation of the Man, and the voyce and conſent of the people concurring. Which being done, Meſſengers were diſpatched to Conſtantinople (where the Emperors then made their abyding) to deſire his confirmation of the election, becauſe their choiſe was not abſolute til then. And it appeareth, that this order was obſerued to pleaſe them, or elſe it was their will to haue it ſo: and ſometime it was done by a deputy or ſubſtitute of theirs, who remained for them at Rome, being named Hipparchus, exerciſing (in this caſe) the authority of the Emperour.

The election of Popes by the Clergy & common people, and not abſolute, but by confirmation of the Emperor.

This manner and cuſtome of electing Popes by confirmation of the Emperor, made their eſtabliſhment the more certaine (though ſome ſay they did it as in tyranny, and not by permiſſion of the Church) yet after the death of Benet the firſt, Pelagius the ſecond was next elected, and becauſe (in that time) Rome was beſiedged by the Lombards (of whom thoſe of Lombardy to this day are deſcended) and in regard alſo, that it rained ſo exceſſiuely, as the Floodes, Riuers, and other Waters ſwelled in ſuch ſort, that (as Platina ſaith) infinite people were drowned & periſhed, wherby it was expected to haue proued another deluge; therefore this Pelagius was the firſt that tooke on him the Popedome, without knowledge of the Emperor.

The Lombards beſiedged Rome.

A great and mighry flood in Rome.

Neuer-

Neuertheleſſe, fearing leaſt Mauritius, Emperor then at Conſtantinople, would be offended thereat; he ſent an Ambaſſadour to make his excuſe, and deliuer thoſe reaſons before expreſſed.

Conſtantine, the fourth Emperor of that name, renounced the election of Popes.

Afterward, diuers yeares being paſt, and this order obſerued without diſcontinuance; Bennet the ſecond comming to be elected Pope, the Emperor Conſtantine, fourth of that Name, being aduertiſed of his ſingular Holineſſe and Learning, in regard alſo of his own authority for his Election: hee ſent the Pope a Charter and Letters Pattents, whereby he renounced to himſelfe and his Succeſſours, all cauſes and reaſons before pretended, for confirmation of the Papal Election; but that thence forward, ſo ſoone as the Cleargy and people of Rome had made choiſe of their chiefe Byſhop, he ſhould then bee held as Gods Vicar, without any other confirmation or amplification. This endured for ſome ſmall while, till afterward the Romaine Church happening to be afflicted againe, & her Patrimony much moleſted by the Lombards, who ſwayed mightily in thoſe parts, being then ſuccoured by Charles Martell, in the time of Gregory the third, and by his Son Pepin, in the time of Stephen the ſecond; they were glad to let fall their former priuiledge, becauſe they had found no mean helpe (alwaies) from the Emperours of Conſtantinople.

The tranſlation of the Empire out of the Eaſt into the Weſt, where it hath euer ſince continued.

Finally, Pope Leo, the third of that Name, after much diſcourſe and deliberation about this matter, conſidering what great helpe and ſuccour he had receiued from Charlemaigne K. of France; laboured and procured him to bee named Emperour, and ſo tranſlated the Empires Seat out of the Eaſterne parts, into the Weſt, where it hath ſtill remained to this inſtant. Whereby may eaſily be gathered, whether in regard of especial priuiledge, or vſurpation of Charlemaignes Succeſſors in the Empire, the Popes holde on their confirmation by the Emperours or no; and confirmed & approued their election of the cheefe Byſhops, in acknowledging alwaies the Weſterne Emperours, and hauing recourſe to them in all their affaires and neceſſities. By ſucceſſion of time, and in the yeare eight hundred and ſeuenteen, Paſcall the firſt was elected (by death of Stephen the fourth) and enſtalled, without attending the confirmation of Lewes, Sonne to Charles the great. And yet he was glad to ſend an Ambaſſador to the Em. to make his excuſe, and ſay; that hee was thereto compelled by the people, and could not ſtay for his confirmation. The Emperour Lewes allowed of this excuſe, and yet ſent an expreſſe commaundement, that he would haue all auncient Cuſtomes to be kept and preſerued.

The Emperor would haue no ancient orders and cuſtomes broken

Long time after, and while the abuſes of Men ſtill encreaſed, there were many ſcandals and diſorders happening at theſe elections; for remedy whereof, Pope Nicholas, ſecond of that Name, in the yeare one thouſand ſeauenty nine, procured a publique Counſell, whereby there was made a Decretall, which beginneth in Nomine Domini, in the three and twentith diſtinction, and thereby it was giuen in full authority, to Biſhops, Prieſts, and Cardinals, to make this election. According to which order, the Election hath in that kinde continued, without any requeſt of the Imperiall confirmation, but in the abſolute power & priuiledge of the Church, becauſe by Emperours and Kinges, it hath not (ſince then) beene called in queſtion.

¶ The cauſe of thoſe daies which are called Dies Caniculares, or Dogge-daies; And wherefore they are ſo called: With many notable examples incident to the ſame purpoſe.

THere are few or none, but (in common conuerſation) they will talke familiarly of the Dogge-dayes, onely by reaſon of the extreamity of heate, which vſually continueth all that time: And yet notwithſtanding, all men doe not know, vppon what occaſion thoſe daies are ſo called. Or let vs admit, that there are very few of any diſcreation, but the reaſon thereof is well enough knowne vnto them; yet may we ſpeake our minde to thoſe few, and ſatisfie them as well as the reſt, accor-

The reaſon of the Dog-daies is ſcarcely knowne to all Men.

according to the iudgement of Aſtrologers, both Ancient and Moderne.

Moſt true it is, that among many other conſtellations and figures, which the auncient Aſtronomers both knew and obſerued, in company of the fixed Starres; there were two eſpecially, and they were tearmed Dogs: one of them the great Dogge; the other, the little, or leſſe; which leſſer hath two Starres, one equalling the firſt in greatneſſe, the other not ſo much by a fourth part, and they are of the Nature of Mercury, and ſomewhat of Mars. This conſtellation of the little or leſſer Dogge, was at the time of Ptolomy, in the ſigne of the Twinnes: and from that time to this inſtant (by reaſon of Motion in the eight Sphere) one of theſe two Starres hath attained to the fift degree; and the other to the nineteenth and a halfe, of the ſigne of Cancer. Of this Conſtellation theſe Authours doe ſpeake; as Pliny, Iulius Firmicus, Manilius, Eginus, and Ptolomy. But becauſe that this is no occaſion at all of our Caniculare or Dog-daies, let vs come to the other, which is called the great Dogge, which is a Celeſtiall Image or Figure, hauing eighteene Starres, and they were placed alſo by Ptolomy (in his time) in the ſigne of the Twinnes; except one onely, by reaſon of the Motion it made by the eight Sphere, from the Weſt to the Eaſt. But at this day, they are all to bee found at the ſigne Cancer, except one or two, that are not (as yet) departed from the ſigne of the Twinnes.

The great Dog and little Dog obſerued by the Aſtronomers.

Plin Lib. 16. Iul. Firm lib. 6. Manil. Lib. 5. Egin. Lib. 2. Ptole. in Almageſt.

Among which Starres, there is one that is ſaide to bee in the throat of the fore-named Dogge, which by the Arabies is called Alſabor, and by the Greekes, Seirios. It is of the cheefeſt greatneſſe, and more cleare and ſplendant then any other of the fixed Starres; which in the time of Ptolomy (as appeareth by his tables) was eighteene degrees and tenne minuts from the Twinnes. Afterward, King Alphonſus, iuſtifying the ſaide Tables, found yet the ſaide Starre to be in the fourth degree, and forty eight minuts of Cancer: and now at this day, we finde it in the eight degree of the ſame ſigne Cancer. Her Latitude is Meridionall (according to ancient obſeruation) ſixteene degrees and ten minuts, and is vnvariable; notwithſtanding, the opinion of Moderne Writers, touching the mooning of trepidation or terror: For although ſhe were not certaine, yet moſt ſure is it, that the mutation of the ſaid Starre is no way notable. Her declination is Meridionall, by fifteene degrees, and fifty minuts. And albeit that the whole Conſtellation of this Celeſtiall Image, hath very great power and influence, yet are we to ſpeake eſpecially but of the very greateſt Star; becauſe all ancient and Moderne Authors, haue made great reckoning thereof, and by her occaſion are the daies called Caniculare.

Of the Starre called the great Dogge, and the obſeruations thereof by our Elders.

She is of ſuch power and efficacy, as during the time that the Sunne and ſhe doth go together from the Eaſt, the vapours and beames of the Sun, do in ſuch ſort heat and chafe themſelues, by the vigor of her property; that ſhee procureth a maruailous alteration & warmth, both on the Earth, Sea, and in all other things, as Pliny and Auicen hath intirely noted. Hippocrates in his Aphoriſmes, did expreſly forbid, that (while the Sun walked in this Conſtellation) no Man ſhould take any Phiſicke, becauſe the time was full of daungerous effectes; which are ſo euident and certaine, as all the World is well acquainted therewith, and ancient Authors haue ſpoken thereof very plentifully. Eſpeciallie Pliny in diuers places, ſaying; That during this time, the Wine is troubled, and becommeth ſtarke naught. In ſome Countries, you ſhall ſee the Sea to caſt vp her Fiſhes, & they to ſwim dead aloft on the Water, the Dogs alſo to run mad about the ſtreetes. In like manner, Columella giueth aduiſe to Shepheards, that while the Dog-dayes doe continue, they ſhould ſuffer their Flockes to feede from morning to mid-day, driuing them continually from the Eaſt towards the Weſt, to the end they ſhould not haue the Sunne vpon their ſhoulders: But after mid-day is paſt, & onward to the Euening, to guide them from the weſt to the Eaſt, becauſe they ſhould neuer haue the Sun on their eies. For he further ſaith, that thoſe daies are very daungerous, and doe cauſe many great inconueniences to happen vnto Men.

bee men of very badde inclination, forward and apt to commit great Euilles; Proud, Cruell, Furious, Daungerous, full of Vaunting, Seditious, and to be suspected; which MANCVS MANLIVS in like maner affirmeth.

Manil. Lib. 5.

Cicero saith also, The Inhabitants of the Isle of Cea or Ceos, * Neighbour to Negropont, doe make Obseruation of this Starre, and iudge thereby the whole course of the yeare, whether the seasons will be healthfull, or subiect to sickenesse. For, if it appeare obscure or Clowdie, they gather thereby, that the Ayre is moyst, thicke, and naught, and the whole yeare to holde the like qualitie. But if it be seene to rise cleare, bright and shining, it then signifieth a pure ayre, Healthfull, and Sweete, and accordingly they do prognosticate wel fare vnto men.

* An Island in the Egeū Sea, wher the Silk wormes were first found.

Cicero in Lib. 2. de diuinat.

These things, are in this manner set downe by Cicero; and yet we know, that such kinde of Iudgements are not sufficient, because one Starre onely sufficeth not, to prognosticate the whole yeares course. True it is, that sometimes these Dogge-Dayes do fal out to be Colde, and the times verie Rainie, which is occasioned by the Suns Coniunction with Saturne, or else by some other Colde Starre, whereof Thomas Aquinas sufficiently speaketh. Besides, Saturne may bee the cause of this times ill disposition, beeing opposite to the Sunne, or in a Quartile Aspect with the Sunne.

Tho. Aquin. in Metaph. Lib. 6.

The Dogge-dayes doe begin, when the Sunne riseth with the Dog-Starre.

Behold the Effects of this Star, and of her Constellation, which doe continue diuers Dayes, and beginneth when as the Sunne mounteth or ariseth with her in the Horizon: These are they, which deserue most especially to be noted and knowne at what time of the yeare they are. Then for our better direction heerein, it is to be vnderstood, that euery Starre is saide to be rising or springing; and likewise, that they doe bestow and order themselues in diuers kinds; some hauing respect to the Horizon, and others to the Sun, who one while keeps aloose farre off from them, and another while approacheth neere vnto them. But we will speake of them onely, that aunswere to our purpose, which (at one time in the yeare) do rise with the Sunne vppon the Horizon, as hath beene well knowne, vnderstoode, & Written by them that haue discoursed thereon, and then is the beginning of the Dogge-dayes.

The beginning of the Dog-Dayes.

Now this moment of birth or Originall, is not common to all places, nor at all times alike, because the mouing or motion (as we haue already said) being according to the succession of the signes, this Starre came forth (heeretofore) in one certaine time of the yeare, and now it happens in another. For the Star being in lesse degree of longitude, euen so as the Sun, it goeth according to the order of the signes, and passeth rather to the point of the Zodiacke, that holdeth euen way with him toward the East. in what place soeuer wee shall consider him: Therefore, in one and the same place, and one selfe-same Horizon, the apparition of this Starre was more forward, and sooner in times past, then now adayes it is: And likewise, by the finitures or limits of sight, shee beginneth to yssue foorth rather in some peculiar places, then in others. Wherefore, the Dogge-Dayes do beginne rather with them that are neerest vnto the Equinoctiall, then with those that are more Northerly, according to the seat of the most oblique Horizons.

The rising of the Dog-Star is not alike in all places, or at all times.

The Dogge-daies doe begin with them neareſt to the Equinoctiall.

Necessarily then it is to bee noted; that although this Starre were in the eight Degree of Cancer, yet would she spring or rise from one Parallell onely, in the same Degree; but (in all the rest) diuersly, more or lesse, according as shee raungeth or keepeth her selfe off from the Equinoctiall, so shall shee be the more slacke and tardie in her appearing; whereof an example may bee hadde, by the Inhabitants of Ciuill, which is at the end of the fourth Climate, in thirty seauen Degrees of Latitude.

The order & obseruance of the Starres.

In those Dayes when as AVICEN Liued, (according as himselfe hath Written and Recorded) beeing about foure hundered yeares agone; the Dogge-Dayes beganne then the fifte day of the Month of Iune: and yet notwithstanding, in those verie times, when the Sunne had made two Degrees, and fiue and twentie Minutes in the Signe of Leo, this Starre yssued from foorth the Horizon, so soone as the Sunne. This haue I equalled, by the Direction of Iohn de Mont-royall, Diuersity of the dog-daies beginning, by diuersitie of places.

a great Aſtrologer and Mathematician, and it is to be ſeene and knowne by the Aſtrolobe. But, if wee ſpeake of the ordinary time, which is the ſeauenteenth day of Iuly, then truly doe the Dogge-dayes begin in our City of Ciuill: ſo that it is an error to ſay, that they commonly begin the fift or tenth day of Iuly, although it might be true in ſome precedent times; and in like maner it may be beleeued, that for certaine dayes, ſome of the effects declared themſelus to the world, before the Sunne was perfectly eleuated in the Horizon, with the Starre.

To ſuch as are far from the Equinoctiall, the Dog Star is long before it riſeth

To ſuch as dwel in places far off from the Equinoctiall line, and are neere neighbors to the North; the Dog-Dayes do begin much later, becauſe the Sunne muſt bee riſen in more degrees of the ſigne Leo, and therefore more dayes of Iuly muſt be paſt. Alſo in the Paralell of 41. degrees, whether it bee Rome, Tolledo, and other places; this Starre, riſeth with the Sunne, when he commeth to the ſixt degree of Leo, which will bee the 21. day of Iuly, and then beginneth the Dog-daies with them. And to them that are vnder the 47, 48. or 49. Degree; as are Paris, Strasbourg, and Vienna, with other Cities; this Star ariſeth in the Horizon with the Sun, euen then when he enters into the 12, 11, and 10. Degree of Leo, which ſhall be the 24. or 25. day of Iuly. Hence may it bee concluded, that the Dogge-dayes doe not begin alike in all places; or euery yeare, at one certeine or ſelfe-ſame time of the yeare.

An eſpeciall direction for the beginning of the Dogge-dayes.

It is an errour then to ſay, that they haue their beginning vniuerſally, or in all places, the tenth day of Iuly. For, ſuch as are vnder the ſeauenteenth Degree declining, haue thence that verie day to beginne with them. And they which are vnder the twentie nine and thirtith degrees, haue them the ſeauenteenth day of the ſaide Month; becauſe (as we haue ſaid before) this Diuerſitie proceedeth from the different eleuation, in diuers Horizons or Limits of the eye. For which cauſe, thoſe men that read Poets and Hiſtorians, are to be aduertiſed, that when they finde in diuers Authors, diuers Births or Originalles of this Starre, and as diuers beginnings of theſe Canicular dayes, they muſt duely conſider, at what time, and in what Climat the Authors liued that Wrote thoſe thinges, to the end, they may bee confronted with truth; for otherwiſe, he may aſſure himſelfe, that they do expreſly contradict themſelues.

How long the Dogge-dayes haue their continuance.

The length of time or continuance of theſe Dog-dayes, which is all the while the Sun tarrieth his paſſage in this conſtellation (according to the opinion of Phyſitians) is forty dayes, wherof ſome are much more dangerons then the reſt, according to the Aſpects that be in this Starre, and the Sunne, with the other Planets; becauſe that if thoſe Aſpectes be good, the good Plannets doe partly temperate and correct his Malice, but the badde doe worke the quite contrarie.

And now it appeares to mee, that in this matter, concerning the Canicular Starre, or Dogge-Dayes, we haue ſaide ſufficient, and giuen taſt enough thereof. Now, albeit there might be much more ſaide and knowne; yet in regarde that it is not fitting to euery mans Apprehenſion, I will reſt ſilent, and paſſe on in this Argument no further. Many others, haue Learnedly and ſufficiently Written, of the Power and Effectes of this Starre: as Plinie, Ptolomy, and almoſt the whole Schoole of Poets. Perſeus calleth it the Madde Dogge, and ſayth; That it burneth vp all Seedes. Ouid, Virgill, Macrobius, Iulius Firmicus, Marcus Manlius, with diuers other excellent Authours beſide (aſwell Auncient as Moderne) whom heere I will not ſpend time to name, they haue at large ſet downe their Opinions of this Starre; & ſuch as are further inquiſitiue in this caſe, may there be fully and amply ſatiſfied by them.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of the Admyrable Art (in Man) of Swimming: The Originall of the Fable of the Fiſh Colas, with ſome incident Hiſtories beſide.

MAny men of good and ſounde iudgement do ſay, that matters of meruaile or rarity ought not to be Written, becauſe doubt of their truth or credit, dooth moſt commonly attend on them. Neuertheleſſe, when for ſuch things as are alledged, the Teſtimony of vnreproueable Authority is auouched; a man may remain the more aſſured of them. I can well remember, that in the dayes of my Child-hoode, I heard old people oftentimes talke of a Fiſh named Colas, that had the true Figure and proportion of a man, and vſed to ſwim dayly in the Sea. Of this Fiſh, many fabulous deuiſes haue bin reported, and my ſelfe neuer caried any other opinion of them: vntill by the reading of many Books, I found as many things written in them, and as full of admiration; ſo that, if I had receiued them frō men of ſlender worth or reſpect, I ſhold haue reputed them for vaine and ydle lyes.

Matters of nouelty, doe carry ſuſpition of certainty.

The Fiſh Colas carried the true ſhape & proportion of a man in all parts.

Concerning thoſe aged peoples Reports, which the cōmon vulgar held to be fabulous, I made ſome pauſe of raſh Cenſure, after I had read two excellent men, of no leſſe Authority then Learning: The one of them, being Pontanus, a great Humaniſt, Oratour, and Poet; the other, is Alexander of Alexandria, a Doctor of the Ciuill Lawes, a man of Deepe Experience and Learning, ſpeaking of them in his Booke named Genial Dayes.

Pontanus lib. 2. Alex. de Alexand. in lib. Diet. Genial.

Both theſe Worthy men do write, that in their time, there liued in Catania a Towne of Sicilie, a man, whom euery one tearmed to bee the Fiſh Colas, that from his Infancie was wholly enclined to Bath himſelfe in the Sea, and it was his onely chiefeſt Delight or pleaſure, either in the Night time, or in the Day. This grew in him (by litle and litle) to ſuch a Cuſtome; and afterward to ſuch an extreamity; that if a day had paſt him without ſpending the moſt part thereof in the Water, he would ſay; that he endured ſuch a paſſion and ſickneſſe of ſtomacke, as made him doubtfull of immediate death.

Vſe & cuſtom begets an habit of courage and boldneſſe

Continuing in this exerciſe, and hee attaining to the yeares of manly diſpoſition, his ſtrength and dexteritie was ſuch in the Water; that although the Seas were very violent and Tempeſtuous, yet hee would Croſſe-ſwim them, without any feare or perill. And theſe two Authours ſay, that (at a certaine time) he was forcibly compeld to Swim aboue fiue hundred Stades, without finding Land, or any where to reſt himſelf, which Stades do amount to aboue ſixeteene or ſeauenteene Leagues. And ſometimes hee would Swim in the Sea (as a Fiſh) two or three dayes togither, wandering into diuers Coaſtes of the Neighbouring Countreyes, & was met by many paſſengers, to whom he wold cry and call in their Shippes. Diuers times they would take him vp vnto thē, and after they had queſtioned him concerning his voyage, they woulde giue him both meat and drinke.

A matter almoſt incredible, but that good Authors do auouch it for truth.

Thus would he (for ſome ſmal time) abide with them in ſportful recreation, but when he ſaw his opportunity, then would he ſuddenly leape into the Sea againe, to returne whence he came; and by this meanes, oftentimes hee carried tydings to ſundry neere Townes & Villages, of them that he had met at Sea.

Thus liued this man for a long time in good and healthfull Diſpoſition; vntill at length, at a great Feaſt and Solemnitie, which King Alphonſus of Naples made at * Meſſana (a moſt Famous Port in the Sicilian Sea) onely to approue the Swimming of this Man, and others, that made vaunt of their skill & dexterity in this Art. There he commaunded a Cup of Golde (of very great woorth and value) to bee caſt into the Sea, and it was giuen as a reward to him that could ſooneſt finde it, purpoſing to throw in other things of worth beſide, after the triall of the Cup ſhould firſt be made.

*A City in Sicilie, neere to the Promontory Pelorus.

In this Aſſembly, there were manie excellent Swimmers, that made no doubt of their cunning and ſufficiencie, and amongeſt them alſo was this Colas, who (with the reſt) lept into the depth of the Sea, at the place where the Cup was caſt in; but afterward hee was neuer ſeene againe, nor any tydings what was become of him. Some thoght, that hee fell into ſome Gulphe or deepe pit, which might bee in the bottome of the Sea, and his diſaſter was ſuch, that not being able to aſcend out of it, there hee died. This Hiſtory being deliuered by two ſuch approued men, gaue me occaſion to conceiue, that this might be the ſame thing which aged people had ſpoken of, concerning the Fiſh Colas.

A triall of ſwimming, before Alphonſus King of Naples.

Another History alledged by the same Author.

The same Alexander, in the very same Chapter saith; That hee knew another Man, who was a poore Mariner, and had (almost) no other kinde of liuing, but onely by Fishing. This man (as he saith) was so expert a Swimmer, that in one day hee went and returned from an Iland, which is face to face with Naples, named Ænaria, so farre as Prochyta, which is vp in the firme Land neere to * Putcoli; and there is betweene the one and the other Citty, the distance of fifty Stades. One day also it hapned, that as he threw himselfe into the Sea, to make the like Voyage, there were other men in a Boate to passe the same place also; but it was no way possible for them (albeit they had men that vowed very speedily) to ouertake the man in his Swimming.

Puteoli is a City by the Sea-side, in Campania, distant from Naples, eight mile

Such things are truely marualous, and our Astrologians say; that it proceedeth from the influence of the Stars, that gouerne in the birth of these men. And that such as haue then the signe of Pisces in the ascendent, shall be wonderous strong and excellent Swimmers. Our Naturall Philosophers doe maintaine, that a man hauing his Armes very small, shall be apt and agile to Swimming. The ability of diuing vnder water, is verie admirable in some Men of the West-Indies, whence our choyfest Pearles do come; for it is said, that they sinke downe into the bottome of the Sea and do tarry there so long a time, as it seemeth to bee a thing altogether impossible. Our Elders tearmed these people Vrinators, but now they are called Guzans.

Astrologers opinion concerning such as swim.

Swimmers, called Vrinators in olde time, but now Guzans.

All the Historians do report meruailous matters, of a man named Delio, so that it grew to be a common Prouerb, to say, the Swimmer Delio. And albeit (in very truth) it is no Vertue to Swim, neither is a man bound to Learne it, yet the knowledge thereof is noway hurtfull. For the ancient Romaines, according as Vegetius declareth, admonished their yong youths, not as yet invred to the Warres, that they should endeuour to Swim, and them they vsed to call Tirones. They had also a certaine Custome in Rome, that the yong Children should practise Swimming, in a place beside the Riuer of Tyber, neere to the fielde called Campo Martio, and there they made it a daily exercise, as iudging Swimming to be a lawfull pastime, and necessarie for such occurrences as might happen in war, as well for the passage of Lakes & Riuers, as also to withstand harde fortunes on the Sea.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Men liuing in the Sea, called Mare-men or Seamen, and women of like Nature, tearmed Mare-maids or Sea-women, and of some other notable things.

IT is a matter of no meane maruell, and it draweth a man into hie contemplation of Gods hanoyworks, to behold the great diuersity of fishes in the Sea; as also, the Beastes and Creatures liuing on the earth; whereof Pliny, Albertus Magnus, Aristotle, and many other natural Phylosophers, haue liberally discourst. Full well I know, that man composed of reason & vnderstanding, is no wher to be found but on earth, and that men were not ordained to liue in the water. Neuertheles, I haue diuers times read, that there are fishes in the Sea, which beareth the liuely shape of a man; among which, there is both male and female: The Female hath the perfect resemblance of a woman; and as they are called Nereides, so are the males named Tritons. Of whom, I will not recite diuers thinges, which a number of light-headed men, and of slender authority haue reported, in whose Books may be read very strange & variable matters. And yet notwithstanding I may lawfully set downe those things which I haue obserued and collected from writers of sound iudgement; men of grauitie, and deseruing credit. Among whom, Plinie saith, that in the time of the Emperour Tiberius, the Inhabitants of Lisbone, a Citty of Portugall, (famous then, and yet continuing so to this day) sent Ambassadours to the Emperour, to certifie him, that they had seene one of these Tritons, or Marine men, oftentimes to withdraw and hide himselfe in a Caue neer to the Sea, and that there he vsed

And Pliny ſaith moreouer, that Octauianus Auguſtus was certified, that on the Coaſt of France, many Nereides or Sea-women hath bin ſeene, who afterward were found dead vppon the Sea-ſhore. The like tydings alſo was ſent to Nero, that among many Fiſhes of the ſea (caſt vpon the ſandes) diuers Nereides were found, and other kindes of Creatures Marine, like vnto Beaſtes liuing on the Earth; The ſame, and much more is confirmed by Elianus, in his Booke of Beaſts.

Other and beſide, thoſe of Antiquitie who haue written of theſe things, & diuers others in like nature. Our Modern Authors alſo haue ſpokē as meruailouſly; as (among others) Theodorus Gaza, a man very learned in ſundry Sciences, & who was liuing in our Fathers Dayes. His writings are iuſtified by many, and eſpecially by Alexander of Alexandria, who ſaith, that the ſaid Theodorus being in Greece on the Sea-ſhore, after a huge ſtormy tempeſt that then happened, he beheld abundance of Fiſhes caſt vppon the ſands, among which was a Neriade, or Fiſh, hauing a face perfectly human, and like vnto a very beautifull Woman down to the Girdle, but all the reſt was formed of Fiſh, writhing vp the tail like vnto an Eele, euen after the ſame manner, as wee haue ſeene a figure painted, called a Syrene of the Sea; ſo this Neriad being vpon the ſands, by her outwarde geſture and behauiour, appeared to bee in great paine and anguiſh. Alexander further ſaith, that this Theodorus Gaza, tooke the ſaid Neriade, and (by the beſt meanes he could deuiſe) put it into the water, wherein ſhee was no ſooner entred, but ſhe beganne to ſwim very delicately, and vaniſhed on a ſudden out of his ſight.

Theodorus Gaza, a Famous Writer, ſaw a Neriade caſt vpon the Sea-ſhore in Greece

A Neriade taken, and being put into the water preſently it vaniſhed away.

Georgius Trabezonzius, a man of no leſſe learning and authority, affirmeth alſo, that paſſing along the Sea ſide, he ſaw a Fiſh riſe vp in the water, & al that could be diſcerned vnto the middle, ſeemed to bee a very beautifull Woman, whereat hee was no leſſe amazed then terrified, becauſe ſhe would hide and diſcouer her ſelfe, according as ſhe perceiued her ſelfe not to be noted; but beholding too many eies to gaze on her, ſhee ſunk into the water, & was neuer ſeen after. All theſe things are maruailous, & yet notwithſtanding, who will not giue credit to ſuch worthy men, being fortified with that which I can yet further ſay?

Georgius Trabezonzius concerning another Neriade.

Alexander of Alexandria declareth, that in his time he was aduertiſed by credible aſſurance, that in Epirus, (now named Romania) there was a Riuer neere vnto the Sea, where children often vſed to fetch Water thence. In ſhort while after, a Triton reſorted thither, and would hide himſelfe in a Caue neer adioyning, watching till he could ſee ſome maiden come alone: whereof ſpeeding at laſt, he would ſeize and carry her along with him into the Sea, and thus he did to diuers young Maidens. The Inhabitants being heereof aduertiſed, beleagred the place in ſuch ſort with ſpies, that he was taken and broght before a Iuſtice there dwelling, where he was found in all his Members like vnto a man. For which cauſe, they put him vnder ſafe cuſtodie, giuing him ſuſtenance to preſerue life withall; but he would feede on nothing that was giuen vnto him, and therefore pined away with hunger to death, by beeing too many dayes in an Element ſtrange vnto him, and wholly contrarie to his Nature. This Hiſtory, is in the ſame manner deliuered by Petrus Gellius a Moderne Authour, in his Bookes of Beaſts: where moreouer he ſaith, That being at Marſeilles, he heard reported by an aged Fiſher (a man of good repute) that his Father had affirmed for truth to him, that he had ſeen a Sea-man or Tryton, like vnto ſuch as we haue ſpoken of, who was preſented to King Rene. We may well then ſay, that a matter ſo approued, and by ſuch Learned Authors knowne to the world for men of ſound truth, ought not to be held as a Fable, but for an infallible certaintie.

CHAP. I.

What manner of Speech was vſed at the beginning of the world: And how the Diuiſion of Languages began at the firſt.

WHen the firſt age of the world began (both before the Floud, & for ſome long while after) men generally vſed one kind of language: for there was (as then) no diuerſitie of ſpeech, neither was there any man, but hee eaſily vnderſtoode when another ſpake to him. The firſt diuerſity & confuſion of Tongues, which hath done ſo much dammage, cauſed ſo many miſchiefes, and yet is the continuall Nurſe of them to this day (through the ſinnes of men) was ſent them by God. Moyſes recordeth in the Holy Hiſtory of Geneſis, that the Malice and Preſumption of men encreaſing, Nemrod (Nephew to Noah by the diſcent of Caine) was ſoone after borne, and manie others beſide, of as audacious a Nature. Theſe Men concluded among themſelues, to make a Tower, the top whereof might reach vp to Heauen; and this they did, in remembrance of the deluge, becauſe they had heard it reported, that GOD had ſent ſuch a Flood vpon the earth, and therefore they would thus reſiſt againſt God, if the like invndation ſhould happen againe. Ioſephus ſpeaketh thereof, in the firſt Booke of his Antiquities, and ſaith; That ſo many men aſsiſted Nemrod in the erection of this mighty building, that the work grew incredible for height & ſtate. Ioſephus moreouer writeth, that they made the foundation thereof ſo large and deep, that althogh it was of wonderfull height (according as Holy Writ maketh mention) yet it appeared to be more broad then high.

But God being willing to Correct this audacious enterprize (albeit not with punniſhment anſwereable to the pride) gaue inſtantly ſo many manner of ſpeaches amongeſt them, and ſuch a myraculous Confuſion of Languages, that they who at firſt vnderſtoode one onely tongue, were diuided now into ſeauenty two: by means whereof, ſuch variance grew among them, that thorough defect of vnderſtanding one another, not only the worke remained vnperfect, but euery man departed with them he beſt vnderſtood, and ſo inhabited diuers Countries: and for this cauſe the Tower was named BABELL, that is to ſay, Confuſion. Iſidore ſaieth, that it was in height, fiue thouſand, one hundred, ſixty foure paces, all made with ſtone of Bricke, bound and knit faſt with Clay, inſted of Morter; of which clay, there was very great ſtore found in diuers parts of the Country.

In the ſame place where that Tower was built, according to the ſaid Iſidore, Ioſephus, S. Auguſtine, and Oroſius, was likewiſe builded that moſt famous Citty, whereof ſo many great matters are are remembred, called Babylon, vppon the Riuer of Euphrates, whereof the round Neighbouring Lands and Countries tooke their Names; as Chaldea and Mesopotamia. The Sacred Scripture also maketh mention, & is of the same consent with them, that the beginning of Nemrods raigning was in Babylon: wherfore, by opinion of the same Authors, it must needs be graunted, that Nemrod builded that renowned Citty of Babylon, which afterwardes was walled and more ennobled by Semiramis and Ninus.

Gen. 10, 10.

Nemrod built the Citty of Babylon.

Now to returne to our former intent, concerning tongues and Languages, the question is well worthy disputation, to wit; what Language it was that men did then speake, before the Confusion and Diuision of Toongues. Saint Augustine moueth the argument, and plainly determineth; that the first Language or Speech was Hebrue, and the same that the Iewes do yet speak to this day. Which, according as may be gathered from the Bible, and likewise as Saint Augustine iudgeth, was preserued in Heber; of whom, both Abraham and the Hebrewes discended, because neither he, or any one of his Lignage, are found to haue giuen any helpe in the building of that Tower. In regard wherof, both hee and his discent, that neuer consorted to such a sinne, had no feeling of the punnishment. And therefore, it may be very well presumed, that in Heber, and in his family, it remained still sound and entire, euen the auncient and first Tongue, not any way corrupted or confused, but only in that house it continued firme, being vtterly lost in al the other; and hence it commeth, that of Heber, the Language hath euer since bin called Hebrue.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei. lib. 5. cap. 2.

Not any of Abrahams race, were at the building of Babell.

The Originall of the Hebrue Tongue.

Many Hebrues (his Successours) haue affirmed, that this Language is the very same that Adam spake, and al those men of the first Age, conserued in Heber: and his Successors Abraham and Iacob, & the very same also wherein Moyses Wrote. Such is the opinion of S. Augustine and Isidore, that it may be rather credited in this kinde, then their coniecture, that hold the Chaldean to be the first tongue. And yet in some measure they may bee excused, because those two Tongues haue a very neere Neighbouring vnity, as also a great conformity in their Letters and Charracters, and in great store of other matters. Besides, in this case it hath bin questioned, and partly concluded, that if two Children or more in number, being borne and nourished in some obscure place, where company may bee no hinderance, or any other voice heard; some are of the mind, that their first Language would bee Hebrue; and others think, the Chaldean Toong.

Adam spake Hebrue.

Of the Chaldean Tongue, somewhat agreeing with the Hebrue.

But if we may beleeue Herodotus, a very famous and worthy Historian, he tels vs, that experience was made in this case, by reason of a contention happening betweene the Ægiptians and the Phrygians, each man pretending a primacie of Antiquity, and a soueraigntie in Language aboue al others; as also for the first inhabiting of Citties. To stay the head-strong course of this diffrence, it was thus concluded betweene them; that two Children (of either Nation) should be nursed in such manner, as we haue before declared: & in such a place, where not any kind of speech might be heard, but that which they naturally began to speake, and it should bee confirmed, to be the first and chiefest: as also, the people (speaking the same) to be of oldest Antiquity. He addeth moreouer, that a King of Egypt, caused too infants to be nourished in a Desert, where no man could be heard to speak in any maner whatsoeuer: And when the Children had attained to foure years of age, he commanded them to be brought before him, & they vttered in his presence many times, the word Ber, which signifieth Bread in the Phrygian Language, & therefore the Phrygians (of all men) wer said to be most Ancient. Thus writeth Herodotus, and many other Authours, both Wise and Iudicious, do giue him their approbation, and (in such Differences) do chiefly alledge him.

The Phrygians held to be most ancient.

Neuertheless, were it, that we shold allow this his opinion for trueth, yet it may (by some others) be answered, that perhaps these Children heard and vnderstood the voyce of some Beast, Bird, or other Creature liuing in the Fields, that did bellow, bray, or shape the same word in his voyce, and so in that kind it might be learned. But for my selfe, I am of the minde, that were there two children now brought vp in this manner, I thinke thinke they would speake the first Language of the Worlde, and that is the Hebrue. And I dare as boldly maintain, that they woulde shape to themselues, some nouell strange speech, deliuering new and vnheard of Names, Accents, & Attributes, as Children (of themselues Naturally) are enclined to do, and will bestow names least knowne, on thinges that by them are most desired. Whereby we may gather, that Nature woulde instruct them in some new kind of Language, before they could attaine to that of their Fore-fathers. Experience (in this case) may cleare vs from all doubt, and serue (as a true Schoole-maister) to them that are most curious in questioning, if their Wisedome would striue to reach beyonde the best receiued apprehensions. And yet (in meane while) I will not be so preiudicat, but leaue euery man to be gouerned by his own censure; Prouided, that it stretch not to wrong the Learned, who haue labored heerein for their best information; and will further satisfie them, if they be capable of their writings.

The Authours opinion concerning the first Speech of Children.

CHAP. II.

Of the Deuision of the Worlds Ages, & what notable matters haue happened in them. Also of the beginning of Kingdomes and Common-weales.

ALbeit that many men haue taken no meane delight in talking of the ages of the world, and what occasions haue hapned in one, with as straunge occurances following in another: yet are there a great number, that know not how the Diuision of these Ages came at the first, nor what yeares is required to each Ages accomplishment. Let me then tell ye, that the Age or lifetime of the world, from the first Originall vntill this instant, is diuided (by the greater part of Authors) into sixe parts or Ages. Neuertheless, there are diuers that number them into seauen, which diuision is made according to the Hebrues. But for my direction in this enterprize, I purpose to bee guided by Eusebius, with the common receiued iudgement of all Historians, that haue set downe their rest on the number of six. Concerning the Diuision of these Ages, there is great difference and confusion found among thē, so that very hardly can a certainty bee resolued on. For it principally apeareth, that those authors are diuided into two seuerall factions: One side following the computation of the Septuagint, or seauenty two Interpreters, that traduced the Old Testament out of the Hebrew Tongue into the Greeke; the others do imitate the Hebrues, and the common Text of the Bible, all which opinions, I will seuerally declare.

The world diuided into six Ages by som, and into seauen by others

Variety and difference found among the Authors.

The first Age of the world

The first Age of the World, is reckoned (by the common account) from the first Creation therof, to the vniuersal Deluge and drowning of it. And this was tearmed the Worlds Child-hood or Infancy, which Age lasted for a long continuance. Wherefore, it may well be credited, that during this time, there hapned many notable accidents among men, although there be no History, nor any recorded memory made of them: Only the Holy Scripture saith; That after God had created Adam and Eue, and (before them) all other creatures, which he gaue in subiection to man, with absolute rule and soueraignty, both ouer the Beastes on Land, and Fishes in the Sea.

Adam did then beget two Sons, who were Caine and Abell, that likewise begat diuers others Children, from whom ensued a mighty people. Moyses afterward Writeth, that Caine builded in the East, a Citty, which he called Henoch, after a Sonne of his that was so named. In that time, Lamech was the first twice-married man, and that durst aduenture vpon two Wiues: By one of them, he had a Son named Tuball, or Tubal-Kaine, that inuented the Art of Musick, as also the sound of Vialles and Organes. Caine deuised the skill to worke in Iron, & to engraue thereon.

The build ng of the first City in the world, and the name thereof

The first Bigamus, was Lameth.

While this Age continued, there wer many Gyants, of whom many Authors haue written, and say; that they were of wonderful stature and strength sterne, rude, and robust, far exceeding humaine ability. Finally, for the sinnes of men, came the generall flood vppon the earth, whereby all mankinde was drowned, except Noah, and such as wer preserued with him in the Arke. This Age endured, according to the opinion of the Hebrues, one thousand, six hundered, fifty six yeares; whereunto agreeth Philo the Iew, Beda, S. Ierom, & the common Text of the Bible. But according to the seauenty two Interpreters, Eusebius, and other Historians, it lasted two thousand, two hundred, forty and two yeares. Saint Augustine saith, two thousand, two hundred, seauenty two years: and Alphonsus King of Spaine saieth, two thousand, eight hundered, eightie two yeares.

Contrariety in opinion, about the length of time in the first age

The second Age beganne in Noah, after that hee was come foorth of the Arke, and continued vnto the byrth of Abraham, consisting in length of time, according to the Interpreters, Eusebius, Isidore, and the greater part of Chroniclers, 942. yeares. But the Hebrewes make lesse account, and grant no more then 292. yeares; and of the same opinion is Philo and Iosephus. S. Augustine affirmeth one thousand, seauentie two yeares. There remaineth very litle certainty, concerning such occasions as chanced in this Age, for no perticuler History is found thereof. Only there are some things saide in generall, touching the beginning of Kingdomes & States, and those that were the first inhabiters of Prouinces.

Noah being come forth of the Arke, planted the Vine, and what therby hapned to him, is sufficiently knowne. Hee begat children, the like did his Sonnes, so that the world began againe to bee greatly peopled. Cham the second Son of Noah, begate Cush and Mizraim, of whom are the Æthiopians and Egiptians descended; the Æthiopians of Cush, and the Egiptians of Mizraim: then had hee Canaan, from whom the Canaanites are deriued. His other Sonne Iaphet, begate Gomer and Magog, of whom so many nations descended, as were ouer-tedious heere to recite. In this time was the Tower of Babell builded, and the confusion of Languages then hapned by meanes whereof (as hath in the former Chapter bin declared, and as Iosephus truely hath recorded) men were thence sundered into diuers Isles & Prouinces, wher afterward they made their abiding.

During this Age, Tuball, or Tubalkaine, the Sonne of Iaphet, went to dwel in Spaine, where he erected a kingdom, and began there his raigne. Some also say, that he was indifferently called Suball, or Tuball, the Sonne of Falech, and Nephew of Heber. The raign of the Scithians began in this Age, in the northern or Septentrionall parts; and therefore, they haue alwayes pretended, that their Dominion preceedeth all other in Antiquity, as Trogus Pompeius, and Iustine haue recorded: whereupon, great enmity still grew betweene them and the Ægyptians; and heereabout they hadde continuall controuersie. Then was the Art Magick, & Incantations first found out by Cham, who likewise was called Zoroastres. About the ending of this Age, and a little before the birth of Abraham (according to the iudgement of Eusebius & Beda) the most potent raign of the Assyrians began to exalt it selfe, hauing Belus for their first King, whom some others tearmed to bee Iupiter. It is also Written, that the second Ninus, in whose time Abraham was born, did then conquer many Cities and Prouinces. Moreouer, there was then another kind of gouernment in Egypt, tearmed Dinastia, where the first supreame Ruler was named Vexor, or Vezor (as Eusebius saith) who about the ending of this Age instituted the Kingdome or sway of the *Sicyonians in Peloponesus, now caled Morea, whereof Agesilaus is said to bee the first King. In this time likewise beganne Idolatry and Gentilisme. Behold, what a confused knowledge we haue attained vnto, of this second Age; in the end whereof, the most famous Citty of Niniuy was builded, consisting of admyred greatnesse: for, according to the Scripture, it was three dayes iourney in Circuit about.

Immediately after, the third Age began, euen in the birth of Abraham; and thence it held on to the Prophet Dauid, when, without all contrarietie of Authors, it continued 942. yeares, whereunto Isidore onely addeth two more: & this we may well tearme the Adolescency or youthfull yeares of the worlde, because in this time all things increased, & were greatly augmented. formed her memorable actions. For, faigning her selfe to bee yong Ninus her Sonne, and hauing chaunged hir Womans habit, she raigned so a long time, and conquered many great Landes and Prouinces. She also re-edified, & round engirt the famous Citty of Babylon with wals. In this time did Abraham (by Gods Commandement) make his peregrination, and won the victory which he obtained ouer foure Kinges, in the reseue of Lot, whom they led away as prisoner.

Of Abrahams trauell & victory.

In this time also, the Amazons had their first beginning. And likewise, the Kings that were called Pharaohs, did then flourish in Egypt; and Sodome and Gomorrah were also then destroyed. In Isaacs time began the raigne of the Argiues in Thessaly; and in the dayes of his Sonnes, Iacob and Esau, the Kinges of Ceста began their rule; the first whereof was named Acris. Then in short while after, Ioseph was sold by his Brethren to the Egyptians, in manner as the holy History discourseth; and likewise, how his Father and Brethren (with their children) went into Egypt, where the people of Israell that discended of them, liued foure hundred and thirty yeares, according as Beda writeth, and S. Augustine in his book of the Citty of God.

During this Age, Hercules of Lybia trauelled into Spaine, where he beganne his Gouernment. And after him, were Hyuer, Brigus, Taga, Beto, Gerion, & diuers others. Of their seuerall raignes & Iurisdictions there, Berosus, with sundry other well approued Authours, do make like mention. In this time was the Citty of Siuile first founded; and it is acknowledged in the world, to be one of the most ancient, as likewise is set down by Berosus and others. It was first of all called Hispalis, according to the name of Hispalus, the Sonne, or (as others will haue it) the Nephew of Hercules, who raigned worthily there; and it was hee that caused the first foundation thereof to be laide, and after built it in comely manner. Yet Isidore contrarieth this indgement of Berosus, and saith; That it was entitled Hispalis, because it was erected in a very Marish ground; and that for their safe security in building, they were compelled to driue great beames of Woode, Trees, and Stakes into the ground. But howsoeuer it was, the Citty of Hispalis was afterward called Spain, as wee are credibly certified by Trogus Pompeius, Iustine, & diuers others. True it is, that Iulius Cæsar did terme it Siuile, ennobling it with great enlargement, making it his chiefe Colony and abode for his Romaines, because it was (before that time) very famous and noble.

But returning again to our first purpose, by succession of this time, Moyses was borne; vnder whose guidance, the Hebrues departed out of Egipt: in which dayes also liued Iob the iust. And not long after, the mighty Deluge or ouerflow of Waters happened in Thessaly; whereupon insued the encreasing of diuers Kingdomes in many Landes and Territories: For Æthiops the Sonne of Vulcan, first raigned in Æthiopia, which had bin first called Æsheria, next Atlantia, and lastly, a Kingdom, after Æthiops name. Siculus gouerned in Sicilia, & Foetius in Boetia. So that Kingdomes and Countries receiued their Names by them that were the first commaunding Princes: as Sardinia likewise was so called of Sardus, another Sonne of Hercules. In those dayes the famous Citty of Troy flourished, and Iason made his conquest of the Golden Fleece; & thence ensued the known history of Medea, that famous Witch, Daughter to K. Oeta, by his Wife Hypsea. And now were the Amazons more powerfull in strength, then at any other time before or after; and then began the Kingdom of the Latines in Italy.

Now the third Age fayling, it gaue place to the fourth, entering at the beginning of Dauids raigne, who was second King of the Hebrues. This fourth Age continued, till the transmigration and peregrination of the Iewes into Babylon, containing 484. yeares, (but Beda counteth no more then 474. yeares.) This Age may wel terme it selfe the lusty and sprightly Age of the world; for in this time, infinite occasions hapned, wherewith all Histories are plentifully enriched. holy King Dauid had now their Originall: he conquered the Philistims, reuenged himselfe on the Ammonites for the disgrace done to his Ambassadors, and put to death the Captaine of the Assyrians. Next him, succeeded the raigne of the Wise King Salomon, who builded the rich Temple of Ierusalem; but he dying, his Kingdome was diuided, Ieroboam succeeding in ten Families, and Roboam his Sonne in two. After this, the empire of the Assyrians, which hadde lasted more then 1200. yeares, became vtterly ruinated, by the death of Sardanapalus, who was Lord thereof, & the most potent King in the world; but he being slaine by Arbactus, the Empire then fell vnto the Medes.

In the same Age, the powerful kings of Macedonia began their raigne, and the Grecians counted their yeares by Olimpiades, which were Feasts and sports of actiue variety; and continued (by them) from fiue years to fiue yeares, with prizes and rewards for the best deseruers. Then also was the magnificent City of Carthage builded by Queene Dido; and very soone after Rome, by Romulus and his Brother Remus, where the Romaine Kinges (from this their beginning) alwayes after held on their raigne. The great City of Bizantium, was now builded in like manner, and afterward, was named Constantinople. At this time beganne great Warres and alterations of Kingdomes in many parts of the world, but especially towardes the ending of this Age, according as Historics doe at large discourse. Nabuchodonosor, King of the Medes and Babylon, went against Ierusalem, destroying both it & the Temple likewise; then led he the people of Iudea thence as Prisoners with him, and thereof was it named the transmigration of Babylon.

Whereuppon, began the fift Age of the world, which continued to the Natiuity of Iesus Christ, God and Man, our Sauiour and Redeemer. This fift Age, lasted 589. yeares, by computation and consent of all Writers. During this time, there were many powerful Kings and polliticke Common-weales in the world; whereof to speake, as touching their rare and vnheard of subuersions, their alterations and change of States; the wonderfull leuying and mustering of mighty Armies, would appeare so farre from common beleefe, that silence is more fitting, then an abusiue abridgement; especially, in matters of such weight and importance. Almost at the beginning of this Age, the famous Monarchy of the Persians had hir Original, the raigne whereof was then most powerfull beyond all other, by the means of great Cyrus his victories, who raigned thirty yeares. In which time he vanquished and ouerthrewe the rich King Cræsus of Lydia, but was foiled himself, and put to death by Tomyris, Queene of the Massegetæ or Scythians, who sowsed his head in a barrell of blood.

The Monarchy of the Persians, and victories of Cyrus, who was afterward slaine by Tomyris.

Seauenty yeares of this Age beeing compleated, the Hebrues were deliuered out of their captiuity, and then was the Temple new built againe at Ierusalem, which formerly had bin destroyed. In Europe also, the Romaines expelled their Kings, and gouerned themselues by Consuls; The first whereof, was L. T. Brutus; and next vnto him succeeded Colatinus. In Greece also flourished learning and Chiualry, which caused no lesse famous Phylosophers, then valiant and excellent Captaines. Xerxes came thither with an innumerable Armie, as hoping to conquer it, but hee was constrained to retire with mighty losse, and greater shame. After this, King Phillip began his raigne in Macedon, and he subdued Greece, the Mother of good Artes and armes, who had fostered (with her Milke of Knowledge) in those Dayes, Demosthenes, Themistocles, Epaminondas, Agesilaus, Zeno, Plato, Aristotle, and many such like beside. No sooner was king Phillip dead, but Alexander his Sonne would no longer abide in Greece: He entred into Asia, which he quickly conquered, destroying the Empire of the Persians, and by means of his victory against Darius, hee continued the rest of his life time, sole Monarch, and Emperour of the whole world. But after his death, his Captaines diuided his Dominions among them; which dishonorable deed, raised no meane dissention, with warres and battailes thorow Asia, as also in the greater part of Europe. Now likewise, (beyond measurable limits) began the strength of the Romaines and Carthegenians, each Nation contending, & proudly pretending a right vnto the whole worlds

These two mighty people, not knowing whose number or stomacke was greatest; fought many worthy battailes together, for each of the Cities yeilded Captaines very excellent in armes. Carthage had for hir Defenders, Hasdruball, Hanno, Hannibal, and others; Rome also afforded the Fabij, the Scipios, the Marcelli, the Æmilij, and such like. But in conclusion, after great expence of bloud on both parts, Rome had the victory, & Carthage was sackt and vtterly subuerted, all Affrica becomming Tributary to Rome. This victory thus obtained, made the Romaines, grow proud and enuious also of the Grecians prosperity, seeking al occasions to war with them, as afterward they did, and taking Greece; made it tributary to them likewise. Yet not so satisfied, their greedy Auarice stil increasing; they stroue to gaine a further footing, and passing into Asia, they vanquished Antiochus, and after him, King Mithridates, making themselues Lordes of all the Lesser Asia: as also of Syria, Palestine, and Egipt. And then on this side neerer hand, of Frante, Spaine, England, and of the greater part of Germanie. In which Conquests, the chiefe Commanders, were, Metellus, Silla, Marius, Lucullus, Pompey, Cæsar, with many more of as great spirit.

It came to passe, that these Gallants could not be pleased with their seuerall good fortunes; but enuious Ambition swelling in their breasts, they woulde needs moue ciuill warres, and each of them striue to command the other, but at length the Empire remained to Cæsar onely. Next whom (after many great Fortunes) his Nephew or adopted Son Octauianus succeeded; and hee hauing vanquished all his enemies, enioyed the Empire quietly. So that seating himselfe in peace and amity with all Kinges and Common-weales, he shut vppe the Temple Gates of Ianus his God, which neuer were closed in the time of warres. CHAP. III.

Of the State and Gouernement of the Spartanes, the Common-wealth obſerued among them, their Lawes, & other memorable occaſions.

THE Citty of Sparta, which alſo was named Lacedemon, and now is called Metriza, was deſtroyed in the time when the Grecians flouriſhed; but it was very famous, by manie honourable actions of her moſt excellent Captaines; and yet much more illuſtrious, in hauing Licurgus to be her ruler with his Lawes, which gaue hir long life, and might haue continued for many hundreds of yeares: but after ſhe fell to contemne his Lawes, too ſoone ſhe ſaw hir owne ending. Now, becauſe hir ancient glory appeareth to me, to be a notable State, and worthy much Commendation, I cannot let hir paſſe, withſpeaking ſomwhat of hir.

Licurgus the Law-maker of Sparta.

Conſidering then, that the Citty of Sparta, (aboue all other Citties) was ſufficiently inhabited with men of great ſtrength, and of Name alſo, which only made it Famous in Greece; it appeareth to me a very Myraculous matter, how, and by what meanes it could be ſo compaſſed. But then againe, when I remember the ſtudy of the Spartanes, all meruaile eaſily is reſolued. And yet, I muſt needs admire Licurgus, and repute him to be an eſpeciall Wiſeman, in giuing them ſuch Lawes; and they being obedient to them, did thereby become ſo happy and bleſſed. For they, without taking example therein by any other Citty, but rather being farre contrary in opinion to many of them, did yet ſo carry themſelus, that their country went beyond all the reſt in their felicity.

The happines of the Spartans in obeying Licurgus Lawes.

For the procreation of Children, (becauſe I take this the principall thing firſt to be ſpoken of) and becauſe there are ſome, who with moſt curious food doe foſter thoſe Children, which they deeme fitting for ſuch kind of delicacy: Wine they vtterly forbid them, or cauſe them to vſe it with great allay of water; now what do they elſe heerin, but euen ſet ſo many Artificers (as it were) in a place of quietneſſe, where no kinde of ſtirring is to be heard; and the women likewiſe to bee in their repoſe, ſetting onely the Virgins (in meane while) to ſpin their wooll for wearing. But who can any way hope, that this is the way to be borne great, and of women educated in this manner. Therefore Licurgus was of another iudgement, in that a better building was in this caſe required, and that it was the work of ſeruants and not Children, to ſit and make Garments. And therefore perceiuing, that the generating of Children was an important matter, and with free-women, that were of as free diſpoſition; he eſpecially ordained, that the woman ſhould exerciſe hir Body no otherwiſe then the man. According to this rule, the ſport of running, and actiue vſe of ſtrength, was allowed (among them) to be as free for women as men. Becauſe he held it a principall maxime in his iudgment, that Children being bred and born of chearfull diſpoſed Parents, would themſelues containe the like ſprightly nature, and their iſſue alſo be of the ſame true temper. Whereupon, when conuenient time came, for women to take knowledge of men, it was duly conſidered, that they who were of ſuch temperate capacity in conuerſing with their wiues; in this caſe would haue a quite contrary opinion to the other. Therefore, he ordained, that when the Husband went to viſit his wife, & when he likewiſe departed from hir, it ſhould be done with ſuch diſcretion, as it might not be diſcerned of any other; in which reſpect, it was ſo thought fit, both for the procuring of moſt ſweet delight, and greater deſire of pleaſure in the ſtate of Matrimony. It was withall conſidered, that they of the ſtrongeſt Complexion, might ſomtime fall into infirmity, and therfore it required the leſſe continuance togither, till both the one and the other were in better condition.

women alowed as free exerciſes as men

In what manner men and their Wiues, ſhould meete together.

Of the procreation of Children.

Moreouer, he made a Law, that no man at his owne wil ſhould marry with a woman, neither that any marriages ſhould be made, til the parties had attained to ful ripenes of yeares, becauſe hee conceiued, that it wold be the beſt help, both both to fecundity and ſtrength. Now, if it hapned, that any old man ſhould haue a yong wife; Licurgus did fore-ſee, that men of thoſe yeares would bee hard to their wiues, and ſuſpitious of them alſo: wherefore he ordained the contrary in this caſe, and inſtituted, that any woman of aged yeares being diſpoſed to mary, ſhold make choiſe of ſuch a man, whoſe minde and body might beſt bee pleaſed with hirs, and take him home to her houſe, although no hope of Children were to be expected. Beſides, he made another Law, that if a man had no will to a wife, and yet was deſirous to haue free children: in this caſe he prouided, that if ſuch a man had ſeene a generous & fruitful woman, if he could win the liking of hir husband, cõtenting him and ſhe not diſpleaſed; hee might beget children of hir. Many like thinges were in the Lawes of Licurgus, permitting, that a man might haue two wiues in his houſe, if he would; and that maried folk might purchaſe Brethren to their owne borne Children, who equally ſhoulde participate of their family, and of their power, but neuer of their faculties. By this inſtitution of begetting diuerſity of children among the other Grecians, it may bee eaſily imagined, how farre the Spartans went beyond others; both in excellency of people, and of power.

That men might haue two Wiues if they would.

Concerning their diſcipline (becauſe the reſt of the Grecians, & eſpecialy they who deſired to haue their children nobly inſtructed, ſo ſoone as they ſhould vnderſtande what they ſpake; they would preſently giue them in gouernement to pedante Seruants, and ſuddenly alſo prouide them of other Maiſters, to learne good Letters, Muſicke, and ſuch actiue feats as appertained to wraſtling. Beſides this, with ſhooes they then wold ſoften their Childrens feet, and adorne their bodies with diuerſity of garments and moderate their Diet, according to the ſtature of their bodies. But Licurgus in exchange of pedanticall ſeruants, to whom priuately they gaue their Childrens gouernment: ordained, to haue them tutord by one of thoſe men, that ſhould be elected by the chiefeſt Magiſtrate, who, becauſe he was an inſtructer of children, they vſed to call him Pedonomo. To him they gaue authority to congregate Children together, as in a Schoole, and he might ſeuerely chaſtiſe them, that (by him) were founde inclined to bad, crafty, and lewde diſpoſitions. According to their increaſing in yeares, ſo was one ſet to walke vp and downe among them, that carried a rod in his hand, wherewith (as they offended) they were beaten: the puniſhment wherof, & the publick diſgrace, in ſhort time made the children ſo aſhamed, that they would readily obey, and performe whatſoeuer they were inioyned to do.

The diſcipline vſed among the Spartans, concerning their children

And then at this growth, in ſtead of Hoſe & ſhooes, they were appointed to go bare foot, and bare legd, becauſe Licurgus foreſaw, that by this hardning exerciſe, they would eaſily run vp the hils and rockes, as alſo with moſt ſafety diſcend down again, mount, or diſmount, running ſwifter vnſhod, after they had well exerciſed their feet, then if they were ſuffered to weare ſhooes. And for variety of Garments, he commaunded, that they ſhould vſe themſelues to one kind or faſhion of habit onely, iudging, that (in this maner) they ſhould the better indure both cold and heat. Next, he appointed, that the Male-child ſhould haue ſo much meat, as neuer afterward his ſtomack might be offended with ouerfeeding. Aduiſing alſo, that he ſhold be invred to taſt want or ſcarſity: as wel vnderſtanding, that ſuch apted bodies as ſhould be trained vp in ſuch manner, would much better (when occaſion ſerued) be enabled to endure labour without food, then others, becauſe this kind of education, gaue them the meanes of longeſt abſtinence; and beſide, taught them to make vſe of any other viands, then their accuſtomed meat and drink, ſo to content themſelues with any nouriſhment whatſoeuer.

The Spartans hardning of their children

Their Childrens Garments & food for the preſent, and for time of abſtinence.

Alſo, he very well knew, that whoſoeuer was deſirous to preſerue health, and to encreaſe the bodies ſtature, ſuch kind of ſuſtenance was more conuenient; then to feed the body with ſubtile & ſuperfluous meats, which only made them groſſe. And to the end likewiſe, that they might not be oppreſſed with famine, he would not permit, that ſuch as ſuffered want through ydlenes, ſhold haue any thing giuen them · but tollerated them to ſteal ſuch food as might ſuffiſe againſt famine. And this he did, as knowing no readier way, whereby to make them industrious or forward, for their owne wants and necessities. And it is very euident, that hee that is desirous to steale any thing, it is necessarie for him, to spend the night in Watching, and the day time in subtle Deuises, laying his Traines equally in order, if hee will compasse those occasions which hee most aymes at. It is not to be doubted then, that they who would haue their Children quicke and apteſt, for such necessaries as are to maintaine life, they should haue them in this manner educated and enstructed.

A pretty question well answered.

But some man may heere infer, that if to robbe and steale may be counted a good quality, when a man grewe expert and cunning in Theft, wherefore did they punish him with many stripes? Thus I answer, according to mine own opinion and coniecture, that as in other matters taught by men, the learners are punished for dooing them well; euen so in like manner, they that held on in these Pilferies, as pretending sufferance to be a License vnto their immoderate Libertie, were as seuerely chastised, as they that stole foolishly and without discretion, and both duly reprehended, for knowing no end of their owne leudnesse.

The Children loose no instruction in the absence of their Maister.

If the Pedonomo chaunced to bee absent, yet that the Children might neuer be without a Maister, it was ordained, that the Cittizen, who was present at his departing, should haue Authoritie and command ouer the saide Children, to instruct them according to his owne liking, and as they offended, accordingly to correct them. But this prooued most vnto the Childrens shame and disgrace, in regard, that neither Children nor men will feare any one more, then him that is their chiefe Maister. Yet som man must needs be present, for the childrens better gouernment, and such an one as was imagined best able to command, he euermore had the Male Children in charge, as the like care was had ouer the Female; so neither of them were destitute of Maisters. But now, I hold it conuenient, to speak somewhat concerning the Childrens Loue, because it also appertaineth vnto Discipline.

Some of the Grecians, as they of Boetia, permitted yong men and Maides to be together; the Ephesians, in the interchange of affable courtesies, made especiall delight in eithers beauty, yet some others there were, who by no meanes would suffer yong Louers to talke together. Licurgus was of contrary opinion to all these, because if there were any, who (as Nature requireth) considering the inward beauty of a Maidens minde, became affectionat towards hir, & so to grow to irreprehensible loue, & without taint or blemish: he graunted them license, that they might be together, and reputed it to be honest discipline. If any were thought to desire the Maidens body, it (beeing iudged a most shamefull matter among the Lacedemonians) he ordained that Louers should no otherwise abstain from cõpanying with maidens, then as fathers did with their Children, or Brethren with Brethren, in the pleasures of Venus, which thing I maruel not a litle, if som there be that scarse believe it; because in many Citties, that Lawes do not hinder their owne practise. But so soon as children leauing their schooling, attained to more forwardnesse in youth-hood, some ceased immediately from all control of Schoole-maisters or other Gouernors, & freely were at their owne disposition. This course also, did Licurgus much dislike, & as one that wel knew, that youth do naturally incline to great surlinesse of minde, by vnbrideled license, and vncircumscribed Libertie of pleasures, therefore he enioyned them to very hard labors, and deuised such apt occasions for them, that alwayes they should be full of busines. Whereunto, he also added, that if any one contemnd or fled from such imployment, he shold neuer rise to any degree of honour: ordaining withall, that not only publicke persons should bee deputed to this Gouernment, but that parents also should haue especiall care of their Children, to the end, that this kind of fear remaining as a Bridle in the city, few or none shold become insolent or vngracious.

Orders for walking abroad in the streets.

Next to this, being desirous to plant in them a graue and naturall kind of honesty, he commanded, that passing thorough the streets, they should hide their handes vnderneath their Cloakes, and neither talke together, nor gaze about them, but still to keepe their eyes fixed vpon vpon the ground. By which meanes, it was obſerued, that the Maſculine ſexe excelled in modeſty and bathfulneſſe, the very choiſeſt perfections in the Feminine. Their voyces were no more heard, then as if they had bin Statues of ſtone; and as eaſily were their eyes enduced to gazing, as if they had bin Pillers of Braſſe; nor were the young Damoſels more chaſt in their Chambers, then young men were as they walked in the ſtreets. In like manner, if they were inuited to Feaſts or Bankets, they vſed neuer to anſwer or ſpeake, except ſome queſtion were firſt mooued or demanded. Concerning Orders and Inſtitutions among them, the one was no ſooner commanded, but the other was as duly and diligently obſerued, eſpecially among the young men, of whome, no meane and prouident care was had, becauſe the courſe of their education, did greatly auaile to inable them for the Commonwealths benefit. And for this cauſe, the Manners, Diſpoſition, & behauior of euery one was diligently noted, and ſuch as naturally were addicted to make proofe of all Exerciſes; their Minds and affections were moſt liſtned vnto, the game of Wraſtling being in frequent vſe among them, becauſe they reputed it an eſpecial exerciſe, to imbolden young men to buckle with Vertue; and thereby attaine to the chiefeſt perfection of all other good qualities.

Orders and inſtitutions for youth.

The Ephori were as the Tribunes among the Romaines.

The Ephori would Elect three of the gallanteſt Spirits among the reſt, who in the Aſſembly of the Cauallery or Horſemen, were called Hippagriti. Each one of theſe made election of an 100. men, declaring by their ſeueral reſpects, which ſort were to be honoured, and which to be reiected. They that ſtood out of this honourable Election, were commaunded to incounter with the other in battell, to win the reputation which (as yet) they wanted, if their skill and indeuour would ſtretch ſo far, and ſo, by this meanes, iuſt trial was made of eithers Vertue. This proued to be a very pious and profitable contention for the Common-wealth, wherein ſuch actions were beſt declared, as beſeemed a man of vertuous inclination: and ſo ſeperately (on either ſide) ſuch Study and diligence was daily put in practiſe, as no one could be foũd an idle & vnfit member, but altogither (one way or other) auaileable to publick benifit. They were alſo conſtrained to haue an eſpeciall reſpect of health, in euery place where they met to encounter, either in ambitious fighting, or manly wraſtling. And while in this maner they contended together, euery man that was there preſent, and had authority, might part thẽ; but if any one would not bee obedient, the Pedonomo cauſed him to be called in iudgement before the Ephori, and they would very ſeuerely puniſh him, as men that hadde diſcreetly ordained, that no man ſhould be ouercome with rage or fury, but euery way be obedient to the Lawes.

Orders againſt diſobedience in their contending.

So ſoone as theſe yong men came to years of Maturity, and ſome of them elected to be Magiſtrates: diuers of the Græcians, without any regard of their bodies ſtrength, would put them to the affairs of war. But Licurgus made a law, wherein he declared, that it was an excellent exerciſe for a man of thoſe years firſt to be trained vp in Hunting, except it might be hinderous to ſome publick Office, and thereby both yong men, as wel as others of riper yeares, were the better enabled to indure the trauaile of Military Diſcipline.

The young Spartans wer exerciſed in Hunting.

Now concerning their maner of feeding, for ſuſtentation of life, Licurgus vnderſtanding, that the Spartans, as alſo diuers of the Grecians, vſed much priuat banquetting in their Houſes, he thereby gathered, that much riot & exceſſe was daily committed: whereupon he commanded, that all ſuch meetinges of the people ſhold be in publick; conceiuing that (by this means) they durſt not tranſgreſſe their impoſed iniunction, but obſerue ſuch a comly order in feeding, as they would not exceed, either in too litle, or too much. Moreouer, idle perſons were eaſily alured to commit many diſorders; & rich men (oft times) held ſom reſemblance with the ſlothful or negligent; whereby inſued, that (while they ſat at the table (they wer ſuffred neither to be too ſumptuous, nor too ſparing. Therfore prohibiting them of vnneceſſary drinking, which offendeth both the mind and Body, it kept them from drinking til they wer thirſty, for that it was both wholſom & profitable: & the people being thus orderly gouerned, what is he that can wrong either himselfe or his dwelling, with vnseemely gurmandizing or drunkennesse?

Licurgus his orders both for young and olde.

In other Cities, men of equal condition would drinke extraordinarily together, and made such a custome thereof, that no shame or respect was hadde among them: but in the City of Sparta, Licurgus, to them of younger years, administred Discipline, and to the Elder, graue Customs and Obseruations. And it is a matter much concerning anie Countrey, that at Feastes or such like meetings, honorable occasions of the Citty should be the chiefest talke, to auoid all other lewde and vnbeseeming Discourse; as also, ouermuch quaffing, whereto vaine speech is the onely Spur and Prouoker; nor should any but honest actions passe thorough the Table, or any word that may make the speaker ashamed. And by this publicke feeding together, it proued to be another benefit, that men woulde haue care of their home-returning, and not ouer-weaken their Bodies with Wine, lest they shold passe disorderly thorow the Streetes. For they knew very wel, that they were not to rest where they had supt, & night must be no other Mantle or Cloake for them, then the day had bin: wherefore, as they were vnder an honest subiection, so should they gouerne themselues honestly both for day and night.

Idle talke, the Spur to drunkennesse.

The benefit of publicke meetings.

Licurgus likewise considered, that such as went to labour after their meat, were of a well coloured Complexion, healthfull and lusty; but others, that consumed time in Idlenesse, became Corpulent, swolne vp, and verie sickely; therefore, he prouided against such inconueniences, and knowing that idle immaginations were but to pamper the body, as bringing fresh Fuell to the fire; he appointed, that the Elder persons in this case, should haue care of the younger, and keepe them stil from excesse of feeding, and set them to one lusty exercise or other, by which commendable meanes, hardly could any men elswhere be found, that either in health or strēgth of body, could compare with the Spartanes, for they made equal exercise, both of their Legges, Armes, and the whole bodie.

Labour is the best nourisher of health.

Licurgus made Lawes also contrary to them of other Cities; for, in other Cities, each man was Lord of his Sons, Seruants and Money; but Licurgus ordained, that Cittizens (without any offence among them) might haue the benefit of Commerce or Exchange, and no man to commaunde his Children or Seruants, but in such things as were iust and behouefull. So that heereby, both Honesty of the Father, and Duty of the Sonne, were equally discerned; that, as no shame ensued by the Iniustice of the Fathers command, so no punnishment followed by the Sonnes disobedience. And if Children quarrelled, or fell out together, so that blowes (perhappes on either side) ensued; if the Parents had no vniust hande therein, the reconcilement was the sooner, and no partie offended. Such order also was for the seruants, both in Domesticke and Open Businesses, and the Iustice of the Mayster, was no meane honour to the Seruant.

Licurgus Lawe for Fathers & Maisters to their Childrē and seruants.

Hee appointed also, that Houndes for Hunting should be to common vse; and such as had no delight in the game, should yet keepe Hounds, & lend them to others benefit. The like seruice was commaunded of Horsses, and hee that was not able to trauell on foot, and had neither Horsse or Waggon, yet must needs bee at some place in hast, where his earnest ocasions vrged his presence: whersoeuer he saw an Horse, he might safely take him; and when his businesse was ended, restore him backe vnto the Owner, who might be as bold with him or any other, and all accepted in friendly manner, as doing no worse then hee would be done vnto. And when anie were returned from Hunting, and wanted food to supply their Hunger, it was ordained, that such as had supt, and left prouision fit for the vse of other, they should make it presently knowne, & deliuer it where such vrgent occasion required. By which meanes, the pouertie of many was oftentimes well releeued, and those Victuals honestly eaten, that else (by couetous keeping) had bin spild and spoild.

For the exercise of Hunting.

In other matters likewise, Licurgus would haue the Spartanes to differ from other Grecians; for wheras in other Cities, euery man endeuoured (to his vttermost) for his owne enriching, some by Husbandry, others by Nauigation; others others by Merchandize, and others by Handy-crafts: Licurgus did then prohibit the Spartans, that Free-men should not meddle with any thing, whereby any Money was to bee gotten; but all such matters, as brought liberty to Citizens, & no way made thē seruile; them he appointed, and them they might iustly terme to be their studies. For to what end should men toyle themselues for riches, where all thinges necessary are equally brought vnto them? By this institution for honest maintenance, it came to passe, that no occasions whatsoener, could make men desirous or couetous of Money. And that which is much more, no gaine could enforce them to variety of Garments, because they cared not for any exterior or magnificent pompe in cloathing, but onely for well ordering and gouerniug their bodies. In which respect, they made the lesse esteeme of Mony, to haue vse or expence thereof in any company, because they were of the minde, that much more nobly one man might helpe another, being his friend or familiar, with the labor of his body; then with such needelesse trash, which declared them to be as industrious in minde, as others were in gathering Riches. And yet notwithstanding, no man (in any case whatsoeuer) might enrich himselfe by anothers wrong or preiudice. Wherefore first of all, was ordained such a piece of mony, as was of the value of ten Drachmaes, to the end, that so soon as it was broght into any house, it might not bee hidden either by the Master or seruant, because it required a great place and carriage: Whereupon, diligent search was made for Gold and Siluer; and whersoeuer it was found, the possessor thereof was seuerely punished. What needed anie man then to hide or hoord vp money in any place, where the keeping brought him greater daunger, then the getting could yeild him pleasure? By this it may be gathered, that among the Lacedemonians, euery one obeyed both the Magistrate and the Lawes. And I am of the minde, that Licurgus neuer attempted this excellent order of a Common-wealth, before hee had thereto first reconciled the Noblemen that were in the Citty. The rather am I induced to this perswasion, because in other Cities, the men that were in greatest power, stood in little or no feare at all of the Magistrate, but held it dishonourable for them to be obedient. But in Sparta, the very Princes themselues woulde yeeld reuerence, especially to the Magistrate, and they reputed it their greatest glory to be humble, and would rather run then go, when they were called, so tractable wer they to obedience, because they were perswaded, that others would be the easier drawn by their example, when they themselus first shewed Humility, and so indeed it came to passe with them. But very like it is, that the power of the Ephori had thus ordained it, well vnderstanding, that obedience is the greatest benefit that can bee in any Common-wealth, both in War abroad, and in peace at home: therfore the greater persons of esteeme, that are about the Magistrat, the sooner (in mine opinion) are Citizens drawn to declare their obedience.

Licurgus wold not haue free men to meddle with money.

The Epheri were such potent men, as they might punish whom they pleased, reconcile all differences, and depriue other Magistrates of their Authority, or preuent them before they came to it: they might commit any man to prison, and call him in question for his life. But these that had such supream priuiledge, would not permit (as in other Cities they did) that such as were elected to be Magistrates, should alwaies beare sway according to their owne wils: for so they might haue prooued to be Tyrants, or as ouer-awing Schoole-Maisters, without feare or discretion, punishing what they pleased to term breach of Law. No, Licurgus in this case declared great prouidence; and as in many things hee became admired for conforming the people vnto the lawes, yet this (aboue all the rest) I hold to merit no meane applause, in that he wold not publish any Law to the people, vntill himselfe and the Princes had first gone to Delphos, to demaund of their God Apollo, whether it might be profitable, & for the wel-fare of the Citty of Sparta, if the people did yeild their Obedience thereunto. If he had answere from the Oracle, that it was for the best, then he would divulge it; iudging it to bee not only very vniust, but also meer wickednesse, if any man should be obedient to

Example of obedience in great men, is the best lesson that can be to the meaner sort.

An honorable death, preferred before a shamefull life

In one thing also, Licurgus is said to deserue immortall memory, because he inioyned the Lacedemonians to prefer an honourable death, before an infamous life. And surely, if men doe consider it well, they shall finde the one much more glorious then the other: And let them speake but truely out of their owne hearts, they do (in honesty) beleeue, that they liue longer by the meanes of Vertue, then by the idle allurements of Vice; because Vertues Documents, though they appeare to be vntastable at the first receiuing; yet (in proofe) they are found to bee more easie, more delightfull, more expeditious and lasting, then any other offered to the contrary. For, it is manifestly seene, that (aboue and beyond all other things) Glory is the onely Companion of Vertue, because all men (in a certain manner) do desire to be helpfull to the good and honest. Vpon which solid ground, methinkes it is expedient that wee should heere discourse, after what manner those people applyed their endeuour, that they might attain to such true fame and credit. They dealt therefore in such sort, that good men liued in honor, and bad men miserably. For, in the Neighboring Cities, when anie one offended lewdly, he was rewarded only with the name of a bad man; and yet notwithstanding, in one & the same Market, both good men and bad might Trafficke together, sit, sport, and feede in one company. But among the Lacedemonians, euery one took it as no mean reproach, if hee were but seene talking with a badde man, or offered to try his strength with him in Wrastling. And many times, a man of ill repute, intruding himselfe among them that plaid at Tennis; caused them instantly to giue ouer play, and could not be accepted as a Companion, on either side. And while the young people were at Dauncing, the very worst place of al was this vnwelcome Guestes allowance, and at parting thence, euery one would shun him on the way, and very rarely coulde he be admitted into any assembly, either among the young or olde: but that he must giue place vppon their present appearance.

Glory is the sole companion of Vertue.

Bad men, might not cõuerse or sport with them that wer good and vertuous.

It was ordained also, that the Parents of Virgins should traine them vp in their owne Houses, till their abilitie of body made thẽ fit to be seen abroad. And it was not lawfull for any Man, to leaue his Wife alone in his own house, least thereby he did incur great punishment: for solitude (oftentimes) admitted way to vnmeet insinuations, with others dangers thereon depending, easily listned vnto, & learned of the lewd, which Offences wer euermore seuerely chastised of the better sort. And therefore, when euill doers were exposed to publicke shame; it was no great matter of meruaile, if Men and Women did much rather couet death, then to liue in apparant disgrace and obliquy. Worthily then did the Lawes of Licurgus deserue commendation, which made such excellent prouision, that (to the verie extreamity of Age) euery one (in duty) might apply himselfe to vertue. For, such was his opinion, that the Crown or honour of a mans life, consisted on age, and therefore the younger sort (attaining to that renowne) by example of their Elders, were bound to the greater care of goodnesse and honesty. In which respect, wee may not omit another singuler Law by him prouided, for such aged persons as were good and Vertuous. For he considering, that the best triall of true life indeed, was in the aged mans hand: expressely commaunded, that Age should be more highly honored, then the best strength of youth. And to speake vprightly, this time of triall or conflict, doeth make the best proofe (beyond all other) of a man. For as the exercise of Wrastling, giues Testimony of the young mans able bodie. so do the Combats and Conflictes of Age, yeild absolute euidence of the old mans mind, and looke how much more excellent the soule is aboue the Bodie, euen as much, or rather more, doo the exercises of the soule conquer them of the body. Wherefore then should we not (euen to this day) admire & honor this good Institutiõ of Licurgus? For after he perceiued, that such men as were negligent in the actions of vertue, could no way exalt the dignity of their country: he tooke diligent care, that in Sparta, all Vertuous endeuours should bee publickely exercised. So that, as men adorned Age is the honor & crowne of life.

The combats of Age, exceedeth the wraslings of youth adorned with vertues, doe easily vanquish abiect or priuate Spirits, and the studious, the negligent: euen so Sparta, that (onely) made publique exercise of goodnesse and honesty, ouercame (by many degrees) all other Citties in vertue. For they would punish such Men onely, as did iniury to others; but Licurgus would haue any man in like manner chastised, for not expressing a manifest care, both how to auoyd such offences, and how to equall his reputation with the best. For Licurgus was perswaded, that hee which did cast his Neighbour into Prison, or forcibly did steale any thing, or priuately vsed purloyning; all these were no more but priuate iniuries to the persons offended: but the Common-wealth was more haynously wronged, yea (in a manner) betrayed to the Enemy, when idle and vitious Varlets escaped vnpunished; and therefore, for such Cankers and Caterpillers to common good, hee ordained very strict and seuere punishments.

Sparta onely allowed publike exercise of vertues.

No greater enemies to any Common-wealth, then idle and vitiouts liuers.

Beyond all these fore-recited ordinances, as in an intollerable case of necessity, his care was extraordinary, for all ornament due to Ciuill life. And therefore, such as were of ability, and had least feeling of others wants, were enioyned to haue equall respect of the Common-weale, both in infirmities belonging to the body, and other occasions as they happened. Beside, if any Man were found negligent, in any office committed to his trust; he was not afterward numbred among the Cittizens. Which appeared to be a very ancient Law, because Licurgus is found to be in the time of the Heraclidi; who albeit they were of great Antiquity, yet (in these times) they seemed new to others: and that which most of all is to be admired, was the promptitude of all men, to like and allow of their studies, yet not any Citty or State willing to folow their example, then which could be no greater benefit, both in Peace and Warre. Therefore, if any one be a curious Inquisitour in this case, he shall plainely perceiue, that Licurgus (better then any other) prouided for the affairs of Warre. First of all, the Ephori tooke graue aduise together, in what yeare they should send forth their Armies, vnder what Commaunders, and with what prouision; electing first the ordinary Footmen, and next to them Artificers, appointing Armour for each; according to their seuerall condition, and as the necessity of the case required: whereby ensued, that as the Lacedemonians had great plenty of Warres, so could they as plentifully serue themselues, with able men of their owne Cittie. They likewise ordained, that those Engines or Instruments, whereof they had most neede in their Armies; should all be readily brought thither in Carts, or on Beasts backes: so that, euery Man might foorth-with perceiue, which of them needed most imployment.

Negligent officers lost the name of Cittizens.

Orders for wars among the Spartanes.

And first of all, each Souldier was appointed to weare a Crimson Stoale or Tippet about his necke, and a Shield of Brasse; because they knew that this kind of Stoale (being most apt for war) was not meete for Women to weare, in regard it kept longest cleane, and free from soyle. It was permitted also, that such as had past the years of Childhood, might weare a little Bush or tuft of hair before on their heads, appearing thereby, to be free-borne, of greater Spirit, liberall endowments, and much more fortunate then others were. The Armies being in this manner ordered, the Horsse and Foot-men were distributed into sixe Tribes or parts. Each Tribe of the Citty had a Tribune ouer the Souldiers, foure Marshals for the seuerall ranckes of Pikes, eight Quinquagenari or Gouernours, of fifty yeares old each Man, and sixteene Captaines of the Squadrons. Out of these Tribes the seuerall Bandes were appointed, sometimes in three Squadrons, other whiles in six. But because there are many, who haue imagined this order of the Lacedemonians, to be very vnfit and impeachable for Warre. I will let them see, that they doe diuersly varry in their coniecture, and farre from the truth of the matter indeede. For in the ordination among the Lacedemonians, there were appointed diuers heads and commanders, who had power (in euery degree) ouer all things to the vttermost. And so easie was it to learne this institution, that no one (could hee but obserue the knowledge of men) was able any way to erre therein. For as some had commission to be be guides, ſo others were commaunded to be followers. And the manner of mooving the Squadron, was deliuered from the Head or commander thereof, by a word, after the order of a Tromper. One while the Squadron appeared to be very thin and narrow; otherwhiles, more large & thickned with company, which (in their March) was no difficult thing to learne. And albeit ſometimes (by encounters) they fell into diſorder; yet was their obſeruation ſuch, as euery one could retire againe to his rancke, and be as ready to meet with the enemy againe, onely by the enſtructions receiued from the lawes of Licurgus.

Many thinges were eaſie to the Lacedemonians, that wer obſcure to other.

To the Lacedemonians many thinges were apt & eaſie, which to the Armies of other parts were very harſh and hard. For when they marched in forme of a Cornet, the Squadron came to his vtmoſt imployment behinde, and if the Enemies Battalion were noted (at the encountring) to proceed in the ſame order; the chiefe of the Squadrons were inſtantly commanded, to confront them with their Targettiers, and alwaies to be in that forme, although the Enemies battaile ſhould ſtand firme. And if the Enemy (in this manner) aſſailed them behinde, they turned all immediatly in order: to the ende, that euermore the ſtrongeſt might oppugne the Enemy. But when the Prince happened to be in the left Wing, they did not therefore iudge their condition the worſe, but many times the better; becauſe, if any attempted to engirt him, the ſtrongeſt Army did preſently relieue him. And for diuers reſpects it ſeemed profitable, that the Generall of the Army ſhould lead the right Cornet, making the battaile of his Cornet, and ordring his followers in ſuch ſort; that, as at the firſt the General guided the right band, ſo at the laſt he ſhould be ſeen in the left. And if the battaile were ſecurely fenced from the enemies right Cornet; they had no other care, but preſently to change all their Enſignes, oppoſing thē all againſt the enemy, as if they were aduanced on the prow of a Galley, and ſo ſhould the rere-ward ſuddenly bring their power on the right ſide. But when the Enemy offered to make his aſſault on the left ſide, they were ſtill ready for him, and either valiantly repulſed him, or reuerſed their Squandrons in ſuch contrarie manner to the enemy, that ſtil the rereguard ſtood like a Shielde of defence againſt them. In ordring alſo, how their ſeuerall quarters ſhould be lodged, Licurgus did iudge it very vnrequiſite, that the Cantons ſhould fall into a quadrant or four-ſquare; but rather to plant their lodging round, except they were ſecured by ſome hill, or had behind them a wall or Riuer. He appointed a Guard for the day time, who ſhould alwaies haue care within the Army, not in regard of the Enemy, but on the friends behalfe; becauſe they might diſcerne thence the Enemies Caualiery, and how beſt to defend themſelues againſt them. And if any one did willingly iſſue foorth of the place appointed for lodging, order was giuen, that the Scirithi ſhould obſerue him; for they had authority, to ſuffer no man to ſtep out of the lodging, and to be careful alſo, that ſtrangers ſhould not walke to ſuruay them. Sometimes they vſed to diſlodge themſelues, as beſt they might offend their enemies, & be helpfull to their friends. And to the end they might be forward to this Martiall exerciſe, the lawes had ordained certain honorable rewardes for all Lacedemonians, according to their ſeueral quality in merit: whereby enſued, that among themſelues they were moſt magnificent, and appeared to others very valiant. Each man muſt take no more paces, then the Tribune himſelfe did appoint him, becauſe none ſhould ſtray far off from the Army. But after the Warlike exerciſe was performed, the chiefeſt among the Souldiers, would commaund all the reſt to ſit down in a ring; and after they had dined, the Scouts were ſuddenly ſent abroad, in which time they went to councel againe, graunting time of reſt, to ſuch as were to be vſed in the night-ſeruice. Which things being ended, ſupper is publiſhed by the ſound of a trumpet, that afterward they may ſing prayſes to their Gods, and pleaſe them with ſacrifices, while the Army repoſeth.

The order of leading forth their Armies.

At the Armies leading forth, they doe firſt offer ſacrifice in the Houſe to Ioue their Patrone and Guide, and to the other Gods, that if any thing haue formerly beene amiſſe ſacrificed, the Fecial Prieſt (who, of the Fire he carieth, is called Pirphorus) taking the fire from the Altar, may go before them to the Confines of the Countrey, where againe he ſacrificeth, both to Ioue and to Minerua. So ſoone as this Sacrifice to the Gods is performed, he goes on ſtill with them forth of the Countries bounds; the fire continually flaming with that Sacrifice, and Beaſts of all ſorts led ready by him, to offer as occaſion ſerueth. About the dawne or breake of the day, he returneth from this ſeruice, perceiuing firſt, that he hath obtained the beneuolence and fauour of the Gods. About the Sacrifice ſtand the Tribunes of the Souldiers, the Gouernours of the rankes, the chiefe of the fifty ſtrange Souldiers, the Commaunders of them that beare the Armies luggage, and the Pretors of the Citty. There are alſo preſent two of the Ephori, who do nothing, except they be thereto called by the King; but ſtand ready to guard what euery one dooth, and to puniſh as they perceiue conueniency. The Sacrifices being ended, the King calleth his Councell, and commandeth them what is to be done. And ſo, he that duely obſerueth this kind of diſcipline, may eaſily iudge the weakeneſſe and want in others in Military affaires, and that the Lacedemonians might iuſtly be tearmed, true and expert Maiſters in the managing of Armes.

The manner of the Sacrifices performance.

The Lacedemonians moſt expert in war

When the King leadeth forth his Army, if hee ſee no oppoſition to come againſt him, none goes before him but the Scirithi, and the Horſemen appointed for diſcouery. And if he ſee neceſſity of comming to the battaile, the King taking the Squadron of the chiefeſt Tribe, leades it on with quicke expedition, vntill he come into the middeſt of the other two Tribes, and there ioineth himſelfe with the Tribunes of the Souldiers: And he that is of eldeſt ſtanding in the Common-wealths affaires, giues order of Gouernment to all the reſt, which are all thoſe, that (in one and the ſame obſeruation) doe feede together, as the Soothſayers, Phiſitions, Trumpeters, Heades of the Army, and all other Officers, that voluntarily happen to be among them. Whereby neceſſarily enſueth, that there can bee no doubt of any thing needfull, but there it is in order readily prouided. And vndoubtedly, in very excellent manner did Licurgus prouide for all affaires in the Army, for if any were to ſuffer torture in the ſight of the Enemy, the Law commanded, that al the Trumpeters ſhould (by ſounding) giue publike admonition thereof, and all the Lacedemonians to ſtand there preſent, with their Crownes of atchieued Honour on their Heads: that when the Army was rid of ſo foule an Obloquy, the young ſprighly Gallants, and thoſe of choiſer election, might enter the next battaile with greater courage, and ſhew themſelues more vndauntedly valiant. The care of all which, conſiſted in the chiefe of the Squadron, becauſe it concerned none of the company to meddle in the matter, but only the Head and Commaunder of the Squadron; which directly he did, except he pleaſed to refer it to the Tribune of the Souldiers.

Licurgus his ſtrict Law for torture in the Army

But when was fitteſt time for the Armies lodging or diſlodging; Licurgus referred that to the will of the King, that hee ſhould appoint the manner, time, and place. The order alſo for miſſion of Ambaſſages, treaty of Leagues, and motions of Warre; was likewiſe an Article of the Kings priuiledge, and euery one went to attend the King, when any ſuch occaſions were in hand. If any ſtriſes or differences happened, the king commited them to the Iudges appointed for contentions: if about ſummes of Money, to the Treaſurer; if about ſpoyles or robberies, to thoſe that had to deale therein. Now when the King had ordered all theſe buſineſſes, there remained no other negotiation for him about the Gouernment; but to carry himſelfe as a Prieſt in Diuine caſes, and as a Captaine in Armes towardes his people: Becauſe Licurgus had ordained, that the King (in all publique matters, as proceeding from God) might sacrifice in the Citty, and was Captaine of the Army in euery place, whether soeuer the Citty sent it; withall, that hee might take the guift of all such thinges as were to be sacrificed. Moreouer, so many Territories were allowed him in the neighbouring Citties, as he should not grow scanty of honest prouision, not super-abound in excesse and ryot.

The Kinges feeding openly, and prouision for sacrifice.

And because the King might feede in publique, he was appointed a publique Table, and at Supper he was honoured with a double seruice; not because hee did eate twice as much as any other, but in regard they would grace (with his leauings) whom they pleased. They allowed him likewise two companions, such as himselfe liked to make choise of, and them they tearmed Pitij. They presented him also daily, a farrowing Sow, that whensoeuer he needed to consult with the Gods, hee should not be destitute of an offering. Neere to his Court they made a great Pond or Pool of Water, which abounded in all prouision thereto belonging, and due care was still had for the maintenance thereof. All the Magistrates (sitting on their Seates) did reuerence to the King, except the Ephori, and euery month they gaue the Oath one to another; the Ephori in name of the Citty, and the King in his own. The Oath of the King was to commaund, according to the Lawes made for the Citty, which were, to maintaine in the Citty the Kings authority stable, and binde the whole Kingdome inuiolably to obserue the same. Those honours affoorded by the Country to their King in his life time, did very much exceed their priuate obseruations; because Licurgus would not attribute tyrannicall pride to a King, neyther prouoke the Cittizens to bee enuious against the Maiesty of Kinges. But those Honours done to their dead Kings, are declared in the Lawes of Licurgus at large who would haue the Lacedemonian Kings to be honored, not as men, but rather as if they were halfe Gods.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the Gouernment and Lawes most vsed among the auncient Athenians; What kind of Common-wealth they obserued, &c.

Athens, the most famous and illustrous City among the Grecians, was (in precedent times) held only by wise men, and, for orderly Gouernment in their Common-wealth, exceedingly renowned. The first Originall theteof, was attributed to Minerua, euen as if it should be saide, that the men liuing in this Cittie in those daies, did manifestly declare, that Wisedome and Prouidence were the onely Builders of Athens. Theseus was her restorer or deliuerer, but Solon was he that did her the chiefe good; because he gaue such Lawes to her people, that diuers other Prouinces disdained not to liue by the selfe-same rule as the Athenians duely obserued. And the Romaines (at the foundation of their State) sent Oratours to learne the Lawes of Solon; approouing them for the most excellent, that the whole World at that time affoorded. Now, in regard that from this Citty, many other receiued their best forme & shape: I am the easier induced, to make known the order of her Common-wealth, which wil appeare to bee as profitable, as pleasing.

The first beginning of Athens.

Solon the best Benefactor to Athens.

Rome learned Solons Lawes.

1. The Athenians, who highly delighted to be called Indigeni, as much to say, as naturally home-bred, not descending of other people, nor sprung from any other place, whereby to make their originall more high or diuine; were distinguished by three seuerall names, as many good Writers haue well obserued. The first were styled Epatride; that is, Noble-men, holding the like Dignitie in Athens, as the Patricij did in Rome. Geomori were the second sort called, who were Rustici, or Country-people, and so tearmed, because they had graunted them one part of the Atticke fieldes, for their their Husbandry. The third kind were named Artificers, who exercised in the Citty both Mechanicall Arts, and Merchandise also: According to the word Dimiurgi, which signifieth Artifex, and may likewise impart the very same, as the name Publicanus among the Romans; to wit, a Customer, or receiuer of toles and Customes. As for such as held the supreamest place among the rest, both in honour and yeares; they were called Demogeronti, or Senatours, who had a very high authority ouer the vulgar sort. The first name of Indigena, was not giuen at the foundation of Athens, nor to the place of people, or to the City it selfe; but only to these, who were the greatest persons, and the very cheefest whereof, had onely liued in Athens, and could boldly affirme, that their beginning was from no other place. So, by pride, pompe, and ouer-awing, they grew to be tearmed Sons of the Foundation; and this or the like names serued, with the memory of Letters, vntill such time as the names of factions arose, which hapning among the popularitie, and the Common-wealth; the diuision continued so long, till Draco the Law-maker ordained Magistrates, and the State to be gouerned by Oligarchia; to wit, a few persons managing the whole authority: And these were then their names; Pediei, Diacrij, Parali, and Ettimorij. The first soly fauoured (as beeing made firme by riches) Oligarchia, or the power of a few. The Diacrij were appointed to popular administration; enduring (though much against their friends) that the most potent shold hold chiefest place in the Common-wealth. Those who were tearmed Parali, fauouring one while the one side, and another while the other, would leane to which part best liked them, taking to themselues, and from others, the meanes of liberty. In this combustion, all iniury fell on the backs of the miserable Ettimorij, because all men of least faculty were so tearmed, and euery yeare were they enforced, to giue the sixt part of their goods, to the tyrannous oppression of the stronger power. Whereby ensued (as in like cases it commonly fals out) that extreame right, proued to be extreame wrong, and as euill humours in a body not well purged, do beget and nourish infinite diseases: Euen so fared it with the Cittizens in their miseries, for they beeing forsaken of all fauours, were glad to beare off all blowes with their owne bare heads. And because the people of Athens may bee the better knowne, what care and discretion the Magistrates obserued, to contain themselues in their degrees and offices: I thought good to make some description thereof, according as I finde it in the sixt Booke of Polybius set downe.

Polib. in Lib. 6. His wordes concerning the people of Athens in their diuersity of opinion for gouernment.

The people of Athens were (saith he) like vnto a Pylot, cast out of his Ship, and quite forsaken. For, as the Pilot giueth command in the Ship (when all the Mariners are accorded with him) that neyther by the Tempest of weather, or dread of Enemies, they should be driuen into disorder, but by their obedience, the greater diligence on all sides vsed: As also when security is thus obtained, they being (in some strange manner) to despise their head and guide, falling to mutiny and sedition, because euery man is of an humor by himselfe; some, desirous to saile on; others, labouring their Gouernour to put into harbour: As likewise, I say, by such distraction in behauiour (most abrupt to behold) the strife and diuersity of opinion among the Saylers, makes some strike the Saylers; others cast Oares into the Water, one part drawing this way; the other to another kind of course, whereon immediat daunger ensueth, and in hoping to gaine Land, ruines vpon a Rocke, and so is split: Euen such, and no other, appeared the wofull estate of the Athenians. For when the Common-wealth had out gone great and dangerous perrils, as well by the peoples vertue, as by the care and indulgence of many Magistrates and Captaines: it ruined it selfe rashly in the end, for matters of small importance, and among Rockes that were of no account to be feared. No better can be said of any estate, where the multitude haue the Helme of gouernment in their hands: Thus far are the words of Polybius.

Now, where the people were so disagreeing both in will and reason, they could do no lesse, but shape themselues into a Monarchy, and to make choyse of one head, who should take on him to gouerne such vnruly mindes. Therefore, by the consent of all, but most especially the popularity: Solon, for his integrity of life, and becauſe he had neuer yeelded to any thing againſt the people, was called to this gouernment. But, it appearing to be a buſineſſe full of perrill, the iſſue very doubtfull, hee being likewiſe a Man of great integrity, and admirable Wiſedome; made refuſall of their offer, with theſe wordes: If I haue ſpared mine owne Countrey, and receiued therein no tyranny, nor implacable violence, that could deface the glory thereof, or bring ſhame to my ſelfe: I feare the leſſe, in that by theſe meanes I haue exceeded other men, eſpeially in conquering my ſelfe: Thus auoucheth Plutarch of him. But he beeing condemned by many others, who ſought for that Dignity by fauours, guifts, and earneſt entreaties, yet wholly by him ſo lightly neglected; had diuers Verſes of ſcandall and diſgrace framed againſt him, which more at large you may read in Plutarch.

Solons words in refuſing the Athenians offer.

Plutarch in vit. Solon.

Now, albeit he thus refuſed to bee a Sole-Monarch, yet was he not backeward, in lending help to this diſparing Common-wealth, by ſuch medicinable Art as might be beſt auailing thereto; namely, Wiſedome and Counſell. Firſt of all hee bethought himſelfe, how to ſuccour ſuch as were oppreſſed by the might of great men; wherupon he made a law, whereby any debt was fruſtrated, that any poor man ought to a rich man: but he ſhould ſubmit his body to his ſeruice and command, and yet (not in way of vſury) to abridge him any iot of his liberty. Many imagined, that ſuch kind of proceeding would ouerthrow all manner of debts; and therfore, they who began to execute this Lawe before open publication thereof, were called Crecopidi; that is, Cutters off of other Mens debts, which was done in a kind of gratification to them, in whom the deſire of ſuch a law was moſt affected. Others were of opinion, that men of baſe condition, might free themſelues from their Debters after this manner, thereby to increaſe the price and value of Money: becauſe that which formerly was worth ſeauenty Drammaes, was afterward eſteemed at an hundred Drammaes, and according to the auncient valuation ſo paſſed. But both the one and the other were thought ſcarſe tollerable, or the one without the other, becauſe ſuch cutting off of Debters, grew as diſpleaſing to Creditors, as it was pleaſing & coueted by the poorer ſort: wherupon it was ſuppoſed, that this would not proue the way to quench the flame already begun, but rather much more to encreaſe it. For the enhaunſing of the Drachmaes added to the former ſum, was exempted from the poore mans power in paiment; wherby was imagined, that at one and the ſame time, it would commaund both the one and other; to wit, that it would increaſe to the Rich mans aduantage, that which by Law he could neuer haue recouered from the poore man. But becauſe euery Law-maker, in giuing other men example, ought to begin with himſelfe, deriuing the originall from his own poſſeſſions: Solon ſent in ſix talents of Gold to the people, which valued as much to them, as forty fiue thouſand Ducates do among vs.

Solon proueth the beſt frend to Athens, and ſetteth downe Lawes for them.

Crecopidi, ſuch as did cut off other mens debts.

The debts cut off were offen ſiue to both parties.

Solon began his law by his own example

In time, while things ſtood vpon alteration, the Law made, did yet hardlie pleaſe: becauſe Rich men ſuppoſed themſelues to be euill intreated, & poor men expected, according to the vſage of the Laconians, the benefite of the Atticke fields. Neuertheleſſe, in proceſſe of time, the peace being well conſidered, that ſuch a Law might produce; it was ſo generally approued and ratified, that they gaue it the name of Siſachthia among the ſacred occaſions. Things proceeding thus on by little and little, this proued ſound Phiſick to the former vnhealthfull body, and becauſe it might fall no more into the like calamity, euery member was duely made vſe of according to his Dignity. Then he ordained, that the peoples cenſure ſhould be allowed of, to the end that each man, according to his faculty, might haue Honour and Dignity in the Common-wealth, making no difference betweene Plebeians or Commoners, and Gentlemen. Neuertheleſſe, eſpeciall regard was had, that ſuch Noblemen, as at that time were ſeated in Magiſtracy; ſhould not any way bee compelled to leaue their places, without their owne free conſent. Whereupon, by this temperate kind of courſe, great men were the more eaſily enclined, to conſort with them of meaner quality, & ſo much the rather; becauſe, before it was held vnlawfull, for any Commoner to vndergo any office, or to be a Magiſtrate.

The Law named Siſacthia.

The

Foure deuisions of the people. Pentacosiomedimni, Ippi, Zephtita, Thita.

The people were then ordered into foure deuisions, with inuention also of such tributes as were to be paid; to wit, Pentacosiomedimni, Ippi, Zephtitæ, and Thita. The valuation of the first degree, was allotted to bee fiue hundred measures of Corne. This was the first rate, and these were the first degree of Men in the Countrey, next vnto the degree of Senators. Gentlemen were wont to be elect: dim the Eseto Oligahchia, a place so named, before Solon ordained the Areopagiticall Senate. The charge of the Pentacosiomedimni, was, when any necessity happened, or neede required to conferre matters for vse of the Common-weale. After this ordination, quickly ensued in the same, the second, of three hundred measures of Corne valuation, who were called Ippi, because to them belonged the breeding of Horses, which by their faculty they maintained; and in time of Warre, they were bound to pay so much as should sustain a Man and a Horse for a whole yeare. Next to them were the Zephtita, who were rated at an hundred and fifty measures of Corne, called halfe a Mina. Aristotle makes no mention of these men in his institutions of Solon, yet writes of them in the Books of his Politicks. Goldsmiths, Dyers, and other such like Artizanes, were comprehended vnder the Thita, who paied no more but a Crown to the Common-wealth, which (after their name) was tearmed Thitico: These men could neuer rise to any Magistracy, while they stood at so low a rate, and in so base a degree. In this manner did Solon appoint his Lawes, making a sound and setled estate, of that which before was extreame weake and sickly. And because the approbation of Lawes implyed the greatest power, being imposed both on the Noble-men and Comminalty, for sounder stability, they were engrauen in Tables, with the deuision of the Atticke fields; which being publikely knowne, and vniuersally allowed; they sacred his Lawes to immortality, without any sinister rumour or contradiction.

Solon brought Athens to full perfection.

2 The people being thus reduced to peace. I think it requisite to begin from the first Originall, discoursing (by the way) of the Tribes. All people, all Nations & Cities (as Liuy saith) vsed to derive their original from rare and excellent men, or else from such, whom rude Antiquity in the Worlds first infancy, placed among the number of the Gods, imposing names on them after their manner. Hereupon, many ascribed their beginning and protection to Ioue, Mars, Mercury, Pallas, Vulcane, & such like Patrones, for the greater supposition of vertue, yet grounded but on their owne bare opinion. By which example, the Athenians not contented with one Sole Nobility; to wit, that of Pallas, gaue diuers names to variant partitions of their people, whom they tearmed Tribes, after the name of the Eponoms, who were worthy Heroes, and whose Memory could not dye, because their statues were preserued, not so much for their vertue, but for others to imitate them, helping themselues (in that manner) to become the more worthy. There were foure Tribes of the first kind; one was named Cecropida, of old Cecrops, because, if we may credit Pausanias, there were two seuerall Men of that Name. The second Tribe of that Nature, was called Aſiochton, that is; Indigena, the peculiar vocable to those people: The third were stiled Atteari; And the fourth Paralia, taking name of their neer neighbouring to the Sea, which more auncientlie was tearmed Cranao, and deuided into foure sundry parts. One Cranao was so called of it selfe; the second Attida; the third Diacrita; and the fourth Nezogena. Attida, so called of the people; The Diatri; of a high place in the Citty, because the Athenians lined in little hils, and the Mesogenij, of the middle Region, were so named. Now, the Mother of Erictheus, to hide her Adulterie, told him, that he was the son of Ioue, which dissembling, for addition of greater grace to the father; taking away the old Titles, four other names (deriued from the Gods) were imposed vpon Athens. It was cald Diada, after the name of Ioue; Atineada, after the name of Minerua; Feſtiada, of Vulcane; and lastly Foſidonia, of Neptune: each of them being deuided into three partitions, and therefore tearmed by the Tribes of three, not so named of freedome by guift; compleated their full number to twelue. These 12. parts in threes thus deuided, continued vntill the time of Alcmeon, sixe hundred and sixty yeares, or little lesse.

The Athenians gaue diuersity of names to their people.

Of Tribes & other diuisions of the people.

The ten tribes of the Princes, and how they tooke their names.

Afterward, by answer from the Oracle of Apollo, the tenne Tribes of the Princes were named, that before him should raigne in greatest fame. It was called Cecropia, of Cecrops; Ericthea, of Erictheus; Ægea, of Ægeus, Pandionia, Acamanta, Leonta, Ænea, Hippotoonta, Antioca, Eanta; whereunto were added Antigonia, and Demetria, to make vppe the iust number of twelue: all which (euery one by it selfe) like vnto the first foure, were deuided likewise into three partitions, and so made vp the number of thirty sixe Tribes, which the Romaines followed in imitation, wanting but one: whereby may be obserued, that not onely they vsed the example of their Lawes, but likewise the deuisions of the Athenian people. These thinges, as they were matters of very great and maine importance in in the Athenian Common-weale: so shall wee haue the more liberty to discourse of them, in our further progression.

The Romaines did imitate the Athenians, both in lawes and diuision of their people.

Of these Princes then, of whom the Tribes receiued their Originall Names, were likewise the twelue Eponimi first named, whom I knowe not, whether Herodotus (in his Erato) doe call the Gods of the Athenians, or no, because the selfe-same Authour, hauing there described some of their Names, saith afterward in his Euterpe, that in Ægypt was the first honoring of twelue Gods, and that from thence they were brought into Greece, and that in Pisa they had an Altar, common to all of them, which was called the Altar of the twelue Gods.

How the Eponimi first receiued name.

Obseruations collected out of Herodotus in his Erato and Euterpe.

Moreouer, he saith afterward, that these Kinges were also called Gods, so many of them as had gouerned iustly: beyond which report, the Historie yeildeth no further credence, neyther doth Aristotle record any such matter in his Politiques. Whereby may partlie be gathered, that those Kinges might also bee tearmed Gods, and that they were foure and twenty in number; to wit, twelue brought out of Ægypt, and the other twelue ruling in Athens. Pausanias, in the place which hee speaketh of the Eponimi; saith, that Herodotus might well speake it. Yet notwithstanding, there is diuersitie betweene them of their Names, and he reckoneth neyther more or lesse then twelue, whereto consenteth Attalus, Ptolomeus, & Adrianus, in whose time he wrote. But else-where shall wee speake of the Magistrate, named Eponimo. The people being made knowne, and their partitions declared; it is high time that we should say some-what of their Magistrates.

Pausanias his opinion of Herodotus speeches.

3 In three seuerall kindes did they vse to elect their Magistrates; to wit, by lot; by publique voyce of the people; and by election of Dignity. By Lot, they elected all the Magistrates that were intended for Iudgement. The Senate, who were elected in the like manner, were called, The Councell of fiue hundred Men. By publique voyce of the people, they created Captaines, Tribunes of the Souldiers, and the Generals for Warre, both by Sea and Land.

After what manner the Athenians elected their Magistrates.

By Lot.

By voyce of the people.

Such as were afterward made choise of by Dignity, by Riches, and by Nobility; were called Choragi, and serued in the publique Pastimes, as also for Sacrifices: in which weighty charge much liberality was vsed, and great expences of their owne Wealth. Of this order there were no more but tenne. Among, & by al which elections, as Demosthenes declareth in one of his Orations, the Common-weale was sweetly embraced by this three folde Ligature. Because the Iudges (by sound reasons) defended the Citty from the iniuries of Domestickes, Neighbours, and Strangers: The Souldiers preserued and enlarged the Confines; And Religion kept the Soules of Men pure and vnpolluted. Now giue me leaue orderly to relate, how, during the offering of this Dignity, the order began of the Ariopagita.

By Dignity & Nobility.

Demosthenes his verdit of this triple bond.

4 In memory of Learning, the Senate Ariopagiticall had beginning, and both for equity and seuerity was accounted most honourable and famous. Now, as it was in great estimation, so was the number of them not a few; albeit, vncertaine how many, which incertainty of number ensued by the Tesmoteti (of whom we shall speake in their apt place) because, as they had ended their Magistracy, which lasted for a yeare: in rendring vp their account to the Logists for their passed Office, some of some of them were entertained and accepted among the Ariopagitæ. Such as were to go to the Logists, who were Magistrates for publique and generall accounts, should deliuer their Names to a Commaunder, and require open Proclamation in this manner; Whosoeuer can accuse such men of any vniust Act committed, let him come foorth, for they haue ended their Office of Magistracy. Vpon this Proclamation, euery Accuser that could make iust proofe of offence, had his free admission; and this made much for the Logists credit. Now, by this kinde of iudgement so seuerely followed, it fell out, that few men, but of worth and reckoning, and supported by their owne honest innocency, holpe to encrease the number of this Order. And whosoeuer was noted to be auaritious, or guilty of some other such infamous crime; could neuer gaine acceptance into this inviolable company. And because no man should vse any deceipt or fraud, each man examined one anothers cõscience, in open sight of the people, and of the Senate. Thus by the yearely addition of many of the Tesmoteti, the number grew to be vncertaine, and manifested apparantly, that the latter choise in this kinde of life, did much excell the former.

The Tesmoteti and Logists.

A note worth the obseruation.

Couetous persons not accepted among the Ariopagitæ.

The like institution was inuented by Solon, because (in former times) Solon had appointed fifty Epheti; that is, Prefects or Gouernours, who gaue sentence in Capitall causes, and on Robbers, which (before that time) appartained only to the Kings office. In their name then did Solon constitute the Senate of great authority in this Common wealth, who not onely answered in capitall occasions, but likewise in the very graueſt businesses of State. The chiefe Magistrate of the Ariopagitæ, was by the Grecians named Adiadoxon; that is, perpetuall and diligent. Now, albeit, he was opposed to all scelerous matters, and publikely did punish them: yet notwithstanding, his peculiar businesse, was concerning impoysonings, burning of Houses, Murders, wounds, Cozonages, Treacheries intended against the Countrey, and many other. The manner of Iudgement then vsed, (according as by memory of good Letters is to be seene) was thus. The guilty person, or he that was accused to be guilty; after the first questioning, beeing confronted by coniecturall testimony, and of probation; immediatly sentence should bee giuen, without deferring it to any longer time, for compassion (in the Ariopagitæ) was reputed to be vtterly vnlawfull, and so neerely did the Ephets ioyne in this seuerity, as they would punish the offendour, with punishment equall to his transgression. Aristotle very highly commendeth this seuerity, in the beginning of his Rhetoricke, which praise Quintillian briefely Collecting together, saith. In Athens (meaning the Ariopagitæ) the Oratours were prohibited, from mouing their Auditours to any passion. For the Senators did apparantly perceiue, that there was no matter whatsoeuer, but Oratours (by their Rhetoricke) would reduce the Hearers to their owne opinion therein. Let vs now proceede to the execution of their iudgement.

Solons Institution of Prefects or Rulers.

Their manner of iudgement then vsed.

Aristotle Rhete.

Quintillian his words concerning seuerity.

The Offendour being in Prison (let vs suppose the case to be Homicide, or Murder) by commaund: the Parents, Seruants, Friends, and neerest acquaintance of the dead person, are summoned together, and as (in their Iudgement) the penalty is imposed, so dooth the punishment proceed, according to the iniury receiued: which Custome, because it is vsed and obserued to this day among the Turkes, wee therefore may make more ample demonstration thereof.

Their maner of executing iudgement.

The Cadi (for so signifieth the name of a Iudge in the Arabian Tongue) so soone as an offendour in Murder is taken, presently aduertiseth the dead parties Parents thereof. If he haue none, then others are sought for, to whom the deceased was most beholding in his life time. If that none at all be found, yet will hee proceede as Atturney to the King, and punnish according to the written Law. He then entreateth, that such men as are there present, will declare, whether they will haue the Offendour punnished by the Law, or payment of Money, and according to their desire, so shall be his sentence. If the man dead were thought to be worth threescore thousand Aspers, which (after our account) are a thousand and two hundred ducates of Gold: with that price ſhall the dead mans loſſe of life be paid. If he pay halfe, then he payes but for halfe a Man; and halfe a Man, is hee that lackes a hand, an eye, or ſome ſuch member of his body, and ſo the payment is obſerued, according to the dammage done to the body. If the party offended be dumbe, a fatherleſſe Child, or imperfect in ſpeech; the Podeſta or Iuſtice hath power, to iudge the penaltie according to the condition, and aunſwerably to puniſh the offender with Death, or pecuniary payment. Thus, as the Ariopagitæ vſed great diligence and ſeuerity in their Iudgements; ſo were they rarely or ſildome troubled with ſuch inflictions, and they gaue Iudgement onely but three dayes in a Month, and aſſembled not together, except they were thereto required, or vpon neceſſity of ſome important buſineſſe. Which is very like vnto the Conncell of Venice, who, for election of Magiſtrates, do meete once together euery eight daies.

The order obserued at this day among the Turkes.

Payment for halfe a man.

Iudgment giuen but three dayes in a month.

Of this Senate, and of many other, Gulielmus Budeus hath very amply written, in his Annotations and firſt Pandect, and therefore I referre theſe matters to thoſe Authours, from whom hee hath collected them. And yet, (vppon Lucians Word) he ſaith; That the Ariopagitæ were wont to deliuer their Iudgement in the Night time, and in greateſt ſilence, becauſe they would not be ſurprized by the cunning of them, who (in the preſence of Man) had moſt delight to talke: For ſo might their Iudgements bee interrupted, while others liſtened to the curioſity of Oratours eloquence. And hence grew that which is vſed as a common Prouerbe; The ſilent Ariopagitæ; ſignifying thereby, that a Wiſe Man ſhould likewiſe be ſilent. Nor was their ſilence without great reaſon, becauſe thereby they did the more attentiuelie liſten to Offendours cauſes: And neuer would they diſcloſe the ſecrets of iudgement, but write downe the ſentence, becauſe they would not ſwarue from their opinion, who had beene of greateſt wiſedome and years, but euery way to correſpond with the ſame. The Venetians are (in this caſe) like to the Athenians; to wit, that their ſentence muſt neuer ſee light, or the ſecrets of their Iudgements, which doubtleſſe is done with great diſcretion. For by this means neuer can their authority be impaired, while their opinion ſtands cleare from calumny, and not to bee wreſted by other Magiſtrates, or rude capacity of the vulgar.

The Venetians like to the Athenians.

Next vnto the Græcians, it would be ſeene what the Latines haue written of the Ariopogitæ. Valerius Maximus writing of them, ſaith thus. In the ſelfe-ſame Citty was the moſt ſacred Ariopago Councell, who vſed to haue care of that which euery Athenian did, and vvith what recompences they ought to bee rewarded: That Men ſhould liue honeſtly, and be duely remembred, that they were to yeelde an account of their behauiour. The ſame Senate ordained, that euery good Cittizens head ſhould be adorned with a Crowne, and kept it as a continuall cuſtome, becauſe honour was the onely nutriment of vertue. Theſe thinges beeing found in autenticall Writings, it may be credited, that ſuch as could not iudge well of thoſe times; did ſuffer their Wittes to wander elſe-where at randome. But as it appeared then, ſo ſtandes it cleare ſtill from all contradiction; that they were extraordinarily iuditious, and meerely Diuine. For Cicero, a Man of ſingular iudgement, would needes compare this Senate rather to GOD, Gouernour of the whole World, then to the Romaine Senate. For (ſaith he) To deny that this World is gouerned without prouidence, is as if a Man ſhould ſay, that the Athenians were to be gouerned without the Councell of the Ariopagitæ.

The words of Cicero, of the Ariopagitæ.

Concerning that which Pliny ſaith, in the ſeauenth Booke of his Naturall Hiſtory; to wit, That the firſt caſes of Capitall Iudgements, came from Ariopago; (eyther a Man ſo named, or the reaſon whereof the Sect tooke Name) therein I can perceiue very ſmall likelihood: becauſe it appeareth by al the Greek Authours, that Solon was the Man that ordained ſuch a Magiſtracy, and vſed ſome moderation (as is ſaid) which the Epheti formerly obſerued not.

Plin. in 2. Lib. Hiſt. Nat.

But it is very manifeſt, that Draco was before Solon, and ordayned ſuch ſeuere Lawes againſt Captiues & Bondſlaues, that, for the ſmalleſt matter of Theft, Draco was before Solon, and wrote his lawes not in Inke, but in blood.

Theft, each man was punished Capitally, whereon grew a vulgar and common saying; That Draco wrote not his Lawes with Inke, but with blood of men. But, if any one shall alledge, that by this Ariopago, Pliny would seem to mean Athens, or that people, it cannot be graced with the least glimpse of trueth; because before the Grecian Empire, the state of the Persians, Assyrians, Egyptians, yea, & the Sorians, were ruinated, who, without imposing penalties vppon Captiues, could not haue stoode so long time, whereby it may appeare, that Plinie (in this point) speaketh not truely; which needs no wonderment, in regarde that himselfe being a Senatour, and much busied in the Negotiations of the Cõmon-weale, very hardly could hee win time, to set downe the realty of his own Collections. Concerning the authority of this Senate, euery thing is perfected by very sufficient Authors: yet one Oration of Demosthenes against Aristocratia, doeth speake thereof in amplest manner, and thereto I referre the more curious Reader.

An obiection against Pliny.

5 The Name of Nomoteto, or Nomotheta, comprehended many generations or kinds of Dignity, wherof I purpose to make some little Narration, before I proceed any further. I find (according to Suidas) that there were three Nomoteti among the Athenians, namely, Draco, Solon, and Æschylus; not the Famous Poet, but another born in Athens, and not made famous by any Authour. Moreouer, Nomoteto, or Nemotheta, signifieth a Law-Maker in any kinde whatsoeuer. And because the vocable or word, is answereable to the effect, the Athenians vnderstoode by Nomoteto, a thousand Cittizens congregated in a knot (as it were) together, who had absolute power, to cause the Lawes to be obserued, to ouer-see, change, and reforme them. These Nomoteti had authority to relate & discourse with the people, whether the lawes appointed, were pleasing to them, or no; and all questions were of no validity, if they were not first vnder-scribed by al the Magistrates of the Nomoteti. They vsed also to bee continually present, when Iudgement was giuen in graueſt occasions: and if the actour or guilty person were not obedient to their sentence; hee had a pecuniary punishment imposed presently on him. This is all the opinion of Pollucius. But Budeus, seconded by Demosthenes, sheweth another matter, speaking much more largely in this case, and in what manner those Lawes were woont to be propounded; and therefore, wee will deliuer his owne words. Demosthenes makes mention, that Solon (among other things) thus ordained; That when any Law was to be proposed to the people, it should first bee rehearsed by the Law-maker himselfe. Afterward, it should be written in some notable place of the Citty, where greatest conourse and frequentation was daily. Then, a publicke Notary must read it in open Parliament, to the end, that if any thing were then distasted, it might by them bee amended: but if it were liked, it was then deliuered to the Nomoteti, who lastly should approue it; which beeing done, then it was appointed to be obserued. Thus saith Budeus, whose opinion, albeit it is most aparant, yet is it confirmed by the wordes of Macrobius, with this addition. Rutilius (saith he) writeth, That the Romans erected a Market place, wherein the Countrey people, for eight dayes together, might dispatch their affairs. But the ninth day, forsaking al other businesse, they should come to Rome, and there, in the Market place likewise, they must listen to the Lawes, because there they should be declared in the presence of all the people.

The Dignitie of the Nomoteti, and signification of the name.

What the Athenians vnderstoode by the word Nomoteto.

6 The Nomoteti, were much different from the Nomophilaci, who had that name of keeping the Books of the laws, because, in vaine hadde the Nomoteti approued the Lawes; if they should not be put in practise, obserued, and iudged accordingly; which was the especiall charge of these Nomophilaci. Cicero doth elegantly expresse their Office, in the 3. Booke of Lawes. The Grecians (saith he) verie diligently, so soone as they had created the Nomophilaci, not only obserued learning, but the actions of men likewise, and registred them among their Lawes. In a second degree of Dignity, were these Nomophilaci, who vsed to wear on their heads a Linnen white Coise, after such manner, as the Dukes of Venice nowe a dayes do. Such honour did Antiquitie giue to the Commonweale, & so much did men then studie to preserue Good Lawes, because it is all one to haue no Lawes; as (hauing many) not to liue there-thereafter. The Ariopagitæ (at all times) were carefull for the making of Lawes, and likewise to haue them kept, which was a charge of great sanctity. Not any matter whatsoeuer, would admit one Office to intermeddle with another, except extreame vrgency so required. Because, one side heard the causes capitall in Offenders of the meaner sort; others afterward approued the sentence; others dealt in fiscall or penall occasions, and such like businesses. Neuertheless, all these partitions consisted of one & the same Senate, and were al members but of one body.

The Ariopagite were carefull for the making & keeping of Lawes.

No Officers medled with one anothers businesse.

Our ancient predecessors, neither by long vse could grow so expert, or attain to such perfection, as to vnderstand (in what manner) one Magistrate must bee proposed to diuersity of occurrences; but chose seuerall degrees of Officers, which now adaies, one Senat is sufficiēt for alone. The criminall* Quarantia, or Quarantana, gouerning in Venice, is not much vnlike to that before rehersed, because they iudge of capitall delicts. But heere is the difference, that if any thing bee committed against the Commonwealth, against the Duke, against Religion or Nature (such as is the most abhominable sinne of Sodomy) immediately that order of Magistracy, called, * Il Capode dieci, do giue a decree for due punishment.

*The Magistracy of forty in Venice.

*The Magistracy in Venice, of ten.

Among the Turks, two men are elected by the Iudges, and sent for the gouernment of diuers Prouinces. These two are chosen from many other Learned, Discreet, and wise men, and are named Cadi-lescher; to whom the Iudges are inforced to yeild a reason of their cariage in Iustice; and hauing misbehaued themselues, they are compelled to stand to their iudgement and sentence. If they Appeale, the Apealants are referred to the great Court, which they cal Diuano. But when reason in the case so requires, both the one and other Senat shal iudge therof, one of four Bashaes being there as President, and the chiefest men in authority also there present. This order of office, is answereable to that which (among the French) is onely done by the Chancellor, who may truly be tearmed the Laws auenger. Because he compelleth all other Iudges to obserue the lawes, & iudge accordingly: but if they do the contrary, he either makes thē feel the Lawes penalty, or speakes with the great Counsell of Fraunce, who giueth them such reward, as is fitting for sceleroús offenders, against the Magistrate.

7. After the Ariopagitæ, in dignitie, name and fame, a Counsel was elected of 500. men? of whome, such memorie liueth among the Grecians, that there was no Oration, or any cause whatsoeuer; but it caried a full tast of their commendation. This Counsell had power, to giue iudgement in Ciuill causes, and all actions that daily hapned betweene man and man. They were many times Lieutenants to the Ariopagitæ, and their number was the cause, that hardly any vices could be suffered. Now, in regard that so great a multitude of men, being assembled together all in one place, could yeild but slender execution of the charge committed to them: they deuided themselues into ten partitions, according to the number of the Tribes. Each seuerall number of fifty, had their dayes appointed for Iudgement and sitting, and had three and thirty daies assigned them; in which time, they were to dispatch their Office. This number of dayes ten times repeated, makes (according to the Athenians account) the Lunary yeare of three hundred and fifty dayes: But, by the reckoning of our Sunnes course, it exceedeth theirs more then fifteene dayes, and one Quadrant. Moreouer, by the ouer-abounding multitude of these fifties, election was made of ten, who were called Presidents, out of the which tenne, they chose seauen Weekly, and euery day, each man was a President, for expedition of needfull occasions; and euery Night he carried the Keyes of the Cittadell, to him that had been the day before President: but heereof we shal discourse more at large heereafter.

The Counsell of 500. men, & wherein consisted their Authority.

The 500 men altred into ten diuisions.

The Athenians year compared with our account.

When this number of fiue hundred hadde finished their Offices, the Name changed, and then they were called Pritanij, who, as many do oth affirme, had care of all kind of Corne; to receiue the Monies brought into the Exchequer; and to receiue pawnes or pledges of such as voluntarily offered them, beside other affaires of the like Nature. These Pritanij, with the Monies gathred in deposito from the litigious; paid the Iudges and and the best deseruers in the Commonwealth. If they were called so by place, then were they to render a reason therfore; and such, of whome the State deserued well, they were both honoured and maintained beside. Cicero is witnes heereof, in the first of his Oratour, and that this was great honor to the Commonweale; where speaking of Socrates, these are his wordes; He was in Athens condemned for guilty, whose deceit or fraud appeared not to be capitall. The sentence cõming to be giuen, the Iudge would demaund of the offender, what punishment he immagined that his bad behauiour had deserued, as hoping to haue the crime confessed from his owne mouth. Heereupon, Socrates being asked what hee thought him to deserue, answered; That he deserued to be honoured and rewarded with ample guifts; moreouer, to haue a publicke liuing giuen him among the Pritanij, which honor (among the Grecians) was verie great: Thus speaketh Cicero.

Cicero in Prim. Orat. leg. de Socrat.

The Authority of the Pritanij in their Office.

These Officers vsed to examin Edicts, Decrees, and Lawes, and giue sentence in cases vnderstoode to the contrarie. Otherwise, without this care and prouidence, the people would easily haue bin drawne into suddaine reuolts, in regard that they oftentimes desired, yea, and approued such thinges as rerurned to their owne ruine, if the foresight of others, and especially of this Counsell, had not preuented them. First of all, by frequency of their office, they propounded all Edicts, which (as readily) were deliuered to the fifty men, in asmuch as a man should say; That whatsoeuer had bin by them approued, was in order to passe from them to the Nomophilaci, & they should cause them not onely to be published, but also to bee obserued. Moreouer, that man was very precisely noted; who (for peculiar pleasing of the people) had procured anie Lawe to stand in force, and not first brought it to the place where it ought to be amended.

Against such as made lawes to please common people.

This order of this Ciuill Magistracie, was subiect to yearely change, and their especiall charge, was, to curb the proud minded, and to haue care of the times of Warre, Peace, Truce, Entertainment of Ambassadors, and publication of Edicts. Their forme of writing was in this maner, according as the Romaine Consulles obserued: Policles the Prince, sitting Iudge of the Commonwealth; of the Pandion Tribe, Demosthenes Peaeneus made the Decree; and the man thus named, was an Archonta, of whose Authority we shall speak in his meet place, as also of the Tribe heere named of these fifty men, who were deriued out of the fiue hundred Gouernours of the Common-weale. The Grecians made their account, according to the Olimpiades; the Musulmans, after Mahomet; we, from Christ; the Iewes, from the beginning of the World; and euery Nation beginneth with his originall.

Their forme and manner of writing.

The seuerall yearely accounts.

8 Because euery day the number of Ciuill causes encreased, and the fifty men were not able to vndergo so great a burthen, therefore they elected (for their owne best helpe) foure and sortie Arbitrators, some by lot, and others by free election. These men, must haue past sixty yeares of age, and no way to be noted of any ignoble action, but reckoned of good and honest behauiour. They were constituted in a place, where the greater number of them might bee alway present, or readily called together, when contentions so required. And this was the manner of their Gouernment. The Plaintiffe and Offender shold make choise of these men, so many as him pleased: conditionally, that vpon their debating of the quarrel they were to finish it, or they to be punished, that wer disobedient to their sentence. Thus the party had double redresse, because, heere each cause was iudicially heard; wheras otherwise, the Apealant, going to the Ciuill Iudge, might haue had some delaying helpe in this cause. Such as were elected by Lot, were not so highly accounted of; not in regarde of their examinations, as because they might referre al matters to the Senates iudgements. The terme giuen to these men among the Ciuillians, was not so much Arbitratours, as Compromisers or Vmpiers in businesses. Only by such Monies as were to be laid down by the party, and adiudged to be paid, if he lost his cause. The Grecians in stead of Lots of Gold and Siluer, made vse of Beanes White and Blacke.

In which kind of Office, amongest the French, they do daily make Election of Commissaries: And (in scelerous causes) they are appointed by the Iudges, be the matters Ciuill, or other Criminal. These Arbitrators wer made choise of as fit men for the place, if they hadde not committed any act of indignity, or had bin greeuously punished, or suffred shame in the company of others. Al religious or holy matters, wer handled among them with great reuerence and sanctity. Pollucius writeth, that they could not heare any cause, whose worth exceeded the value of ten Drammaes. When any case was transferred from them to some other Iudge; they wrote their mind in a little Table, with what Constitution had first by them bin Decreed, as well for the Plaintiffe as the Offender: and at the beginning of his suite, they receiued a Dramma of the Plaintiffe, which serued towardes payment of other inferiour causes in that Court.

How they were elected.

9 Let vs now speake of the Captaines of the Gallies, who were known by the name of Trierarchi, not that I attribute any great Fame to their dignity; but because the Athenians (in their Nauall affaires) did oftentimes repose especiall trust in them. Their iust number is not agreed on by any Authors, because according as necessity required, so their number increased or diminished. Only thus much is certainly known, that commonly twelue men had the main charge imposed on them; who, in the time of peace, had the gouernment of the Arsenale, where the Ships and Gallies were kept in store and reparation. In time of warre, they were obedient to these Captaines, with other Prefects or Commaunders: as the Venetians doe yet obserue to this day; for they create one Generall of absolute power, in Nature of a Tribunes Authority, which holdeth only in those places where hee conducteth the Army, but in the Citty he hath no rule at all. These Tribunes likewise were put in trust, to make new Shippes and Gallies, when the old were past vse, as also to gouerne them in their proper faculties and expences, by account yeilded vp to the State; whereof the cheefest Senatours had the care, who euermore did foresee, whither the Common-wealth did suffer losse or no, by charge of the Army, when other prouision could not elswhere be made. Now to speake vprightly, this little belonged to the publicke Magistrate, and therefore was referred to a certaine number of Citizens; which custom (to this day) is obserued among the Venetians, necessity so requiring, because they pay by the Artezans. Not that themselues doo pay any thing, but that one or two trades, do pay the charges of one Gally, by which meanes they gather good store of Gold.

The care of the Chiefest Senators.

This kind of Office, waxing by little and little to decay, by the means of Demosthenes, grew to strength againe, hauing imposed a Law vpon such, as were to be elected to this charge, as is to bee seene in diuers places; & among others, in an Oration of his, against Æschines. Behold you men of Athens (saith he) what benefit I haue brought to the administration of your Common-wealth, when I perceiued your Nauall affayres to grow weake, & your Cittizens (exempted from paying Tribute) hauing paid but little mony, and such as had the meaneſt faculties to be (in a manner) oppressed with the burthen; and thereby your State pittifully to decline. Then made I a Law, that Cittizens should pay according to a due taxation, such as (in reason) was iudged conuenient, and so deliuered poore men from those iniuries, which they had indured by former oppression. And a little after, he speaketh more plainly. By the first Constitution of the 16. Law, they vsed to pay together the charges of one Gally, burdning therby, very litle (or nothing at all) such as were rich and able, but much oppressing poore Cittizens. But it is ordained by my Lawe, that the quality of euery person is to be reckoned: Whereby it appeared, that such as paide the tenth part for the expences of one Gally, might wholly satisfie the full charges of two. Whereupon ensued, that they woulde no longer be tearmed Trierarchi, but Contributors. The Oration of this our Author, is euen all one with that in the Androtione, where all this action is at large declared. Nor is there any diuersity at al in that which formerly hath bin related, except that the Pritanij were woont to receiue to receiue a Crown of Gold, in reward of their vpright behauiour in the nauall busines, which else by beeing ouermuch neglected, albeit euery such person were very diligent in all other Offices, yet this might haue bin despised, and quite ouerthrowne. The Latines called them Trierarchi, according to the Greeke word, as Cicero in his third action against Verres, deliuereth Testimony thereof, in this manner; Of which matter thou heardst in the first action, Charidemus Chio witnesse, hee being then Trierarchus, and Verres departing from Asia, &c.

Of eleuen mē called Nomophylaci, and Hipparchi, as also of their office.

10. We read in Pollucius, that there were eleauen men called Nomophylaci, and Hipparchi, to wit; Presidents. Tenne men (saith he) were seuerally elected by one at a time, out of each Tribe, which number was encreased by the Chancellour, who made the eleauenth man. Their Office was, to conuince such Theeues as remained in prisons, and other malefactors beside. If they could not winne the truth out of them, they sent them to other Tribunalles, where they were gladde to confesse their offences, and had their punishments accordingly appointed. Whereon they were tearmed Iudges of punnishment, as at this day in France the Prouost Marshalles are called, who somewhat do resemble those men, that amongest the Turkes are named Vainoda. They can apprehend all manner of bad persons, and deliuer them into the hands of their neareſt Iudges; but may impose no punnishment vppon them. Such were the Wardens or Captaines of the Night, thoroughout all Gallia, and in the Venetian Prouinces, and (as I haue heard) among al their people. The place where the eleuen sat in iudgment, was called Nomophylacion, which place had a Doore behind it, tearmed Xironion, out of which Doore, offenders were led vnto their punnishment: euen as in the Field the Decumana Gate was vsed, whereby they sent forth seditious Soldiours and captiues to be corrected and chastised.

Demosthenes, maketh mention of them, saying; A man beeing fledde after a breach of prison, hee would goe vnto a certaine Woman, called Lobia, where formerly hee hadde beene allowed Entertainment, who hyding him, would tarry the first day, when the neereſt person should come to serch for him, and make it openly knowne by Proclamation, that hee sought for a guiltie Offendour. By this may be discerned, that the Delict being sodainely committed, they vsed to make as sodaine enquirie after the Malefactor to apprehend and take him.

The words of Demosthenes.

Heereuppon, Suidas doth take good note of these Nomophylaci, to bee verie much different from the first of that name; because they compelled the Iudges to liue according to the Written Lawes; and these did but binde, as it were, the common people thereunto. We will alledge one place more of Demosthenes in Timocrates. If any man (saith hee) were conuicted of iniuring his Father, Mother, or for not hauing ended his charge in warre; or for abyding in any place, prohibited by the Lawes: the eleuen men hauing caused him to be apprehended, bound him, and committed him to Elicia (beeing the name of a place whereof we are to speake no more) where he was to be accused by whomesoeuer would, according to the Law.

11. Albeit these Presidents might well be ranked among the fiue hundred men; out of which number, they were vsually chosen: yet notwithstanding, because I haue followed the more part of their Magistrates, and they being all very honourable, I am the willinger to make perticular mention of them. Out of fiue hundred men, who were diuided into ten Tribes, fifty men were elected, and out of those fifty, ten men also chosen, among whom perticulerly cōsisted the absolute summity of the Commonweal. But haply some man may demand of me, after what maner he was to be elected, whose Vertues made him most cleare and commendable. I answer, that it was very easily done, as may bee discerned by the Venetians, who do first of all Constitute the Electours, as by lot they are called; and afterward, they put the names of them called, into an Vrne, and then take them foorth by publicke suffrages. When the Election is thus made, ten men are then chosen forth of the residue, by Lot, with silent sufferage, and with Beanes. These matters beeing carried in publique apparaunce, no man receyueth the reward of Vertue, till Iudgement dooth passe of him accordingly. Now, out of these tenne men men thus made choiſe of, ſeauen only may attaine to the Office of Preſidents: and ſo is the lot caſt among theſe tenne men, with ſuch vpright and due obſeruation, that the three remainants, can finde themſelues no way offended. And becauſe hee that ſitteth in the cheefeſt place of Magiſtracy, was vſually called Prefect and Preſident; al the reſt did participate in honor of the ſame title. They were carefully and eſpecially aduertiſed, that it was not lawfull for any man, to be twice in this Office, in one & the ſame yeare. When he ſat in his ſeate of Magiſtracy, hee had by him the Keyes of the Caſtle, of the Exchequer, and Counſell of the Common-weale. At what time ſoeuer the Pritanij called the Senate, they elected out of nine Tribes nine Preſidents: but out of that Tribe called Pritanenſa, whereof hee beeing then the chiefe, they vſed not to cal any other.

Of the Epiſtati by Iſeus againſt Elpagoras.

Harpocration ſpeaketh the verie ſame of the Epiſtati, producing the ſaying of Iſeus againſt Elpagoras. There were (ſaith he) in Athens, two Epiſtati: One in Lottery, elected by the body of the Pritanij, & the other by the Poedri; of whoſe Office, Ariſtotle maketh declaration in his Politiks of the Athenians. Now to ſpeak vulgarly, that man was called Epiſtato, who was authorized & admitted to any Negotiations, as Hiperides hath very wel noted. Conuert wee now our ſpeeches from the Epiſtati, to the Poedri. The man called Poedro, was as head or Duke of the Weale-politicke. His Dignity was verie ſufficient, and the full order thereof being comprehended by Demoſthenes, in an Oration of his againſt Timocrates, I thought good to ſet downe the wordes of the Law by him induceth, which beginneth in this manner. The eleuenth day of the firſt Moneth, after that the Crier or Proclaimer had made it openly knowne, the people went with ſuffrages to approoue the Law. The formoſt part of them that ſhoulde deliuer their liking, were they who had bin preſent, when the ſaide Law had formerly bin allowed by the Counſell, and by the Senate. The ſecond, were ſuch as thoght meet to ſpeake againſt it. Theſe men, according as the Law was balloted, gaue it aſſignment. And if it hapned, that any tooke exceptions againſt this Law, which formerly had paſt approbation; the Pritanij, who then were in Office, were the laſt day of ballottation with the Senate about the matter, and the Poedri alſo might iudge in the ſame caſe. Afterward, they ſat downe according to their dignity; firſt, they that deſerud priority for Religion; ſecondly, they of the Nomoteti. Then they conſulted, from whence the Monies ſhould be collected, that was to bee deliuered to the Nomoteti, for their better attendance on the Common-weales affayres. Theſe Nomoteti were of their Order, that wore ſworne in Elicia. Then from Elicia, if the Pritanij held not the Senat according to the Lawe preſcribed, and if the Poedrj gouerned not according to reaſon and equitie: eath one of the Pritanij ſhould be punniſhed in a thouſand Drammaes, which they conſecrated to the Exchequer of Pallas; & the Poedrj ſhould giue foure hundered alſo to the ſame Goddeſſe, and the accuſer of thē preferred to the Office of the Teſmoti. Then he lookes, if any of the Magiſtracy are indebted to the publick eſtate; and the Teſmoteti conuincing them thereof, do forthwith commit them to priſon. If they refuſe to doe it, they are ſubiect to open note of infamie, and excluded out of the company of the Ariopagiti, as contemners of the Lawes Gouernement. Before the Senate aſſemble together, to render their ſuffrages, hee that will propound any Law, writes it at the place of the Eponimj, to the end, that according to their number, the people may haue time from the Nomoteti, to make firſt due examination thereof. And he that deſireth to introduce a new Law; not once onely, but euery day hee brings it to the Eponimi, vntill ſuch time as the Senate ſhall be aſſembled. The Eponimi, from the whole number of the Athenians, doe make election of fiue men, who haue the charge only to defend and maintain the Lawes. Hitherto wee haue ſpoken ſufficiently of the Lawes. Then followeth the forme of their Oath, diſcourſed by the ſame Author after this manner:

12. Iliaia and Iliasi, were in Athens the greatest Tribunals, as Harpocration saieth, and there the publicke Iudges handled the causes both of the one side and other. They consisted of a thousand, or a thousand fiue hundred Cittizens, the very best men in all the Citty. Fiue hundred vsed to be in one place, a thousand in two iudgement places, and 1500. in three. Iliasēste was the name of the place, & Iliasi was the whole congregation in iudgment. Lysias vsed both these vocables to one signification. The interpretation (in the Oration against Timocrates) is in this manner: Iliaia is the place of the great Senate, and so are the multitude of Iudges called, that there do yeeld a reason of their Office. Others would haue the place to bee called Dio, that is; beneath the aire, because the Grecians tearmeth the heauens Dion. Pollucius is of the same opinion, and saith, Iliaia was an assembly of fiue hundered Iudges; two, if a thousand; three, if a thousand fiue hundred. They vsed two kinds of Ballots in their voices or suffrages, one whol & sound, the other bored and empty. By these they absolued and condemned, affirmed and gainsayed. They had a vessel like vnto a Tunnel, whereby their suffrage passed thorow two pipes; one of Wood, & the other of Brasse, with which they approued and reproued, according as we shall declare more amply, as time & place requireth. The interpretatiō heerof, in the Oration against Timocrates, is very diuers, because it is there saide, that insted of stone vessels, they vsed Beanes both white and blacke, for a kind of difference, as if one of the stone-vesselles were empty, and the other full; whereupon, this kind of electing Magistrates was tearmed, By the Beane. It is also sayd afterward, that Pythagoras commanded abstinence from Pease and Beanes, not in regard that they were Windie, and all things of like Nature; but rather, to signifye thereby, that hee which will liue quietly, without Ambition, and not bee opposed to the Baffulinges of Fortune, thoulde not trouble himselfe with Magistracy, nor seeke after Dignities, which are as slippery, as Beans are Windy.

13 One of the Tribes, were called Apodecta, that is; Quæstores, or treasurers, so many as made vp the number of tenne. These Quæstores were such, as now adayes wee tearme Collectors, or Gatherers of Rents and Customes. The Grecians and the Latines did commonly call them Eranistes, as wee vulgarly entitle our Collectours of Subsidies, or such like. The charge of these Apodecta streatched thus farre. Hauing receyued Letters from the State, (as like Election is made amongst the French, when they will Collect anie sums of Money of the Prouinces, for some important businesse of the kings) they bound such as wer indebted to the Common-weal, that they should make paiment according to like part of their faculties. All the while as these monies were receiuing, the Antigrapher was stil present, to wit; the Comptroller, who (naming the summes) did set all downe in a Iournall or Day-booke, and at the receipt, wrote downe each mans payment, whereof heereafter we shal speak more at large. The taxations which others (in reason) were to pay, were gathered by the Logists, and what remayned behind to the Questores, came afterward to the Logists. The account being cast ouer, and som remnants remaining as vnpaide by any man; sodaine order was taken, that so soone as hee was able, the remainder should be paid. But, if it so chanced (as oftentimes in like cases it fals out) that any brabling or strife ensued on these Collections: the quarreller was forthwith broght before the Magistrates, called the nine men, & promising there to pay their iudgement, he shold be sworn faithfully to do it. Heerin stood the difference of the Apodectæ, from other Officers, they onely had power to receiue, but not to compell any man thereto. This name or Title was much commended, as appeareth in the Booke of Aristotles World. According to these, the Questores of the Exchequer were ordained; the Captaines for the Wars; the Comptrollers for hunting. Then followed, the Receyuers of guists, and such as were like Lombardes, for supply of others necessities. The Latines tearmed them Susceptores, that is; Receiuers. The like Budeus affirmeth, taking it from the Law-makers. But I imagine, that by Receiuers, they meant and vnderstood, such as entertained Theeues, and bad persons, who oftentimes were bound to pay (in the Kings name) to the Exchequer, matters of greater moment or sum, then any other beside; and yet no way to helpe or relieue the King, nor the publick benefit, but to moue and increase terrour in the people, vnder the Kings name.

14. The Logists (saith Harpocration) were ten men, elected out of the Tribes, to whom, all such as had ended their Office of Magistracy (within thirty dayes of their authorities expiration) were to render an account of all such occasions, as they had then administration of in their charge. The Grecians named them Logisti, and Logizistæ. Aristotle, in his Politicks of the Athenians, agreeth with the same Author, adding: That they were different from the Eutini, who were to heare other kinds of accountes. The Eutini did sit with the Nine men, or Nine Princes, making seizure of al such benefits, as the Common-Wealth had bin defrauded of, after the finishing of their Magistracy. There were in Athens (saith Pollucius) two Logists; one, that delt in the affayres of the Senate; the other, that was out of the Senate: And yet they both were elected by the Senate, to the end, that they should ouer-see the whole administration of the Weale-publicke. I am perswaded, that insted of two, Pollucius vnderstood two sortes of Logists; in regard that other Anthors haue Written, that there were many of them. And it is not possible, that they should be but two onely, because they were not able to heare so many causes: we may conceiue then, that he, speaking only of two, inferred thereby the two Presidents of that power.

This Office is in Fraunce in great respect, and belongeth to the businesse of the Exchequer; and that whereof wee speake in this place, is in Paris called the Chamber of accounts. Whereuppon, they who hold the chiefest dignitie, are tearmed Presidents; they of the second degree, are called Auditours; and they of the thirde, are stiled Clearkes of the Accounts.

These Logists receiued the Bookes deliuerd them by the Apodectæ, or Questores, which they read in presence of the Auditours, and of the Arithmeticians. They not only kept account of the Monies, but likewise of all other matters, that appertained vnto the Kinges Reuennue, setting all downe (according to the yeares multiplication) in ordinary Bookes, where they might bee soonest found, and Faith made of the payment, to auoyd all strife or dissention, when the Monies publicke came to the receipt, or any other ocasion whatsoeuer. In Venice, there are three men appointed to these accounts: and the Turkes likewise haue such a Magistrate. They haue a Baratemin, Prefect or Gouernour of the expences, who (with foure other men) doth heare all the businesse belonging to the Treasury. It shall not varry much from our present purpose, to relate a little more of the Eschin in Orat. cont. Demost. & Stesiphon.

Logistes Office, as it is set downe in the Oration of Æschines against Demosthenes and Stesiphon.

First of all (saith hee) the Law commanded, that the most sacred Senate of the Ariopagitæ, should be written by the Logists, and that they should not be exempted from yeelding vppe their accountes vnto them. And there you desire (O Athenians) according to that written by your command, that the Logists should bee Patrones of the venerable Senate.

The sacred Senate of the Ariopagitæ.

Next, your will and pleasure is, that the fiue hundered men shall render them an account of their Magistracie: and so distrustfull was the State of them, that hadde not rendered an account of their businesse, that suddainely it must bee done. Nor might any such Offender, depart the Land, vntill the Goodes to him belonging, were subiected to their power. Nay more, none might consecrate any thing whatsoeuer vnto the Goddes, or bee manumised. In briefe, they might not haue any right or power of their owne faculties, for want of rendering their accountes, but still should stand in further Obligation to the Commonwealth.

But some one may obiect; He that hath spent nothing for publique good, nor redeemed any man, was hee likewise to render a reason for his defailiance? I answere, no man could bee exempted, from yeilding vppe an account vnto the Citty, for matters of omission, as well as of commission. A little after he addeth, Thou oughtest (O Demosthenes) to haue suffered the Common Proclaimer or Crier of the Logistes, according to the custome of the Countrey, to call for any that could accuse the partie: Such are the Words of Eschines: vndoubtedly, if this Law were in force among vs, it would reueale the Thefts of Collectors, the fraud of Magistrates, the Deceipts of Rent-Gatherers, the corruption among Iudges, their priuate Fauours, and publicke Oppresions; if admittance might bee graunted of all Testimonies, punnishing first false witnesses with the losse of their heades. How many (thinke you) are by such indirect meanes, euen torne in peeces, spoyled, and meerely robbed of their Goodes, that dare not make anie publique speech thereof, but bite in their Oppression with sorrowfull and greeued harts, that no such place of Iustice is permitted nor allowed, where they might freely accuse so many mischieses and iniuries?

A good wish, but neuer to be expected.

15 Those men, whom the Grecians tearmed Antigraphi, the Latines called Custodiæ. These were next in degree to them, of whom wee haue formerly discoursed, and Wrote downe the reckonings and Diuisions in a Iournall; as Men amongest vs in publicke mannagements vse to doo, especially in matters of money.

Custodiæ called by the Grecians Antigraphi

Æschines saith; At the first (O Athenians) the Antigrapharians were elected by suffrages, or voyces, and hee, at euerie meeting of the Pritanij, shoulde declare to the people what accounts were entred.

Eschin in Orat. cont. Demost.

Suidas saith; That one Antigrapher was in the Senate, another in the publick administration; which apeareth to be credible, by such vse of the like, as (now adaies) is made amongst vs. Because, in euery Court was a Notarie or Register, that Wrote downe all those thinges which the Iudges had pronounced. There was also another, who was Custos of the Common Expences and Receipts. But I cannot (saith Suidas) affirm, that there were three Notaries, as among the Romaines, who tearmed them Secretaries, that wrote the actions of the Senat, and preserued them.

The words of Suidas.

Notaries among the Romaines called Secretaries.

The Grecians, would haue euerie Tribe to haue one, which should be very likely, for else, howe was it possible, that such a burthen of the Common-Wealth, arising from the peoples often seditions, shold be comported by three Secretaries onely, considering, that the Iudges were so many, and so many seuerall Orders or degrees of them? Æschines addeth; That the Notaries vvrote downe their Names in a Iournall, that had not formerly rendered an account (vnto the State) of the trust reposed in them, which likewise is Concordant to our instant Obseruation, in such as holde high and eminent places.

A further addition of Eschines.

16 Many write, that there were ten men, appointed as Tribunes of the common people, or heads of the tribes, who (as Pollucius affirmeth) succeeded in the place of the Nacraroni, and were in euery tribe twelue parts, and were each man called Nacrarius, to whome likewise these Demarchi were appointed. The Nacrarij were obliged, to yeelde an Account to the Common-weale, of their expences in the time of warre, for two Horſſes, and one Shippe. Of theſe Nacrarij there were an hundered and twenty, as many Demarchi, as many Shippes, and of horſes two hundred and forty, when the warre ſo required, beſide ſuch as wer maintained from the publick Treaſury. They had care for all ſuch things as appertained to the nauy, whereby they were much moleſtuous to poore people, in regard, that they payed ratably for buſineſſe of the Field, for Houſes, for Marchandizes, and for the Arts they profeſſed: and if they denied or refuſed to pay, they might amerce them to the very vttermoſt of the Debt. Now, becauſe the Demarchi (with leſſe offence to the people) might make Collection of them, they would Write of the Prouinces, and of the Atticke Fieldes, how many of them were barren, and how many fruitfull; how much each one poſſeſſed, and then gathered, according to the benefit and vſe of his Trade. After they had thus commanded their Monies, the ſecond office of the Demarchi, was, to ſet downe in a Iournall, all ſuch yong people, to whom (in regard of their yeares) it was lawful to allow ſucceſſion and Inheritaunce, which did redound to great commodity. If at any time there grew any queſtion about the age of any one (which only fell into the Magiſtrates guift, and to his allowance) preſently they ranne to the Iournall, wherein the birth of euery one was Written, and ſo cleared all doubting. Another benefit likewiſe thereby inſued, to wit; the continuall fit Election of yong men for the wars.

17 There were ten Ephtini or Creoſti, redeemers of debts, iudiciall Hearers of ſuch cauſes, & Maiſters of compoſitions, to whom, becauſe others wer conſtrained to yeild a reaſon of all ſuch Occurrences, & the parties to ſet down euery thing vnder their owne hands, we cannot more aptly tearme them, then Quæſtores of Accounts vnder Hand-writing. Theſe being elected by nine principall men, euen in the greateſt calamity and buſineſſe of the Countrey; they increaſed diuers Cuſtomes, Toll-Gatherings, and Fines to the people, & redeemed many debts; by means wherof, they were called Creoſti, not becauſe they ſhould redeeme, but in regard that they had redeemed many. The ſums of Mony numbred by theſe Men, were deliuered in account to the Logiſts. They dealt in the affayres of the inferior Magiſtrates, and diſpoſed of all their Receipts, beſide the conſtituted penſions of the publique Chamber. They had the charge of all Ambaſſages, euen to their concluſion. A Notary vſed to attend on them, who ſhould acquaint them with the peoples names, and heauy their Tributes according to their power. And when any diſturbaunce happened among them, for any penalties impoſed; they would lead the Offenders to the Tribunall of the ſuperiour Iudges; and likewiſe ſuch as had not wherwithall to pay, according as Iſocrates maketh mention in his Trapezitition, towardes the end. The Scriuener or Notary thus attending them, kept account of the Corne, which was contributed by euery one, becauſe it was beſtowed in the publick Granary. They that had the diſtribution of this Corne, were called, Sitometre; they that kept it in ſtore, Sitophilaci, and the place where it was kept, Sarophilachio. They that had care to ſee it conuayed thoroughout all the Citty, Sitoni, or, Maiſters of the Suſtenance.

The Venetians, doo make eſpeciall vſe of ſuch Magiſtrates; for there are ſome, that take the charge of bringing Corne from all partes; and thoſe men, are called moſt commonly by the people, Puruayers, or Prouiders of Graine. They haue power and Authority to ſee it ſafely kept, and to diſtribute it to two Magiſtrates appointed for Meale, who doth cauſe it to be ſold in two places; Namely, at Saint Markes, and at the Rialto, called the Store-Houſes, at much better rate then the Marchants will affoord. This is thus done, leaſt the Couetouſneſſe of many ſhould prey vppon the poore, and the Common-Wealth, and ſo to murder men by Famiſhment. Which thing, is ſo familiar and frequent in theſe our Dayes, that many times, for the thirſt of Gold, and coueting after a greater price for Corne: we may ſee it rotten and ſpoyld, and ſo much caſt away, or powred downe the Riuer, as might haue fed an hundred thouſand Men. Thus by the endeuor of theſe two men, they they haue ſtill abundance of graine, nor are the Venetians careleſſe of theſe Officers, albeit they are hemd in with the Sea: when the Turkes are as prouident euery way, although it be falſely giuen vs to vnderſtand, that they are vnskilful in ſuch matters of Magiſtracy. They haue their Edili, and Gouernors of Cities, whom they tearme Sar Farin, that is; the Cities Ruler: his eſpeciall charge is, that the people haue alwaies aboundance of Barley, and of other Corne, at reaſonable rate. In the Army alſo, the Arpac Enim takes care, that there bee good prouiſion of Barley for the Horſes:

The Romains were ſo careful of their Corne affayres, and Husbandrie for Graine, that they brought it from the Riuer Nilus at publicke charge, and by that meanes conueyed ſuch abundance of Graine into Alexandria, that at length they brought it in like plentie to Rome, maintaining ſtill the Riuer at incredible expences. Moreouer, they made a Law, that if any one brake the bankes of Nilus, or any other bankes of ſuch riuers as they vſed, he was puniſhed very capitally. The Fields of Bizantium in Affrica, Campania, Sicilia, and all other places whatſoeuer, that yeilded any plenty of Corne, was ſo highly by them reſpected, that they honoured all ſuch parts with the name of Prouinces. Returne we now to the Sitori, who little differed from thoſe notaries or Scriueners, that I mentioned with the Sitoni, who were tearmed Logographi, or Writers of the accounts, becauſe they ſerued in place of the Epigraphei.

1⁸. Hauing ſaide ſome-what of young men in the Office of the Demarchi, whoſe names were regiſtred in the Iournall, we will heere proceed therein a little further. Before they could haue any power in Hereditarie occaſions, for the ſpace of two yeares together, they muſt viſite all the neere Neighbouring Regions, as ſeeking to learne the exerciſe of Armes. And then, from the eighteenth yeare of their age (at which time they departed from the Ephebie) to the twentith; they were tearmed Peripoli, that is, Circuiters, or Wanderers; and Ephebie by their age, to wit; youthhood, and Ephodi, by the voyages they had gone.

Of the Liſiarchici, Peripoli, and Ephebie, in their ſeuerall degrees.

They were likewiſe called, Chorias Epiſcopi, that is; Inquiſitours of the Regions, not becauſe they were in any ſuch Magiſteriall Office, but in regarde that they (ſeeking after ſtrange occurrences) were skilfull in all places and wayes of the Regions.

Chorias Epiſcopi Inquiſitors of the Regions.

Two yeares being paſt, as in reward of their trauaile, they had the Title beſtowed on them of Liſiarchi, becauſe the Grecians ſaid, Liſin ech tu ligin, left to the inheritance. The power of inheritance being graunted them, they tooke then this forme of Oath: I will neuer become a ſhame to Armes. I will neuer forſake that Captaine, to vvhome I ſhall bee appointed in Service. For the honour of my Countrey, I vvill fight ſingle, or againſt manie. I vvill neuer doe any dammage vnto my Countrey. I vvill ſayle to any Countrey or Region, whereto I ſhall bee appointed. I vvill condiſcend vnto the Equitie of the eternall Iudges. I will bee obedient to the Sacraments alreadie receyued. If any man ſhall diſobey the Lawes, or ſeeke to Deface them, I will hinder him ſo much as lieth in me to do. Alone, or againſt many, I will be a reuenger of wrongs. I will alwaies honour the wiſe Gouernours of my Country.

The oath taken by the young men.

Six men were thus named, and to them, power was giuen (at all times, when the Great Counſell Aſſembled) to Elect thirty othermen, as Co-adiutours, all which; with a Thred, dipt in Vermillion Colour, marked all ſuch as were negligent in hearing the Lawes, or in comming vnto the Senate, and they were then ſeuerely punniſhed. Whereuppon, there grew a Prouerbe on ſuch as were in Office, more for fear of punniſhment, then loue to vertue, to wit; Beware the halter dipt in red. A generation of ſuch men, is almoſt in euery Citty, who will neuer vndergo any Office, except the lawes do compell them.

Six men, had power to elect thirtie other helpers.

A Prouerbe vſed by the Athenians.

19 There were nine principall Men, renowned in Athens, who could not be elected into that Office, if they had not firſt taken an Oath, that (both by father and Mother) they were Athenians begotten and borne, and well knowne to be ſo, by his Father, Grand-father, and great great Graund-father. They were likewiſe demaunded, if they were Indigeni, or had deriued their originall from any other people: as the Venetians do obſerue the like Courſe, to knowe the Natiue Children of Noblemen. In matter of Religion, they were questioned, if God Ioue were to them penetrale and tutelary, and Apollo their first Founder. In the course of their life spent already, they were demanded, if they had bin beneficiall to their Parents; if they had vndertaken Armes for their Countrey, and for the Altar; if they had atchieued honour in their Countrey deseruedly: All which being approoued, they were then admitted, but otherwise they might not. All these Questions were asked them by the Ariopagiti; and in the Porch of the Kings Pallace. This Oath being first taken, then this other followed. That perpetually they should bee obedient to the Lawes: That a man shoulde neuer request any Statue of Golde, for the most beneficiall seruice hee could perfourme to his Countrey or Common-weale. That hee should not pursue the extreamity of Iustice, for any extraordinary benefit to himselfe.

A second oath taken by the Archonti.

Hauing promised by Oath all these things, hee was brought from the Senate, into the Acropolio, a strong Tower belonging to the Athenians, where hee made fresh replication of all the former promises. There is no great dissimilitude heerein, from him that is elected Captaine for the Nauie, belonging to the Senate of Venice, who vulgarly is called a Prouider or Purueyer. Heere onely is the difference, that this man is thus appointed, and hath care of all the Nauall Affayres, as also of Corne: And the other, vseth to administer the power of the Lawe. When they are thus brought vnto the strong Forte or Tower, although they be all elected Archonti; yet sixe of them are termed Tesmoteti: One, Archon Eponimo; a second, King; and the thirde, Captaine of the Souldiours Polimarcho, of whome, we shall heereafter speake more particularly.

20 The Feasts of Bacchus, Apollo, and Diana, were Celebrated by the Eponimo. Hee heard the Differences betweene Wife and Husband, Kindered and Kindered, and appointed punnishment for such, as did iniurie each other by oddes, or excesse of aduantage. He had care of Orphanes, for whom hee made choyse of good and honest persons, to be as their Tutors, and to yeild a reason of the Legittimate, from such as were made heyres by institution. The Grecians vsed to tearme such men, Chiron Epitopi, that is; Defenders of widdows: but in saying Traorphanon Epitropus, it signifieth Tutors of Orphans, after they had regarded such Widdowes, as were left great with Childe at the Death of their Husbands. Their charge was, to bee respectiue of the Posthumi, Children borne after their Fathers decease, and that the Widdowes which were so deliuered, should bee cancelled out of the Iournall, and their Child-birth excused.

Chiron Epitopi, and Traorphanon Epitropus.

21 Plinie interprets him to bee a King, and chiefe Sacrifieer; Whereby we may affirme, that the Romaines not only imitated the Grecians in their laws; but also deriued their forme of gouernment (in Common-weale affairs) from them. And as this King vsed, as it were, to administer all sacred thinges; so was this name of King the chiefest and most eminent in Authority. The first dignity of his office, was, to haue especiall care, that the Sacrifices should be offered to Bacchus and Ceres, according to accustomed vse, with the Curatori of the pastimes. In all their sports and delightes, the Athenians vsed to haue their Auditors, who not only (as I haue formerly noted) were Presidents of those sportes and feasts: but likewise out of their own properties, of meere liberality, and according to their faculties, would shape their expences, onely in regard of that name, to be chiefe in such occasions, & proposed the rewardes, partly of their own bounty, and partly of the publick. Concerning the charge of these Auditors, or Coragi, as the Grecians stiled thē, and the priuiledges belonging to them. Demosthenes discourseth at large in one of his Orations, where, if any bee desirous of more ample satisfaction, he may be fully resolued. For those men apointed the Feasts, in what maner they shold be doone, and on what charges they should consist.

Three Feasts were obserued among the Athenians, wherein vse was made of Lampes and Fires, (viz:) to Minerua, to Vulcane, and to Prometheus. Suidas sayeth, that Istrus left in his Writings; That the Athenians at making the Feast of Vulcan, did then imagine Lampes to be very conuenient. In memory of which nouell inuention, they would neuer after sacrifice their pastimes to Vulcan, without the vse of many Lamps. Moreouer, becaus̃e it added a great grace to the most prudent inuentresse of Arts, Pallas, and to Prometheus, first Fautor and Deuiser of driuers Artes among Men: Lampes were especiallie commaunded to be vsed in their Feasts, and that their Successours should follow their ordination. The Sacrifices being ended, they iudged such differences as happened among the Wrastlers and others Sporters. Afterwards, they brought in their criminall causes before the Ariopagiticall Senate, and the Offendour before the Tribunal, laying by his Crowne atchieued in the games, he sate down with the Ariopagitæ, and was the first to bee sentenced, according to the fault committed. Then, they heard the causes of Animaters and Imboldners, according as harms had happened on the common wayes; iniuries done to Houses, and such like transgressions, and sentence was deliuered as occasion required.

22 The third of these Princes, was the Polimarcho, which Title was declared by his Office, and whereto hee was by duty obliged. He was President at all thinges sacred to Diana, and Mars the God of Warre. Next to this, the Polimarcho, had charge of all the Combates fought in Lists, and for the Countrey. There was then a most excellent custome obserued in Athens, that all such as dyed in Warre for their Countries cause, their Names being enrouled in a Day-Book or Iournall; they were oftentimes celebrated with publique Feasts, and then their names were openly recited, as also their actions performed with glory and perpetuall honour. When young Men fought combats, that manner of fight was tearmed Epitaphicon; that is, belonging to a Graue or Sepulcher: whereto those young spirits went with enflamed affections, preferring the Weale-publique, before their priuate Welfare.

Young mens combats were called Sepulchralis.

Moreouer, the Polimarcho tooke account of such verses and Canzones, as were made in commendation of the dead, and the assured truth of them: Then did he giue them to young Men, and they should sing them at their publique pastimes. They alwaies presented to the Ariopagiticall Senate, such as in War had gon out of order, or (for feare of perrill) fled away, and there required condemnation against them. In breefe, his Office was, to mannage all Military matters, and rurall businesse. Many haue written, that he also kept the Keyes of the Citty Gates in the night time, and had especiall care of all the Ports. Now, because he had the full charge of Military occasions, we will heere giue a little touch of the other Captaines of War.

Honor done to the dead.

23 Next to the Polimarcho, followed two Hipparchi, Maisters of the Horse, to whom not onely all the Horse-men were obedient, but the Army vniuersally: otherwise, they would seuerely chastise the vnruly, and such as made scorne of their commaund. They were heedefull also, that men should keepe their rancke, and no one depart from the Captaine (of whom hee had once made election) without lawfull cause, or his especiall licence, on paine of his Head: That order might be obserued in food and rayment, and not immeasurably any way exceeded: That no iniuries should be done by them to the people; and other like matters, meete to be prohibited in Souldiers. These men kept in order the Centurions, the Capi-di-dieci, & the vnder Souldiers. There were beside in Athens, ten Philarchi; to wit, Tribunes, and Captaines of the Tribes.

24 The Tesmoteti vsed to elect the Magistrates of the Horse; beside, their charge was, to see that the Iudges shold obserue the conditions set downe in writing, and iudge according to the Lawes: As wee, instead of these men, haue our Atturnies and Aduocates. Out of accustomed times, they might cause the Senate to assemble, and at their pleasure. How great the authority of these men was, & of what charge; the Romaines made sufficient demonstration, in that (among them) these Offices were allowed to the Dictator, Consull, Prætor; yea, and the most important occasions of the Tribunes, as well Military, as concerning the Common people. They were also to declare to the people, those matters whereon the Senate had concluded. They were troublesome to such Magistrates, as had had promulgated Lawes, which had not formerly been consented to by all; and vniuersally, they were Fathers and defenders of all the Lawes. Moreouer, it was their charge, to appoint punishment for false Witnesses, and to condemne the vniust Accuser; and yet to giue place to the Iudges, according to their honour.

Fathers and defenders of the Lawes.

25 Because our perfect intention may be the better vnderstood, I will recite the very words of Demosthenes, set downe in this manner. Diuers are the benefits among you (ô Athenians) which no where else are to bee found: among which, verily the most sublime and cleerest, is, the Ariopagiticall Tribunall. Of whose praise, whosoeuer would vndertake to expresse the smallest part, he shall abound and exceede in such Copy of discourse, as nothing can bee more eudent: In regard, that both by ancient and Moderne Testimony, it hath beene very plentifully handled; yet notwithstanding, I will not forbeare (for all that) to declare one thing recorded by Antiquity. It was the pleasure of the Gods, that in this place should be established iudgment of murder, and heere it is iudged, as it is framed. Neptune made Faith in this case, for his Sonne Alirrhothius against Mars. Twelue Gods did heere giue sentence, betweene Orestes and the Furies: but these are matters of Antiquity, let vs come to Moderne occasions. Such hath beene the reuerence helde and obserued to this Senate, and such the religious Faith; that no Tyrant in Oligarchy (which is the rule of a few potent persons) nor in Democracy (which exceedeth all other kindes of Gouernment) euer durst be so bold, as to take iudgement for Murderers from this place, & appoint it any where else. Againe (which is a matter most marualous) that neuer was there found any guilty person conuicted, or accuser that preuailed not, that deseruedly appealed from their sentence. These are the wordes of Demosthenes; and Pausanias confirmeth the very same in his Atticks. First of all, on the right hand, was the Kinges Porch, wherein the King yearely vsed to sit in his greatest pompe. Harpocration saith, in his first Oration of Demosthenes, thus; There were three Kinges Porches. The first, of Ioue their deliuerer; The second, for the King, and continually vsed; The third, was adorned with variety of Figures.

Pausanias saith. The Field of Mars, was so named, because Mars was there condemned, for hauing slaine Alirrhothius; and where Orestes was adiudged, for murdering his Mother. But he to escape the punnishment, instituted an Altar to Pallas, which he called the Altar of Pallas Martia. Afterward he saith; There are other Tribunals in Athens, but not so famous: As the Trigon, so called of the triangular Figure; And the Paranista, so named, because it was in an obscure place of the Citty, and frequented but by few. But the cheefest of all, and where most plenty of persons might be assembled, was the Ilieta. The place where they sentenced Homicides, Poysoners, Parracides, and such like wickednesse, was called Palladium. In the Pritanio, the discoursed on ciuil causes; so saith Pausanias. But returning to Demosthenes, he saith; There was another Palladium, where all such were sentenced, as had committed Homicide against their will, or in defence of themselues, being intured. In this place, albeit the Parents and Kindred of the dead pursued the cause; yet notwithstanding, they should haue no censure in the affliction: but the matter being made knowne to the Senate, they sent the party to a place of security, vntill the Parents and Friendes ceased further molestation. Pollucius saith; That Troy being destroyed, the Palladium was transferred to Athens by the Greekes. But the Inhabitants of Phalera, (which Port ioyned neere to the Pirea of Athens) taking them to bee Enemies, threw them into the Sea. Acamath saith; That they were Grecians, who brought the simulacre of the Palladium, and called it THE VNKNOVVNE ORACLE; because they being alike in yeares, familiars and friends, were thus dead, and not knowne. In which place, in memory of the accident, the Tribunall was made, and the sacred Palladium, where sentence was giuen for voluntary Murders, because the Falerians killed them, not willingly, but in defence of their Countrey. Demosthenes addeth a third Tribunal, which was called Delphinus; where Iudgement was giuen on them that denied not the Homicide, but proued that they had done it vpon good occasion. Pollucius sheweth, that it was made by Ægeus, and thereon named Apollo Delphinus, and Bellona Delphina. A fourth Tribunall, called Pritanio.

The fourth Tribunall, according to Demosthenes, was in the Pritanio, where these kind of cases were handled (viz.) If a Man (passing along the way) were smitten eyther by a stone, a ball of Iron throwne at him, or any other senceleſſe thing, & the hurt done without knowledge of him that was the caster: they did then argue coniecturally, by what Art or meanes they might best attaine to know the Offendour that acted the harme, or whether the party were the cause of his own iniury; either of which beeing made apparant by proofe, condemnation passed aunswerable to the importance of the case. In the proceedings of this Tribunall, whereof the K. was the Head, the Councellours and Friends also of the King sate with him there together, who, after inquisition made of all coniectures, if the Author of the harme could not bee agreed on: they vsed presently to rent and teare the Processe in peeces, and cast it into the Fire, or into the Sea, as a signe of punishment due to it. The fift Tribunall, was in a place, which they called, The Well pit, or Grauell pit; where, if a Man (after a Murder against his will done, & should commit another willingly) came to his aunswere; he was constrained to yeild a reason for the Fact. Then standing on a Ship (as a Man vnworthy, depriued and exiled from his Countrey) not held by any Anker, Cable, Mast, or Saile, hee was left to the mercy of his Fortune.

A fifth Tribunall, called The well pit.

Of Assessores, called Paredri.

26 In their most sollemne Iudgements, sixe Paredri vsually were present, binarily chosen by each one of the three Archonti; whom Suidas affirmeth, that they were sometime foure, according to Aristotle in his Politickes. It was very expedient, that these men should be altogether of blameleſſe life, and thereof (before they might come among the other Iudges) they rendred a very seuere and strict account, before fiue hundred men Pritanij, for the first time.

Arist. in Polit.

Men yeilde a strict and seuere account of their liues.

The second, was to the Ariopagita, euery man obiecting against them, what soeuer they could alleadge, and deliuering it in accusation, to the Comandadore. The cause of so seuere inquisition, was, becausse they were to manage matters of importance, and full of perrill, wherein was great need of extaordinary fidelity: As, in deliuering the Iudges sentence, whereof, one word left out, changed, transported otherwise, or added vnto by the Notaries (who wrote very swiftly) might ouer-turne, or draw the sentence into a quite contrary sense, or (at least) make it very farre off from the Iudges meaning. They were therefore set as Ouer-seers of the Notaries, to obserue all pointes and virgulers, in transcripts deliuered to the Iudges.

The reason of so strict seuerity.

27 The Clearkes vsed to note downe, and send for them that were elected by the Colonies, and Inhabitants of the Citty, or of ancient possessions among the Athenians, or newly purchased, but not made habitable, and then to deuide the Bounds, Territories of the Countrey, and iurisdiction of each Citty, according to the lot of euery man, after they were vnable for further seruice. And heereon was the word Clearke formed; to wit, to distribute to them the lot of their allowance. It was obserued as a custome among them, that such as were destitute of Goods and Houses, (which very quickly was knowne by diligence of the Ariopagita) and had sustained such losse by imployment in the Warres: the Common Purse allowed so much Mony as the iourney required, and then they were sent to the remotest Citties, naked or needing store of Inhabitants, or else to some other conuenient parts adioyning, where the Country maintained them all the rest of their life time.

28 There were ten Dispensers, or Stewardes of the publique Treasurie, who (in presence of the Senators) from that Treasury that was vsually kept in the Palladium; tooke so much as was necessary for publique vse: especially, for preseruing the Nauy in good order, and all prouision for the Sea; for heereon, (as had beene many times obserued) depended the safety, not onely of Athens, but of all Greece beside. Of two Ships, of wonderfull greatnesse by publique Name, they had most especiall and prouident uident care: The one of them was called * Faralos; and the other Ammon. Beside, the fore-named dispensations, they were wont (in returning to the Senate, with publique Supplications) to beare the Golden Image of Pallas, the Signals of victory, formerly giuen to their Captaines, and other ornaments of sacred thinges: which I read, was onely done by them, whom the Grecians vsed to tearme Calachierta, Ephori Calachierta, Ephori Philacas, and such like. But Harpocration affirmeth, that the words are all of equall Dignity, and that the Men were so called, because they placed, preserued, carried abroad, and husbanded all such businesse.

Guardians of the publique Exchequer or Treasury, called Tamiæ.

The Interpreter of Demosthenes Oration against Timocrates, saith; that there was a place in the hinder part of the Cittadell, which they called Acropolis: and of that place they were named Opistodomo, and Tamicon, because all the Money of the Churches was there kept. Yet afterward it happened, that all the vsury Money was found wanting there, by meanes of the said Guardians: because they that were then Tamij, burned the Treasury, to the ende that their Theft might not appeare, nor their slender care bee discerned. Demosthenes in his third Philippicke, calleth them publique Preseruers, whom we vulgarly vse to tearme Treasurers of spare, or Treasurers onely; hee calleth them beside, Moristi Tamia.

29 In speaking of these Tamij, it puts me in mind of the Hellinomij, whose office was, to preserue and administer such Monies, as were collected from those partes of Greece, that were vnder the Athenian Empire. The like also might they doe of sacred thinges, and of all taxations and Tributes; they vsed also to gather and summe vp the profits of the Islands. The Greeke Authours, in rendring a reason for this Name, doe say; that after the King of Persia was vanquished by the Athenians, in a Warre vppon the Sea; they, to preserue their Empire the more diligently (because suddainely, well neere all the Grecians exalted their courages, after such calamity and miserable slaughter as they had long suffered) commaunded; that all in generall should pay Tribute, toward the great charges of that Nauall Warre, whereby the Countries common Enemye was happily foyled. Heereupon, the greater part of the expences was quickly collected, and therfore they were called Hellinotamij, as much to say, as Chamberlains of Grecia.

33 There were others, tearmed Hellanodici, who gathered such Monies, as were giuen in the name of sacred vse, and afterward consigned to the Choragi, for the charge of Sacrifices, as also the sports of the Citty. This was collected of the citizens & inhabitants of Athens.

31 The Gineconomi, were Men that deliberated on the Ornaments for Gentle-women, and afterward for all other women; to the end, that no one might weare any thing vnbeseeming her degree, but ech one be adorned according to her quality: imposing also a pecuniary penalty, on such as durst doe otherwise, and the infliction was as speedy, as they were ready to offend the Law by them appointed. There was also a Law for Women, prouided by a Son of the Emperor Phillips, by which Law, if any walked dishonestly, they were quicklie fined at a thousand Drammaes: Pollucius affirmeth, that afterward they fell to twenty. The Signeury of Venice, in some passed yeares, perceiuing the intollerable expences laide out in Ornaments for women, and that thence arose and increased (beyond measure) the danger of their condition: ordained, that no Woman, were she of Noble blood, or a Cittizen, Maide, or Wife, should dare to be seene in publike, with a Garment of Silke; except on the day of mariage, and such as shold go to mariages, or solemne inuitations. For, before this restraint, many, of very meane quality, would equall themselues with a Queen in pomp. They appointed, ouer and beside this good Lawe, that they should weare no Chaines of Golde, adorned with Gems; no Carcanets, or Girdles: and the Magistrates then in office, compelled thē to obseruation hereof, according to the Law in that case prouided. I doe not tell yee, how meete and necessary this Law was, because I know, that there are many, who ouer-abounding in a vaine custome, will lay on their backs, and on the Garments of their Wiues & Children; almost their own wealth; yea, of others beside, houses, dignities, or whatsoeuer (in this vaine humour)

Of Feasts and meetings.

It was the custome of these Gineconomi, to haue a care of Feasts & meetings, if they were aunsiverable to the Lawes therefore appointed, and to note the number of the Guests: Timocles in his Philodeaste, leaues it so written, adding withall. Open (saith he) your doores, to the end we may be the better noted of you, & you of vs: then the Gineconomi passing along, do obserue who are the inuited, and how many are in old or newell fashions. Moreouer, he addeth, that Philocherus, in the seauenth of his Atticks, saith; The Gineconomi, with the Ariopagita, tooke obseruation of Mens company in euery house, likewise at Weddings, and at the Sacrifices; because there they vsed to excede in apparrell, diet and drinking. Athenæus saith; I cannot consent with Plato, concerning the number of inuited Guests; because he will haue no more to be at a Wedding, but ten persons; fiue men, and as many Women. But the one wrote of things that happened, and the other but imagined, as in like manner is all his Common-wealth.

32 Those men, who by some Authors are called Inotti; to wit, obseruers of Wine; Plato in his feigned Common-wealth, tearmeth them Mnamonas, I thinke, because they recorded the Lawes. For, as the Gineconomi (as wee haue already said) compelled the determination for Womens Ornamens, the number of guests; and the order of their Viands: so these other in like manner, imposed Lawes for Wine, that if any one dranke more then needed, beeing thereof conuicted, he should learne the better at another time to drinke lesse. But, how many times their Elders vsed to drinke, is not declared, neither doth it much import to speake it: because regard is more to be had of nature, then number. But in this case, if any one be desirous to know the vse of diuers people; let him read the tenne and eleauen Bookes of Athenæus his Dinosophists, where almost nothing else is discoursed. These Inotti among the Athenians (as Eupolis the Poet faithfully deliuereth in his Polixena) were neuer seene in company of the Souldiers, nor they with them. O Citty, Citty, how delicate wouldst thou appeare, and how much better for thee, if thou wert still so prouident? So spake Good proofe was hereof among the Macedons, Thracians, Dacians, Misians, and Dalmatians; yea, among the Dutch and French, for their Warres fell out vnluckily, when Wine and Women were ouer-much frequented, but neuer ensued any harme by mediocrity and abstinence; but returne we again to Athenæus. These Inotti (saith he) obserued whatsoeuer was done at banquets, and if they dranke alwaies equally. He was an inferior Magistrate, saith Pliny the Rhetoritian, of the Crocanitai discipline. There were three in number, who were cald Optalmi; because when they gaue admonition, they did thereby awake the eyes of the minde, which (by too much Wine) were lost and vterly dazeled before.

33 In Athens there were ten Curatores, or Prouiders, belonging to the Pallace, who appointed the prices of all thinges, that they might be brought, not according to the will of the Seller; but aunswerable to iust and honest valuation: regarding withall, that in stead of good thinges, bad might not bee past away. Moreouer, they had charge, that no Cittizen should engrosse more Wine or Corne, then was conuenient for his vse. And all such Graine, as exceeded the Cities daily vse, should be conuayed to meet places, in the name publike, and there sold for iust price, although there were neuer so great dearth or scarsity.

34 They had Byshops also, to whom the care of the Prouinces affairs appertained, and beeing appointed as Arbitratours thorough all the Prouinces; they inquired after contentions, publike wrongs, and iniuries to iurisdictions. If any one went against their ordination; they gaue sentence against him, whereto he must be as obedient, as if it had beene giuen by the cheefest Magistrate. They were likewise called, Actatores, Guardians, and Prefects, and of the Greeks, Ephori: which word Cicero vseth in the first

CHAP. V.

In which of all the Heauens, God is ſaid to haue his abiding.

The Authors alteration to a contrary argument.

FOr bearing awhile, to wade any further in deſcription of thoſe ancient Commonweales, and that variety of reading may yeild the more delectation; we will alter our preſent ſubiect to a higher ſtraine, and ſpeake of matter much more remarkable. Already haue wee (in the beginning of the firſt Booke) diſcourſed of God, his Creation of the World, and other occaſions of like Argument: In this place we intend to ſpeake of the ſeueral Heauens, and in which of them it is ſaid that God hath his abiding. Before the Incarnation of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, and till he had taught, by that incomparable prayer, which we call the Lords Prayer, that his Father, and ours likewiſe, by his ineffable mercy, dwelt in the Heauens, and aboue them all: the Philoſophers, as Socrates, Plato, Pythagoras, Ariſtotle, Democritus, and others ſince then, learned Chriſtian Diuines; as Dioniſius Ariopagita, learned Thomas Aquinas, ingenious Scotus, & the lateſt in our time with Tithelmanus, haue all giuen vs aſſurance by their writings, that there are many Heauens, amounting to the number of eleauen. Now, in regard that diuers men, being ſlenderly acquainted with holy Hiſtories, doe not know in which of thoſe Heauens God hath conſtituted his Throne (albeit he is euery where by his preſence, Eſſence, and power) I will briefely ſpeake thereof, to the end, that in their Prayers and Contemplations, they may ſeek after him with more loue and reſpect.

God is to be ſought in Heauen.

The diuiſion of the Philoſophers, concerning the Heauens according to the Planets.

Philoſophers and Diuines haue numbred nine Heauens.

The Philoſophers deuided the Celeſtiall Region, as they did the Elementary, alleadging, that there are eleauen: of which, the firſt Heauen (beginning at the moſt inferiour) containeth but one Starre or Planet, which is the Moone, and ſeemeth very great to vs, becauſe it is the neereſt vnto vs. The ſecond, is that called of Mercury; The third, of Venus; The fourth, of Soll, or the Sunne, which the experteſt Mathematitians write, to exceede the whole Earth in greatneſſe an hundred ſixty ſixe times. The fift, of Mars; The ſixt, of Iupiter; The ſeauenth, of Saturne. All theſe ſeauen Heauens haue each of them but one Starre or Planet (as wee haue ſaide) bearing the Name of each, and they are called errant or wandering Starres, becauſe they keepe not alwaies one ſcituation, neyther are equally diſtant one from another; but one while they draw neere; another while, are farre aſunder; ſometimes that goes before, which at another time comes after. At his eleuation, it will be neere to another, according as the Spheares turne themſelues, violently or ſlowly.

Errant and wandring Stars or Planets.

The ſeauen Heauens cannot be ſeene aboue each other.

That it cannot bee any way likely, that theſe ſeauen Heauens (with their Planets) ſhould be ſeene the one aboue the other, is manifeſtly to be prooued; becauſe that ſometimes the inferiour doe ſo hinder, that no ſight can be had of the Superiour. As may be diſcerned almoſt euery yeare, in the Eclipſe of the Sunne: for the Sunne Eclipſed by the Moone, looſeth a great part of his light, the Moone being then directly oppoſite. Next to the Heauen of Saturne, and much aboue him, there is another, called the Firmament, all filled with Starres, not numberable to Men, and they are tearmed fixed, becauſe they are ſeene euermore to keepe one order, and are conſtant in their ſcituation. That it is ſo, wee are aſſured by the Prophet Dauid, who ſaith; What is he that can number the Starres of Heauen, or can call them by their names?

The Firmament heauen.

Pſalme 147.

Aboue

The Christaline Heauen.

Aboue the Firmament, is the Heauen Christaline, or watry, which learned men are of the minde, that it was created by God aboue the other Heauens; to the end that it might mitigate the great heat, which the other Heauens acquired by their motion, and by the Stars being in them. Of this opinion was Ptolomy, Alphraganus, and others; yea, holy writ maketh mention thereof, where it is affirmed, that the Creatour said; Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the Waters. Then afterward followeth. And the Firmament was in the midst of the Waters which was beneath. And the Psalmist singeth in another place: Praise God all ye Heauens, and ye waters that be aboue the Heauens.

Gene. 1.

Againe, more high then the Christaline or watry Heauen, is another Heauen, called the mouing Heauen, which hath no Stars, no more then the Christaline; but his office is, to turne it selfe (Spherically) from the East to the west, by the South, which he dooth in foure and twenty houres; and by his strength and great velocity, he maketh all the other subiacent Heauens for to turne about.

The mouing Heauen, and the office thereof.

Moreouer, aboue all these fore-named ten Heauens, the recited Philosophers and Diuines, do tell vs, that there is yet another Heauen, exempt from all locall motion, & is before all that which can be called the World: filled with infinite intelligences, and most happy spirits, that were created all in one place, and thereto deputed for the glory of God. This Heauen, incomprehensible in greatnesse, and much more then all the other (as including them all within his center and concauity) is abounding in lights: wherefore the Grecians called it Empyrium; that is, fiery, or shining in great brightnesse. Not that it burneth like the Fire; but by similitude, because the fire yeildeth a splendour, and so is this Heauen illumined with a most glorious light. This is the Seat of God, as his Pallace, where he is said particularly to dwell; because that there his will is fulfilled, and the obedience of the Angels and blessed Spirits is perfect. Or else, in regard that there more particularly, he worketh, as S. Augustine saith in his fifty seauen Epistle to Dardanum: where al the blessed Spirits are present, contemplating the face of God, the brightnesse whereof, our eies are not able to endure, no more then the Owle can the glorious Sunne, and there is no true or perfect light indeede, but that which proceedeth from him onely.

The eleuenth Heauen, cald Cælum Empyrium.

Why called Cælum Empyrium.

August. in Epist 57 ad Dardanum.

There are some that doubt, what the action of this Cælum Empyrium is, saying; it hath no power ouer the inferior Spheres, or bodies infinite, and that it was not created for the gouernment or disposition of natural things; but only for the Throne of God, and habitation of the Elect: holding it very vnfitting, that so precious a dwelling for GOD, should serue for corruptible Creatures, and for this bodily World. Others maintaine the contrary, that it is eternall, and that, by this Heauen, inferior matters haue the longer continuance, and are the better entertained in their due order.

Diuers opinions of the action of this Cælum Empyrium.

Moreouer, although it should exceede all the other Heauens in height; yet are our Prayers carried thither. For Saint Paule saith, That the briefest Prayer piereeth Heauen. And the most faithfull Euangelists haue written, that the Apostles and Disciples beholde Iesus Christ visibly ascend vp into Heauen. As much to say, as that hee passed thorow those ten Heauens, and attained vnto the eleauenth, where his Father abideth. Saint Paule also saith; That hee was rapt vp into the third Heauen. S. Luke the Euangelist, and a Phisition, writeth, that blessed Stephen saw (a little before his death) al the Heauens opened to his bodily eyes, euen vnto Cælum Empyrium, and it also, where the Diuine Maiesty raigned in Trinity.

CHAP. VI.

Of the error committed by the ancient Mathematicians and Astrologers, yea, and such as haue continued to this day: in calling the Planets by diabolicall names, and attributing a Diuinity to them.

IN our precedent Chapter, discoursing of the Heauens, with their Starres and Planets; I call to minde, that auncient Mathematicians, and other of much latter continuance, imposed deuillish names on them; to wit, the Heauen and Planet of Saturne, of Iupiter, Mars, and so of the rest. Euery one knoweth, that Deuils (in elder times) made themselues to bee adored vnder these Names. They committed yet a much greater errour, in giuing the people to vnderstand, that those Stars, Planets, or Celestiall Figures, had such power ouer inferiour Bodies: as that they were the onely cause, of all good or euill happening to vs in this World. For example. To the Planet named Saturne, they attributed sterility and mortality. To Iupiter, happy times, and the beginning of life. To Mars, the cause of all debates, garboiles and Warre. To Sol, Riches and Treasures. To Venus, loues and marriages. To Mercury, eloquence and knowledge. To Luna, the Empire and commaund ouer humide matters. And God (in all these thinges) was counted as nothing, but euen as the figure (o) filling vp an empty place.

The Planets said to be Deities by the power each of them had.

An obiection concerning the Moone.

Some Man (perhaps) will say vnto me, that apparantly by the Moone, according to the estate and quadrature of her Body; the Sea hath his fluxe and refluxe. That the braine and Marrowe in the Bones of Creatures (she beeing in her full) is much more repleniſhed, then in her Quadrature or Waine. I aunswere, that the Moone is a Starre or Planet; yea, a body insensible, that is no way animate, neyther hath any power of her selfe, but onely what God hath imposed and permitted.

The Answer.

The Moone hath no more Deitie then the water.

Moreouer, that in her there is no Deity, no more then in the Water, which being very moyst of it selfe, washeth foule Cloathes, nourisheth Fishes, and yeildeth many other great commodities, and yet (for all this) is no Goddesse. But like as if a man should make a good fire in some publike place, in a very cold and frosty time, and many comming thither to warme themselues, feeling their chilnesse well asswaged; should they (for this kindnesse) giue thankes to the fire, or rather to him that made it, or caused it to be made?

All power only dependeth in God.

Euen so it is of the Planets, for they haue no power at all, eyther to make vs Wise, Rich, Poore, Warriours, Vertuous, Vicious, or what else: but all these depend on God onely, who hath made Man in his owne Image, and limitted his good or euill, neyther to star or Planet. Now, by reason of this fond error in Mathematicians, I haue seene many Maidens, of good and honourable descent, who hauing been ouer curiously educated fell the sooner to folly, making ship-wracke of modesty, honesty, and all. I haue noted men likewise of as loose conuersation: yet both these Sexes, to couer their turpitude, haue not shamed to stand in defence of their lewdnesse, protesting it to be vnauoydable, in regard that Mathematicians had giuen them to vnderstand; that they were conceiued, and borne vnder such Planets, as had incited them to such euils, and therefore they could not (albeit they had neuer so much good will thereto) retire from committing such sin, but needs must still persist therein. Are not these faire Fruits of your Iudiciary Astrology? Let me boldly tell ye, that God, being wholly iust, hath (to your shame) prepared a Hell, to chastise such wickednesse in Men, as will haue good and euil to depend on the Planets power.

A most wicked opinion of Mathematicians, which hath been the ruine of many men and Women.

But true Mathematicall Prædictions indeed, are to be deriued from the word of God, according as wee are enstructed in the sacred Scriptures, saying; Then doth he loue his people, when they haue obserued his Commaundements; yea, then shall they haue aboundance of Fruites, and the seasons shall beare themselues well in their qualities; whereon the health of men consisteth, and they shall liue in peace, with many other blessings besides. But when men shall go away from his commaundements, all euils shall befall them; and this a most assured prædiction.

From whence we must fetch our truest predictions.

Deut. 28.

The Christian Church, not onely (at all times) held Iudicary Astrology in detestation; but euen the Ethniques also: For vnder the Empires of Augustus, and of Tyberius, Mathematicians and Astrologers were banisht out of Rome. S. Clement, who redigested the constitutions of the Primitiue Church, writes: That they then prohibited and with-stood, that no Enchanter or Astrologer should bee receiued into the Church. In the Councell of Tolledo, it is said;

Correct. Tacitus. Tranquillus. Lib. 8. Cap. 38.

Concil. Tolletum Cap. 4.

said; That if any Man thinke, that he ought to beleeue Astrology, or Mathematique iudiciarie, let him be accursed; that is, excommunicated, and deliuered ouer to the Deuils power. Wherein they had great reason, because there is nothing in the World, that sooner inuiteth people to Idolatry, then Iudiciall Astrology. For it subiecteth both Body and Soule to Nature, which power likewise is giuen to the Planets, and this hath bene the reason of their adoration. And there hath bin found some people, euen in our time, that did, and doe the like.

Astrology the cause of Idolatry.

A Mathematician excommunicated by S. Augustine.

Saint Augustine, Byshop of Hippo in Affricka, who liued in the yeare of Iesus Christ 427. the Emperour Theodosius then raigning, excommunicated a Mathematitian, and caused him to be expulsed out of his Diocesse, because he maintained, that a Mans owne proper will made him not a Murderer, but the Planet Mars. Also, that GOD made not any Man iust; but Iupiter did it: with many other such like opinions. Afterward, this cunning Mathematician (a Christian of a grosse Graine) within some few yeares after, acknowledged his errour that he stood in, saying; that Sathan had thereto seduced him. And beeing better inspired by God, forsaking all his idle opinions: he penitently submitted himselfe, and was receiued againe into the Church. The day of his reception, and in his presence, the said Saint Augustine preached a most learned and excellent Sermon, whereto I referre the Reader; it is contained in his Workes on the sixty one Psalme.

The Mathematician recanteth his error, & was receiued againe into the Church.

What Mathematickes are to be allowed, and not the other.

I doe not heereby condemne those Mathematiques, that containe in them Arithmatique, Geometry, Cosmography, & Astronomy; these latter meanes containe their true integrity still, euen as it was in the time of ABRAHAM, before these Diabolicall names were admitted; which one would very little thinke, should win power, not onely ouer Mens bodies, but likewise ouer their Immortall Soules. This latter Astrology, is very profitable for such as sayle on the Seas, and (oftentimes) for them that trauaile by Land thorow desart places: heereby may be knowne the Nature and course of the Windes, for our better aduenturing in full carriere, or calme on the Sea. Also, when is best season to Sow, Plant, Graft, fell Woodes, gather Fruites, discerne the times, and for many other good effects. But that which they tearme Iudiciall Astrology, for the wicked precepts thereto appertaining, hath at all times beene hated by honest people; yea, euen to this day. In so many Counsels as haue beene holden, it hath euermore beene condemned, as the sourse of too many heresies. The like was done in the last at Trent, & among the estates at Blois; as also not long since vnder the raigne of Charles the ninth.

Good vse made of this Astrology.

The councels condemned Iudiciall Astrologie.

That this iudiciary Astrology is altogether a lyer, I will take a little paines to demonstrate; for it affirmeth, that if any one be conceiued or borne, while such a Starre, or such a Planet raigneth: he shall containe the Nature of that Starre or Planet to him attributed. Esau and Iacob were first conceiued, and then borne vnder one and the same Planet, for they were Twinnes: yet when they were borne, the last held the other by the heele; notwithstanding, they were both of very different Natures. For Esau was Martiall minded, hairy, a great Hunter, disobedient both to Father and Mother, cruell, and (in breefe) of very bad disposition. Contrariwise, Iacob (no way sterne or hairy) was a louer of peace; continuing in the House, neuer studying how to range thorough Forrests, to seaze on sauage Beasts. He exercised labour, led a pastorall life, was obedient to his Parents, and vertuous: which (in the end) begot him the blessing, and the inheritance of his Father, and the other had the curse. If I were so disposed, I could alleadge plenty of Histories. As of a Lady that was a Bordelois, that, after fiue and twenty yeares past in marriage, had two Daughters at a Birth. The one, at meer years for a Husband (with much dislike of her Parents) became a religious Sister of the order of S. Clare. The other kept a shop of sin in the open Brothelry. These two Histories may suffice. If it shall be obiected to me, that Mathematicians and Astrologers foretell of things, that are seene oftentimes to take effect, by their Diaries or Almanackes: I answer, that they in speaking so much, & in so many seuerall natures, quite contrary one vnto another (as of Heat, Cold, Drought, Raine, Winds, calme times, Dearth, aboundance of all thinges, Mortality, Health, that a great person shall be borne, or else one dye) it were vnpossible, but that some one of these must needes happen; albeit, their Prædictions fall out more by hazzard, then by Art. In like manner, if you will but conferre together the Almanackes of diuers Authours, you shall find no one of them to agree with another: Whereby may be easily conceined, the vncertainty of this Iudiciall Astrology, which ought not henceforth to bee tollerated in any Christian Common-wealth.

The contrariety in Almanacke makers

Moreouer, in imitation of Pope Syluester, first of that Name, who gouerned in the yeare of Iesus Christ, 318. the names of Idolles should be changed, and those of false Gods, attributed to Starres or Planets: as he did the dayes of the weeke. For the Sunday, which they called the day of Soll, or the Sunne; he would haue it to bee named the Lords day, & a day of rest to Christians. Munday, second day of the weeke, and so called in regard of the Moone, hee caused it to be called the second Holy-day. And so consequently by numbers following, vnto Saturday, whereto he left the name, not for Indaising, but because the day was so cald by the mouth of God, and he willed that it should be strictly obserued in the auncient Iewish Law. We may well name the Heauens where the Planets are, without imposing any name of Idols on them: As the first Planet, second, third, and so to the number of seauen, or giue them some other conuenable names; which heereafter, would prooue a defence from falling into the ancient Paganisme, as our Moderne Astrologers would faine induce vs thereto.

The Stars or Planets ought not to be called by the names of Deuils.

How the Heauens may be named not offensiuely.

The Histories of the Indiaes newly discouered, & those of the North parts, conquered by the Moscouite, do plainely shew vnto vs, that many people doe there (yet to this day) adore the Sunne, the Moone, and other of the Stars; yea, they are so addicted in deuotion to thē, that it is a very difficult thing, to make them leaue this horrible Idolatry. How happy then are they, that haue true knowledge of him, who created al those Heauens, Planets, and Stars, and place their whole hope of saluation in him? As for the Almanacks or Diaries of our Iudiciall Astrologers now adaies, they are not receiueable, But onely in this kinde, to tell vs the mooueable Feastes, and others; as also the Ecclipses and Months.

Idolatry yet committed in the Indies.

CHAP. VII.

Of the cause why the great Christian Philosopher, and learned Doctor Origen, did dismember himselfe.

THere are many, not onely of these times, but of those wherein ORIGEN liued, (which was in the yeare of Grace, two hundred twenty fiue, vnder the Emperour Alexander Seuerus, Maximinus, and Phillip) that were hardly conceited, that Origen, in the floure of his age, being then about twenty fiue yeares old, should deprue himselfe of Virga virilis; not that he had in those parts any disease, which might require such extirpation. This Act was diuersly thought of, by the ancients and Pastours in the Primitiue Church, especially one Demetrius, who was then Byshoppe of Alexandria (esteemed a most learned and vertuous Man) he blamed him very highly. For (quoth he) there is no expresse commaundement in holy Scripture, to mutelate or make any member imperfect. Albeit, in S. Matthew there is a passage, where Iesus Christ himselfe said: That some are chast of themselues, for the Kingdome of Heauen. All our Orthodoxall Diuines do hold, that this ought to be vnderstood, how we should rent away and separate those euill affections and vices that are bred and borne with vs. So likewise it is to be vnderstood, concerning coueting after earthly goods: for ther is nothing more contrary to the saluation of the Soule, then to busie it selfe in gaining worldly riches and treasures.

The time whē as Origen liued An. 225.

Demetrius Byshop of Alexandria, reproued Origen for this deed.

As concerning carnall sinne, I am of the minde, that the young man had not the leysure to thinke thereon. For day and

The great & earnest zeale of the first Christians.

and night hee scarse had time to teach youth, were they Infants, Sons, daughters, Men and Women: not onely in the liberall Arts, wherein he was well skilled, but likewise in holy writ. And in the Primitiue Church, people of al sexes and ages, made no difficulty at all, to be taught in the Schooles of Christian Doctors. Likewise, as I haue read in Eusebius, the Ecclesiasticall Historian; he himselfe liued at that time, when Origen was so busied night and day, to enstruct euery one that made offer of himselfe; which appeared to bee so labourious a paine, as euery man was much amazed thereat. He liued very austerely, for hee neuer dranke any Wine, neither fed on Flesh; but contented himselfe with a little Bread and few Fruits, as the onely meanes (in his owne opinion) to spoile his stomack. In like maner, he went bare foote, and bare leg'd, and had very hard lodging: during then the course of so strict a life, it can be no way likely, that hee guelded himselfe, as fearing to bee tempted by the flesh. But I hold this coiecture (with others) that he did it to auoid suspition, and to take away all calumny, that might be iudged of young Schollers loose liuing: For the Paganes in those times, perceiuing that the Christians (in regard of the rigorous Edicts made against them) met together in the night time, rather then in the day, and in close Caues, to heare such Prayers & Sermons, as their Christian Pastours made vnto them, dreading to bee discouered and grieuously punnished; falsely imposed on them, that they made no such assemblies, but onely that they might licentiously exercise all kindes of whoredome, and that their Pastors and Doctours, not onely abused the fairest Women, but euen Boyes also:

Then it is to be presumed, that Origen acted not this violence on himselfe, but onely to the end, that the more freely Maids, Women, and Boyes (that came to his Schoole to be enstructed) might be cleare from blame, and himselfe also. Nor could he haue doone this, but by a magnanimity of courage, and great zeale in him, to aduance the Glory of God. In whose imitation, many, touched with the like zeale, did the like. As Melitus, a Man of heauenly minde and life; whose Bones remaine in the Citty of Sardis, as the fore-named Eusebius sets downe in his History, the fifteenth Chapter. From this height of his youth, he aspired to Martidome, and had attained thereto, had it not beene for his desolate Mother (who was before widdowed of his Father, that was a wealthy Cittizen of Alexandria) and some of her Children, lately become Christians. For they being faithfully informed of the day, when Origen ment in the morning to yeild himselfe to the Romaine Proconsull, he that was Deputy, to proscribe and put to death, all such as made profession of Christian Religion: She entering into his Chamber in the night time, when her Son slept very soundly, tooke away all his Garments, which shee hid and lockt vp very carefully, and by no meanes would deliuer them to him the next day, nor diuers daies following. Which hindred him of his Martyrdome, being ashamed to be seene naked. In which time, the Proconsull hauing executed his commissions, and the liues of no more Christians remaining in his hands. he went to another Citty, named Heliopolis, there to continue the rest of his charge. So it may appeare, that these occasions passed by Gods great prouidence, and Origen was then not to suffer death, in regard of the wonderfull benefit, which afterward redounded to all Christendome. For by his knowledge and dexterity in teaching, hee conuerted a great number of people to become Christians. He was likewise Schoole-Maister to many worthy and famous persons, who daily laboured to be worthy of Martyrdome. Namely, a young Lady, called Potamia, issued of a very illustrious Family, who endured so much in her Martyrdome; that Basilides (beeing her Hang-man or Executioner) inflicted all torment and extreamity of cruelty on her, before hee could cause her to dye: yet after her death, bethinking himselfe of the holy words vttered by her, during her torments, became a Christian and within few daies after, was himselfe likewise crowned with Martyrdome.

Origen, at the age of forty yeares, learned the Hebrew tongue, to the end, that (by his Commentaries) he might the better interpret the holy scriptures. And such was his ingenuity, that one Origen conuerted many to Christianity, by his doctrine and example of good life.

Origen had an extraordinary memory and guift in dictating.

named Ambroſe, a Byſhoppe, gaue him ſeauen Secretaries to write vnder him; all which hee wearied, beſide Men and Women, that wrote from his mouth as he gaue inſtructions. It is found in writing, that he compoſed fiue thouſand Bookes: neuertheleſſe, by laps of time, the greater part of them were vtterly loſt, and among them remaining, ſome haue bin approued by Diuines, and the reſt not. He quenched many Heriſies by his great experience; namely, that of Berillus, who maintained, that the Son of God was not before the Virgine Mary, from which errour hee conuerted him. He reduced to the Chriſtian Faith, the King of Arabia, and the Proconſull of Ægypt. His Learning and admired knowledge, was publiſhed in ſo many places, that Porphyrius keeping then a Schoole of Philoſophy in Scicily, and eſteemed to be the moſt learned Philoſopher ſince Ariſtotle; admiring Origens workes, became a Chriſtian. The Mother of the Emperor Seuerus, of whom wee ſpake in our precedent Chapter, hauing read ſome of his Workes, was conuerted. She ſent for him to come ſee her at Rome, which he did, & remained there for ſome time: where hee was found to bee much more learned, then Fame had ſpoken of him. There is nothing found written of his death; albeit I haue made diligent ſearch in Euſebius, from whom I collected this inſtant relation; and that he was liuing at the age of threeſcore years, wherefore it is preſumed that he dyed very old.

Many Hereſies ouerthrowne by the learning of Origen.

The King of Arabia and Proconſull of Egypt, conuerted by Origen.

The Mother to the Emperor Seuerus conuerted.

Now, hauing waded thus far in diſcourſe, concerning the mutilation that Origen made of himſelfe: I am the more willing to recite ſome Hiſtories (happening in our time) of other perſons, who on their own priuate motion, and for other endes, haue depriued themſelues of thoſe parts, contrary to the order of nature. About the yeare 1573. there was an aged Countrey-man, of a Village neere Segur, a Citty in the higher parts of Lymoſine, whoſe name I ſpare to ſpeake of, This man being a Widdower, it was noyſed of him (but falſely) that he had vnlawfull familiarity with his owne Sons Wife. Whereupon, ſome that were his Enemies, or rather more malicious then wiſe, laboured the matter to a Iuſtice: who commaunded further certainty of information, that punniſhment might be inflicted accordingly. The Country man being come to the City, to make his defence againſt this crime impoſed on him, and dyning with his Aduocates Clearke in a common Inne: found there a great company of young people, and other flouters, that in their drinking, ſpared not to deride and ieſt at the poore Countrey-man. After he had endured numberleſſe bitter girds and tauntes, ſuch as exceeded common patience to ſuffer; ariſing from the Table, and pretending to goe warme himſelfe by the Fire; hauing ſharpned his Knife on the Mantle-tree of the Chimney, which was of Free-ſtone, he inſtantly therewith did cut off his ſecret Members. The Hoſt that ſaw it, cryed out, and gaue great aſtoniſhment to all the reſt there preſent: But, the Country man eſcaping thence, fled home to his owne Houſe, which was more then halfe a league from the citty, bleeding extreamely all the way, and would haue no help of any Chirurgion, and yet he became recouered againe. In the doing of this Act, ſurely his intent was, either to auoid following ſuſpition of ſo foule a pollution; or, perhaps, in meere diſpaire, ſeeing himſelfe ſo ſcorned, as it was iuſtified.

A ſtrange boldneſſe in a poore man.

Other perſons of later time, that haue done the like to themſelues.

A memorable Hiſtory of an old man of Lymoſine.

A yong man of noble houſe, in the ſame Country, acted the like vpon himſelfe, in affliction of ſpirit; becauſe he could not haue carnall knowledge of a young widdowed Lady, only through his own diſability. For he had long time purſued her, and ſhe was as ready to accept (at three ſeuerall opportunities) as hee to offer. At laſt, taking his leaue of her, with ſome diſgrace, that ſhe ſhould be ſo apt, and he ſo vnable: to be reuenged on his imperfect Plant, ſuddenly he ſlic't it off, and would not admit any cure, but rather deſired to dye, by the expence & effuſion of his own blood. Yet at length he was perſwaded to entertain remedy, becauſe it was told him, that he ſtood in danger of his Soules deſtruction, and dying, he ſhould be allowed no Chriſtian buriall; becauſe it was an action of his owne wilfulneſſe. The wound in ſhort time after beeing cured, and the obloquy thereof remaining in freſh memory: he entred into a religious courſe of life, and continued afterward in good health for many yeares. Marcus

A miserable thing, that trafficke should be made of guelded Boies

Marcus Paulus Thenetus, and Garcias d'Orta, a Portugall Physitian, do deliuer for a certainty, that in Bengala (a Kingdome most potent at this day, seated on the Islands and mouth of the riuer Ganges, in the East Indies) the Moors inhabiting that place, do trauell vnto other firme lands, and the Neighboring Isles, to buy young Children, whose parents being poore and couetous of mony, do sell their sonnes, else these villaines will robbe and steale them thence, and then quite take away, not only Virga, but Parastatæ also. Such as escape death after this cutting, they educate them very delicately, and afterward sell them to the Persians, and other Mahumetistes, who buy them at a very deare rate, (to wit; three or foure hundred Ducats a piece) to serue as men of their Chambers, in a foule and vnlawfull acquaintance, and also, to haue the charge of their wiues.

A most abhominable sin.

The practise of the Turkes in Asia and Europe.

The Turkes that dwell in Europe and Asia, do vse the very same castration on such young Boyes as they can seize on in the Christians Countries, & then make sale of them in maner forenamed. As is made manifest by the Historie of the Lord of Villamont, vnder his owne hand in Writing, hee hauing seene the same in the Citty of Damas in Syria, in the yeare, 1589. hee saith, that a Bascha Lieutenant to the King, hauing married his Daughter, and being desirous for to make some honest present to hir before she departed from him, bethought him selfe of a Russian Slaue that he then had, beautifull, comely, and aged about 18. yeares: him did hee purpose to geld (in full manner before recited) and then to preferre him to his daughter, as one fit to attend her in her Chamber. This deliberation comming vnto the Slaues vnderstanding, he concluded to shunne his Maisters intent, because it was a hazard of life, either in Child or man. And therefore, rather then thus to die, he resolued to kill the Bascha his Maister; before hee would endure so notorious an Infamy. And indeede, hee executed his determination; for, finding his Maister (the second day after his daughters mariage) somewhat ouer wearied with Dauncing, Iusting, and Curuetting his Horse, and his belly well stuffed with Wine and Delicates, finding him fast sleeping on his bed, without speaking a word to any, he entered his Chamber; and with a most magnanimous Courage, gaue him many Woundes with a Knife in his throat. The Bascha awaking, cried to his people for succor: but the Slaue so expediously pursued his purpose, that the Bascha was dead, before any of his house could helpe him. Yet when they came, and entered the Chamber, seeing their Lord dead vpon the ground, and hee that did the deede there present, drawing forth their Cimetaries, and ouercome with extremity of fury, they hewed the slaue in more then an hundred pieces.

A Historie of a Russian Slaue.

A couragious resolution in a Slaue, for safety of him selfe

My conclusion then is, that all people whatsoeuer, as do vse such a wicked kind of Trafficke, in selling yong Children thus to be abused, are most Barbarous, vnworthy to be called men, and such also as serue their turn in this monstrous sin, because I hold it meere Treason against Nature. As for Origen, Melitus, and other Religious personnes, in acting such violence vpon themselues; I am of the mind of many Learned Diuines, that howsoeuer they did it on a sanctimonious intention; yet their zeal heerein deserued rather reprehension, then any rightfull commendation.

The Authors Conclusion.

Zeale beyond discretion is no way commendable.

CHAP. VIII.

The checke and reproach, which Cublay, Emperour of the Tartars, gaue to the Iewes, Mahumetists and Pagans, mocking them to be Christians; when they had lost the battaile against him.

IFinde Written in the Tartarian histories, that in the yeare, 1286. there raigned a most potent and wise Emperor ouer the Tartars, named Cublay, he that sent the great Captaine Baiam, to Conquer the great Prouince of Mangi, where was the admired Country of Cinquenule, which was raced by him, and all the Inhabitants slaine, for he killed thirty thousand Christians, against all right of warre, whereof I purpose to speake elsewhere. This Cublay, was a Pagan in Religion, worshipping the the Sunne, Moone, and the Starres, hauing (beside) certaine false Goddes, and (amongest others) one named Natagi, whom he beleeued to haue power ouer the fruits of the Earth, presented to him by diuers figures and Images: and this was the Faith and Religion which his predecessors had left vnto him. He commanded from the greater Armenia, euen to Calicut, a Kingdome in the Easterne Indiaes; insomuch, as then he might say of himselfe, that he was one of the greatest Lords of the world. He kept a verie magnificent Court, and (the most part of his time) in the goodly Citty of Cambalue, where he had a Pallace so great & spacious (standing on a faire riuers side running thorow the city) that he could easily giue entertainment to a thousand men. The City contained in circuite, about eight Leagues, and there was no day in the yeare, but there came thither more then a thousand Waggons laden with costly Cloaths of Silke. He hadde ordinarily twelue thousand Knightes for his Guard, three thousand whereof, guarded him three Dayes, and three Nights together; then three thousand other (in like manner) succeeded them, and so (alternatiuely) the whole yeares space: which manner of Guard, he kept as well in the times of peace, as warre, to declare his greatnesse, pompe, and magnificence.

His great dominion.

The great Citty of Cambalue.

Twelue thousand Knights were his Guard.

I will not speake of the sumptuous and wonderfull furnishment made for his Table, for it would be too long to rehearse, and almost impossible to be beleeued. I will bee silent also, in his Bounty and Liberality, which he dayly gaue away, not at his Subiects expences, but out of his prouident sparinges: without molesting his Subiects by nouell Subsidies, or any that dwelt within his Lands, of what Religion soeuer they were; as the Turke hath at all times dealt with the Iewes and Christians, whom he suffers to liue in his Empire, and to vse their owne Religions, but there wanteth no strict or strange conditions. Such as haue seene him, and afterward set downe his behauiour, do credibly affirme, that he neuer offendeth any man, except it be vnwittingly, and his Lieutenants and Commissaries do the very same. He loueth and supporteth his Subiects, to his vttermost power, and acknowledgeth any fauors or benefits done vnto him. Both he before, and now this other his Successour, haue had, and instantly hath in diuers of his Lands and Signiories, people of sundry Religions; as Christians, Nestorians, Armenians, Abissines, Græcians, Mahumetistes, Iewes, and Idolaters: yet haue they liued, and still do to this day, in all freedom of Conscience, without any further molestation, then they that obserue his owne Religion, permitting them also to builde Temples, wherein to exercise such Seruice as is theirs to them most frequent.

His sumptuous Diet, Humanity, and Liberality.

He giueth allowance to all manner of Religions in his Kingdoms.

This great Monarch, is not of the minde of the Mahumetan Princes, who comming to their State, begin the entrance of their Gouernment, with Parricides, Fratricides, and murther of all them that may aspire to the Royalty. As appeared by Sultan Selim, Emperour of Constantinople, who after hee had slaine his two elder Brothers, Achmath, and Corcutus; caused his Father Baiazeth also to be poysoned. And some few yeares before his owne death, demaunding of his Sonnes, which was he that hoped to raigne after him, because hee would leaue his empire to him; hee that durst boldly shewe this willingnesse to the State, so that it might be with his consent, hee caused him presently to bee strangled. But another of his Sons, named Sultan Solyman, who raigned not many yeares since, beeing admonished heereof by his Mother, who was well acquainted with the Empetours cruell Nature: refused the dignity wholy, terming himselfe his slaue, and not his son; who liuing after his fathers death, hardly could bee induced to take the charge on him, fearing that his cruell Father might as yet be aliue.

The differēce between Cublay, and the Mahometane Princes.

The brutish cruelties of Sultane Selim.

The cunning of Solyman, by his mothers instruction.

Muly Mahamet, King of Tunis, slew seauenteene of his Bretheren, when hee came vnto the Crowne; and not long after, ten or twelue of his neareſt Kindred. After his re-seating by the Emperor, for Barbarossa had quite expulsed him; his owne Son pulled out both his eyes. These matters would be very prolixe in recounting, because there hath not bin any Mahumetan Prince created, without some bloodshed of his kinred. What a contrary disposition was in this Cublay? for he aduāced his brothers, nephewes,

The bloudy cruelty of Muly Mahamet King of Tunis.

Cublay aduanced his Brothers, Nephewes, and Kindred, and was no way bloudy.

phewes and alliance in consanguinitie, to the greatest Offices and dignities hee could deuise. For, to som he gaue kingdomes, made others Lieutenantes ouer his greatest and goodliest Prouinces; others chiefe Commaunders of his Armies: briefly, in all the best manner hee could bethink him, did he promote his bloud, yet liued in all equity and content among his people; yea, he was of so extraordinary humanity, as hee was neuer willing to be seene in any battell, (after hee was created Emperour) but one: yet had hee bin in more then 12. before, so highly did he detest the death of men.

The great ingratitude of Naiam, Nephew, to the Emperor Cublay.

It happened, that a Nephew of his, named Naiam, growing ingratefull, and abusing the bounty of his Vnckle (for he was a young man, aged about thirtie yeares, proude, and ambitious) forgetting the Lawes of Nature, being constituted Gouernour of many Prouinces, where he hadde mighty possessions to maintaine a Royall estate, without any subiection to yeild an account of his actions; mooued by boldnesse and presumption, leauied a powerfull Armie, against his Vnckle and soueraigne Lord the Emperor Cublay, and brought it into open field. Now, to the end, that he might the better assure himself of victory, and to contend with some equallity of strength, he found the means to draw a Cosin of his to his faction, another Nephew to the said Emperor, who had conceiued a deadly hatred against his Vnckle, in regarde of many reprehensions receiued from him, for diuers insolences committed by him, in the charge of affairs committed to his trust: which made this Caydne (for so was he called) the readier to ioyne with his Kinsman, with presence of himselfe in person, & the aid of sixty thousand men. Following thus their desseigns, they complotted togither, to assemble their forces on a certaine plaine, for safer entrance into the Countrey, and speedier inuasion of the Emperour their Vnckle, before hee should aprehend the least surmise thereof. Naiam failed not then, with 40000. men, to be ready at the place appointed: but Caydne, vsing all diligence hee could deuise to keepe his promise, had not as yet his whol number of men so suddenly furnished.

Preparation for hot warre against the Emperor.

This enterprize was quickly discouered to the Emperor Cublay, and with what courage his Nephews (in publick conspiracy) were thus in open armes against him. He being a wise Prince, and a very worthy Souldiour, was not negligent in opposing himself against their purposes: wherefore, he appointed store of men to keepe the wayes, bridges, and passages, to hinder those two Armies from ioyning together, and that his Nephewes might not bee acquainted with his intentions. Afterward, he called his men of Warre to the Field, which hee had secretly drawne from the neerest parts to Cambalue, where he euer kept his Court. Yet now he had much ado, so suddenly to procure these Souldiors togither, because he had sent two great Armies into Countries farre off, for the Conquest of some other new Prouinces. This Army thus made ready, as best means would permit, & so short a respit affoorded, went to meet the one Enemy, who was not (as yet) ioyned with Cadne, and they were charged so vnprouided, as they had not leisure to raunge their men in battell array; but the one part were slaine, & the rest put to flight. Some were taken prisoners, amongest whom was Naiam, who being brought before Cublay, they would haue slayne him in his presence; but he commaunded, that he should be wrapped vp in a great cloath of Silke, well bound about with Cords, to the end he might bee smothered therein, which was accordingly executed. But before hee would suffer this to be doone, hee caused the slaughter (then made of his Enemies) to cease, sending them free pardon; & immediatly more then forty Ensignes were brought and laid at his feete; in which Ensignes, were the figures of Crosses, such as we see at this day among vs.

The Emperor vnderstood this conspiracy of his Nephewes and prepareth to withstand them.

Cublay ouercommeth the Army of Naiam, who was taken Prisoner.

Naiam smothered to death in Silke, and his followers pardoned.

Heere is to be vnderstood, that the people thus offending with Naiam, wer almost all Christians, according to the Nestorians, Armenians, or Abessines, and he himselfe would haue seemed to bee such; but in very deed, he rather appeared to be of no Religion at al. Heereupon, the Iews, Mahumetists, and Pagans being Conquerours vnder the pay of Cublay, began to shout, scoffe, & make a mockery, at some fifteene thousande Christians, disarmed and brought as prisoners soners before him, expecting when hee wold command them to be massacred. But quite contrary, beeing then mounted on a braue and gallant young Elephant, on whose backe his seate royall was most sumptuously carried, silence being made, and their mockeries appeased: he commanded them all to troope about him, to hear what further he had to say vnto them, and then, in the open Field, he made this Oration.

The Oration of the Emperour Cublay, to his Prisoners, and all other there present.

Cub'ay attributeth his victory, to his great God the Sun.

THis day I cannot deny, but that the victorie which I haue obtained ouer mine enemies, is by especial grace from my great GOD the Sunne, Moone, and the Startes, abiding in this glorious Vault of Heauen. To whom, I purpose to render thankes to morrow, euen in this open field of battaile, in making Oblation of good and worthy Sacrifices. Wherefore, let the Maisters of the field giue order, that the places be auoided of human bodies heer slaine, as also of the dead Beasts, and decent Altars purposely erected. As for the prisoners, beeing most part of them Christians, whom I behold despoiled of their Armes, shouted at, mocked, despised, and iested at by the Iewes, Mahumetists, and others, vpbraiding them with their God Iesus Christ (who was sometime fastned to a crosse by the said Iewes) for not ayding and helping them to the victory, as wanting such power, because so many of their Ensignes are heere prostrated at my feet: From this present houre forward, I forbid all maner of persons, of what quality or Religion soeuer they be, to vse any more such derision of them, on paine to bee depriued of their armes, and well whipped with Roddes at two seuerall times, yea, on the very greatest paine beside, that can be imagined. And so much the rather, because their God Iesus Christ is esteemed of vs, to be one of the verie greatest celestiall Deities, ful of al right, Equity, and Iustice. For, hee knowing these Christians to make warre vniustly against vs, being our subiectes, that neuer gaue them occasion, but reuolted of themselues, and adhered with our enemies: therefore hath hee permitted, that I should win the day, albeit I haue heard him to be called the God of battailes. Ouer and beside this, I pardon al them, that haue followed my vnkinde Nephewes Naiam and Caydue, as being meerely deceiued by them, in making them beleeue, that they were leuied for my seruice; and therfore I receiue them againe into my protection. Giuing further to vnderstand, that all such as haue any prisoners, they are not to offer thē the least harme whatsoeuer, but immediately to set them at liberty, deliuering them their armes, and all other Equipages to them belonging, on pain to passe thorow the daunger of the Army, euen he the proudest that shall make deniall. Our charge imposed on the Christians, is, to pray vnto their God for our prosperity, and to do vs nine moneths Seruice, by taking Wages of vs, in our instant Warre against the King of Nixamora, who denieth to pay vs our tribute and striues to equall himselfe with our Greatnesse.

Cublay pardoneth the Rebels that took part with his Nephewes.

Cublay enioyned the Christians, to pray to their God for him.

Cublay prohibiteth all mockes and scorning of the Christians.

In regard of this Edict, the Christians had gentle vsage, especially, of the Iewes, who persecuted the Christians more (where they got superiority) then any other whatsoeuer. Euery man may iudge by this worthy deede, that Cublay was a very generous & vertuous Prince, full of piety, in acknowledging, that his victorious battels, proceeded of God, and not of men. It was neuer heard, that Alexander the Great, who wonne no meane store of battailes, with an infinit number of goodly strong Cities; that euer he rendred thankes to God, or (at the least) vnto his own Gods, in whom he pretended to haue some confidence. Oftentimes he consulted with prosane Priests and Oracles, to know if he shold be Monarch of the whole vniuerse, and whether he were the Sonne of Iupiter, or no, with diuers other such like ydle vanities. At length, hee would needes make men to adore him; Nay, there are some do write, that he exacted it vpon compulsion, but he liued not long after these ambitious follies had so blinded his

The vanities of Iulius Cæſar, Emperor of Rome.

Iulius Cæſar likewiſe, a famous Captaine, of admirable great ſpirit, & moſt expert in many ſinguler ſciences, yet he tooke this fond conceit of himſelfe (ſeeing he had obtained the Roman Empire by Armes) that he had more in him thē meer humanity, by his actions, perſwading himſelf, that he was iſſued (in race) from the Gods, by meere alliance to Venus. Which being perceiued by diuers Princes, and many of the Commonweale alſo, coueting to pleaſe him in his ambitious arrogancy; they Dedicated Temples to him; yea, ſome Sacrificed vnto him. As yet at this day is to be diſcerned at Sydon, a City of Phœnicia, wher it is inſculpt vppon the gate, Diuo Iulio Cæſari dicatum; Conſecrated to Iulius Cæſar the God. And on a Collome (which is placed on a little Mountaine, at the very mouth of the Euxine Sea, expoſed on all ſides to the violence of the Waues) containing eighteen foot in length, and eight and an halfe in Circumference, on the Baſes of the Piller was Engrauen this Verſe:

A Piller at the entrance of the Euxine Sea.

Cæſar tantus erat, qd. nullus maior in orbe: that is, Cæſar was ſo great, and of ſuch power, as he might tearme himſelfe the chiefe and moſt excellent of all Men in the world. It is very well knowne, that it was himſelfe that cauſed this Inſcription there to be engrauen. Yet (for all this) it was neuer knowne, that euer he acknowledged his victories for to come from God: for he raigned not long, & leſſe then Alexander, becauſe hee was murdred in the Senat houſe.

Cæſar raigned not ſo long as Alexander.

The great modeſtie and humanitie of Charles the fift Emperor.

Charles, the fift Emperour of that Name, hauing won a great and memorable battaile againſt the Sectaries in Germany; and namely, againſt the Saxon, the foure and twenty day of Aprill, Anno Dom. 1547. would not proudly ſay, as Iulius Cæſar did, when hee conquered Pompey the Great, and wrote theſe three words to the Romain Senate; Veni, Vidi, Vici. But Charles, full of true pietie, and well knowing; that victories diſcended from on high, ſaid; Veni, Vidi, & Dominus Deus meus vicit, to wit; I came, I ſaw, but it was God my Lord that Conquered.

Chriſtiā Princes moued ſome way blame worthy

The Hiſtory of the Emperor Cublay, may make ſom Chriſtian Princes bluſh with ſhame, who hauing warre againſt others of the ſame Law, Faith, and Religion, will not yet (in their victories) pardon their enemies, but put them all to the edge of the Sword. Neither will they acknowledge God to be Authour of their victories, but attribute all vnto their own ſtrength and magnanimitie: wherein this blinded Prince (deprined of the true Knowledge of God, Cublay a Pagan, Emperour of the Tartarians) made it a great ſcruple to offend.

CHAP. IX.

From whence the name of Sarazins came at the firſt, and what people they haue continued, euen to this day.

A great error in many graue Authors.

I haue noted a verie great error, committed by Sabellicus, Blondus, the Tyrian Byſhop, Volaterranus, and many other graue authors, who (in their workes) haue tearmed the Mahumetiſts or Turkes, to bee Sarazins: for they neuer knew any ſuch name, neither were at any time ſo caled, but only Mulſulmans, which is as much to ſay, as a people faithfull in their Law or Religion. Others, who thought their Iudgement to be much more pregnant, dared to ſay, that this name of Sarrazin, came of Sarra, the wife of Abraham, of whoſe race, the great Prophet Mahomet (inuenter and deuiſer of their Religion and Lawes, held euen to this day by the Sarazins and Turkes) they affirme to bee diſcended. But this coniecture is not warrantable, becauſe they rather coueted to be called Agarians, in regarde of Agar, Handmaid to Sarra, and Mother of Iſmael: Or elſe Iſmaelites, in iudging themſelues to be yſſued of the ſayde Iſmael, Baſtard ſonne to the ſore-named Abraham.

What the word Mulſulmā ſignifieth.

From whence the Sarazins deriue their diſcent.

But let vs leaue theſe falſe Etimologies, which neither carry, or can yeelde any true likely-hood, and come to the very Original of the name Sarrazin. The error grew from hence, that ſome ſhort while before Mahomet, or Muhamet (as others terme him) aroſe, and began to extend himſelfe as well towardes Suria, as Perſia: there liued in the rocky Arabia and Idumea, certaine Arabes, who made their abode and dwelling (and yet do to this day) vnder little Tentes or enclosures, and had no other trade or maintenance for their liuing, but by Thefts & Robberies, which they daily exercised vpon all passengers, were they Turkes, Christians, Pagans, or whatsoeuer. Of which Robbers and Theeues, the country could neuer be freed, neither yet can be to this day; as such doe faithfully affirm, who haue trauailed on pilgrimage to Mount Sinai, at Ierusalem. And the Turks themselues do confes, that when deuotion drew them foorth on pilgrimage, to the Citty of Medinai al Nabi, that is, the Citty of the Prophet, scituate in Arabia Fœlix, where the Sepulchre of Mahomet is; and when likewise they do yet passe through the very greatest solitudes and deserts (as many times the Christians doe:) They finde them to be peopled with these kinds of Theeues, as formerly hath been saide, who name themselues Sarracenis, not in regard of Religion or bloode; but by an auncient appellation of the sayde people; of whome, Ptolomy maketh mention, and saith, that their liuing is in Idumea.

and

Sarrazins were a people dwelling in the deserts of Arabia and Idumea.

The Turkes go on pilgrimage.

Sarracenis, the name they giue themselues

Amian. Marcellin. lib. Apost. 14.

Amianus Marcellinus, in the History of Iulian the Apostate Emperor, makes a Description of them, and saith: Those places (more then two hundred yeares before the Originall of Mahomet, or of his Alchoran) were fully furnished with the Sarrazins; yea, so was Assyria afterward, euen so farre as the Cataractes of Nylus, or the Kingdome of Prester Iohn, where they vsed the same courses, violences, and Thefts, vpon Merchants & Inhabitants of the neighboring Countries, according as the Arabes or Alarbes do at this day. Whereuppon, because that their chiefest habitation was in the Deserts and Mountaines, which are in Arabia, and the adiacent quarters or Countries, as Chaldea, Assyria, Mesapotamia, Suria, and Egipt, when the Arabes arose with their new Religion, and had frequented the foresaid Regions: The nearer Countries supposed, that these people were those former Sarrazins, by ignorance of their Language, as also by the rashnes of some writers, who liued then in Suria, & since that time in Spain, pretending to haue good knowledge of those people, and therefore continually then called them Sarrazins.

Antiquitie of the Sarrazin people.

The neighboring Countries to Arabia

Moreouer, to confirme that vain appellation, those Interpreters in Spaine, who (by commandement of S. Bernard) were appointed to interpret the Alchoran; in euery place where they founde the vocable, Mulsulman (which is as much to say in the Arabian tongue, as Peaceable and faithfull towardes God) they translated the same Sarracenis, or Sarrazins. This Mulsulman then is the word, whereby all (that beleeue in the Alchoran) will be called: whither they be Arabes, Syrians, Persians, Tartares, Turkes, or Moores. Whosoeuer then, woulde enter into any peaceable and Friendly Conference with them (albeit, none do hate their name more then the Turkes) must call them Mulsulmans, as we doe our selues Christians, or faithfull people. So are they all named, by the Author of the Ismael, or Ismaelitish race, & by their Bastard Prophet. After our maner, & in respect of religion, they terme a man Mulsulman, and a woman Mulsulmina, or Mulsulminet; albeit, some say Mussim, by a corrupt pronounciation, as we may conceiue by our selues, who do vse to call those disfigured Wanderers, that walke among vs with deformed faces, and long ill-fauoured lockes, vsing all subtile Thefts, Pilferies, and Legier du maines they can deuise; wee Nick-name to be Sarrazins, Egiptians, or Gypsies.

Error in translation of the Alchoran.

Mulsulman, a general name for them that beleiue in the Alchoran.

Sarrazins will be called Mulsulmans.

Our Sarazins or Gipsies.

I thus conclude then, that when Historians Write, that the Sarrazins inuaded and made vse of Rhodes; Next, of Thrace, then of Italy, Spaine, and other Countries: it is to be vnderstood of the Orientall people & Affricans, that were of the Mahometane Religion; because they vsed the selfesame Cruelties, thefts and Robberies, as the Sarrazins of rocky Arabia did. And to speake truly, all Europe would (at this instant) haue bin haunted with those people, if they had not bin formerly expelled and spoyled. It remaineth yet fresh in memory, that the Great Grand-father to Phillip King of Spaine (not long since deceased) named Ferdinand, expulsed them out of the Kingdome of Granado, with their King called Melen; and he bestowed six whole yeares together in stout warres, onely for foyling them. And then the Dominion, which the Sarrazins and Moores

A great slaughter of the Sarrazins in Spaine by King Alphonsus.

Before the sayd Ferdinand, King Alphonsus, in the yeare of our Lord, 1233. slew in diuers places, aboue 200000. of thē, euen when they helde strong Castles, Forts, and Cities in Spaine, all which he forced them to forsake, and since then, they haue bin vtterly ruined. Henrie the Emperor made another great massacre of them in Italy, in the yeare of Christ, 1010. expelling them wholy out of that Country. Among the Sarrazins, there were not onely generous persons, but likewise some men of great learning, as Auicen, Mesuus, Isaac, Manfor, Auerroes, and many others.

Another massacre of them in Italy, by the Emperor Henry.

Now, as al things haue their vicissitude and alteration by courses; so, after that the Sarrazins had raigned in Affrica, and partly in Europe, about the space of 800. yeares, there came a people from diuers parts of Scythia (which at this day we call Turkes) who in lesse then 200. yeares, ouercame in armes those people called Sarrazins, with many other christians beside, not onely in Asia, but also in Europe and Affrica. And albeit, those Turks were of the same religion; to wit, Mahumetists: yet did they not abstaine from vexing and troubling them vvith War, euen as they did the Christians: For in the yeare, 1012. they tooke Ierusalem, and all Iudea: but the Sarrazins of Egipt recouered them againe, and held them for 300. yeares after. Neuertheless, they were yet againe expulsed thence, in the yeare, 1517. by the Turks; the Sarrazins loosing then, not only Palestine, and the Holy-land; but likewise Egipt, Syria, Arabia, and the very same Country of Idumea, whereas the Sarrazins had their Originall; and are there subiect to the Turks now at this instant: For Campson (their King) lost the day against Selim, Emperour of the Turkes, and Tomombeus his successour, beeing next chosen their King in his place: but he was taken, and (afterward) most ignominiously strangled in the Graund-Cayre, the very principall City of Egypt. Where we may behold the end of the Sarrazins, not any part of them now remayning, except a few in the place forenamed, who continue in base seruility to the Turkes.

The Turkes ouercame the Sarrazins in lesse then 200 yeares.

The Sarrazins lost Ierusalem, and all Iudea to the Turkes.

Campson King of the Sarrazins foiled by Selim.

Tomombeus, last King of the Sarrazins strangled.

This briefe discourse, may giue vs to vnderstand, that Sarrazins were not at all such as are called Mahumetists: but they that hadde their beginning in the Countries of Idumea, and the Desert of rocky Arabia, with all those that (being ioyned with them) commaunded vnder them in diuers Countries, bringing other Nations likewise in subiection to them by Armes, vntil such time, as they wer exterminated by the people, whose countries they vniustly vsurped by war, & also at length, by the Turks, althogh they be of the same religion. For war is maintayned among them, onely for desire of soueraignty and ambition: which is not so commendable among vs that are Christians, or that we should be sick of such a bad disease.

Sarrazins began onely in Idumea, and none now remaining but only there.

CHAP. X.

Of the Title or name of Seruant, slaue, Bond-slaues, and such like. Their Original, and how they were vsed in elder times, and are at this present.

FOrasmuch as in our time, we haue so great speech of the ouer-abounding multitude of captiues or Slaues, which the Turks & Moores lead away out of Christian Countries, wherof the French seem to haue no feeling at all, because such a case concernes not them; in regard of their good policy & order, by their most Christian Kings care, & his counsel: yet notwithstanding such occasiō may hereafter happen, that if euer God shold suffer his Mahometan enemy to preuail so far, as he hath done elsewhere, they would then acknowledge by most wofull experience, what the condition of captiues & Bondslaues is, wherof I purpose to discourse in this Chapter. And to begin at the ancientnesse of slaues or Bondmen, it would be somewhat hard to assure, at what time they first began to be so called and vsed. because we find in the sacred scriptures; that Abraham had no other seruants but France insensible of such afflictions as Bond-men feele.

Abraham had no Seruants but Slaues male and female.

Slaues, as well male as female, & (withall) had a great number of them. Wherby may bee presumed, that (long time before) there was such a seruile condition: for, acording to the supputation of Carion, the Germaine Cosmographer, Abraham liued in the yeare of the World, 2047. Their Originall then (vndoubtedly) proceeded of wars, wherin the victor vsurped al right of domination ouer the vanquished.

The Originall of Slaues.

The Romans called a Slaue or Captiue Seruum, as we in our Language entitle a Seruant, because he that was taken in the wars, was kept and guarded. And then, if he was not put to his ransome, (according as hee pleased, into whose power he was faln, or else, if he bought him) he remaind as his slaue or seruant, and he might smite, beate, and kill him. Moreouer, he could not possesse any thing, that was in his Maisters charge & keeping, albeit he wer extracted by race Royall, noble, or ignoble. For the word Slaue, Seruant, or Captiue, it is to bee vnderstood, not onely of such as are taken in Land-battels, or Nauall skirmishes, encounters, surprizal of Cities, Townes, or like places; but likewise, al those that can bee, and are seized on in the enemies Countrey, although they be Infants sucking at the breast, or of greater yeares; Women with Childe, and the fruit in their wombes, alwayes were, and yet are to this day, subiect to seruitude. This is thus doone by the Law of Nations, and al Nations in former times vsed the same, and so is it stil in vse, except it be in case of one and the same Religion.

The etymologie of Seruant.

The quality and condition of a Slaue.

How the word word Captiue or Slaue is to be vnderstood

Ius Gentium.

One might be made a Slaue (as yet we see in all the East, & in Affrica, Spain, Italy, Poland, Moscouia, Germany, and in other Prouinces obserued, except in warring against people of one religion) foure manner of wayes. The first, was by War; the second, when he was the Son of a woman slaue; the third, when any man sold him, to participate in the price of his vendition, which oftimes is done in a desperate manner, not hauing any meanes of liuing, or when a man will foolishly expose his own freedome to bondage. There are too many at this day so hot of Nature, as, if they could, they would do the like; witnesse such, as leaue themselues neither lands, goods, nor Kindred. The fourth manner, was by crime and offence, when a man had not where-withall to satisfie the party offended; then he was sold, if the crime committed, required such a punishment.

Foure seueral waies wherby a man may becom a slaue

It is a question, but (indeede) mine owne, whether it bee better to make a prisoner (taken in Warre) a slaue, or to kil him, according to the custom of Nations? I answere, that it seemeth more humain and ciuill, to take a prisoner (in war) in condition of a slaue; then to kill him, although it be in a mans power to do it, and without any impunity. For, by the Law of God & Nature, it is forbidden to kil, but not to be made a slaue; because it appeareth that Moises permitted it. In like manner, it is the propertie of a Wise or discreet man, to rule and gouerne his slaue or Bondman humainly; albeit it were much better for some, to be slaine outright at the very instant, then to fall into some mens handes, and liue in their subiection. The paines and torments which they suffer, & must do, God best knoweth how long, wee purpose to speake of heereafter. For, heere I would demaund another Question, to wit; whether it be beneficiall to a commonwealth, to haue Slaues, or not?

A question demanded, and discreetly answered.

God and Nature forbiddeth to kill.

Another question.

How dangerous it is to a Commonweal or Kingdom, to haue a great number of slaues, especially, if they can compasse the meanes to league & combine themselues: may be read in the Romaine Histories, much more then euer they dreamt of, and to the maine hazard of their whole estate. For they could not be hindred, but that they arose thoroughout all Italy, to the number of threescore thousand, and vnder the conduct of one Spartacus, they vanquished the Romans in three fought battels. It is most certain, that there was then in the field: ten slaues for one free-man. Silla made an Edict, that euery slaue that did bring the head of his Maister, should be enfranchised, to wit; of euery such man as had followed the part of Caius Marius, against him; which very many did. Now, it is not to be doubted, but that how many slaues soeuer wer in the battaile; as many enemies at home had they in their families. At such time as the persecutions began to grow hot against the Christians in the Primitiue church, there there was no Maister that durst become a Christian, except with the hazzard of his life, for hee must either enfranchise his slaues, or else they wold accuse him.

In the primitiue Church.

From whence proceeded the first power of the Sarrazins

The power of the Sarrazins in Arabia, tooke first Originall, when as a Captain named Homar, Lieutenant to Mahomet, had promised Liberty to such Slaues as would follow him. Heereon he drew so great a number to him, as (in few years) they made them-selues Lordes of the East. For the word [Libertie,] and fame of the Conquestes made by the Slaues, enflamed the mindes of all them in Europe, and raysed them vppe in Armes. First of all in Spaine, in the yeare, 781. Afterward, in the Kingdome of France, in the times of Charlemaigne, and Lewes the Pittifull, as may be gathered by the Edicts then made, against the Conspiracies of Slaues. Then Lotharius, the Sonne of Lewes, after he hadde lost two Battailes which he waged against his Bretheren, re-called the Slaues to his ayde, and they (soone after) began to pursue their Maisters; in the yeare, eight hundered fifty two: which fierce fire, suddenly kindled in Germanie; also, where the Slaues entering into Armes, shooke the estate both of the Cities & Princes; yea, the King of the Allemaignes was faine to assemble all his forces, to break the Gordion knot of this strange combination.

Al Europe wofully tormented by slaues, in many places.

A Roman Senator accused by his Slaue, before cruell Tiberius.

I remember the History of a Roman Senator, who was in very great perrill of his life, by beeing accused by one of his Slaues, before the Emperour Tyberius, to wit; that the Image of Tyberius, which was engrauen on a Ring that the Senatour wore in his finger, had touched the Vrinall as hee was making water; and this was taken for an Offence of High-treason, such was the extream Tiranny and light beleefe of the Emperor Tyberius.

The Historie of a slaue Moore, in the Isle of Maiorica.

In like manner, there haue bin many of later times, that murdered their Maisters, and committed other monstrous villanies, as not long since a slaue Moore did, in the Isle of Maiorica. This damned Villaine, hauing beene beaten by his Maister, for some notorious Offence, watching his opportunity for reuenge, first violated the honour of his Mistris, then threw two of hir children forth at the Castle window, wherein he made vse of this aduantage, locking the doors fast against his Master, who stood without, and beheld this wofull spectacle. At last, he made his Maister to cut off his owne Nose, to saue the youngest child that yet remained aliue: For, the slaue had sworn, that if he would cut off his nose, he would not hurt the Infant. No sooner had the Maister acted this cruelty on himselfe, but the perfidious slaue Moore, cutting the childes throat, threw it down to the other, & then cast himselfe headlong after, in a villanous bruery. I could aledge infinit other examples, if I were so minded; but in regard of breuity, I wil entreat the Reader to rest satisfied with these.

A multitude of slaues is very dangerous.

Behold then what a danger it is, to be serued with slaues, and how a multitude of them, haue falne out to be the ruine of Countries; & as it is not good to haue many, so is it very behoouefull, to see that no wher they exceed the free. Wherefore it is very conuenient to manumise them, or els to vse them gently, to beget rather loue then hatred of thē, not vrging them to desperat actions vn beseeming their duty; training them vp rather in mechanicall exercises (as was ordayned by Licurgus & Numa Pompilius) then in any sturdy or robust busines, befitting Armes. And in truth, the greater part of such Bondmen or slaues, wer then enstructed in Mechanick Arts; for some of them were Shoo makers, Taylers, Carpenters, Smiths, Cloathiers, Ship-wrights, Masons, Gold-Smiths, Ioiners, & such like honest trades. They were also imployed by straungers, because they should return the gain which they made by their labor, to their Maisters. And that it should be so, Cato the Censor, who was so conscientious, and had about him 200. slaues, hee contented him-selfe with the profites that (by them) came to him, and the Reuenues of a small Countrey Farme which he had, and that he sold to them backe againe, at an easie price, when hee beheld them to decline by age, because by their paine and endeuor he at first purchast it.

Licurgus, and Numa Pompilius, gaue Orders for slaues

How wise Cato the Censor imployed his Slaues.

Example of rich Crassus the Romaine Citizen.

Crassus, one of the richest Roman Citizens that euer was before or after him, had ordinarily fiue hundred very profitable Slaues, of diuers employments, beside such as he kept in his house. They enriched their Maister (within very few yeares) only by their gaines: for great account (in times past) was made of such a setled estate, and it was helde the very best assurance of inheritance, that a man could then leaue to his heires. And in these dayes, such as are vnder the Turkes Dominion, do vse the very same kind of benifiting, for he that hath foure or fiue Slaues, strong, healthful, and lusty; attaineth to great riches by them. Beside, many are much better serued by them, then by their mercenary seruants; that leaue them at their owne pleasure, when these other dare not do so.

Vnualewable benefit made by Slaues in the Turks dominions.

The vsage of the Parthians to their slaues

The Parthians vsed not to intreat their slaues vngently, but accounted of them as their owne Children; yet notwithstanding, they were prohibited from infranchising them. They multiplied in such aboundant manner, as, in all their Army, there was found but foure hundred and fifty free men. Florus saith, that the Romans did set at liberty eight thousand Slaues, whom they caused to bear Armes, in regard of the great losse they had receiued in the battell at Cannas, against Hannibal, and they did great seruice to the Commonwealth. Comming now to our instant daies, to speak what maner of vsage they indure; I am silent, and must dumbly let slip the execrable Villanies (without all dread of punishment) inflicted on them, of whatsoeuer sex they be: only I will discourse of other matters belonging to them, and according as my instant subiect grants me leaue.

Florus in Ep. 74

The handling of slaues in diuers partes, and among the Romains.

So soone as such a one was falne into his enimies hand, be it of which side it should so happen; if he might not be rendred back vpon exchange, or put to his ransom, or be bought again as a captiue: then was the prisoners head presently shauen, and after marked with a hot iron on the arme, but more cõmonly in the forhead. If he wer of stature, he was then set to keep horses, work in the fields, Till the grounds; but very badly clothed, euen as the poor toiling slaues are in the gallies. Many times they haue bin imployed in very vnclean Offices, as to empty Priuies, & to hold the vrinall.

The Noble courage of a Celticke slaue.

Witnes a Cels (that is, one born in Gaul) whom his new Maister set to holde the stoole wherein he auoided his Excrements, which made him say; I will make thee look on me whom thou hast bought, in much better maner. So getting vp to the house top, threw himselfe downe, and there died, affecting rather any kinde of death, then to do such vilanous seruices. Maisters euermore had the life & death of their slaues in their power, albeit Tyberius would not permit it; but rather suffred slaues to bring their Maisters to the iudgement bar, for their hard vsage, & he that killed his slaue, was acounted as a murderer. The like ordained Nero, Adrian, & others; but it was neuer obserued, or (at least) it lasted but a while.

The life and death of a slaue in his Maisters power.

The Edict of Tyberius.

They were beaten (in those times) as oft as their Maisters pleased, & because they would not do it themselues, they had certain houses out of the city, wher men were purposely appointed and waged, to torment and beat thẽ with hard knotted cords, knagged staues, or certaine Bodkins, wherewith they would pierce into their bodies, euen in such places as wer most sensible; & this must be done as oft as the Maister commanded, standing by, beside good store of other torments. These men had for each slaue they thus tortured, a certain sum of mony, euen as Hangmen haue; and either they did it in their Maisters presence, or some that were (by them) appointed to see it done. Many of them had their lips and Nostrils slit vppe, if they appeared to be short winded, euen as now adayes we deale with Horsses. The Emperour Adrian, a very humaine Prince, who gouernd in the yeare of Iesus Christ, 120. returning one day from the fields, chanced to passe by the place where these cruelties were exercised; and buying all them that were thus to be tormented, bestowed their Liberty instantly on them.

Diuers Torments daily deuised for slaues, & cruelly executed on them.

Men had wages to tormẽt slaues.

The great humanity of the Emperor Adrian.

Titus Liui. Lib. 4. Cap. 9.

If it hapned that a Master was slain in his house, about som quarrell, or otherwise, and by whomsoeuer, all his slaues were presently put to death. As it came to passe, by reason of a murder committed on the person of the great Prouost of Rome; when question was made, of putting al his slaues to death, according (saith Tacitus) to the ancient Custome. The vulgar people, who wer (the more part of them) enfranchised men, began to be moued, because it was wel inough knowne who was the murtherer; and yet notwithstanding, foure hundered innocents innocents ſhould therfore ſuffer death. The matter being debated in the Senat, it was there concluded, that the cuſtom muſt be kept; and thereuppon, all the Slaues were put to death. I ſpare to ſpeak of the murder of ſlaues, who were conſtrained to kill one another at Areines, and then their Bodies were expoſed to Beaſts: all being done to delight the people, and for a cuſtome in contempt of death.

The murther of ſlaues at Areines.

Another act of humanity in the Emperor Adrian.

The Emperor Adrian, of whom we haue already ſpoken, being in ſom choller, threwe an engrauen Iron at one of his Slaues, which Iron (vnhappily) hee had then in his hand; the ſlaue (not hearing what his Lord had commaunded him) by misfortune hadde this his eye ſmitten out. The Emperour calling the Slaue to him, ſaid; He was infinitly ſorry for the loſſe of his eye, and therefore deſired him, to ask whatſoeuer he wold in recompence, and it ſhould be granted him. The Slaue made anſwere, I can demand nothing of ſuch worth, or thou grant it, that can equall the value of the eie I haue loſt. Other Maiſters neuer ſhewed ſuch humanity in Nature, but rather were of much ſtearner cruelty: As Flaminius the Senatour, who cauſed one of his beſt ſlaues to bee ſlaine, without any other cauſe, but to pleaſe his Ingle boy (which he kept for Sodomy) who ſaide, that hee neuer ſaw a man ſlaine. At the ſiedge of Ieruſalem, in one day, there was ſlaine twenty thouſand Iewiſh ſlaues becauſe a Soldiour had eſpied Golde in the intrailes of a Iew, who had bin killed before, by the paſſage of a Sworde quite thorough his body. Hee aduertiſing his Companions heereof, the Roman Soldiers, they did forthwith cut the throats of all their Slaues that were Iewes, and ſearched into their Bowelles and Inteſtines, to ſee if there they could finde any Gold.

Ioſeph in lib. de Bel. Iudaic.

Auguſtus Ceſar, banketting one day with Aſinius Pollio, his very great friend, a yong Slaue that waited on the Table, chaunced to breake a Glaſſe, whereof Pollio hauing notice, commaunded him preſently to be caſt into a Pond, where he kept certaine Murenes (which are Fiſhes of two or three cubits long, vvith very ſharpe Teeth) to bee deuoured by thoſe Fiſhes. The poore Slaue, threwe himſelfe at the feet of Auguſtus, to entreat, not to ſaue his life, for hee confeſſed that he had deſetued death, in breaking a Glaſſe that his Maiſter ſo eſteemed: but only, that he would chaunge the torment to ſome other. Auguſtus would not ſo much as moue Pollio therin: Whereupon, the Slaue was thrown into the Pond, and miſerably torne in pieces, as Seneca affirmeth. The Lacedemonians beholding their Slaues to multiply in great numbers; made a leauy among them of three thouſand men, the very ableſt that could be found, and pretending to releaſe their bondage, in one night they were all ſlaine, without any knowledge what was become of them.

Seneca. Lib. 84 Aſinius Pollio, kild his ſlaue for breaking a Glaſſe.

The inhumanity of the Lacedemonians.

The Grecians, Spaniards, and Allemaignes, vſed the ſame manner of behauiour to their Slaues, as the Romans did. Iulius Ceſar declareth, that the Gaules would Sacrifice their ſlaues, and throw a great number of them into the Fire, when the Bodies of their deceaſed Maiſters were to be burnt. The Allemaignes exceeding theſe Cruelties, if it hapned that their ſlaues, either by ſickneſs, wearineſſe, or famiſhment, could not follow them in their iournies; they would cut off their Feet, & ſo leaue them ſtaruing to death. We wil heere end this Chapter, leaſt wee ſhould tire the Reader with length, and barbarous Cruelties. Now we will ſpeake of Slaues among the Turkes, and what is become of the ancient race of ſlaues; alſo, how long it is ſince the Mahometans and Chriſtians had no Slaues.

CHAP. XI.

Of Slaues made by the Turkes and Mahometanes. Alſo, how the race of the auncient Chriſtian Slaues became loſt.

Mahomet, firſt Inuenter and Father of the Alchoran religion, to attract people enow to his curſed ſect (which he planted by armes) ordained, that not any Mulſulman, or ſuch as made profeſſion of Religion, ſhold be a ſlaue, though he were taken in war, or otherwiſe, which hath bin ſeriouſly obſerued, from the year, 742. to this preſent; Mahometans nor Chriſtians made no ſlaues among them.

sent. Yet this was not kept by the Christians, who hauing Warre one against another, vsed their captiues and slaues, acording as the Romans did. But the Pastors in the Christian Church preached so zealously, & so successefuly, that they perswaded them (in example and imitation of the Sarazins and Mahometans) that they would make no slaues on eyther side, being al of one religion. We haue already spoken sufficiently, what fauor the slaues found among the Romaines, let vs now cast an eye, & note how the Turkes do handle vs, if it were our hard fortune to fal (in the like case) among them.

Preachers in the Christian Church.

It is most certaine, that all Christians who happen to bee slaues to the Turke, Persian, Tartare, Iew, Moore, or Arabe, as wel in the East, as in other places, aswel by right of warr, as otherwise; bee they sucking children, Boyes, youths, men, old, or young, women or maids: they take the like authority ouer them, as on their beasts. Nay more, there are some people following the warres, that make no other benefit or traffick, but onely of Christian slaues; for they make triple commodity of their mony, because soldiers hastily sel them at indiffrent rates; then afterward, they make sale of them in Countries and Citties, where they know that they are very highly desired and sought after. A yong man of 18. or 20. yeares of Age, is now adaies sold for 25. Ducats. A young Infant, aged three or foure years, at fiue Ducats, Women and Maids are not sold so cheape. And before they buy them, they are ofttimes seene stark naked, to obserue whether they haue any imperfection on their bodies. Afterward, they look in their mouthes, to see whether they haue good Teeth, & of what age they are. Finally, they are very dilligent and carefull in obseruing their Countenaunces; for, they that make Trafficke of Slaues, are commonly verie skilfull in Physiognomie.

The vsage of christiã slaues in diuers Nations.

Some follow wars, only to buy christians

The prizes of Christians sold as slaues.

For the most part, men are destenied (as it were) to delue in the erth, after such order as they are commanded, and with Instruments acordingly. Daily are they fed with course, and scarse holsom Bred, & but litle therof neither, so much as they think wil content nature, and no other drink haue they then Water. For clothing, they haue commonly Linnen breeches, a Doublet or Iacket of course cloath, of a blew or redde colour; their legs and feete bare; they lie on the hard ground, and somtimes in ditches, dragging a heauy Ladder after each one, lest desperately they shoulde kill their Maisters, or set their houses on fire. They are beaten & tormented at all moments of time, euen when the toy tickles the Masters head, iustly or vniustly, cõmonly with a stiffe rounde Cudgell, sparing no place of the body. Their Heades are shaueu, and all other parts where anie haire groweth, which is obserued euery second month. There are some that allow them to learne occupations, & let them forth at daily hire, to serue as best they can be imployed, either in helping Masons, Carpenters, & such like labors.

The labour & dieting of their slaues, & how they goe apparrelled.

How they are dayly imployed and vsed.

As for female slaues, they serue for all businesses that they please to vse them in. Oftentimes (if they like them) they make them their Concubines, & when they grow weary of them, they eyther sell them away to others, or suffer them to attend the houshold affaires, & wait on their Mistresses. Heer is to be noted, that they are not compeld to alter their Religion, except they bee so bold, as to enter into their Mosquees or temples, or vse any wordes contemptibly of their Alchoran, or wound any of their Mahomentan Religion: then, such an offender must be put to death, or else be forced to become of their Religion. And although they be Circumcised, and Mulsulmans, yet are they not therefore released; but perhappes they shall bee the gentlier vsed. For this cause, if Christians, warring against the Turkes, happen in their fights (either by land or Sea) to surprize any of these Christian renegadoes, they vse them vilely, knowing that (except they pleased) they wer not constrained to change their religion. And the better to know such, they serch their secret members; and finding the sign of their abiuration; they are handled like turkish slaues, & the oftner bastonaded. If a Christian or Iew liuing among thẽ, shal haue carnal knowledg of a woman Turk; he must either die, or chaunge his religion. In some places, he is sold in the open Market for the Princes profite, if he haue not bin circumcised. Heere I might tel ye, that some haue hapned on kinde kind & humain Maisters, who haue vsed the̅ like their own children, & I my selfe haue seene some so fortunate; but it fals out very rarely. Bellonius saith, that a Slaue in Turky, might cite his Maister before the Iudge, to tell him for how long time he should serue him, or else, what summe of Money he would accept for his ransome. And the Slaue making a lawfull Act of the Iudges ordination; the Authour affirmeth, that he hath seene some (by this meanes) to gaine their freedome. This is to be vnderstood, among the Burgesses in Cities, or Field-labourers: But such as fall into the handes of Pyrats, or of great & powerfull Lordes, they very hardly attaine to liberty.

A way how Slaues compassed their liberty, before a Iudge.

Furthermore, this is very certaine, that young Male Children, either Sons to their Slaues, or taken in Warre; they cut off both Virga and the Testicles, by which kinde of incision, very many dye. But such as haue the fortune to escape; they sell them at an hundred, or two hundred Ducates price. Because, when they grow greater, and come to apt yeares; the charge of their Wiues are committed to such Men. For Turkes of good and able meanes; doe keepe diuers Wiues: some two, others three, foure, or fiue commonly, according to their degree and condition. But the Prince hath many times in sundry Sarrailes, three or foure hundred Women; and giues them in marriage to his Officers, as hee waxeth weary or glutted with them.

The guelding of young children.

Turkes haue many Wiues.

A Slaue that practiseth flight and escape (a thing very hard to bee effected; because the Guardes of the Sea-ports, Riuers, and else where, are alwaies very watchfull and circumspect:) If hee be found to haue no lawfull passe-porte, then is hee stayed, and brought backe to his Maister, paying the Wine, that is, a certaine summe of Money: but afterward hee is very cruelly handled. A Gentleman of Gascoigne, returning out of these countries but a while since; assured me faithfully; that he saw in Syria two Spaniard Slaues, empaled or broached on stakes aliue and speaking: because, that beeing Slaues, they vsed their endeuour to escape away. Others also (for the same cause) were hanged vp by the feet, and beaten on the belley with many blowes of a Bastonnado. Some yet (more fortunately) haue aduentured, by conference of sixe or seauen Slaues together, that (by diuing into the Sea, or some neere adioyning Riuer) could closely keep themselues hid all the day time, and afterward trauaile (with no mean hast) all the night. Then comming to some great Riuers vppon the Frontiers, haue made meanes to breake downe some branches of Trees, and making thereof a floatage to carry them; bequeathed themselues to the Waters mercy in their passage, some swimming and drawing it one while, till being faint and well-neere spent, the other haue relieued them, and by this meanes some haue been known to saue themselues.

How the flight or escape of a slaue is punished.

Two Slaues spitted on stakes, for offering to escape.

In what manner some Slaues haue escaped.

The Tartars, after their Slaues haue serued them seauen yeares, they do enfranchise them; prouided, that they depart out of the Countrey. The Iewes are prohibited, to detaine any Christian for a Slaue, dwelling on the Confines, or in the Countries subiect to Christian Princes or Common-weales: but such they may take, inhabiting in the Turkes Territories; or others of the Mahometane Religion; if they bee none of the Turkes Slaues, and so knowne to be in their Countrey. The Iewes yet herein are more wicked then the Mahometans, who compell no Man at any time to alter his Religion; yet they doe it. And albeit they haue done so, they remaine (neuertheless) as Slaues with them stil. Our Christians now adaies perceiuing, that (in imitation of the Iewes) the Turkes and Mahometans will not enfranchise their Slaues, although they submit to their Religion: the very same course keepe they, and to speake truth, the most part doe it not, because they finde thereby not any iot of better vsage.

How the Tartars release their Slaues.

Change of religion admits no enfranchisement in any Country.

Christians imitate the Iewes in their Captiues.

This is the reason, that the Hungarians, Transiluanians, Polonians, Bohemians, Germaines, Italians, Spaniards, Danes, and other people in these daies, doe not enfranchise their Slaues, for their alteration of Religion. France onely carrieth this priuiledge, that any Slaue treading on that ground, is forth-with enfranchised; as it was sentenced by an ancient Arrest of the Court, against an Ambassadour. Bodine writes, that he saw at Tholosa, Any Slaue, comming into France, is forth-with franchised.

Tholosa, a Geneway Gentle-man, who was there compelled to enfranchise a Slaue, which he had bought in Spaine. It happened, not many yeares since, that there arriued at Burdeaux (by Sea) a Ship laden with Moores-Slaues, of both Sexes, which a Marchant-Stranger had brought thither, in hope there to make good sale of them. Knowledge heereof being brought to the Lordes then in Parliament, they forth-with dismissed them, and gaue them free liberty. So they went to get dwelling, some in one place, some in another, wher they could finde best meanes of entertainement: And this (in mine opinion) proceeded from most equitable conscience.

A Shippe of Slaues Moores brought to Burdeaux.

Now let vs see what became of the Slaues in former times, that were among our ancient Christians, and how the race of them became lost; in regard that their Children, and all such as descended of them, were alwaies of seruile condition, if they were not enfranchised by good will of their Maisters. It is to be vnderstood, that (by little and little) Europe ranked it selfe to the Christian Religion, and that the Byshoppes and Fathers in the Church, ordinarily Preached wholly Charity, perswading them (for saluation of their own soules) not to euill-entreat their Slaues, but rather to giue them liberty & enfranchisement: considering, that all Christians (euen by Baptisme) were freed from seruitude, and were their Brethren in our Lord Iesus Christ. By which, and such like holy remonstrances (continued for some length of time) the people began to lend attention thereto; and (by slow steppes or degrees) as well in respect of brotherly loue, as (peraduenture) feare of reuolt, which the Slaues then might make, as in former times they had done; they granted them freedome, but let vs note how.

What became of the Slaues in elder times

All Christians freed from seruitude by Baptisme.

They vsed in those daies, to let their Slaues haue the tillage & husbandry of their Lands, and they matching in marriage with Women of their owne condition, gaue them speciall charge, to giue their Patrones (yearely) diuers kinds of Graine; as Oates, Wheat, Rie, Mony, and Poultry: beside all which, they were taxable for the foure accustomed times, for their Patrones or Lords prouision then, euen as if they were their Prisoners taken in Warre. If the Patrones chanced to mary their daughters; If they vndertooke any voyage beyond the Seas, against the Sarrazins; If they tooke the order of Knighthood, &c. then were these Seruants tyed to sundry kinds of seruices to their Lords. Moreouer, many were charged by their Leases and Couenants, to goe trauaile personally for their Lordes, when they should haue warning thereof, at certain daies limitation. Some found them Wine at their owne expences, and brought it home to their Houses with their Beasts. Some mowed their Meddowes; cleansed the Ditches of their Castles; twisted their spinning; and furnished them with so much Wood, (in part, or wholy) as they should burn for necessary vse. Nor could they alienate the Landes and Inheritances giuen them, but onely by consent of their Patrones: To whom, whatsoeuer they acquired or purchased out of their Iurisdictions, or in the same; wholly returned, in case they had no Children: and both they and their Childrens children, were strictly bound to all these conditions. They ought not to leape, dance, or vse any kind of publique reioycing, during the whole yeare, wherein their Patrone or his Wife deceased. In briefe, there were many seruitudes willingly accepted by thē, some more, some lesse, whereto they stood bound. But the Patron had no power to smite, kill, or molest his Vassaile: for, if he fulfilled not the duties imposed, then should he bring him to open Iustice.

What was to be done at the Seruants own charges, &c.

Patrones had no authority to beat or kill their seruants

And albeit, one of this seruile conditiō, should depart, and dwell for euer out of his Lords land: yet notwithstanding, both he and his held, and still should hold the same estate of seruitude; if he did not compound by Money, or compasse (by speciall grace of his Lord) that he might be enfranchised. In many places, if the Seruant (in iudgement) did cut his Girdle, he quitted all his goods, as well present, as to come, or pretended euer to haue & possesse in his countrey. If then he went and dwelt in a place free, and not subiect to villanage; he was at liberty, and whatsoeuer he attained vnto afterward; he might dispose of to whom he pleased, not hauing any Children of his owne. Likewise, if a a man of free or noble condition, either bought, or happened to haue adiudged him any goods in a Land of ſeruile quality; he was not therby made a Seruant: but if he chanced to dye without Children, the goods which he poſſeſſed in that Land, came to the Lorde and Patrone, but not any goods which he had elſe-where. In ſome places it is obſerued, as an inuiolable Law, that he which remaineth (a yeare and a day) in a Land of ſeruile condition, and keepeth not Fire continually, without going out or extinguiſhing: although he be a Free-man, yet he ſhall there be in the like nature of the other Inhabitants, and hold what he hath by villainage.

Freedome by fire kept a yeare and a day.

The Lord of Roche-blanch in Gaſcoigne, pretended to haue, not only the right of Mort-maine ouer his Subiects; but alſo that they were bound to til his grounds, manure his Vines, mow his Meddowes, reape and thraſh his Corne, builde his Houſes, pay his ranſome, and ſtood taxable to the four vſuall Ember-weeks in the kingdom for his prouiſion: Likewiſe, that he might bring them backe with Halters about their Necks, if they departed his Countrey without his Licence. This laſt point (how euer the other ſtood in force) was cut off by Act of Parliament at Tholoſſa; as being preiudiciall to the right of liberty, and fauoring of ſeruitude, which can take no place in that Kingdome. It ſeemes that the Monkes (who came very neere this kind of condition) did, and do little differ from ſuch enthralled people: for they can haue nothing properly their owne, but are ſubiect to their ſuperiours, and all rigours. But herein they differ from the other, that they haue ſpontaneally made themſelues ſeruants for life time onely, in hope to enioy (after death) eternall liberty. It was prohibited by auncient Lawes, that Abbots, Priours, and Guardians of Conuents, ſhould receiue any into Religion of ſeruile quality, without the Licence of their Patrones.

The Lord of Roche-blanch, his pretence.

Monkes are almoſt meere Slaues.

Many Princes long ſince, and in our times alſo, haue enfranchiſed them of their Countries, deliuering them out of villanage and ſeruitude, euen in meer Charity, or with Mony: And yet without any preiudice to the rights of Gentlemen, that held their Lands and Signeuries in ſuch Nature. As for example, Lewes Hutin, King of France, who freed ſo many as offered themſelues to him, with the price of Money, that ſerued to furniſh his Warres. The like did Humbert, Prince of Dauſphinie, in the yeare 1245. Henry the ſecond King of France, by his Letters Patents, enfranchiſed them of Bourbonnois, in the yeare 1549: impoſing a ſmall taxation on them, annually payable. And in his imitation, Emanuel Philibert, Duke of Sauoy, in the yeare 1569. did as much, by perſwaſion of his deuout and moſt vertuous Wife and Princeſſe, Sifter to the fore-named King Henry.

The enfranchiſements done by charitable Princes.

Lewes Hutin k. of France and others.

I do not infer, that all Prouinces were ſubiect to theſe ſeruitudes, yet there haue beene diuers in France; as part of la Marche, Champaigne, Auuergne, Foreſt, Bourbonnois, Lyonnois, Bourgongne, and others, whereof I may be ignorant. But the lower Allemaignes haue thereto bin more ſubiect, then any other that I know, euen as alſo Allemaigne it ſelfe. I would therefore aduiſe, that if any one happen (who is of an vnknowne place) to ſeeke coniunction in marriage: they would be careful firſt of his extraction, leaſt it fall out with them, as I haue ſeen in Paris, by an Aduocate of Lyonnois, a man of great meanes (attained vnto only by his knowledge) who being maried to a woman of an illuſtrious houſe, yet he dying without Children: the Patrone came and required lawfull ſucceſſion, and it was adiudged him by the Court. I could produce diuers Hiſtories to the like effect, but I let them ſleep in ſilence, fearing to be too tedious.

Diuers part in France ſubiect to ſuch ſeruitude.

Great danger in marriages, without carefull preuention.

Now a-daies, well neer all Chriſtendome, beginnes afreſh to make vſe of Slaues, except in France, and ſome other few places. But ſuch as are deſirous to vnderſtand more of their eſtate: let thē read the Bookes of the Romaine Lawes, and there they ſhall finde ſufficient diſcourſe; as alſo plenty of the like matter. And becauſe there is no vſe made of thē in France, they are not read of in their Vniuerſities: for the reading of ſuch argument, began to ceaſe a little before Bartholus wrote, concerning the Law of right, who liued in the yeare 1350.

The magnificence and riches of the Chaldæan Empire. Tertul aduer. Iudeos. Metaſthenes in rebus Iudicis. Lib. 4.

NOthing was more famous in old time, nor more celebrated by all Hiſtoriographers, then the riches and magnificence of the Chaldæan Empire; which, beſides the Orientall Countries (from India to Æthiopia) included, al Ægypt, Affricke, and Spaine. In which reſpect, Daniell the Prophet ſaid to Nabucadnezzer, who was King thereof: Tu es Rex Regum, & poteſtas tua in terminos vniuerſæ terræ. Thou art King of Kings, and thy power extendes it ſelfe to the bounds of the whole earth. Beſides that, the wealth, ſtrength, and beauty of Babylon (the Imperiall Seate of the Chaldæan Kings) was ſuch; as it giueth ſufficient teſtimony of the Empires great power. For the wals were 50. cubits thick, and 200. cubits high. The Citty was (foure ſquare) 15. miles from one corner to another; and ſixty miles in compaſſe. Inſomuch, that Ariſtotle affirmeth, that whē it was taken, thoſe which dwelt in the furtheſt part of the Citty, did not heare of it in three daies. It had an hundred Gates, with the threſholds & poſts of Braſſe; great number of Marble temples, and golden Images: whole ſtreets ſhining and glittring with Gold and precious ſtones. And among other Temples, there was one of Belus, four ſquare, containing two Stades euery way, which was a quarter of a mile in length, and a mile in compaſſe. In the middeſt whereof there was a Tower, which (as well in breadth, as in heigth) contained a Stade; that is to ſay, halfe a quarter of a mile: vppon the which were raiſed eight other Towers, one aboue another, with eaſie ſtaires to aſcend vp to the top, where there was a Chappell with a ſumptuous Bed, and a Table of Gold. Finally, ſuch wonderfull things are written by graue Authors, of Arteficiall Mountaines, Orchards, and Gardens (called Horti penſiles) hanging Gardens, and ſuch other thinges, that they ſeeme incredible.

Hereby we may gather, how admirable was the wealth of the Kings of Babylon, and how great the power of their Monarchy; whereof the deſtruction was propheſied by Eſay, 200. yeares before it hapned, who ſaid in the perſon of God. Ecce, ego ſuſcitabo ſuper eos Medos, &c. Behold, I will raiſe againſt them the Medians: and Babylon, which is ſo glorious amongſt all other Kingdoms, and ſo notable and famous in the pride of the Chaldæans, ſhall be ouerthrowne. In like manner, Ieremy the Prophet (aboue ſixty yeares before it was taken) ſaid: Suſcitauit Dominus, &c. The Lord hath raiſed vp the ſpirit of the King of the Medians againſt Babylon, and his meaning is to deſtroy it. Alſo Daniell the Prophet, interpreting to Balthazar King of Babylon, the words, Mena, Thekel, Phares (which were written miraculouſly before him, as hee was banqueting with his Nobility) fore-tolde the very day before it was taken, that God had giuen his Kingdome to the Medes & Perſians. All which was accompliſhed the night following, when Darius K. of Media and Perſia (whom Xenophon cald Ciaxares) beſiedging Babylon, tooke it on a ſudden, with the help of his Nephew Cyrus the Perſian, in the time of a great Feaſt, when the King, Nobility, & and people (contemning their enemies, in ouer-weening their owne ſtrength) attended only to banquets & ſports, as both Xenophon and Herodotus do teſtifie. They doe alſo declare the meanes how they tooke it, agreeing to the Prædictions of the Prophets: To wit, by a Stratagem of Cyrus, who cauſed certain ditches to be opened, to draw away the riuer Euphrates which paſſed through the Town; whereby the Channell was left dry, and the ſouldiers entring ſuddenly, ſurpriſed it without reſiſtance.

Thus began the execution of Gods wrath vpon Babylon, and on the Empire of of the Chaldæans, which was then translated to the Medians and Persians, according to the Prædictions of the Prophets: which Prædictions (neuertheleſſe) were not fulfilled all at once, but in proceſſe of time. For the Prophets fore-told not onely the ſurprize of the Citty, but alſo the vtter deſolation thereof, and of the whole Countrey of Babylon. Murus ille Babilonis latiſſimus, (ſaith Ieremy) ſuffoſione ſuffodietur, &c. That exceeding broad wall of Babylon, ſhall bee vndermined, and digged vp, and the high and magnificiall Gates thereof, ſhall be burnt. And againe in another place, ſpeaking to the Babylonians, hee ſaith; Confuſa eſt mater veſtra &c. Your mother (meaning Babylon) is wholly confounded, and made euen with the ground, &c. And all thoſe which ſhall paſſe by it, ſhall be amazed, and ſhall hiſſe at it, in reſpect of the plagues that ſhall fall vpon it. Alſo Eſay propheſied, that it ſhould become a Wilderneſſe, ſaying; Non habitabitur vſq; in finem, nec ponet ibi tentoria Arabs, nec paſtores requieſcent, ſed requieſcent ibi beſtiæ, &c. It ſhall not be inhabited to the end, nor the Arabian (who driues his cattell from place to place, to ſeek feeding for them) ſhall not pitch his Tentes there, nor ſo much as Shepheards ſhall remaine there, but it ſhall be a receptacle for wilde beaſts.

All this (I ſay) was wofully accompliſhed afterward, for Darius the Sonne of Hiſtaſpis the Perſian, tooke Babylon againe the ſecond time, about forty years after the firſt ſurpriſe; by occaſion of the Babylonians rebellion, and then he raced the ſtrong and ſtately wals thereof. And though the Citty was left ſtanding; yet it fell (by little and little) to deſolation. Eſpecially after the building of Seleucia by Seleucus Nicanor, and of Cteſiphonte by the Kinges of the Parthians: from which time forward it grew to be diſpeopled. In ſo much, that in the time of Adrian the Emperour, there was nothing left of Babylon but a poore Wall, which ſerued in Saint Ieromes time (as hee witneſſeth) for an encloſure for all kinds of wild Beaſts, that were reſerued and kept there, for recreation of the Kinges of that Countrey, when they came to hunt in thoſe parts. And thoſe which haue trauailed lately that way, affirme; that all that part where Babylon ſtood, is ſo full of Lyons and ſauage Beaſts, yea, and of murdring Theeues, and Robbers; that paſſengers are faine to haue Guards of Souldiers for their ſafety. Which I alſo note by the way, as an accompliſhment of the Propheſie of Ieremy, who ſaid. Habitabunt ibi dracones, cum ſtrutiſicarijs; Dragons or Beaſts of the Deſert, with wicked Murderers, ſhall dwell there.

And Herodotus affirmeth, that the ground yeilded ordinarily two hundred for one, and ſome yeares three hundred. Dan. Cap. 5. Idolatry, and the prophanation of holy vessels.

Lastly, Daniell expounding to Balthasar (the last King thereof) the inscription written on the Wall, by the hand which appeared as he was banqueting with his Nobility: signified vnto him, that God had giuen his Kingdome to the Medes and Persians, as well for his pride and Idolatry; as also, because (in that banquet) he Prophaned the holy vessels of the Temple, which Nabucadnezzer his Grand-father had brought from Ierusalem, when he led the Iewes into captiuity. So that the mighty and potent sinnes for which God did ouerthrow so great an Empire, were, Pride, Witchcraft, the superstitious vse of Astrologie, cruelty towards the people of God, destruction of his Temple in Hierusalem, and the prophanation of holy vessels dedicated to Gods seruice. Whereby we may see, how heinous those sinnes were in the sight of God, and how grieuous the penalty of sinne is. Lastly, how true it is which S. Ierome saith, speaking of that mightie Empires subuersion: All humane power is but dust and ashes, when the wrath of God striketh for sinne. Thus much concerning the destruction of Babylon, and Translation of the Chaldean Empire to the Medians: Next I thinke it most conuenient for me, to relate the destruction of Ierusalem, and wofull calamities of the Iewes euer since.

I Omit (for breuities sake) the Prophesies of Esay and Ieremy, and will onelie speake of two other: the one of Daniel, and the other of our Sauiour himselfe. Daniel writing after the first destruction of Hierusalem by Nabuchadnezzer, during the Iewes captiuity in Babylon, and hauing prophesied of the re-edifycation of the Temple, saith further in these wordes: Daniels prophesie of Ierusalems destruction.

Dan. Cap. 7.

Et post sexaginta duas hebdomadas, occidetur Christus, &c. After threescore and two weekes (that is to say, 490. yeares, counting the weekes by yeares, and not by daies; to wit, seauen yeares to euery weeke) Christ, or the Messias shall be killed, and the people which shall not be his people, and the Cittie and Sanctuary shall be destroyed, by a people that shall come with their Captaine, and the end of it shall be destruction, and after the end of the war, shall follow the determined desolation.

This was the prophesie of Daniell, of Ierusalems destruction, and the cause thereof, aboue 500. yeares before it happened: which our Sauiour himselfe told more particularly, who (a little before his passion) going downe to Hierusalem from the Mount Oliuet (whence he had the full view and prospect of the Citty) wept for compassion hee had of the misery that was to fall vpon it, saying; Veniens dies inte, &c. The daies shall come in thee Hierusalem, that thy Enemies shall enuiron thee round about, and shall straiten thee on euery side, and shal not leaue in thee one stone vpon another; because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation. And again (afterwards) he said to his Disciples When ye shall see Ierusalem besieged with an Army: then know, that the desolation thereof is at hand. Then those which are in Iudea, let them fly to the Mountaines, and those that are in the midst of it, let them depart; and those which are in the Countries adioyning, let them not enter into it: For that these are the daies of reuenge, to the end that al those thinges which haue bin written thereof, may be fulfilled. Woe be to Women with child and to Nurses in those daies; for there shal be great misery vpon the earth, & wrath vpon the people: and they shall fall in the face of the Sword, and shall bee carried captiues into all Nations, and Ierusalem shal be troden vnder the feet of the Gentiles.

and your Children. For loe, the daies shall come, when they shall say; Happy are the barren, and the wombs that haue not born children, and the paps that haue not giuen suck. Then they shal begin to say to the mountains, fal vpon vs; and to hils, couer vs, &c. Thus said our Sauior, which I haue set down the more particularly; to the end, we may consider, how the euent corresponded to his Prophesie, by the Testimony of prophane Authors; especially of famous Iosephus the Iew, who was an eye-witnesse, and partaker of the common calamity of his Country, though (being blinded no lesse then the rest) he had not the grace to acknowledge the true cause thereof.

The siedge of Ierusalem 40. yeares after our Sauiours passion.

Although there passed almost sortie yeares, before the siedge of Ierusalem after our Sauiours death: yet Almighty God began much sooner, to execute his iust iudgements vpon the Iewes, in most euident and rigorous manner; not only in Ierusalem & Iudea, but also in al other parts where they dwelled. It seeming conuenient to his Iustice, that as they were assembled in Ierusalem at his passion, and all consenting to his condemnation; so they should pay the penaltie thereof in all parts whersoeuer they liued. And therefore, within 7. or 8. years after our Sauiour suffered, there were infinite numbers of them slaughtered in all the Citties of Syria, Egipt, and other countries, by conspiracies of the people against them. As in Seleutia 50000. In Damascus 18000. In Cæsarea 20000. In Scithopolis 13000. In Ascalon 2500. In Alexandria 50000. Beside 10000. more in other Citties of Ægipt; and 5000. in Ioppa. Within a few years after, Claudius the Emp. banished al the Iewes out of Rome, by a publike Edict, and out of all the Country of Iudæa. Besides, the Citty of Hierusalem was miserably infected with Theeus, Robbers, Murderers, Magitians, false Prophets; and seditious persons; prophaning the very Temple with bloud: insomuch, that 20000. were killed, and the most of them stifled in a tumult in Hierusalem, at a Feast of Easter (as we cal their Pascha.) Al which Iosephus recounteth, as the preamble to their ruine. Besides, their Gouernours did vse such tyranny vpon them, vnder the Emperours Caligula, Claudius, and Nero: that very many of them were forced to abandon their Countrey, and the rest to rebell. Which brought vpon the the Armies of the Romaines; first vnder Cestius, Gouernor of Syria, who burned, spoyled, and ransacked all Palestine, and besiedged Ierusalem it selfe. Afterward; Vespatian destroied all the Country, and great numbers of the people with Fire and Sword: whiles also (in the meane time) they were miserably afflicted with Famine and Ciuill Wars, by reason of three potent seuerall factions, which arose amongst them; first, in the Prouinces abroad, and after in the Citty of Ierusalem, where the seditious slue great numbers of their Aduersaries, euen in the Temple it selfe, and committed such horrible sacriledges, & other abhominable mischiefes therin, that Iosephus saith thereof. Non recusabo dicere &c. I wil not forbeare to say that, which sorrow forceth me to vtter. I verily thinke, that if the Romaines had not come when they did, against those most wicked men of my Nation, either the earth wold haue opened & swalowed the Citty, or another Deluge would haue drowned it; or thunder-bolts and fire from Heauen would haue destroyed and consumed it.

The wonderfull punnishments of God vpon the Iews many yeares before the siedge of Ierusalem.

Thus saith Iosephus, and this was the state of the Iewes, when Vespasian (being chosen Emperour of the Romaines) left the charge and prosecution of the warre against them, to his Sonne Titus: who (presently after) planted his siege before the Citty of Hierusalem, while the Iewes (according to their yearely custome) were assembled there out of all parts, to celebrate their Feast of Pascha. Which time was ordained by the special prouidence of God, that the time of their punishment, might answere to the time of their offence (for that they had put out Sauior to death at their Paschall Feast.) And partly, to the end, that the reuenge might be the more cõpleat on the whol Nation, by reason of the infinit number of them that were assembled there, for celebration of the Feast, euen from all parts of Iudea, and the Countries adioyning. The Towne being besiedged, was (within few daies) enuironed by the Romans, according to our Sauiors prophesie; not onely with a Trench, but also with a wall; in such sort, that no liuing creature could issue out any way. By means whereof, and of the great multitude of people within the Town, there grew (within a while) such extreamity of famine: that they were forced to eat, not onely Horses, Asses, Dogs, Rats, & Mice, & the Leather that couered their Shields and Bucklers; but also the very dung out of the Stables, yea, and a Noble woman was known to eate her own child that suckt vpon her breast; wherin was fulfilled the Prophesie of our Sauiour, when he said: Beatæ steriles, &c. Happy are the barren, and the bellies which haue not brought forth Children, &c.

Luke. Cap. 23

But to proceede, in the meane time, the besieged were no lesse infested with cruell sedition, and war amongst themselues; then with famine, & the assaults of their enemies abroad. Insomuch, that they filled the Citty and Temple with their own blood, and such as were taken by the Romans, were (by the commaund of Titus) crucified before the wals of the Citty, to the number of 500. euery day, vntill at length (as Iesephus reporteth) there wanted both Crosses for the Bodies, and place for the Crosses: so that, their clamorous sentence of Crucifige, (giuen against our Sauiour Christ) was iustly executed vpon themselues.

Also, great numbers of them, who (being forced with Famine) sought to saue their liues, by yeilding themselues to their enemies: were (neuertheless) killed by the Syrian and Arabian Souldiers, and their Bowels ript vp, in hope to find Gold therein; vpon a report, or at least a conceit, that the Iews did swallow their Gold, to conuay it out of the Citty by that meanes. And such was the misery within the City, by Famine, Pestilence, and cruelty of the factions one against another; that (as Iosephus reporteth) all the sinkes, void places, and retreats; yea, the very streets were full of dead bodies, which were continually cast out from the Houses, and trodden vpon like Dust and Dirt. Wherein the Prophesie of Esay was fulfilled, who said; Facta sunt morticinia, &c. Their Carkasses became like Dirt or Dung in the midst of the Streetes. And although it was ordained at the first, that the dead Bodies should bee buried at the Citties publike charge, to remedy the contagion, which daily encreased by the Pestilent sauour of them: yet the number grew within a while to be so great, that there was no place to bury them; insomuch, that the liuing were forced to cast the dead ouer the Wals, into the Ditch of the Towne, and in so great nmmbers, that Titus the Romaine Generall seeing it, and noting the filth and corruption that issued out of their Woundes and Plague-sores, most loathsome to behold, exclaiming, said: That it was some extraordinary punnishment of God vppon them for their sinnes; and not any effect of his siedge.

Finally, after fiue months siedge, the Temple and City were burned, and the Wals raced, excepting one little peece thereof, which was left for some shelter and defence for the Souldiours, who were to remain in those parts: besides, some pieces of three Towers, which Titus commaunded should be left, for a Monument and remembrance of his siedge. Whereas al the rest of the Citty was destroyed (as Iosephus saith) that it seemed neuer to haue beene inhabited. Which our Sauiour signified, when he said; Et prosternent, &c. And they shall lay thee flat vpon the ground, and one stone shall not be left vpon another in thee. To conclude, the number of those which were slaine, and dyed during the siedge, was (as Iosephus reporteth) a Milion and an hundred thousand, and of the Captains 97000. whereof Iosephus himselfe was one: And of those, some were condemned to the publike works; others (of the stronger and handsomer sort) carried in triumph; and such as were vnder the age of 17. yeares, were sold for little or nothing. And those which remained in the Countrey, were loaden with such grieuous impositions and tributes, that they liued in continuall misery.

But what? was the Iustice of God satisfied, & his wrath towards the Iewes appeased with this? No, for (as the Prophet Esay said, when he prophesied of the lamentable destruction of the City:) *In omnibus his non est auersus furor eius, sed adhuc manus eius extenta. all other places where they were dispersed: As first (in the next age) in the time of Traiane the Emperour, within lesse then fifty yeares after the subuersion of Ierusalem; Infinita eorum millia, &c. (saith Eusebius) Infinite thousands of them were killed, for their rebellions in Ægypt, Mesopotamia, and the Iland of Cyprus. For in Alexandria in Egypt, where they liued in great multitude, all of them were put to the Sword. In Macedonia, they were vtterly extinguished. And in Cyprus they were all either killed, or banished; and a Law made, that it should be death for any Iew to tarry there, though he were driuen thither by Tempest against his wil. And a few years after, Iulius Seuerus being called out of Britttany by the Emperor Adrian (to represse a rebellion of the Iewes) destroyed almost al the countrey.

Infinite numbers of Iewes slain in diuers parts of the World, in the dayes of the Emperours Traiane and Adrian.

For, as Dion writeth, he dismanteld fifty strong Forts, razed or burnt 965. Townes and Villages, and killed aboue 50000. Iewes in battaile; besides that, an infinite number of others either died by fire, famine, and pestilence, or were sold for Slaues. And such (saith S. Hierom) as could not be sold, Were translated into Ægypt, or else perished by ship-wracke, famine, or by the sword of the Gentiles. And the Emperor hauing (lately before) re-edified the Citty of Ierusalem, and called it (after his owne Name) Ælia Adria, commaunded by publike Edict, that no Iew should (euer after) enter into the Territory or iurisdiction thereof, nor so neere vnto it, that hee might behold it from any high place. Shortly after Adrians time, they were also miserably afflicted by the Emperor Antonius Pius, for another rebellion; and after him again, by Marcus Aurelius, who being wearied with their continuall tumults (as saith Amianus Marcellinus) exclaimed against them, saying; That they were worse then the Marcomani, Quadi, and Sarmates, whom he held to be the most beastly of all barbarous Nations. And again, some yeares after they were subdued and destroied by the Emp. Seuerus, who triumphed for his great victory against them, and renewed the decrees of Adrian, for their exclusion from the sight of their Country, by means whereof, they were counted no better then Vagabonds.

Whereof some also yeild a particuler reason, manifesting Gods malediction vpon them; to wit, That all Iewes haue a filthy and lothsome sauor continually, euer since their dispersion; and that they perswade themselues, that the same cannot be cured, but with drinking the bloud of Christians. For which cause, they haue killed many children at diuers times, and in diuers * Countries. And particularly in Trent, in the yeare of our Lord 1475. at what time they miserably crucified a young Child of 20. monthes old, called Simon: and the Iewes being taken for the fact, confessed, that one of the causes that mooued them thereto, was to drinke his bloud, for remedy of their stinking disease: as writeth Iohannes Mathias Tiberinus, a Learned Phisitian, who liued in Trent at the same time. But to returne to the former ages, from whence I haue a little digressed. After the time of the Emperour Seuerus, they rebelled also against Constantine the Great; for the which, great numbers of them had their eares cut off, and were (by the Emperors commandement) dispersed throughout all Countries, with that and other marks of Infamy, for generall shame and reproach of al the Nation. And not many yeares after, there were many thousands of them slaine in Iudea, without respect of young or old: and three or foure of their chiefe Cities, and very many of their Townes, were burnt in the time of Constantius, Son to Constantine the Great, for another rebellion.

The reason of the stinke that the Iews haue, and the remedy which they haue sometimes vsed for the same.

Chrys. Orat. 2. adu. Iudæos circa An. 313. The misery of the Iewes in the time of Constantine the Great, & Constantius his Sonne.

Hier. in Chron. Anno. 352. Sozomen. Lib. 4. Cap 6.

The fauour done to the Iewes by Iulian the Apostata, turned to their confusion.

Emperour Iulian the Apostata, who succeeded Constantius, fauored thē so much for the short time of his raigne (which was but 20. months) that he gaue them leaue, not only to returne to Ierusalem to inhabite there; but also to re-edifie their Temple, yet it rather turned to their confusion, then to their contentment and commodity. For first, as concerning the re-edification of their Temple, when they had made collections of great sums of Money (whereto, as well Women as Men most zealously contributed so much, as they were any way able, with intention to make it more beautifull then euer it was:) they lost both their labour & charges, being forced (by three prodigious accidents) to surcease the worke after they had begun it.

The re-edification of the Temple in Ierusalem miraculously hundred.

For when all things necessarie for the building were prouided, the foundation laid vpon the ground-workes of the old Temple, the wals rising apace, the Iewes triumphing, and insulting against our Sauiour Christ and the Christians (who were much dismaied, in respect of the cleare propheſies of Daniell, fore-telling the perpetual desolation of the temple:) It pleased Almighty God, that first an Earth-quake dissolued the Foundation, and ouerthrew the wal that was begun; and then a fire from Heauen consumed as well the Tooles and Instruments of the Work-men, as also the Timber and other matters prepared for the building; yea, and burnt very many of the Iewes themselues. Lastly, for their further confusion, and that it might be manifest vnto them, from whence all this proceeded: there appeared a Crosse in the ayre, and the apparrell of all those which were present, was miraculously marked with Crosses, which could neuer after be washed out, nor taken away by any meanes; where-with the Iewes were so confounded, that they desisted from their work, and many of them became Christians. This Story is written by Ruffinus, Socrates, S. Gregory Nazianzen, and S. Chrisostome, who saith; Huius rei nos omnes testes sumus, nostra enim aetate ante annos viginti haec acciderunt. We are all witnesses of this matter, for it hapned in this our age, litle more then 20. years ago. Loe then how little the fauour of earthly Kings and Princes auaileth, when the heauenly King disfauoureth and punisheth for sinne. And also how true it is which the royal Prophet saith; Nisi Dominus aedificauerit domum, &c. Except the Lord builde the house, they labour in vaine who build it. And now as concerning the aboad of the Iewes at Hierusalem afterwards, it is euident, that they remained not long there: but that within a while after Iulians death (who dyed presentlie after this chanced) they were not onely expelled thence, but also forbidden againe to enter into the Citty. For we read, that within 20. yeares after, in the time of the Emperors Theodosius & Valentinian, their custome was to purchase licence for Money (yearely) to goe thither, to bewaile the subuersion of their Temple, in the aniuersary day thereof: as witnesseth S. Ierom, who liued many years in those parts, and wrote there (at the same time) his learned Commentaries vpon the lesser Prophets. Wherein hee notably describeth the miserable estate, as well of the whole Countrey, as of the Iewes themselues, which therefore I thought good to set down in his owne words.

Circa An. 389.

The Iews purchased licence for mony, to go to Ierusalem to bewaile the subuersion of their Temple, in the time of Theodosius.

As for the destruction (saith he) of the strong Cities, which were wont to be in Iudea; I thinke it may better bee iudged by the eye, then by the eare; better by sight, then by report. And I especially, who am now in this Prouince, cannot but see it, and approue those things which haue beene written of it: For we see now scant any little Monument of the old ruines, in some of the greatest Cities which flourished in times past. In Silo, where the Tabernacle and Arke of the Testament of our Lord was; the very Foundations of the Altar scant appeare. Gabaa, that great Citty of Saul, is pulled downe to the very ground. Rama and Bethoron, and the other famous Cities, built by Salomon; are now little villages. And a little after. And at this present day, the perfidious and Traiterous Iewes, are forbidden to enter into Ierusalem; except it bee to weepe, and bewaile the subuersion of their Temple, for the which also they are enforced to pay Money. So that, as in times past, they bought the bloud of Christ: so now they are faine to buy their owne teares, and cannot bee suffered so much as to weepe of free cost. You might see, in Chrysost. Orat. 2 cont. Iudæos. Circa. An. 397.

Furthermore, Saint Chrysostome writing some yeares after, in the time of the Emperours Arcadius and Honorius, affirmed, that the Iews hauing lost their Liberty and Country; Were contemptible and ridiculous to all men throughout the World, from the East to the West, and to the very extreamity and further-most boundes of the Earth. Their misery also (in those times) appeareth by two Lawes of Honorius the Emperour; the one against them, and the other in fauour of them: By the first he ordained, That no Iewe should haue any kinde of Honour or Office in the Common-wealth, and that such as already had any, should bee depriued thereof. The other Law made in fauor of them, was; To represse the fury of the people against them in all parts, because for foure yeares together, before that Law was made; their Sinagogues were burnt, & they themselues despightfully and cruelly handled euery where; which the Emperor restrained by a publike Edict, least (otherwise) they should be vtterly extinguished.

And who is able to recount all the plagues and calamities, which since that time haue fallen vpon thē euery where? And how they haue bin oppressed, spoiled, banished, and massacred, whersoeuer they haue liued? In France 90000. of them were forced to be baptized, or to fly the Countrey, in the yeare of our Lorde 614. In Spaine, a conspiracy of theyrs being detected, in the yeare 694. all their goods were confiscate, themselues made Slaues, and their Children (vnder the age of seauen yeares) taken from them and Christned. In the yeare 1009. it being discouered and published, that certaine Iewes in France had intelligence (by Letters) with the Prince of Babylon, and had procured the subuersion of a famous Church in Ierusalē, wher the Sepulcher of our Sauior was said to be; there was such a general hatred conceiued against them throughout Christendome, that they were tormented & slaine in all places where they dwelled; some hanged, some burned, others put to the Sword: besides, very many, that (to auoide torments) killed themselues. Also in the year 1348. infinite numbers of them were massacred in Spain, France, Germany, and Italy, vpon a report, that they had poysoned the Wels in al those Countries, and caused a great mortality of people, which dyed at the same time. And in the yeare 1492. all Iewes were expelled out of Spaine, to the number of 124000. Families, of whom there died 2000. of the plague, as they were remouing, and the like rigour was vsed against them in Portugall some few years after.

Also in England, in the time of K. Richard the first, great numbers of them that then dwelled in Lincolne and Yorke, were slaine (as well women as men) in a tumult of the people. And vnder King Iohn, they were miserably oppressed with taxes and impositions, and such of them as wold not pay what was demanded of them; were cruelly tormented, vntill they gaue satisfaction. Amongst others, it is written of one of them, that seauen of his teeth were pulled out, one after another, before he would graunt to pay a Taxe of ten thousand Markes; which he was content at last to pay, to saue the rest. Lastly, vnder King Edward the first, they were all banished out of England by Act of Parliament.

In so much, that in Spaine and Portugall, where there are great numbers of baptized Iewes (whom they call Christianos nuenos, New Christians) no man is capable (of them) of any Knighthood, or yet (in some places) of any dignity Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, if he be any way descended of them, which is speciallie enquired of, by expresse Commissions sent forth for that purpose. The blindnes of the Iewes, & their hardnesse of heart, their greatest plague.

Finally, we may adde hereto another plague (surpassing all the rest) which God hath laid vpon them, for the consummation of their infelicity & misery: I meane their blindnesse and hardnesse of hart, which is not only of it selfe magna damnatio, A great damnation (as S. Augustine calleth it, but also doth exclude them from all remedy, so long as it continueth. This the Prophet Esay signified when he said. Excæca cor populi huius, &c. Make blind the harts of this people, & agranate their eares, and shut vp their eyes, least peraduenture they may see with their eyes, and heare with their eares, and vnderstand with their harts, and be conuerted, and I moued to heale them. Also the royal Prophet Dauid, to the same purpose. Obscurentur (saith he) oculi eorum, &c. Let their eyes (ô Lord) be obscured, that they may not see, and lay a perpetuall load or burthen vppon their backs. And the same was also signified, or rather prophesied by Moyses, when hee threatned the people of the Iewes, saying: Percuti et te Dominus amentia, &c. The Lord will strike thee with madnesse, blindnesse, and fury of mind, that thou mayst go groping in the mid-day, as the blinde man gropes in the darke, and mayest not direct thy waies, but alwaies sustaine shame and reprosch, and bee oppresst with violence, and not haue any man to deliuer thee.

And therefore the Apostle saide; that the blindnes of the whole nation of the Iewes ingenerall should continue: Donec plenitudo gentium intraret: vntill the fulnesse of the Gentiles should enter; that is to say, *vntill all Nations should be conuerted. The other reason is, Quia necessarij sunt credentibus gentibus: Because they are necessary for the Gentiles which

They are liuely Letters, representing vnto vs the passion of our Lorde; for they are dispersed into all Countries, to the end, that vvhile they pay the penalty of their horrible crime, they may be witnesses of our redemption. Besides that* (saith he) if they vvere quite extinguished, how should the promise of their reduction and conuersion to the latter end of the world be fulfilled? Thus reasoneth S. Bernard, which I haue thoght good to note by the way, to satisfie the scruple of some in these daies, who are scandalized to see the Iewes suffered to liue at Rome, and other Christian countries, not considering (as it seemeth) the perticuler prouidence of God therein, who so ordaineth it for their greter punishment, his owne greater glory, and the manifestation of his loue towardes vs, the Confirmation of our Christian Religion; yea, and for the saluation of some of them, whom it pleaseth him to call to the Christian faith. While (neuertheless) their whole Nation ingenerall, beareth the heauy burthen of their owne malediction, which they gaue against themselues, when as they cried, Sanguis eius super nos, & super filios nostros: His blood light vpon vs, and on our children.

Of a crafty and subtile Physitian, who attained to bee super-intendent in the affayres of France, and gouerned or ouer-swayed King Lewes the eleauenth, who was accounted the best aduised, and most ingenious Prince in his time.

IT hath bin said, and the same opinion (for the more part) stil continueth, that Lewes eleuenth of that name, and King of France, was the ablest and best aduised Prince, that either was before him, or hath bin since. In regard that at his entrance, he found the whole Kingdom in combustion; his Subiects, cheefest Citties, and Lords of greatest power coniured against him: yet did he so dexteriously pacifie them all, & afterward, set such diuision among them; that he became sole Commander, retyred Guyenne to him, which was his Brothers portion, who dyed soon after, not without some suspition of the Kinges acquaintance in the act. Hee found the meanes to accord himselfe with the K. of England, hauing preuailed with some of his Counsell, and made a present to him of a great quantity of good wines: albeit the said King had crost the Sea, to ioyne his power with the Duke of Bourgongne (a heauy enemy to Lewes) and war fiercely on France. Afterward, he dealt so discreetly with the saide Duke, who was then busied in foyling the Suitzers, Lorraines, and the leagued Countries, that he compassed absolute peace. And becaus the power of the Duke continued very suspitious to the King; closely and vnder-hand, he maintained warre among the Subiects, against their duke: so that in the end, after the losse of some battailes, the Duke was slaine, and the Dutchy of Bourgongne seized on, which euer since hath remained to the Kinges of France.

The troubles in France at King Lewes his entrance.

put to death, vpon certaine crimes layd to their charge, according as hee dealt with his Constable, the Earle of S. Paul, and the Duke of Nemours. He called not the States vnto any new imposition of Taxes, according to the ancient custom of the Kingdom. He encreased (beyond reason) the imposed Taxes which hee found at his entrance, and disposed of al according to his owne fantasie, holding it as a certaine rule; That hee who knew not how to dissemble, knew not how to raign. In briefe, from his very Infancy, it was iudged, that he would proue a very dangerous Prince; especially, when not hauing attained to the age of 15. years, he arose against his father, whereon he was enforced to flye to the D. of Bourgongne. Which when his father vnderstood, he sent to the saide Duke, aduising him to foster vp the Fox, that one day wold eat vp all his Pullen. And to speake truly, so long as he liued, hee imitated the behauiour of that subtle Beast. At length, he was smoked, and made to die, as vsually we put to death such old Foxes as wee hit on: after hee had run thorough bad courses enow, and how it hapened whereof we are now to discourse.

An vnworthy saying of a King.

It is to bee obserued, that this King, because hee was ambitious, desirous of reuenge, & very suspitious, hauing discontented the most honorable & cheefest persons in his kingdom; becam very curious in finding meanes of imposing new Subsidies vpon his people, for exercise of his own prodigalities, & compassing plots, how he might giue vnto such as deserued not, but euen on pleasure, & beyond reason. It came to passe, that among these diuersities of curiosities, the health of his body begā to alter in a very dangerous manner: for he was not only sicke in body, but in spirit likewise. So that it was found most true in him, which Galen said; Manners do alway follow the temperature of the body.

Strange fantasies and humours in a King.

Galen. Lib. 9.

To proceed then, this King, in regard of the fore-named causes, became verie melancholy, that formerly had bin very facetious, affecting such as laboured any way to procure laughter. Hee began to be fearful of death, superstitiously enclined, & meruailous suspitious that something was intended against his State. Heer-upon, refusing visitation, he commāded his son Charls (who after was the 8. K. of that name) to be closely shut vp, and made strong Iron bars & doores to the house where he lodged. Moreouer, he ordained extraordinary Guardes, to watch night and day about his Court, being vnwilling to speake with any one. Hee would weare the richest and most sumptuous Garments that hee could deuise, albeit hee neuer went out of his Chamber: whereas, when he was yong & healthful in body and mind, he went but meanly aparrelled. Were not these apparant signs, of a man depriued of his best senses, & of that disease which Physitians do terme Melancholly?

Signes of melancholy and alienatiou frō sound vnderstanding.

There was a Physitian, which had bin entertained by the King, some short while before this extremity befell him, named M. Iaques Cottier, who had attained to that degree of profession; not so much in regard of his knowledge, as by the fauour of the Duke of Sauoy, who had bin his meanes of aduancement to the King. This man, perceiuing Lewes begin to bee weakely disposed in his vnderstanding (as hath bin already declared) hauing also serued in former times with some ordinary Physitians, finding the King one day alone, and al his vsual Physitians absent from him (happily about their practique affayres) himselfe soly attending, and none else neere: he tooke aduantage of this opportunity, in manner following. The King apprehending dayly more and more, a dreadfull perswasion of Death, which (indeed) is a matter most irkesome and terrible to Rich and mighty men, especially such a King as this, who was the most famous and Potent Christian Prince in his time; began to question with this Physitian, as desirous to know if hee could in this case cure him? The Physitian assured him, that hee could and woulde, prouided that he wold repose such confidence in him, and he alone to haue the dealing with him, for better effecting the busines. Moreouer he alledged, that his other Physitians came farre short in knowledge of his naturall disposition, whereof he made serious and exact obseruation; for that from the first hour of entertainment into his Maiesties seruice, he applied his whol study & practise to vnderstand his natural inclinatiō, whereof the other had no care at al, but disposed most of their seruiceable attendance dance, only to enrich and benefit themselues withall, hee entreated the King not to reueale this secret information, proceeding onely from intire dutie and affection. And that he himselfe would still bee diligent about his person, searching and reading the most learned authors in Phisicke, to deriue from them an vndoubted remedy for his Disease. Heereto he added, that the more hee sought into the quality of that passion, the more it appeared doubtful and difficult to be cured, because it had formerly hazarded his life very often, but only was still frustrated by his carefull preuentions. And so much the greater he alledged his daunger, in regard, that his other Physitians had applied such Purgatiues vnto him, with other strong and violent Medicaments; which if hee had not very secretly and (vnknowne to them) corrected, the king had died long ago. In briefe, he then perswaded and ouer-ruled the King, euen as him-selfe pleased, for no man could haue accesse to impeach him; yea, he so farre preuailed by this insinuation, as (from thence forward) especiall charge was giuen, that no man shoulde enter the Kinges Chamber, except Cottier gaue his consent thereto, by which meanes, he assured himselfe of sole-gouerning his Royall person.

Lying and deceitfull speeches, to win himselfe the greater credite.

A Flatterer seldome wants his Companion.

Nowe, for a stronger fortification of this credite alteady wonne with the King, hee drew in likewise one Mayster Oliuer a Barber, who was a Dane by birth, vtterly vnlearned, and yet serued as a Councellor about the King, as diuers others in like manner did, that were as vnworthy as both these men: and whatsoeuer Cottier saide, Maister Oliuer the Dane stoutly confirmed it, as iustifyed by the probable Rules of Art. The ordinary Apothecary belonging vnto the King, was drawne into contempt and disgrace, and so were all his other Physitians, as men not worthy to hold such place; but either vtterly ignorant, or playing vppon too much aduantage. These courses were heedfully obserued by two other Physitians, the one named M. Draconis de Beaucaire, Professor and Chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Montpelier; the other, was a Scot by birth, and had (not long before) bin taken in the battaile at Nancy, where the Duke of Bourgongne was slain, and then was this man entertained into the Kings seruice, by the fame and good report spred euery where of him, for Learning, Honesty, and Merit, to be about a King. It will well appeare by this Historie, how easily Princes are induced to beleeue false reports, and to reiect men of merit for base intruders.

Cottier keepeth all other Phisitions and Apothecaries from the king.

The King grew into such extreamity of Melancholy, that as in those times yong Lyons being brought him out of Affrica (by his owne expresse charge) to play and disporte withall, he would not indure to haue a sight of them. And one day (aboue the rest) his passion was so violent, that the humour tooke him, to dismisse an attending seruaunt of his Chamber, because hee had warmed his Ptisane before he dranke it, and saide in Choller; that not onely he did it to bereaue his life, but all his houshold Officers were likewise consenting vnto it. Whereupon, M. Iaques Cottier, beeing then present, said vnto him; I know very well Sir, that you comprehend mee in this suspition among the rest: but be you well assured, that after I am departed from you, you cannot liue the space of eight daies, and make account to find it most true. The King was so terrifyed with these words, that from thence forward, he not onely wholly committed his person to Cottiers disposition; but likewise all his Kingdome, and whatsoeuer else thereto belonged, so that his Physitian (as then) commanded alone. He refused also to see his Queene, Children, and deerest Friends, because hee was possessed, that they Conspired against his life, and desired nothing more then his Death: in which vaine surmise, hee was not a little soothed by his Physitian.

The King falleth into a violent melancholly.

The insolent boldnesse of Cottier to the King.

A wonderfull perswasion in a King.

It hapned afterward, that Messire Giral de Viennes of Bourgongne, beeing Marshall de Rieux, came to see the King, and could gain no entrance into his Chamber, but by permission of Cottier: which hauing yet at length obtained, the King (Child like) complaind to the said Marshal, of the great rigour vsed towardes him by M. Iaques, as well in restraint of his drinke, as meat; and that hee would not permit him any recreation. Moreouer he told him, that the Virgin Marie had appeared to him diuers times, and Cottier gets pardon for two murders committed by one man.

Vpon a day, a Champenois Gentlemã, named Cortenay (who had committed two seuerall murders) cam to the Court to get his pardon, which he obtained at the request of Cottier the Kings Physitian. But when it cam to the Lord Chancellor, that this grace should be confirmed by the great Seale, hee made refusall thereof, as being granted against all right and equity. Intelligence heereof being brought to the King, he presently called for his Seales, and gaue the Custody of them to Cottier the Physitian, sending the Lord Chancellor home to his owne house, with disgraces enow, and reprochful speeches. Thus was the King wholly gouerned, and his Kingdomes affayres, by Master Oliuer the Dane, a Barber, who represented the Constable; Cottier a Physitian, Lorde Chancellor; and a mender of stockings, who was made Admirall.

A strange forgetfulnesse in a King.

An infamous gouernment.

It happened afterward, that for the space of some ten or twelue dayes, this new made Chancellor receiued no Monies at all, by meanes of the Seales hee had in charge; whereof he complained to the King, alledging, that the extreamity of his disease, wold not admit the least absence from his royall person, to attend the benefit due to his new office, and whereas now hee gained nothing; if he had opportunity to apply his own practise, his commodity wold be equal with the best, only by his visitations & consultations amongst sickely persons, whereof hee had no such cause to complain, till this restraint of attending the King only; and whereof hee entreated him to take notice, as also of his great deseruings.

Cottier his complaint to the King, concerning his new Office.

An vnbeseeming prodigality in a K.

The King, who was intirely perswaded, that his life depended onely vppon the Physitians care & cunning; fearing also, least his former Allegations might cause him to forsake him, commanded the Treasurer of his Exchequer, to deliuer him foure & fifty thousand Crowns to content him; and more hee should haue had, if more had then remained in the Coffers. Moreouer, hee caused the King to make his Nephew Byshop of Amiens, and to bestow on his other Kindred and Allies, such gifts and great estates as himselfe pleased. For indeed, such was the Kinges infirmity both in bodie and minde, as Cottier might doe what hee listed, and none durst contradict him.

As for Master Oliuer the Barber, the King sent him into Flanders, with large Commissions, and a powerfull Armie against the Daughter vnto the Duke of Bourgongne, but being able to performe there no matter of moment, hee returned backe againe to the King, who reioyced not a little to haue him neare about him. At length, the Kinges bodie became so dried vp, wasted, and consumed, that he appeared rather to be an Anatomy, then a man, only thorough the ignorance of this Physitian, as was well obserued by men of greater experience. For, a Melancholy body ought to be humected, and moderately heated, as well with Aliments as Medicaments. And albeit he continually desired to drinke Wine, and feed on a boyled Capon, which were very conuenient for his health: yet would Cottier by no meanes permit it, but made vse of a more hurtfull and dangerous diet.

M. Oliuer the Barber sent into Flanders.

The Kinges extremitie was caused by his Physitians ignorance.

Now, as thus his bodye wasted in apparant view, so his Spirites became deprawed, and strangely altered. For, he tooke a sudden conceit, that his bodye stunke extreamly, and that hee felt nothing but very vnsauoury smels; which indeed he did not, but in meere opinion onely. And though all the standers by; yea, the Physitian himselfe affirmed the contrary, yet could he not (by any meanes) be disswaded from this strong conceit, but daily desired a remedy for this supposed disease. Insomuch, as they were compelled to burn very odoriferous perfumes, and to giue him cordiall Powders of violent sauour: but his chiefest delight was in receiuing perfumes, which both bred and brought him vnto daily sownings & Conuulsions; whereby appeared, that these thinges happened by Diuine permission, rather then any indiscretion in them that applyed them.

A strange perswasion in Melancholy.

Sweet cordial powders and streng perfumes applied vpon no iust occasion.

These alterations were obserued and known to many, and among others, the Lord De l'Auardin, who (at what perill soeuer it cost him) would needs see the King, and said to Cottier the Physitian, that the King ought to bee put in mind of his Confessour or Ghostly Father, ther, and very requisite was it, that hee should receiue the blessed Sacrament, because it could not be otherwise, but his ending was very neere. The Physitian replied, that this matter was as wel knowne to him, as to any other; and that no meane danger depended on very speech thereof, because for the space of halfe a yeare before, his Maiesty had bin continually fearefull of death; and now, if any man should but name death in his hearing, meer terror of the word would bereaue him of life. Notwithstanding all which speeches, the Lorde De l'Aurdin (hauing got entrance into the Chamber) said alowd to the King; That if he would be quit of this sickness, he must daily prepare himselfe to Confession, and receiue the blessed Sacrament of the Eucharist: in regard, that his Father, being aged aboue an hundered yeares, and very sickely, recouered his health by that meanes onely. The King being indiffrently perswaded, gaue his consent: prouided, that it might be doone by a Religious man, named F. Phillip, well entred into yeares, of good life, and had the fame to be verie Learned, beeing a Monke in the Abbey of S. Martine; which reuerend man, hauing admission to the King, aduised him in the course of confession, to craue pardon of God for so many murders, Bontefeux and rauages, as in his former daies hee had committed, perswading him, that (to his vttermost power) he should make recompence and satisfaction. Among other matters, he alledged, that the people of the Franche Comtè, who much complained, that albeit they wer (almost all of them) brought vnder his obedience; yet notwithstanding, his men of war stil committed the most detestable insolences on them, that could be deuised. He told him also, that if God had spoken it (with his own mouth) to his good seruant Dauid, that hee would neuer dwell in a goodly Temple, which he purposed to build, because he had bin too prodigall in the expence of Mens blood by his wars, and ouer exceeded in his hostile actions; euen so it was to be feared, that he wold withdraw his grace from the blessed Sacrament, instantly to be administred, and he might hazard the receipt of his owne damnation, except he caused his Warriours to cease from their cruelties. He further aduised him, to reduce the taxations of the kingdom to such estate as hee found them at his entrance; for his people were ouer-extreamely impouerished, and the greater part of them dyed by meere indigence.

An excellent inuention of the Lord de l'Auardin, to speake with the King.

The King made answere, that howsoeuer he repented the rauagements & spoyls by him performed in the County of Bourgongne; hee was very hartily sorry, that all the Lands belonging vnto the late Duke of Bourgongne, was not brought into the same condition. As for the Subsidies and Taxations by him imposed vppon his people; so soone as he recouered helth, he would discharge them, and no other answere could bee had frō him. Notwithstanding al which obstinacy, the Religious father performed his duty, deliuered him the blessed Sacrament, and left him to the further disposition of God. Soone after, they offered him meat to eat, which he could not receiue, because he said, that he felt a foule stinking sauour ascending out of his body vp into his braine: wherefore, he cōmanded plenty of perfumes about him, whereof it seemed he could neuer receiue sufficient, but euen in that manner surrendred vp his soule. So, shortly after, it grew to be a Prouerb in France, That the King was smoakt to death like an old Fox. Yet notwithstanding all these fantastick humors, he bethoght himselfe (some few yeares before) of his buriall, & gaue order to be interred in a Church (which was founded by himselfe) called, Noštre Dame a Clery, where he appointed diuers Cannons to pray for him.

Hauing thus discourssed the death of King Lewes, we may not forget Maister Oliuer the Dane, Barber; terming himselfe a Counsellor vnto King Lewes the eleauenth, no, nor M. Iaques Cottier the Physitian, and Chancellour: It hath been a long and common receiued saying; That of a good Life, ensueth a good Death, and of a bad life, as badde a Conclusion, which will bee found most true, in the end of our fore-named M. Oliuer. For, you must first vnderstand, that king Lewes the eleuenth, extraordinarily doting in affection vnto this Barber: bestowed on him the Captaine-shippe of Chasteau de Lothes, which was, and yet is to this present a most goodly estate; also, the gouernment of S. Quintins in Picardy; and from a meane Gentleman of his Chamber, aduanced him to many worthy Seigneuries. Insomuch, that being possessed of such large liuings & reuennues, and his courses not to bee controlled, hee plunged himselfe in all kinds of Voluptuousnesse, and euen as boldly after the Kinges death, as in his life time.

A History of a yong Gentleman of France.

It fortuned, that a young Gentleman had committed some offence, of what moment I do not well remember, but the Prouost of the Kings household had him in charge as a prisoner. The Wife to this yong Gentleman wel knowing, that if her Husbands case came to strict examination of Law, it would endaunger his life, laboured with earnest sollicitings from one to another, whom she supposed to hold best credit and fauour with King Charles, eight of that Name, and Sonne vnto the King deceased. At length she remembred the Dane, whom she thought to hold like esteem as when King Lewes liued (because hee was still much followed, richly accoutred, and entred the Kinges Chamber when himselfe pleased) to him wholly she addressed her suite, entreating him to bee the meanes of her Husbands deliueraunce. This Oliuer, perceyuing the sollicitresse to be faire, young, and of comely personage, promised to free her Husbande from prison; prouided, that hee might haue familiar knowledge of her, as Louers in secret Dalliaunce vse to doe; whereto the poore Gentlewoman (seeing no other meanes of mercy) after infinit and potent Denials, was wonne to condiscend.

The dishoneſt requeſt of M. Oliuer the barber.

Hereupon, to keepe promise with the Gentlewoman, M. Oliuer went vnto the Prouost, and entreated him to stand in the Gentlemans iustification: which by no meanes he would do. Then hee desired him to winke at his breach or escape out of prison: but much lesse would he listen to any such perswasion, albeit he promised to stand betweene him and all perill. At length, M. Oliuer seeing himselfe so neglected, and his suit denied, reproached the Prouost with great ingratitude, because he had placed him in that Office, and won him many guifts and graces from the deceased King; beside, when the King was once so incensed against him, as it stood vpon his no meane detriment, he appeased the matter, and wrought his peace. These, and other such like vrgent speeches, preuailed at length so with the Prouost, that he returned this answer. If M. Oliuer could aduise the meanes whereby the Gentleman might euade, and he sustain no peril when his prisoner should be cald for, he would gladly yeild thereto: whereto M. Oliuer thus replyed. The safest and surest meanes for his riddance, & to auoid al further dangerous questioning on his own behalfe, is to strangle the prisoner in the Gaole, and then hurle his bodye into the Riuer. In this manner (quoth he) the party offended shall bee both auenged and satisfied, the Wife to the dead man not iniuried, because hir husband stood not (as yet) in law condemned, and matters thus passing, al parties would be pleased.

The case thus fully concluded on betweene them, the Dane inuites the Gentlewoman that very instant Night to his lodging, to satisfie his lewde and libidinous Lust; which she (poor soul) accordingly did, being by him most assuredly perswaded, that the next Morning shee should see her husband at Liberry. But she (alas) was too much deceyued; for, while M. Oliuer entertained her in his bed, the Varlet of his Chamber, named Daniell, and another, called Oyac, a mender of Stockings by his first professiō (whom I do imagine to be the very same man, that Sessell sayd to bee Admiral to King Lewes) went & strangled the woful Gentleman in the Prouosts Prison, and afterwards threw him into the Riuer of Seine, as if hee had wilfully leapt out of his Lodging Window, and coueted rather to be drowned, then to answere his accusation. The body floating vpon the water, as hauing no Capacity of sinking, by reason that life was first depriued, was by Sailers & Watermen haled vp on Lande, to lye there on the banke al the day insuing, where it was soone visited by multitudes of people, and easily knowne of euery beholder. M Oliuer the Barber apprehended, and condemned to tortures.

The Lamentations of this faire weeping Gentlewoman, procured ſuch compaſsion in the by-ſtanders, that Iuſtice was ſoone acquainted with ſo foule an offence; and M. Oliuer beeing immediately apprehended, and confronted with the wofull Gentlewoman face to face, vvas forthwith (notwithſtanding all his ſtoute denialles) condemned to the Racke and Tortures. Being vnable to endure the torment, he confeſſed the fact, relying ſo much vppon the Kinges fauour, and his owne proude Authority, that they durſt not ſentence him with death. But heerein the Deceiuer found himſelfe Deceyued; for, being generally hated, becauſe he hadde ſo highly abuſed the deceaſed Kinges truſt repoſed in him, and the whole State, beſide the addition of this monſtrous inhumanitie, he was adiudged to bee hanged, and ſtrangled to Death. In which ſentence, his man Daniell bare him companie, beſide large amends out of his Liuings, to the wo-hearted Widdow. As for Oyac the Hoſe-mender, he was not hanged, becauſe it was ſufficiently approoued, that he was not preſent in the priſon, when Daniell alone ſtrangled the Gentleman, but onely holpe afterward to throwe the dead bodie into the Riuer; wherefore he had his eares cut off, and then was baniſhed out of the Kingdome.

Now, concerning Maiſter Iaques Cottier the Phyſitian, who was retired home vnto his owne Houſe, enriched with fiue and twentie thouſand Florins of Reuennewes which he had gotten, partly by Offenders Confiſcations, whereof the dead King had made him poſſeſſour; as alſo, by the large ſummes of Money ſo lately giuen him out of the Exchequer. It was iuſtified by re-edition of the Treaſurers accounts of the ſaide Exchequer, that he had receiued in readie moneyes, aboue foureſcore and eighteene thouſand Crownes, beſides other great guiftes by ſeuerall parcelles. Hereupon, he was purſued to make reſtitution; becauſe thoſe gifts were immenſe, and exceeding reaſon.

That Princes, and other perſons of great degree, who ſtand in feare of impoyſoning, ought not giue ouer-much confidence to Eſſayes or Taſts made of their meats and drinkes, neither to the wearing of precious ſtones, or Annelets.

IHolde it not amiſſe, to diſcourſe ſomwhat concerning thoſe Ceremonies, vſed in the Eſſayes & Taſtings before Princes, and other eminent perſons both in Church and Commonweale; who do carrie a degree of reſpect aboue other men; and yet notwithſtanding all thoſe deuiſes, are not a iotte the more aſſured thereby: For example ſake, the Maiſter Cooke, who more Ciuilly is tearmed, the Eſquire of the Kit-

A worldly way to make Princes wise.

Kitchin, hauing readily prepared al those Dishes on his Kitchen Table, that are to bee presented before the Prince; with a Morsell of Bread, he passes ouer all those Dishes, dipping it also into the Broaths, Sawces, and all other Viands to bee fed on; then eateth he the said piece of bread, to the end, that all suspition of poyson may be auoided. Againe, those seuerall seruices are set on the Princes Table (and before him) he that placeth or ordereth those dishes, performeth as much as the Maister Cooke formerly did. Whereby it is presumed, that the Prince may feede with the safer security. But I am not of the minde, that these essayes or tasts haue any certaine assurance, because those essayers or Tasters doo receiue so small a triall, that albeit the meats should be impoysoned, yet it cannot hurt them; or (at the most) so little, as with very slender remedy, they may be deliuered from any danger.

The Authors reason for his doubt.

A Taster cannot bee easily poysoned.

Moreouer, he that had so diuelish an intent, as to commit an acte so detestable, that partie could not be easily poysoned, by meanes of farced Flesh or Fish, which most commonly is the seruice to great mens Tables. There is much matter (in this case) of important admonishment, to wit; that such treacherous Tasters or Essayers, may formerly haue receiued some precious Antidote, to preuent the poysons perill vnto himselfe; or filled his stomacke with fat and Oyly Meates; or drinke some quantity of Milke; or fed on very fat Tripes; or Lettice well prepared with Oyle, without Salt or Vineger. Nay, it may bee, that hauing receiued some pretty quantitie of poyson, and kept it by such meanes in his stomacke, hee will cast it vp againe, wirhout any hurt or daunger, and there is nothing more certaine then this. I say beside, that Cup-tasters and Butlers may do the like, in tasting their wines, or other drinkes.

Preseruatiues against poison such as haue bin tried.

Many Monarks & Kings haue bin poysoned, notwithstanding all care for preuention.

Heere some one may obiect vnto me, that there is great apparance of trueth in my Wordes, and that manie Monarchs and Kings, notwithstanding their Essayers, Tasters, and other vigilant care to preuent such Villainy, haue been impoysoned, and dyed cruelly; as Alexander the Great, Drusus, Claudius Cæsar, Charls fift of that Name, King of Fraunce, John King of England, and diuers other. Also, that these Essayes, Tastinges, and other such like Ceremonies, are nothing else but markes of Soueraignty and principality; and such vesselles of Golde and Siluer may bee made, at such time as the mettals are melted, that may haue such Antidotes mingled therewith, quite contrary to all poysons whatsoeuer. Moreouer, hauing vessels in this order prepared, they will preserue whosoeuer shal be impoysoned, if they feede on their viands out of them only, and receiue their drink out of none other; Nay, I my selfe beheld a Physitian, mounted vp to such a degree of folly, as hee would needes vrge an absolute perswasion of all these things, to Catharine de Medicis, late Queene of France, albeit they are most absurd, and voide of all reason; for Golde-Smithes themselues do maintaine the impossibility of them. I referre the iudgement heerof, to such as are best experienced in naturall things, because nothing whatsoeuer can be mingled among Gold and Siluer, but mettals only.

Diuers strãge and impossible obiections

Nothing but mettals can bee mingled with Gold or Siluer.

I haue heard some to discourse of preseruatiues against poysons, in the presence of King Charles the ninth, and Queene Catharine his Mother; and they haue iustified very constantly, to defend any Man or woman from impoysoning; by wearing a Ring on his or her Finger, that should haue a Toad-stone placed so in it, as it might touch the flesh of the Finger; and such was the excellent Vertue thereof, as the party should feele it to burne his Flesh, if any poyson were presented to him.

A Ring with a Toad-stone in it.

Others haue affirmed, that there are certaine Carracters to be worne, hanging about ones necke, or engrauen in a ring, whose naturall property, expelleth al maner of poysons. They alledged Albertus Magnus, that hee saith in his Treatise of Images, that if any man caused to be engrauen in some precious stone, the Image of the Hearbe called Draggon-Wort, with all his Spots, Markes, and Starres, and doe but carry the stone about him, it is most singular against all Venoms. Pedro de Albano, was also produced, to set downe in his Writings that hee found in a certaine Booke, whereof in elder times, the Kings of Persia made especiall account, that whosoeuer procured to be engrauen in a Hematist, a man kneeling, circkled rounde about with a Ser-

The Stone called a Hemaust.

Serpent, holding the head thereof in his right hand, and the taile in his left; then setting that Stone in a Ring of fine Gold, and wearing it dayly, it would preserue and keepe him from all manner of poysons.

In my poore opinion, if this Image should haue so rare a Vertue, as no where else was euer heard of, it were verie requisite, that the engrauing must be done vnder the Constellation of some Plannet, whose influence shoulde infuse the propriety in the Sculpture. It was further added in the discourse, that the Agate or Iacinth, Orientall Saphire, Emeraulde, and the Stone which is called Draconitis, because it is saide to be found within the Head of a Draggon, and many other Stones beside, haue the selfe-same qualities.

False properties attributed to diuers precious stones.

As for my selfe, to deliuer readily my iudgement in this case, I thinke there is no great assuraunce to bee reposed in such carriages, because I neuer beheld so much as one experiment, whereto anie Faith or Credit might be giuen. And yet very neere all these fore-named thinges, haue beene experimented on diuers persons, condemned to death for diuers offences, on whom no effect at all could be wrought. And yet it may bee, that by subtilizing (very cunningly) an Emerald, Iacinth, Agate, or Saphire, and putting it into a Cup of Wine, or Cordiall water, the party offended with some poison may finde ease and helpe, because such stones do naturally strengthen the heart. But that wearing or carriage of them only, can quaile the malignity of any poison, I will neuer beleeue (as some verie fondly do, vntill I may my selfe beholde some great and notable experiment thereof.

Experience giueth the best assurance in such doubtfull matters.

Precious stones naturally do comfort the heart.

Not long after our fore-named discourse, there came vnto the said Kinges Court, an impudent bold-facst Fellow, a Champenois, aged about thirtie yeares, (whom I spare to name, because hee was extract of Vertuous Lignage, both by Father and Mother, to whom the louers of Learning are not a litle obliged, though he degenerated too far.) This man gaue solemne assurance, that hee had (about some yeare since past) trauailed thorowe diuers famous Cities of Germany, and frequented companies of diuers opinions, especially in Religion, among whom he heard it credibly reported, that they of the pretended reformed Religion in France, sought means to poison the king, his Brethren, & their Mother the Queen. Whereupon, he shaped his course out of Germany, into Italy, and thence into Spaine, only to find such occasions as best might assure and preserue their liues. At last, comming to Lisbone, the Metropolitane Cittie in the Kingdome of Portugal, with verie great Labour, and at a deare Value, he bought a Stone, called Pazar, or Bazar, which had beene found in the brest or stomacke of a sauage Beast, like to one of the wilde Goats liuing in diuers places of India: adding withall, that hee had made diuers experiments of the like Stone, as well on Beasts, as Moores, and others of the Mahometan religion. Then with plentie of Oathes, hee assured their Royall Maiesties, that the partie whome hee bought it of, was a Captaine belonging vnto the Spanish Seas; and shewing the Stone, it was presently deliuered to the Physitians belonging to the King and Queene, for their aduise and counsel in the matter: shee being a very Wise Princesse, and well enstructed, hardlie could shee be drawne to doe any thing rashly.

A Historie of a bold and impudent lyer.

A stone found in the brest of a Wild Beast, called a Bazar or Pazar.

Aduise giuen for trial of the stones vertue.

Counsell was giuen to the Queene, to make triall of the Stones Vertue, vpon criminall prisoners, such as had deserued Death, and extraordinary punnishment. Whereupon, the Prouost belonging vnto the Houshold, was sent for; and beeing questioned, whether he had anie Offender in his prisons worthy of death, he answered; that he had a bold Theef, condemned for robbing the Kinges Receyuers of monies, and remained at his Maiestie mercie. Also he hadde another, a Cooke by his profession, who had robbed his Maister of great store of plate, & both these, without order to the contrarie, were to suffer death the next Morning.

Experiment made on two condemned persons.

It was concluded, that poison should be giuen to both these condemned men, as much to the one, as to the other; and the Pazar or Bazar stone, being beaten to powder, a quantity thereof should be giuen to the one prisoner, and none at all to the other, to make a perfect proofe of the Stones Vertue; which stone, I my selfe handled, and was as bigge as a common Almond. But hee that receiued the powder of the ſaide ſtone, according to the proportion appointed by the Champenois, notwithſtanding hee was holpen thereby, as much as could bee poſſibly deuiſed, yet he died as well as the other priſoner, both of them enduring much more heauy, great, and grieuous Torments, then they ſhould haue done by the punniſhments prepared for them. Which when the king & the Queen his Mother perceiued, they threw the reſt of the Stone into the fire, and ſharpely rebuked the Champenois for his impudent lying. By this meanes, the impoſture was fruſtrated of his intent, which was, to obtaine the guift of a thouſand Crownes, beſide the firſt Abby or Priory that fell vacant, or already was falne. The man was not long ſince known to be liuing in very miſerable condition, lame in his limbes, aged aboue threeſcore, and generally ſcorned of euerie one that knew or heard of his apparant folly.

Aduertiſemẽt to Princes, & other great perſons.

By this diſcourſe, Princes and others of high quality may learne, not to bee ouer-confident in ſuch men, as giue thẽ aduiſe and meanes to preſerue themſelues from poyſons; wherof no ſound experience hath beene made, but bequeaths them ſtill to dayly dangers. For which reaſon, wee will declare in our ſucceeding Chapter, how, and in what manner they may be preſerued and defended againſt poyſons. Alſo, why poiſons are vſed to Princes, and men of high Authority, to bereaue them of their Liues, rather then by Armes or Weapons.

CHAP. XVI.

Why the liues of Princes are more attempted by poyſons, then by Armes. And by what meanes they may preſerue & helpe themſelues, if they doubt or finde themſelues to be impoyſoned.

ORdinarily, ſuch as pretend the death of Princes, Princeſſes, & of other illuſtrious perſons by poyſons, they do it in that kind, becauſe openly murdering a Prince, expoſeth the parties life to ineuitable death; and neuer hath any one bin ſeene (or at the leaſt very rarely) to eſcape, becauſe he muſt needes be ſurprized by the Archers or Guardes, that continually attendeth the perſon Royall. Wherefore, ſuch as dare contriue ſo wicked an action, are commonly men of higheſt rank or note, and (oftentimes) of their owne blood, either aſpyring to their eſtate & dignities, or in reuenge of ſome receyued iniury; wherein no reaſon being able to rule them, fury and violent rage tranſportes them vnto this deteſtable meanes.

The Reaſons alledged why the attempt is by poyſon.

Now, to auoid and preuent all occaſions of ſuch dreadfull attemptes, a Prince ought not to vſurp on any eſtate appertaining to another. For this is an eſpeciall reaſon, to leade both himſelfe and his to daily danger. Hee ought alſo religiouſly to keepe himſelfe in the ſtate of grace, by frequent and deuout Prayers vnto Almighty God; to Loue his Subiects; to doo nothing againſt the Lawes of Nature, and to be Nobly Liberall to ſuch as are about him, & haue the hourely care of his perſon. Moreouer, they that attend on the health of any Prince or Princeſſe, as Phyſitians and their Adiuncts; they ought to vſe their ſtomacks to Gargariſmes and Caſtings, at leaſt once euery month, in the Morning. For, ouer and beſide that it much auayleth againſt poyſons, which at their firſt Working will thereby bee expelled preſently, ſo is it one of the moſt ſoueraigne remedies and ſecurities that can be deuiſed. To purge the ſtomacke, is likewiſe aduantageable againſt the Stone, Dropſie, Goute, &c. And two or three dayes he muſt vſe to take Treacle, or Mithridatum, faſting. Some do highly commend the Confection of Iacinth; and by frequent vſe of theſe things, very rarely ſhall the bodie be preſerued them poyſon.

How beſt to auoide all dangerous attempts againſt a Princes life.

Purging the ſtomack is very much auailing.

But if it happen, that a Prince haue vndoubtedly receyued poyſon, ſuddenly let him bee made to vomit by voluntary Drinkes, if Nature bee not eaſily therto inclined; or let him drink a good quantity of Lukewarme milke, and if Butter bee well mingled there among the cure is much the ſooner compaſſed. After very ſtrong vomitting, & ſo much as he is able to indure, with the receit of ſome

For dreſſing meats.

Moreouer, thoſe Kitchen Veſſelles for Cookery, wherein his Meates and Broaths are to be dreſt, ought daily and hourely to be kept couered, to preuent the fall of any Venomous Creatures thereinto, as Stellions, Phalanges, Lizards, Scorpions, Serpents, & Spiders, who ordinarily make their aboad about Chimnies. Nicholas hath ſet downe in his Writings, that all the Monkes in a Conuent at Florence, dyed, by hauing eaten Pottage and Meate ſodden in a Pot, whereinto (from the toppe of the Chimney by chaunce) a dead Spyder fell.

A ſtrange Hiſtory.

Beſides, no Sauces are to bee preſented to Princes, eſpecialy if they be thick, or in co our Greene, Red, or White; becauſe very daungerous Poyſons may be commixed in thoſe Colours, they being alſo much like to them. Theſe things diligently obſerued, it ſhall be a very difficult matter, to bereaue any Princes life by Poyſon. Now let vs ſee in our enſuing Chapter, if poyſons may be giuen any other way, then in meates or drinkes.

...t Sauces ...o bee ...uſed by colour.

CHAP. XVII.

That a man may bee impoyſoned by Pomanders of ſweete ſmell, Fumes of Torches, Tapers, Candels; by Letters, Garments, and other ſuch like things.

IN our former Chapters, we haue diſcourſed how poyſon may be adminiſtred in Meats and Drinkes, to the preiudice of life. Now we are to ſay, whether the like Treacherie may be accompliſhed by ſweet ſmelling Pomanders, Fume, or ſmoake of Torches, Candles; or by reading Letters, wearing Gloues, Shirts, and other Garments.

Many haue held Opinion, that the kiſſing of Princes Garmentes, before they be put vpon their perſons, and generally all things preſented vnto them, as Letters, Hand-kerchiefes, or whatſoeuer elſe, is done to no other end, but onely for Ceremony, Reſpect, and Honour, in duty and reuerence to their Greatneſſe and Excellency. But, I am able to affirme the contrary, becauſe it was at firſt inuented, and done, expreſſly to aſſure them from being Impoyſoned, by ſuch things as ſhould be preſented vnto th m. And whoſoeuer will read the Greeke Authours, ſhall finde that Wickednes ſe to be moſt auncient; eſpecially we finde, that the Caribes (inhabiting the New World) haue long vſed it.

Why all things deliuered to Princes, are kiſſed.

Strange manner of Impoyſonings.

And to approoue my words, I will alledge ſome examples well knowne to our ſelues and that ſuch things are to be done, it hath bin, and yet may be noted, that whoſoeuer ſleepeth or ſitteth any long while vnder the ſhadow of a Walnut Tree in Summer, ſhall foorthwith be offended with a grieuous Head-ach. And ſuch as take the Coole Ayre vnder the Yew Tree, will be in dreadfull peril. I my ſelfe haue obſerued diuers inconueniences happening thereby, not only to Men and Women, but to Beaſts likewiſe. Do we not (almoſt) daily behold, that the ſmoake of a Tallow Candle, the light being ſuddainly extinct, is very dangerous to Women with child, cauſing the Head-ach in extremeſt maner, and brought one (whom I very well know) to the falling ſickneſſe?

Experience of diuers kinds of dangers by ſitting vnder Trees.

A Friend of mine, commonly called the Fat man, a Piccarde by Nation, and Chirurgion to the late Lewes of Bourbon Prince of Conté, who hauing handled and carried about him a ſweet Pomander, for the ſpace of fiue or ſix Houres; which Pomander, an Italian Perfumer preſented to the ſaid Prince, & preſently was deliuered to the ſayd Chirurgions keeping, who ſoone after, fell into Sownings, Caſtings, Torments in the Braine, Conuulſions, and afterwards, into moſt grieuous and miſerable languiſhing. Yet two Moneths after, by the diligent care and aſſiſtance of a Piemontois Phyſitian, who belongeth to my Lord the Conſtable at this inſtant, and then called Marſhall d'Amville, hee was recouered. Alſo, the Seruaunt to the Apothecarie, called Goulet, dwelling in Paris, deſpiſing the Friendly

The vapor of a Char-coale fire venimous except iron be put into it.

At Lymoges, in the beginning of the Leagues turbulent emotion, Monſieur de Pantadour being com to Lymoges, to take order (as ſworn Lieutenant to the king) that the Towne might bee maintayned for his Maieſties ſeruice, and hauing (by example of Iuſtice) giuen terror to ſom Offenders; a Soldiour of ſom account, ſhutting himſelfe into a Cabinet, leaſt otherwiſe hee ſhould bee diſcouered; by the vapor of a very ſmall Char-cole fire, died in leſſe then twelue houres, and could by no meanes be recouered. The fume aud ſmoake of impoyſoned Torches and Candles, are not they much more able to procure the death of anie perſon?

A man poyſoned by ſmelling to a Gilly floure.

It is not long ſince, a Lombard gaue an impoyſoned Gilly-floure, vnto one whoſe death he deſired, albeit hee diſſembled his inward treachery verie cunningly, and (in outward ſhew) with extraordinary friendſhip; but by ſmelling to the ſaid Floure, the party ſuddenly fell downe dead. The ſmell or ſauour of a Sea-Hare, is ſo pernitious, as not only it troubleth the ſence, ſight, and procureth caſting: but likewiſe, if a man continue in the ſame, ſent but for ſome few houres, it cauſeth death without any recouery, as I my ſelfe haue ſeene by experience.

Smell of the Sea-Hare very dangerous.

These few written and recorded hiſtories, of taking away life by impoyſoned Odours and Vapours, may ſerue as ſufficient for our inſtruction; let vs com now to thoſe other kindes, which (by touching onely) do as much, or rather farre worſe. About ſome two yeares ſince, I beheld the death of a yong man, aged ſcarſely twenty yeares, who ſuffered the application of a great Emplayſter (made of the flies called Cantharides) to his cheek, whereon he had a great red blemiſh, which hee brought with him into the world at his birth, and appeared to him as no meane deformity; extreamity of paine would not permit him to indure the plaiſter hardly foure houres, but he was dead before the next Morning. And yet, as euery one well knoweth, the Cantharides are one of the weakeſt Venoms.

A man Impoiſoned by an implaiſter of Cantharides.

I alſo, ſawe the death of a Gardiner, who, by pruning and clenſing his trees, the Egges of Catterpillers happened to fall on his face, and venomed it beyond recouery. Now, albeit this may ſeeme ſomwhat rare, that a mans death ſhould be cauſed by ſo ſmall a matter: yet it is moſt certaine, that both theſe Hiſtories, and ſuch as follow after, doo euidently declare, that by nothing but the very touch onely of ſome impoyſoned thing, death enſueth without any Remedy.

Egges of Catterpillers very dangerous.

Galen declareth, that a man in the City of Bythinia, ſcituate in the kingdom of Thrace, cauſed the death of diuers men by an Hearb, compaſſing the means that it might but ſticke vppon their skinne only. And that the firſt knowledge or experience which he had thereof, was, by buying the Liuer of an Hogge in the Market, and returning from the City to his Country houſe, he had occaſion by the way to do the Office of nature, laying the Liuer (in meane while) on the ground, on diuers hearbes. As he tooke vp the Liuer again, he perceiued blood to yſſue foorth in great aboundance; whereby he iudged, that it proceeded from ſome Vertue in one of the hearbs, that ſtil cleaued faſt to the Liuer: he further conceiued, that if the ſame Hearbe were applyed to men or Beaſts; their death wold eaſily be thereby procured, which he acordingly performd on ſuch as himſelfe pleaſed. But his wicked and bloody practiſe being known, at length he was apprehended and broght before the Miniſter of Iuſtice, where, without ſufferance of many torments, he confeſſed the whol matter, and what plenty of that herb grew in that place only, which he ſware he neuer had reuealed to any perſon. When the Magiſtrate had heard his whole Confeſſion, he condemned him to Death, and preſently cauſed his eyes to be blindfolded: to the end, that as he was led on the way vnto the place whereas his Execution was appointed, he ſhould not teach or inſtruct any other, in ſo horrid and damnable a practiſe.

A ſtrange Hiſtory alledged by Galen of poyſoning by the touch of an Hearbe.

A great diſcretion in the Magiſtrate to auoid further danger.

Many men and women haue greatly indaungered their bodies, by Itches, Scabs, and ſuch like filthineſſe, onely by lying in vncleane ſheets, or wearing the Gar-

Danger by sleeping in vncleane linnen, or wearing garments

Garments of corrupted persons. The Neapolitane disease is very easily so taken in Italy, but rarely in France. Good Histories doe assure vs, that Hercules died with extreame torments, being impoysoned by a shirt which his wife had sent him.

A Turke poysoned a Wallachian by a paire of Buskins.

Monsieur de Montagnac, Lord of Trenchillion, who accompanied Messire Francois de Noailles, Bishop of Dax, Ambassadour into the East, deliuered vnto mee for an vndoubted truth, that a Turke in the City of Patara in Lycia, caused the death of a Wallachian, in this manner. The Turke very desirous of the Wallachians death, which yet he dissembled artificially, sought all vnsuspected meanes how to compasse it: & his reason was, because the Wallachian would not take his oath, that the Turke (being a Patarian Souldiour) was one of the first that mounted on the breach of a final town, (but very strong) which the Turkes had besiedged and taken in Hungarie. For, such as can approue in Turky, that they haue performed any Generous Act; are recompenced with diuers Ducates, ouer and aboue their ordinary pay, and are likewise aduanced to the first vacant degrees. The Turke at last presented the Wallachian with a faire paire of red Buskins, which he accepting as a Signall of kindnesse, did presently put them on his Legges; or had not worn them aboue two houres, but a great heate and rednesse appeared on his Legges, which he himselfe (as yet) perceiued not. Hauing put off his Buskins, the rednesse conuerted into pushes, blaines, and blisters, which quickly running ouer his whole body, he dyed within twelue houres, exclaiming on the Patarian, who was fled away.

Of impoysoning Saddles, Reines of Bridles, Surrops, and Sheathes of Swords, &c

As concerning a common report, that the Saddles of Horses may be impoysoned, the Raines of their Bridles, the stirrops, and Scabberds and Sheathes of Swordes, thereby to impoyson such as sit, handle, or weare them: the Turkes that inhabite the higher Misia, are saide to be skilfull Maisters in such exercises; yet I make some difficulty of giuing credit hereto, because I neuer beheld any such accident to happen. Neuertheless, many men of sound credit, who haue trauailed the East, and the adioyning parts; do faithfully maintaine the truth thereof. But if there be nothing more certaine, then that a body may be impoysoned, euen to death, by a paire of Gloues, if but drawne vppon the hands, and by a Handkerchiefe, if the face be wiped therewith: Then let mee tell you for a truth, that a great Lady of France (some few yeares past) had both these wicked presents, onely for the couetousnesse of the great wealth she enioyed, and the strange manner of her death was bemoaned by many.

Danger by Gloues and Handkerchiefes.

Seeing then, that the death of Princes and great persons may thus be compassed: I would aduise them that hold so high dignities, and liue among bad people, who make no conscience of vsing all kinds of wickednesse; to carry Powders about them, and other compositions, such as skilfull Phisitions can well enstruct them in, which may defend the Braine, the Lungs, and Heart, preseruing both them and the other inward parts of the body, with receiuing often Treacle, Methridate, and such like vertuous things. As for Saddles, Reines of Bridles, and Scabberds of Weapons: danger in them may be auoyded, by seeing them well cleansed, chafed, and rubbed, with faire Linnen Cloathes before a mans face. And for Handkerchiefes, Gloues, and Letters; they ought to be well heated by good fires, and carried abroad into the ayre, before they be read or vsed, as the like is to be done in things of like qualitie.

Necessary aduise to preuent such perils, and by what meanes.

CHAP. XVIII.

That all Venims or Poysons, haue not the power to kill the heart; but that diuers of them (by a certaine hidden or manifest property) doe rather worke against one certaine part of the body; then against another.

DIuers doe hold opinion, that all Venimes or Poysons, do containe operation alike, and all of them tend to no other end, but to kill the hart, which is the onely fountaine of life. But this coniecture hath deceiued

All poysons do not cōtain alike power in working.

deceiued many, for the greater part of Poysons, haue an obscure or apparant property, to viciate or destroy rather one part then another. Because there are some that will infect the braine; others the mouth; others the Lights or Lungs; others the Liuer; others, the Melt, or Spleene; others, the Reines; others the Bladder; and others, the seuerall ioynts of the Body, &c. Concerning the meaneſt or most common kinds, whereof others haue saide somewhat before my self, I would discourse a little; and so much the rather, because what is handled in this Chapter, I wold iustifie for truth; and therefore we will beginne with a venomous simple, that woundeth and offendeth the Braine very greatly.

The danger of Hemlocke, or Homlocke.

Hemlock, or Homlock, called in Latine Cicuta, an Hearb vulgarly knowne, by an apparant property, doth more offend the Braine, then any other part of the Body: insomuch, that they who haue tasted thereof, haue felt an instant wheeling giddineſle, or torment in the head, and sometimes meerely haue run mad. I haue seene two men, who thinking they did eate Persley, were deceiued with Hemlock (for these two Plants haue a very neere resemblance) the one dyed soone after; and the other (while he liued) could neuer recouer his health, and this hath been noted in many more.

How the Athenians vsed the iuyce of Hemlock.

The Athenians vsed to giue the Iuyce of Hemlock, to such honorable persons in their citty, as were condemned to death by sentence of the Iudge.

The people of Tuscany much abused by Hemlocke.

In Tuscanie groweth a great quantity thereof, and if their Asses happen to feede thereon, they fall downe in such a profound sleepe, as they seeme rather to be dead then astonied. Many poore Countrey people were hereby much abused informer times, who little dreampt on any such strange alteration, or the cause thereof: for verily, imagining their Asses to be starke dead, and hauing more then halfe fleyed their skins, the beasts recouered, to the great amazement of their Masters, but much delight of the Beholders. Hereby may be easily obserued, that Hemlock is altogether contrary to the Braine.

Crow-foot causeth men to dye laughing.

There is another Simple, cald Crowfoote; in French Batrachion, or Passefloure; in Greek and in Latine Apium risus, which if it be put into the mouth, it with-draweth the Iawes in such maner, as if it procured continuall laughter, & in laughing manner it causeth death. That which groweth in Sardignia, is not altogether so violent: yet, if it be applyed to the Flesh, as sometimes it is to the Arteries of the Armes against a Feauer Quartaine, it cauterizeth and burneth the Flesh.

The powder of the Sea-Hare, consumeth the Lights and Lungs: witnessed by story of a Singing man, or Quirister.

The scent or smell of the Sea-Hare, and his Flesh dryed in Powder and taken, it greatly iniureth the voyce, and woundeth the Lights in such manner, that such as haue receiued thereof but three times, and in very small quantity, haue bin brought to an exulceration of the Lungs, and incurable consumption of the body. This was verified on a Chanter or Quirister, in the Chappell of King Charles the ninth, in the yeare 1566. by another man of the same quality, who beeing desirous to preferre a Kinsman of his into the other Mans place, he being in gracious respect with the King, gaue him some of this Powder, wheron grew an Vlcer in his lungs, his voyce vtterly spoyled, and he (in short while after) dyed. Here you are to vnderstand, that Chaunters vse sometimes to bacchanalize among themselues; especially, when they receiue any extraordinary benefits or rewardes of Princes, or other great Lords in the Courts, for Mornings or Euenings salutations with their Musique and voyces: then, for preseruation of their voyces, they mingle diuers wholesome spices, compounded with Sugar among their Wines, to send them downe with the greater delectation. By which vnsuspected meanes, the Chaunter could the more easily poyson his Enemy; whereof at last he dyed, hauing voyded (by extreamity of a Cough) a mighty Impostumation, which this dangerous Powder had bred within him. Neuertheleſſe, the Fact was discloſed, and the Prouost of the Houshold directing his Proceſſe against the Chaunter, he was (by sentence of the Iudge) hanged and strangled, and his body after burned.

Of poyſons that deſtroy the Liuer.

Concerning thoſe Venoms that deſtroy the Liuer, there are ſome ſtore of them; onely it ſhall content me to aduertiſe the Reader, and remember him of the Hiſtory alleadged in the precedent Chapter, of the Countrey-man of Bithynia, and how by the meanes of one onely Hearbe, which ſpoyled the Liuer he then carryed, he wrought the death of many people. And ſome of the Simpliſts of theſe our inſtant times, haue found out that daungerous Hearb; and yet, imitating the wiſedome of their learned Maiſter Galen, they dare not make it openly knowne. They can likewiſe (for the ſame purpoſe) make Poyſons of Minerals, and of diuers other Creatures in theſe daies, which neuer were knowne to our Elders; and they will take away life in very ſhort time.

The cunning of Simpliſts in theſe daies.

For the reins, Bladder, and genitiue parts

Againſt the Reines, Bladder, and genitiue parts, I need ſpeake of none but the Cantharides, whereof if any quantity be taken, or more then the skilfull Phiſition ſhall preſcribe by writing, without queſtion death enſueth. As I my ſelfe ſaw happen to a young Gentlewoman, waiting in the Chamber of a Lady in Guyenne, to whom a wanton young Gallant (being amorous of her beauty and perfections) found meanes to make her receiue the weight of three drams of the Powder of Cantharides, mingled among certaine greene Hearbes, made Sallet-wiſe; onely to induce her to his voluptuous deſires: and this he did by the Councell of a poore, needy, and wicked Apothecary, who (for three Crownes) ſold him the ſaid Powder of Cantharides. The Gentlewoman, within three houres after, fell into ſtrange alterations: as a moſt violent heat, and exulceration of the Reines and Bladder, being deſirous euery moment to auoid Vrine, with extreame ſtingings and prickings, whereof in the end ſhe dyed. And her body being opened after her death; the Reines, Matrixe, and Bladder, were found very blacke, dryed, and excoriated. Not onely the Cantharides being drunk, or otherwiſe inwardly receiued, are moſt pernitious, but likewiſe if they be outwardly applyed, as I my ſelf can witneſſe, by that which happned to a Curtizane at Paris. She being offended becauſe ſhe was of a browne complexion, went to a certaine Mountebancke, to buy ſome meanes of fayrer beauty. He applyed a Cataplaſme or emplayſter, both to her Face and Neck, which was well compounded with the Cantharides, and this ſhe muſt weare for the ſpace of twelue houres; but within three daies after ſhe died. There was likewiſe then preſent with me, one named Monſieur Greaume, a learned Phiſitian, who cauſing her body to be opened, her Reaines, Matrixe, and Bladder (but no part elſe) were found to be Gangrened, and moſt filthily ſmelling.

A Hiſtory of a deceiued Gentlewomã.

Hurt by ignorant Apothecaries.

Another Hiſtory of a Curtizane.

There are alſo diuers kinds of Pulſe or Graine (which I will forbeare to ſpeake of) whereof if any frequent vſe be made; ſuch debility will be found in the ioynts of the body, as in the Legs, Feete, Flanckes, Armes, and ſuch like Members, that hardly can any eaſe bee had for the paine. A Learned Phiſitian ſhewed me a Simple, with credible aſſurance, that if the weight of a Crowne were taken thereof; it would take away the benefit of ſight within foure houres after. He ſhewed me alſo the root of another Simple, the powder wherof procured deafeneſſe.

Danger by diuers kindes of Pulſe.

Simples that take away both ſight and hearing

Wherefore it is not to bee doubted, but as there are Medicaments, which both purge and comfort certaine parts of a mans body: euen ſo there are diuers Venoms and Poyſons, which aſſayle and moleſt one part more then another, as I thinke I haue ſufficiently ſhewne. Witneſſe Agaricke, that purgeth the braine particularly, and Muske likewiſe, which (in a ſmall quantity) glads and comforts it. Aloes and Myrabolans, doe purge the ſtomack; Cinamon and Spicknard do make it well againe. Succory and Rheubarbe wil purge the Liuer; Ceterach and Capprier the Melt or Spleene; Terebinthina and cold Seeds, the Reines and Bladet: for al which, there are as many, or more kind of cõforts. In like manner, there are Hearbs, Plants, Minerals, Animals, that both offend and help diuers parts of the body. Hauing (in mine opinion) diſcourſed ſufficiently on this Argument, I thinke it not amiſſe (in our enſuing Chapter) to remooue their error, who do conceit, that Impoyſoners can can worke so cunningly, on such bodies as they are willing to destroy: to make them languish, & liue so many months, weeks, daies, houres, or yeares, as they please to limit or appoint.

CHAP. XIX.

To know if an Impoisoner can so arteficially accommodate his poysons, that he may limit the houre, day, weeke, month, and yeare, in which time his intention shall cause the person to languish, & afterward die, by him poysoned.

The opinion of Theophrastus

Heophrastus is of the mind, that a man may so prepare Aconitum, or other poisons in such manner, as he may thereby cause another body to languish or die, according as himselfe pleaseth. He saith beside, that such as keepe poyson within them for any long time, shall dye with much paine, for it followeth on necessity, that the body will become dry and crumpled: whereas contrariwise, they that containe them but a short while, doe dye much more easily.

The opinion of Phisitions, concerning the times of operation in poysons.

The vniuersality of Physitians haue concluded, that albeit some poysons are found to be more quicke and suddaine then others are or can be: yet notwithstanding, the one or others power, it is impossible to iudge assuredlie on what day shall be the period of their operation, in procuring the death of any one, as some haue supposed. For if we admit, that poysons are more sudden in some bodies, then in others: it proceedeth not from the naturall propriety of those poysons; but is caused by the greater or lesser resistance in nature, in the persons that bee impoysoned.

One poyson giuen to diuers, for tryall thereof.

Hereupon it hath bin noted by experience, that in giuing one and the same poysons, and in iust equality of weight, to diuers condemned persons: one hath dyed within an houre, another in lesse then a quarter; and a third hath continued for foure and twenty houres; yea, in some man, nothing at all hath appeared, such hath beene the strength of Nature. This may be daily discerned in Laxatiue Medicines, for deliuering one and the same Medicine, (and in like quantity) to diuers diseased persons: in some it is found to be of facile motion; in others, of very tardy operation. To some, the Medicine dooth a little seruice; to others, a great deale; and to others nothing at all. It will purge some without griefe or pain; in others, the same Medicine will cause a thousand languishes: and yet notwithstand, all this proceedeth but from the diuersitie of temperature in Men, which cannot be so exactly noted, as to determine certainely, at what time naturall heat shall withstand or resist the poyson.

A similitude drawne from Medicines purgatiue, & comfortatiue.

A notable example well worth the obseruation.

But let vs put the case, that there were an Impoysoner so subtile and ingenious, as (by experience and science) he could easily vnderstand the carriage of the vitall faculties in diuers and sundry persons, and that he could coniecture, how long he should liue to whom hee gaue the poyson: yet notwithstanding all this, it is impossible for him to know resoluedly, which, shall bee the death-day of the party impoysoned by him. For it is not possible, that any Phisition or Philosopher (except it bee diuinely reuealed to him) should calculate so farre as the vtmost point, how much ther is in euery perticular body, both of Radicall humour, and of naturall heate: considering, that the principall qualities of our Bodies, do not alwaies continue in one condition. And hence it proceedth, that wee finde our selues to be more strong, or else more feeble, at one time then another: whereto wee may likewise adde, that internall causes doe alter and change our temperatures ordinarilie. Counter-poysons also, being giuing to such as are impoysoned, although they cannot surmount the malignity of the poyson; yet notwithstanding, they wil prolong the pacients life. And therefore I hold it as a very great folly in any one to thinke, that hee can weigh and iudge of our inward faculties, euen as iustly as if he weighed Saffron.

Our bodies are not at all times in one estate.

Counterpoysons, if not help, yet they will prolong life.

It ought also further to be noted, that although the resistance happeneth, (for the most part) according as the Nature of the party Impoysoned is is weake or strong: yet neuertheleſſe, it proceedeth likewiſe hence, that ſome men haue their arteries (through which ſome poyſons paſſe, to penetrate ſo far as the heart) much greater and groſſer then other men haue. For when a Poyſon findeth the Conduits large & wide, not only doth it paſſe the more ſuddenly, but likewiſe it goes on and enters euen to the heart, by meanes of the ayre continually entring, that peerceth thorough the flabels of the heart, or other parts, where the poyſon (by his hidden or manifeſt quality) ſeeketh to hurt. Which neuer happeneth in ſuch perſons, as haue a coole heart, and their vitall Spirits ſtrengthleſſe; becauſe their Arteries are very narrow.

why Hemlock is deadly to men, & good for Starlings.

Hereupon enſueth the ſaying of Galen, that Hemlocke is mortall to men, and nutratiue to Stares or Starlings: for thoſe Birds haue their Arteries ſo ſtrait, that it is not poſſible for the venome in the Hemlocke, to penetrate ſo farre as the hart. And to approue my wordes, I will relate an Hiſtory, of one named Seigneur Valentine, who was held to bee the naturall Sonne of Pope Alexander the ſixt: & the ſame is alledged by Mathiolus, who heard it reported credibly, by diuers men in his time. This Man, being deſirous to poyſon certain Cardinals at a banquet; without thinking thereon, poyſoned himſelf alſo, with his Father, & diuers other frends: ſome wherof dyed within few daies after; others, ſome months after; others, ſome yeares; and yet himſelfe eſcaped, by the help of certaine Antidotes which he tooke, and other remedies. He experimented the ſame poyſon, by giuing it to diuers Mules and Mulets, which he could eaſily kill, according to the working of their naturall heat. The reaſons then before alleadged, and this Hiſtory may ſerue to perſwade the Reader, ꝑ the vulgar opinion is not auaileable; holding obſtinately, that the Impoyſoner can certainly determine the houre of a mans death, which is apparantly falſe.

Dioſco. lib. 5. cap. 1. A Hiſtory of a notorious impoyſoner.

A poyſon inuented by the of Cumana in India.

Thoſe people in the Prouince of Cumana, ſcituate in the Weſt Indiaes, doe make a poyſon which killeth the heart ſuddainely, eyther by the ſmell thereof, or touch: it is compounded of the blood of diuers Serpents; Gum made of a certaine Hearb, and a ſtrange kinde of Apples, all commixed together, with the Heads of ſome Ants, that are full of venome. In compoſition of this vile Drugge, they ſhut vp an old Woman in a Chamber, giuing her all the ſeuerall ſubſtances, and ſuch Wood as muſt boyle all the Simples together. This decoction continueth two or three daies and nights on the Fire, before it can bee brought to perfection: and the old woman dyeth with the ſtincke and venomous fume iſſuing from the ſeething. If ſhe dye, they then highly praiſe and commend the poyſon; but if ſhe ſcape without death, then they caſt it away, and puniſh the woman very grieuouſly. This poyſon is ſaid to be the very ſame, which is vſed by the Caribes, and againſt which, the Spaniards could neuer finde any remedy; being wounded by the impoyſoned Arrowes and Darts, ſhot and caſt at them by thoſe Caribes.

Proofe made of the poiſons power.

Poyſon vſed by the Caribes.

I could haue proceeded further in this diſcourſe of poyſons, to the pleaſing, or rather diſlike of the Reader, becauſe the ſubiect is ſome-what odious: but the cauſe procuring me to what hath beene deliuered, was, to aduiſe ſuch as are conſtituted (in theſe our daies) in places of eminency and dignity, to haue an eſpeciall regard of themſelues, becauſe ambition hath beene, and yet is ſo great in ſome perſons; as very fewe Princes haue not beene endangered by poyſon. And if that way hath not preuailed, to make their liues ſubiect to their mallice; then Piſtols haue beene imployed, and impoyſoned Kniues: As on the moſt Chriſtian King Henry the third, who was ſlaine in that manner at Saint Clou. Then on King Henry the fourth, whoſe memory will endure to the Worlds end, for a famous King and peereleſſe Souldier: and who bare the markes of ſuch villainous attempts all his life time, euen in his royall face, and could not preuent his death thereby.

The Authors reaſon, for diſcourſing on poyſons.

Kings ſlaine with impoyſoned Knines.

I am alſo to be excuſed, in not ſetting downe the names of many poyſons, & paſſing vnder ſilence the power of ſuch as are very dangerous; becauſe I held it no part of my duty, in regard that Galen himſelfe refuſed to name them: Nicander, and (after him) Dioſcorides, haue ſet downe the names of many poyſons in their workes, and deliuered certaine ſignes, whereby to know what poyſons

Galen, Nicander, and Dioſcorides.

are to be dealt withall, and remedies also incident to them. But let me tell ye, that those perrilous matters whereof they haue made so publique euidence, are so grosse, and of such easinesse to be defended, as (in very truth) they doe not deserue to be set downe in writing. For such as are made vse of in these our times, they haue much more pernitious effects, and sooner can ridde the world of many persons, then any of the other (by vse then made of them) had power to do.

Our notell poysons more dangerous then them of old.

CHAP. XX.

What manner of people they were, that had the Title of Gymnosophistes.

FOr better vnderstanding, what is meant by the word Gymnosophistæ, to such as are little experienced in the Grecke tongue, I direct mine intent, giuing them to know, that the Word is composed of two vocables; to wit, Gymnos, which is as much to say, as Naked; and Sophistæ, that is, Wise; euen as if you would say Naked-wise, for (in very truth) they went continually naked. Pliny and Cicero haue discoursed of them, and (after them) Saint Augustine. These Philosophers dwelt about Mount Caucasus, neere vnto the Riuer Ganges; where they went naked, as yet (to this day) the most part of the Inhabitants of that Countrey doe. They vsed to make Vowes, to liue in Deserts, some in Forrests: not during life, but for a certaine number of yeares, walking in contemplation of Celestiall thinges, and of Morall Philosophy. They would neuer enter into any Townes or Cittics, neither married, but liued austerely, alwaies looking stedfastly on the Sunne, euen in the greatest heate of the day; standing vsually vppon one foot, in the very hotteste and scorching sand or dust. Beeing wearied with long standing in that manner, they would stand as long vpon the other, and sildome stand on both feet together; this they wold likewise do in the extremest cold of winter.

Gymnosophistæ, Naked-wise Pliny. Cicero. S. August.

Vowes of the Gymnosophists.

Their Life, Custome, and Behauiour.

They fed on nothing but Fruits and roots, which alwaies (in meere charity) was brought to them: for rather then to aske or require food, they would famish themselues to death. They vsed to lye in the coole shade vnder Trees, or else in the vast, wide, open fielde. Persons of great honour, and multitudes of other people beside, vsed to goe see them, and brought their Children with them, to be enstructed by them; because it was reputed in euery opinion, that they were men of great sanctity, and excelled all other in knowledge. In breefe, all their Doctrine was to know God, shunne Vices, and (aboue all other) ambition. They inred their bodies to endure all kinds of afflictions, were it to bee burned aliue: for many of them would cast themselues into a fire, if they had attained vnto the age of fifty years, or there about. There was no small number of them, but very many, and they accepted into their society children descended of the best houses. Whereof Cicero being certified, he marualled not a little, that among so barbarous a Nation, and where they made no vse of letters: there should bee found so many Learned Philosophers, chast, sober, adorned with many vertues, and accustomed to suffer all iniuries, as well of the Ayre, as in other externall matters.

Their manner of feeding and lodging.

Children brought to be instructed by them.

Their Doctrine and sufferance.

Cicero his reason of amazement at the Gymnosophists.

Strabo writeth, that there were two kindes of Gymnosophistes; one of them dwelling in Deserts and Forrests, cloathing themselues with leaues and barks of trees, liuing bashfully and soberly, neuer dinking any Wine; and these Men were tearmed Hermanes. The other sort frequented Kings Courts, Cities, and assemblies of people, and they were called Brachmanes: who held opinion, that the day of death was the birth-day of vertuous Soules; which opinion appeared to be truly Christian.

Strabo affirms two sortes of Gymnosophists.

Hermanes.

Brachmanes.

Alexander the great, hauing trauailed farre in the Indiaes, heard report of these Gymnosophistes, and caused some of them to be brought before him: of whom he was sharpely reproued, because hee beeing but a Mortall Man, hauing but one mouth to feede, and one Kingdome, more then sufficient for his Gouerning; that yet he tooke such paines, and oftentimes fell into great dangers, to raunge, trouble, and conquer all the East

Alexander the great, reproued by the Gymnosophists.

East and the Indiaes, which neuer any way had offended him. He seeing himselfe so toucht to the quicke by these naked Philosophers, for his limitlesse ambition; refused to passe on any further, but returned backe to Babylon, to liue thence forward quiet and peaceably, purposing neuer after to trouble any person.

Alexander taxed, represseth his ambition.

Aristobulus, who accompanied Alexander in all his voyages and Conquests, writeth, that two of those Gymnosophistes followed him, in his returning from the Indiaes to Babilon, both of them being continually naked, without any Garment on them. He that seemed the eldest or more auncient of them, would lye groueling on his face vppon the ground, euen in the powerfullest warmth of the Sunne, or heat of Summer, much molested with Waspes and other stinging Flyes; yet would he not stirre, or once make offer to driue them away. He that was the younger man, he would stand continually vppon one foote, holding a Log of Wood in one of his handes, containing the length of three cubits; and ordinarily would hee stand in this manner, as well before Alexander, as out of his company. Some while after, the elder man left this austerity, and began to liue more delicately; for which, being reprehended, hee answered: That he had liued (in his former manner) the space of sixe and thirty yeares, according to the vow he had made to God, to hold that rule of Gymnosophistæ for such length of time: which being now expired, he might returne to liue in the same sort as other Men did. The younger man being named Calanus, hauing followed the Court and and Army of Alexander, so farre as Persia, he made a goodly fire in an open assembly, and hauing annointed al his body ouer with Lard or Grease, he threw himselfe into the midst of the Fire, with a smiling, iocond, and cheerefull countenance, according to the custome of the Brachmanes, and so burned himselfe into Ashes.

Two Gymnosophists followed Alexander to Babylon.

One of the Gymnosophists reproued, & his answere.

The Gymnosophist burneth himselfe.

The Mountaines called Caucasas, where these Gymnosophistes doe inhabite, are not they which touch Scythia in Asia; but those that confine on the mouths of the great Indian riuer Ganges, where the Inhabitants are blacke, going all naked, except some small couerture for their parts of shame: they are great Idolaters, euen to this day; of friendlie conuersation, not nice or daintie, and they are often deceiued by Marchants-Strangers. None of those other Gymnosophistes are found in these partes, but there are certaine Priests and Women, who do (very nere) hold the same manner of behauiour, as the ancient Brachmans did, for they burne themselues when they become aged. If any man among them happen to dye otherwise, all his Wiues (for there they haue many) doe contend among themselues, which of them loued him best, and the case must be pleaded (for tryall) before a Iudge, Each of them is an Atturney in her owne cause, and she that is found to be of greatest affection, and hath done most accepted seruices to the dead in his life time; shee onely hath the renowne in Iudgement, and she shall haue the honor to be burned aliue, with the dead body of her Husband.

Priestes and Women that dye in fires.

The proofe of womens loue to their Husbands.

As for my selfe, I alwaies conceiued, that those Gymnosophists were religious persons, who beleiued the immortality of the Soule, and sequestred themselues from mens societies, because they would not be touched with worldly desires; thinking to do all things acceptable to God, and enstruct others how to liue vertuously. And in so much, as they willingly threw themselues into deaths power, before nature had runne her ful course; it seemed to mee that they did it, to auoyd further offending God by their sinnes. There are found some Men among vs, euen in these daies, that sequester themselues from sight of other Men, exhorting vs to all charity & vertue, to haue daily remembrance of death, and to prepare all our thoughts to God: they are said also, to liue as (if not more) chastly and austerely, as the other did: but as I am not able to speak this of mine owne absolute knowledge, so will I not condemne any one thereto enclined, that doth it not on a superstitious kind of zeale, or to be held of greater sanctity then others, therefore I refer iudgement herein, to him to whom it iustly belongeth.

CHAP. XXI.

¶ Against the opinion of such men, as doe thinke, that the Septentrionall Countries, which bee vnder the North Climate, are vnfruitfull and inhabitable.

THere were many of our fore-Fathers, who helde opinion, that vnder Zona Torrida, no Man can haue any dwelling, in regard of the extreame heate there continuing: but they were therein much deceiued, for it hath beene found by Nauigations of the Spaniards, Portugals, and others, within some hundreds of passed yeares, that very many ciuill people doe inhabite there, and great store of Victuals for nourishment, dooth also there abound.

Zona Torrida.

Habitable land vnder Torride Zone.

Contrariwise, some likewise haue thought, that the two Zones which bee imagined to holde the two extremities of the Worlde, are (by their violent colds) not habitable; because they are farre remote from the Zodiaque and Eclipticke, which is another imagined Line, and through which the Sunne maketh his course. Heerein also they haue beene greatly beguiled; for vnder the two Zones, the Land is couered with Men, Beasts, Hearbs and Trees: the inclemency of the Ayre, or of the cold Heauens doth there no hurt at all. Nothing but the Earth it selfe, which is found in some partes barren and vnfruitfull, makes them not to bee inhabited by men: as in the Desert and Sandy Arabia, whence yet you may passe into diuers Countries, carrying Victualles with ye. So is it likewise to be imagined of many other Desets, which are in many other parts of the World.

The Zodiaque and Eclipticke line.

The Earth it selfe vnfruitfull.

I haue alleadged these fore-named matters, because many yet doe holde, that the Septentrionall Countries are infertile; as Moscouia, Tartaria, Scithia, Getia, Prutania, Denmarcke, Suetia, Norway, Finland, and others; whereof it would aske some time to make recitall, which are all Neighbours, or vnder the North; in regard, there it is cold the greater part of the yeare, and at all times subiect to Snowes and sharpe Frostes; as also Fogges and Mistes are there very frequent, and the Ayre commonly cloudy. Wherein they are also much deceiued, for in all those Prouinces, there are neyther Fieldes, Vallies, Mountaines, Hillockes, nor the Banckes of Riuers, but you shall see them couered with goodly Hearbes, Grasse, and Plants, faire spreading, and in fruitefull manner, as also plentie of Men and Beasts. Now, because coldnesse is vnprofitable to Generation; therefore many haue held these Countries to be very desert and empty of all thinges.

Lands vnder the North populous and fertile.

Countries vnder the north.

Signes of fertility and plenty.

First of all, there is great plenty of Horses, fat, high-fed, and very good, so that when they goe in any expedition, their Troopes doe ordinarily consist of threescore or fourescore thousand horses. The Men also are very nimble and ready, so that if they had the vse of Armes among them; as of the Harquebush, Petronils, and other Artillerie, accordingly as wee haue: they would quickely ouer-runne Europe, or the Persian. That it can be no otherwise, we haue had good experience in our times, when they haue giuen assistance to the Turkes, in much greater number then I haue spoken off. Of Oxen, Kine, Sheep, Goats, Swine, and other Beasts for Housholde seruice, the Countries are (well-neere) ouer-burthened, and wonderfully well fed: abounding also in White-meates, which are their verie chiefest sustenance. So that, if those Countries were so barren, as most Historiographers, and some Cosmographers (that neuer dreampt on these things) haue written: wold beasts there multiply in such plenty, and thriue in such extraordinary manner?

Great aboundance of men and beasts.

Lacke of knowledge in Artilery.

The error of Historians & Cosmographers.

As for the Women, they are so fruitfull, as commonly they bring two children at a burden, oftentimes three, and foure at sometimes; whereof let no doubt or scruple be made. For I haue seene many, and frequented long with people of those partes (both of Honour and Learning) who haue confirmed the truth heereof vnto mee. All the Men of Warre heretofore, of the Gothes,

The fruitfulnesse of the Women.

The North hath yeilded very potent Armies.

Gothes, Vandales, Scythians, Hunnes, Normanes, and others; beeing in number aboue foure or fiue hundred thousand Men, and the Army of Tamberlain (who liued in the yeare 1390.) that consisted ordinarily of a Milllon of Men; were of no other people or Countries, but such as inhabited vnder the North. They are Men of Spirit, Learned, and preserue Annales among them, euen as we doe in our Nations: Some of them are Christians, after the Gracians manner; others, Mahumatists, and others Idolators.

The plenty of Furres which those Countries yeild.

These people were Furres, euen from sole of the foote (as wee vse to say) to the Crowne of the head: And whence can such prouision of Furres be made, but by the fœcundity of their Landes? For they doe not onely cloath themselues, but they likewise furnish Fraunce, England, Italy, Germany, Spaine, Flanders, Greece, and other Prouinces; yea, with the very richest and fayrest; as Ermines, Sables, Martines, White Wolues, Foxes, and diuers others.

Great store of Venison.

Shall I speake of the great plentie of Venison, and exceeding in fatnesse, daily taken by them? As Harts, Hinds, Kiddes, Wilde-Boares, Hares, &c. very easilie and familiarly hunted among them. Likewise, Fowles of all kinds, as well haunting the Mountaines, as liuing on Plaines, and in Waters. All which Viandes are at such cheape rate, as, for halfe an ounce of Siluer, which valueth twentie French Solz, or two Shillings of our English Money, a man may haue a Redde Deere, or a Wilde Boare; and a Hare for the fift part of a dramme of Siluer, hardly valuing a Pennie. I set not down the Names of their Monies, because the Scythians, of whom I speake more then others, and dwell direct vnder the North, haue no vse at all of Money: but both buy and sell all thinges for the weight of Gold or Siluer, Duckes, Mallards, Plouers, wilde-Geese, Cranes, Ringdoues, Pewets, Partridges, Quailes, Blacke-Birds, &c. in a manner for nothing, they are so easily taken, by reason of their great aboundance. The people lead a Pastorall kinde of life, and haue no other dwelling then vnder Tentes, and in the open Fieldes, without any repining thereat, and yet they sleepe there verie soundly. This Countrey whereof I speake, containeth more then sixe hundred Leagues, which Pliny, Ptolomy, and Pomponius Mela, doe hold to be almost desert, and from an hundred Miles, to another hundred, hardly is any Towne or Village to be seene.

Pliny, Ptolomy, Pomponius Mela.

The cheapenesse of victuals.

The Scythians haue no vse of Money.

Store of wilde Fowles.

Their maner of life and dwelling.

The North-Sea greatly aboundeth in Fish.

Their Seas are fertile, and abounding in Fishes of all kindes, for there they are greater, and much better nourished, then in any other Seas; witnesse the Whales, Coddes, Lings, &c. that doe come all (well-neere) from these Regions. And if any Whales be taken in the Spanish Seas, as I haue seene some, but very sildome: they are much lesse then the other, nothing so fat, nor in such store and plenty. Let vs proceede yet a little further. If these Countries were so vnfruitfull and inhabitable, as they are said to be; would Bees and Hony be in such aboundance there as they are? For there is scarcelie any Tree, where those little Labourers doe not builde their Hiues: especiallie if they can meete with any hollow Tree; wherein I haue heard it credibly reported, that Men haue diuers times sunke vp to the shoulders in Hony. Whence comes such store of Waxe, as the Germaines send into Fraunce, and other places of Christendome, but onely out of those Countries? For although there be some store in France, yet is there not any such plenty or encrease, as would furnish Paris for one month onely. In breefe, their Trees are full of Honny, Waxe, and Fruites: beside, I haue been certainely assured, that the leaues in their least Groues and Thickets, haue well neer equalled your common Colewortes. The whole Land is euen couered (as it were) with extraordinary odoriferous Hearbs; especially young Mariorame, which is held there to bee so precious, as if we can get thereof; wee compound it with the Powder of Violets, and vse it as a restoratiue.

Great aboundance of wax, Hony and fruits.

Hearbes of sweet sauour.

The opinion of the Naturalists, concerning generation and production.

Now, according to the opinion of all the very greatest Naturalists, coldnes is not aduantageable to generation and production, eyther in Beastes or Plantes; because we perceiue, that (in Winter) Beasts haue no familiarity together, and all Plants become as if they were dead, or despoyled of their goodly leaues: which needs must be the reason of no such fœcundity in these cold and freezing Countries; and yet there may be in those Climates, some humor intermingled with the earth (beyond the ordinary nature of other partes) which is the only Argument of such fertilitie. For the Butter-flyes, Bees, and other common Flies, doe not feare any cold there; but are much greater and grosser then they be heere. Oftentimes, the very least or cold Frostes heere with vs, quite kils our Bees and Flyes; but the very greatest coldes there, and (as one saith) when mighty yfickles couer al the Rocks; yet euen then doe they produce generation. Men are far more healthful there then we be heere; they feed more then we do, & digest their meat better, because (indeede) they are much more laborious. I haue obserued in Auuergne, that on the highest Mountaines there, (which are those called Mont D'or, and Domme) where the Snowes neuer stirre for nine months together: that yet neuertheless, they are very fertile, & yeild the greater quantity of grasse & hearbs; of better tast, and bigger and faiter, then the plaines do with all their temperate ayres. Beastes likewise doe much better fatten there, then commonly we see in other places.

A reason of fertility in the North Countries.

Mont D'or and Domme in Auuergne.

Heere it may be obiected to me, that the reason why Cosmographers and Geographers haue set down no Towns or Villages, on the plaines of those Countries; as namely, in Scythia and Tartaria, was, because there are either very few, or none at all. And so much the rather, in regard that the people dwelling vnder Tents, are still vnsetled and ambulatory; as seeking after new pasturages, when they haue made their feeding (any time) in one place. The people make no auouchable testimony hereof, but rather, that the reason why they dwell in Tentes, and in the open fields; is, because they will not be shut vp within Wals; to the end, that they may the sooner approch their enemies, when they Warre vpon them; as also for their apter courses, out-rodes, and surprisals, for they are of very Warlike disposition. For other occasions, they haue all thinges sufficiently for sustentation of Mens liues, without neede of any thing brought from other places: except it be wines and Spiceries, which (of necessity) must needs there be verie scarse, and they haue little neede of.

Few Townes or Villages in those Countries.

The reason why these people liue in Tents, & not in Townes.

I conclude then, that when any man shall fall in contemplation of the countries fruitfulnesse vnder the North, and also of their Seas; hee must not thinke, that coldnesse is the cause thereof, for it bringeth rather discommodity, then any good benefite. But let him propound to himselfe, as I haue formerlie saide; that the reason proceedeth of some good and fat humiditie, remayning in the Groundes of those Countries, and whereof we haue none such heere.

The Authors Conclusion.

CHAP. XXII.

A Paradoxe, approouing, that the meanest and simplest place of Birth or descent, maketh a Man to be truely most Noble.

THat Nobleneſſe of Bodie and Heart (which our Elders euermore obserued for the minde) being both combined together, are the very fayrest partes to be wished in any Man; I make no more doubt thereof, then I do of truth it selfe. For, let there bee neuer so great a number of them, whom we tearme Gentle-men, Lords, mightie Magnificoes, or others whatsoeuer; yet, except they bee enriched with these vertues ioyntly: I reckon them not within the compasse of true Nobilitie. And I dare oppose my selfe directlie against any Man, who (in the peeuishnesse of his owne Spirit) shall aduenture to maintaine, that descent from a great House, without other Title then the bare name onely; is sufficient to make eyther a Nobleman, or Gentleman.

Nobility of body and mind.

The compass of true Nobility.

Admit the case, that (as some hold) Vertue auayleth but little, which (neuertheless) they shall finde to bee most false: yet the Vnnoble-borne person hath this aduantage, and the obscurity of the place (whence he is deriued) giueth him this power and Prerogatiue:

Vertue of little or no account yet free for to vse.

to

to take delight (without any preiudice) in all those kindes of sportfull pleasures grounded on Vertue, which can bee in present vse. As, to vndertake strange enterprises, though appearing difficult and full of daunger; which hee may safely doe, without any to reproue him therefore, or cast a blush in his countenance: succeeding as well, as if he could say to himselfe, heere wanteth nothing now, but Nobility by Race, & Antiquity of Kinred.

The benefit of poore, yet honest birth.

I dare say beside, that a poore Man honestly borne, and of good Spirit, standes free from the rough severitie of troublesome Tutors, froward indiscreete Pedants, reckonieg himselfe in the number of them, who are truelie borne free and at liberty, and voyde of those distastes, which obscureth the splendor of famous Lignages. Hee findes not himselfe subiect to such diuersitie of fashions in Garments, which wee behold to alter and change day by day; oftentimes making both minde and body aunswerable to those fantasticke and idle-headed Habites. Nor is hee bound (for preseruing the honour of his House) to keepe a great Traine, or a surfeiting Table. Hee holds it no disgrace or shame, to walke on foote in his Countrey, without his quarrelling Rapyer, or other Weapons. If Fortune smile not, but ouertaketh him with worldly and ordinary mishaps: he rather accounteth it credit for him, to vndergoe another mans honest seruice, then fall into misery, or hazzard his future hopes, with any blemish and staine of Obloquy. All which thinges they dare not doe, that either remember in themselues, or any other of their Race, the eminent place of their Birth and Off-spring: but, ouerweening themselues destyned to the same Fortunes; doe (oftentimes) endure and fal into the greater mischiefes, because the smoake of their famous Houses, laies diuers charges on them, inferiour to their Nobility and excellence, and beeing slipt or falne in their first aduenture, they can neuer afterward (without great difficulty) rise againe.

Fantasticall garnets, that make as foolish minds.

Seruice to good men is no disgrace.

Great minds are the cause of their owne greate ruine.

Industry the steps to greatest fortunes.

The Man not Noble borne, is verie wary, before he fall into worse then his Originall Fortune, and makes his Industry his best pillers and vnder-proppes: by which commendable meanes, making Vertue his course, and pursuing the golden degrees of Wisedome, his name attaineth to be more illustrated & famous, then it can easily bee obscured by any sinister accident. Then, addicting himselfe to Letters, and the liberall Sciences, or else to follow Military Discipline; he bestowes therein such labour and diligence, that by meere right and Iustice of Merit: first hee beares away the special benefit thereof; next, the luster and splendour of it waites on him continually; and the fame (due to so high deserving) cannot bee taken from him, by any Commaunder, Lorde, or Maister, to whom (for bare Name of Gentry) it may bethought more fitly to apperraine.

Learning, the liberall sciences and Military discipline

Example of Warlike actions hath beene noted, in Bayarde, Manleurier, Malherbe, and other valiant French Captaines; as also in Castruccio Castagne, Picine, Carmaygnole, and Ioannine in Italy; all which men (though descended of meane and humble Parentage) ther renowne did sufficiently manifest, that in them remained the onelie Vertue of high attemptes. The like may be saide concerning Learning, and the Sciences, if wee remember Henrie the eight, King of England, who is said to Write diuers worthy Bookes in Latine: which (neuertheleſſe) were reported to be done by Sir Thomas Moore, who was his Lord Chancellour, a man that liued in great reputation, for singuler Wisedome and Authority; yet descended but from meane place and Parentage, and (in regard of Blood, or House) might bee tearmed Vn-noble: Learning neuer seeketh after eminent places, or mightie and Magnificent Houses, where sloth and negligence is much better friended, then all industrious dilligence or labour in actions of Vertue can attaine vnto. In approbation of this Maxime, we can produce; that Nobility of House maketh not the Philosopher, Poet, or Oratour; but studious paines and trauaile bestowed in either of them; these are the thinges that makes a Man both Noble, and immortall to posterity.

The auncient Tragicke Poet Euripides, came of very poore and abiect Parents. Demoſthenes, the honour of Greeke eloquence, was not onely of meane place, but beſide, of vncertain Parentage. Virgill, the famous Latine Poet, was begotten by a poore Mantuan labourer. And Horace, the incomparable Lyrick, was Sonne to a Trumpeter in the Warres. For Men Moderne, find but one onely that wrote in Philoſophy, Poeſie, Rhetoricke, or any other Science, who could renowne himſelfe (at any time) by the Anceſtors of his Houſe. Ye may very well note to the contrary, if (out of a Noble or magnificent Houſe) ye finde but one that giues himſelfe to ſtudy, he is commonly tearmed a laſciuious wanton Pamphleter, a cunning Satyriſt, a Rayler, or Brabler; and I pray ye, how is his houſe ennobled by him, when Vertue thus forſakes him, and lends him not her aſſiſtance.

If we ſhall neede to paſſe any further in this diſcourſe, I dare vndertake to ſhew ye, that true Gentility (indeede) came at firſt from Men of meane condition, and many of them are yet (to this day) renowned by good Hiſtorians. Nay, more, that great Princes and Lordes haue receiued their Originall from poore Cottages, and ſimple Houſes. For example, Tarquinius Priſcus, was Sonne to a Marchant of a ſtraunge Countrey. Seruius Tullius, was begotten on a Woman Slaue. Septimius Seuerus, came of very baſe degree. Agathocles, King of Scicilie, tooke it for no ſhame, to garniſh his Pallace and richeſt Cup-boordes with earthen Veſſels, in memory that hee was but a Potters Sonne.

True Gentility came from men of mean quality.

Ælius Pertinax was (at firſt) but a ſimple Seller of Wood. And Venadius Baſſus came of maruellous poore Parents. If it bee ſo then, that among ſuch great perſonages, the more part are found to bee deriued from poore and meane places: What reaſon haue ſo many men now-adaies, to ſearch out ſuch expreſſe inuented lyes, by counterfeit and Heteroclite Titles, to tearme themſelues Noble and Gentle; meerely to purchaſe credit by ſuppoſed Preheminence of great Linage? And then, what a turmoyle and trouble doth it procure, when a ſilly Antiquary or Chronicler (or ſome other idle writer) eyther through want of diſcretion, or otherwiſe, ſets not downe in his poore Pamphlet, all the Titles and qualities of ſuch an vp-ſtart Gallant?

Inuented Titles to make men Noble or Gende.

It would cauſe an eſpeciall content in minde to mee, if (by my paines) I could procure a ceſſation of this ouervaine and fooliſh humour, this heate of deſire to be tearmed Noble or Gentle: were it but in ſuch onely, as neuer knew what Armes meant, nor could euer expreſſe or approoue, one vertuous Act in any of their Predeceſſours. Surely, mee thinkes it is a very ſtrange courſe obſerued in the Kingdome of Naples, that euery baſe Groome in the Countrey, muſt (at euery Word) be tearmed Signior: And in the ſuperſcription to ſome ſlouenly Slaue, hee muſt haue the Title of Don ſuch a one, which agrees euen as handſomely, as to call a filthy Slut in the Kitchin, Madama Lucretia, or Signiora Pampiluna. Oh intollerable abſurditie? the like folly in no age (heeretofore) euer heard of. So, in Frannce, euery Peazant and Lacky muſt bee called Sir, or Monſieur: then which, no greater ſtile can be giuen to the King, or his Brother, or the greateſt Lord in Grace about him. In Burgundy, Flaunders, and Henault, a verie Lacky-Boy following the Campe, will make Armes for himſelfe, after his owne minde and faſhion, with Mantle, Helme, and Creaſt, after the Saxon guiſe, wherewith many Hoſtlers doors are famouſly dawbed. In Britaine, ye haue not one, but his Father was a Lord at leaſt. In Scotland: they all extract of the blood Royall: And in Anion (as in Wales) they are all Gentle-men. And this is moſt certaine, that there are very fewe places to be found in the World, but (in them) ſome Seedes of this miſerable ambition is diſperſed. Scarcely is there any Citty, Village, Towne, or Borough; but ſhakes hand in this folly, euen for friendſhip ſake.

If he be but a Sexton, and looke to the Church goods, presently hee must be intituled, Most Reuerend Sir, Most Religious, yea, and Most Blessed too, if it might bee admitted. Consider (seeing such dishonor don to true noblenes & Gentility) if it can bee endured with any patience? Would ye imagine, that these ambitious blastes haue past the Alpes, euen into Frizeland, Saxony, and high Germany? I can assure ye, hauing bin in those partes, about important affaires, wherein then I had some imployment, that so soone as I perceiued this horrible misery; Oh Deuill (quoth I) how largely hast thou euery wher shot forth thy pernitious venom? Couldst thou not keepe within thy Natiue bounds, but thou must climbe ouer those admirable Mountaines, and places almost vnaccessable, to enflame mens minds with this thy hellish fury? I found in that Country, howe some would ride post to the Chambers Imperiall, only to buy the title of Gentility; and afterward, make vaunt of their Nobility; some, by two; others, by three; and others, by four seuerall linages, curtalling the true names of their owne right Aunce stors, to make their claime by a contrary way, the more likely. Some boasted of their discent from the Tuscanes, some from the Romans, som from the eldest Allemaignes, and some were naturally bred of the race of Achilles Mirmidons. There was one, who for the Ensigne and Emblazure of his Nobilitie, in my conceit, had a very apte Coate of Armes giuen him, to wit; A Green-goose necke, in a Field Geules, couered with a Creste double staged, enriched with Mantle and Feathers, myraculously wasted after the Tartarian manner, with other deuises of farre stranger fashion. Whosoeuer had sworne to me, that among so great a number of rough and sterne people, there should be found one sparke of such peeuish ambition, I would neuer haue beleeued him. Because I was (euer before) giuen to vnderstand, that this folly dwelt onely in the Kingdome of Naples and Spaine. The Father of Euripides, & his Sons wordes to him.

I remember I haue read, that the Father of Euripides, expressing some outward ioy, because on a sudden he was ennobled, receiued from his Sonne these words; Good Father (quoth he) doe not reioyce so much at this matter, for the Prince hath but giuen yee a thing, which anie man else may haue for his money. For Nobilitie nowe hath no other foundation then on Riches, and hee that hath store thereof, hath power likewise to be made a Nobleman. This was it which moued good Socrates to say; Only Vertue maketh vs noble and excellent. For it auayleth nothing, to glory or renowne our selues by this or that family, if without Vertue wee thinke or perswade our selues to be Noble.

Nobilitie grounded on riches.

The saying of Socrates.

To this purpose, Cicero who deserued that famous name, to be alway called Pater Patriæ, the Father of his natiue Countrey Rome, being reprehended by Salust in his inuectiues, that he knew him not to be descended of Noble race, but rather came from a place vtterly vnknowne to Noblemen, he returned him this answer; My Linage beginneth in the name of Cicero, but the race and name of Salust, will end in Salust. Plato also maintaind, that seruants were descended of Noble bloode, if their Parents were Louers of Vertue, & they therein did follow their steps. And contrariwise, that all Princes and Lords were issued at first, from people of base and meane condition, and thence might derive the antiquity of their race.

The answere of Cicero to the reprehension giuen him by Salust.

The saying of Plato, concerning Seruants and Princes.

This was to qualify the pride of some insolent persons liuing in his time, who made no account of any thing, but of their goods and treasure; imagining, that Gentility in olde time, dropt from Heaven, like the fall of Manna to Aponillus Calaber, or Briancon. But the ancient Noblemen, were made by their Vertue & courage, which they woorthily manifested, both in manly fighting, and dying for the honor of their Country, committing no other action beside, that might bee blotted with the detection of villainie or reproach. Such as go that indirect way, and labor to get the name of Gentility, by actions apparantly fowle and dishonorable; them I may properly tearme to be Gentle-villaines, in regard that their long coueted Nobility, by such depraued behaviour, can giue it selfe no other Name, then the iust guerdon to such notable iniquitie.

in this world are Noble in quality, each one beeing composed of selfe-same matter, and framed by one onely builder or Worke-man, by whome their soules are infused into their bodies, being capeable (euen from their birth) of one selfe-same power and vertue. But they allowed afterward, that according to the disposition of each body, they which receyued the greatest portion of Vertue, had likewise greater preheminence aboue others; and so (for difference sake) were therfore called either Noble or Gentle. Vertue then is the truest Nobility; and Greatnesse of house, or antiquity of Lignage, are matters meerely of nothing. For, a poore Countrey-man, borne in Arpinum, hath bin as well called Emperor, and Father of his Countrey; as any Iulius or Augustus Cæsar, descended of most auncient Houses.

Vertue is the truest Nobilitie.

CHAP. XXIII.

A pleasant Allegoricall description of Charon, called the Ferry-man of Hell.

Seneca in his Tragedie of Hercules Furens, introduceth Theseus, who recounteth to Amphitrio, the strange sights he had seen in Hell. And he describeth Charon, according as Virgil doth, in the sixth Booke of Æneides; and as Polygnotus painted him in a Table, which hee made for the Temple of Apollo, as Pausanias recordeth. Boccace being desirous to interpret the figure of Charon, deliuereth his mind in this maner; By Charon, we are to vnderstand the signification of Time, who is saide to be Son of Erebus, and of Night. Erebus may be taken for the secret counsell and spirit of God, by whome, both Time and all things else were created, and Night was the Mother of Charon. For before Time was, there was not as yet any light at all; but it was made in darknesse, and out of darknesse it first appeared. Charon was afterward commaunded into hell, because they that are in Heauen, haue no neede of Time, as we mortals haue, that inhabit this lower part of the world; frō whence, if we cast vp our eyes to them, we may (by good right) account out selues to bee in Hell. Charon carrieth and re-carieth mortals, from one side of the Riuer vnto the other; wherby we may gather, that when we are borne, Time in like manner, leads and guides vs on toward death, causing vs to passe the Riuer Acheron, which is as much to say, as without ioy or comfort, in which kind of course, slideth away our fraile liues, full of many and infinite miseries.

Charon is old, and yet notwithstanding strong, hardy, and couragious; signifying thereby, that Time looseth no strength by multiplicity of yeares. His Garments are blacke and sullied, as shewing, that while we are slaues and subiects to Time, wee make no care or account of any thing else but the worlde, and occasions belonging to the world, which are vile, fowl, & much deformed, in comparison of them appertaining to heauen, and whereon we ought to set the very height of al our loue and desire. But the fraile Garment of our mortall body, which we continually cary about vs, doth in such sort couer the light of reason, that as led blind-fold, we walke through the hell of this world, guided only by common sense, and a million of inordinate appetites. Wherefore, there needs no great meruaile, if we bee dayly enuironed with multitudes of euils which present themselues as readily, as souls discend into the hell of this our worlde, and take vp their lodging in our mortall bodies. In which manner also, may the speeches of Virgil bee interpreted, describing the wicked carried into Hell, in the sixt Booke of his Æneidos.

CHAP. I.

Of Old Rome, in her Primitiue Nature and condition: Of her first Religion, Lawes, Magistrates, Ciuill Pollicies, &c.

Pan the first God honored in Rome.

AMongest all the Goddes, which the ancient Religion of Rome first exalted, it was Pan Lyceus, called by many, Faunus and Syluanus; to whome, with the Lupercalles, they did the honour of Sacrifice, as is affirmed by many auncient writers. They say, that such kinde of sacrifices were first brought to Rome by King Euander that fled from Arcadia, who came to that place, where afterward was built the Fort of Rome. Shepheards, who held this God as their Head and Commaunder, vsed to performe their Sacrifices starke naked to him, with their faces couered, and a certaine Girdle in their hands; but this kind of naked sacrificing is not punctualy known, in regard that our ancients haue written diuersly thereof. Some say, that he being their God, and naked; declared thereby, that he was more apt and ready with al diligence in their assistance, and therefore required, to haue his Ministers naked in like manner. Some others affirmed, that the Arcadians, the very ancienteſt Inhabitants of Greece, who at the beginning, remained like wilde Beasts, in Woodes and Thickets of trees: After, they became reduced to a more Ciuill kind of life, would haue their God to bee honoured in the former manner, onelie in respect of their owne greater memory.

Many others haue VVritten, that Iole the Mistris of Hercules, was seene by this Faunus, and lasciuiously affected by him. The Old God, hauing from an hie rocke espied this beautifull aspect, became pleased beyond all patient sufferance, concluding with himselfe, to follow her whither soeuer she went. Shee, on the other side, hauing no notice of him or his intent, went along with her husband thorough the woods, seeking a place where to sleep in safety. In meane while, the night being at hand, she, according as she had formerly vsed to doe, tooke the hairy Lyons skin from Hercules, and spreading it about hir shoulders, tooke also his Club; then walking some distance from her husband, she laid her selfe downe to rest; for they were to Sacrifice to Bacchus, and therfore they ought to sleepe assunder. Syluanus, burning in wanton heate beyond al measure, and perswading himselfe, that nowe vvas the apteſt time to effect his amorous purpose, silently made stealth vnto the place where she lay; and putting forth his hand softly, felt the Lyons skin. Feeing thereat somewhat amazed, and thinking hee had mistaken her lodging, as whistly he withdrew thence, and went to the place where Hercules slept. His hand being there likewise his Taster, & finding more smoothnesse then he felt before; softly hee lifted vp the cloathes, and putting his hand still on, on, scarsely could he well feele the roughnesse of Hercules his body, but hee began to wake, and extended his hands to feele who troubled him. Syluanus offered to escape, but feare and darke night barring sight of his passage, hee began to make a noise, whereat likewise the Lady awaked; and lighting her Lampes, Hercules could plainely perceiue who it was that hadde made this ydle attempt. If Faunus (seeing his folly thus discouered) were ashamed or no, the effect it selfe can best witnesse. Confounded both with grief & disgrace, he fled thence into the remoter Woods, and ordained, that in the Sacrifices offered to him, no Garments shold be worne by the Sacrificers, because by them hee had bin so deceiued.

Faunus would fly, but cannot

The ordination of Faunus, in regard of his owne disgrace.

Notwithstanding, some doe assigne the especiall cause heereof to Romulus, & say, that hee celsbrating the like Sacrifice all naked, in regard of the Suns extreame heate, heard by certaine of his Newes-Bringers, that diuers theeues (in the time while he was thus busied) had stoln away a heard of his Cattle. Whereupon, euen naked as he then was, he swiftly pursued, and taking the Theeues, in perpetual memory of this worthy deed, he would haue all his sacrificing Priests, to exercise their office naked. But let the custome arise of what cause soeuer, it is most manifest, that it so continued to the time of C. Iulius. For it is recorded, that Cæsar beeing Dictator, at the spectacle of the like sacrifice, M. Anthony (who was one of the Sacrificers, and afterwarde of the Triumviri) comming running, would haue crowned Cæsars head with a wreath of Lawrel, wherein there was a Royall Crowne; but Cæsar not accepting thereof, because all the people frowned thereat, he went and crowned his Statue therewith. Afterward concerning the name of the Lupercalls, and wherfore Sacrifices were in that kind called; there are many reasons founde. Some say, they were called Lupercalia, because by inuocating on the name of Pan; Woolues were frighted away from the folds of Cattle. Some tearmed the Temple wherein that God was honoured, Lupercale; whereon saith Virgil.

And the Lupercal vnder the frozen Cliffe.

They shewe also, and are perswaded. that because the Wolfe was there found, which gaue suck to Romulus and Rhemus; thereupon it was called Lupercale. There wants not some also, who say, that it was so sir-named, after a Mountaine in Arcadia, called Liceus, where that kind of Religion is yet in account; for the Arcadians do call that Beast Licon, which we in Latine terme Lupus, a Woolfe. The especial deuotion vsed to this God, and the priests dedicated to him, was, as is found written, because women that could haue no conception or easy deliuery in childbirth, or prosper in constitution of their bodies, vsed to go to the Luperci, who were the Priests of Pan; and as they were more or lesse, beaten with a little rod, dipt in the blood of a young Goate, by the Priestes, euen so they conceiued, and were deliuered also of their Children. The solemnity done to this God, was celebrated the 18. day of Ianuary, as Ouid declareth in his Bookes to Faustus.

The Nursing of Romulus & Remus.

The deuotions to this God, and his Priestes, and wherefore.

1. In the same time that Euander raigned, it is saide, that Hercules hauing slaine Gerion, brought along with him a heard of Oxen and Kine, of meruailous goodlinesse; and hauing found neere the Riuer of Tiber, a place that liked him well for their feeding, made his stay there, and being weary with trauailing, did eate and drinke a little to sustaine nature; and afterward laide him downe to rest. Cacus, a Neat-heard of those parts, one that liued by others losses, seeing the seemly appearance of the Cattle, was very desirous to steale them: yet fearing least the owner should take notice of his theft (albeit now was the time of night) he tooke the verie fairest of them, and drawing them backeward by the tailes, conueyed them in that manner into his Caue. At breake of day, Hercules awaked, and numbering his cattle as he was wont to do, not only discerned the Theft, but also the backward footing of the Beasts; whereby he coniectured no otherwise, but that they had wandered, and came forth of the caue again. Yet meruailing how the other should be gone, he concluded to inquire no further, but to depart with the rest; and driuing them thence with his wand, it happened, that the Beasts themselues missing the others gon, as naturaly desiring their company, began to Low or bellow, which the enclosed Cattle in the Caue hearing, answerd them againe in the same language. Hercules immediately knew the noyse of his Oxen and Kine, and ran presently to the Caue, wher Cacus comming to withstand stand his entrance, by resisting him manfully hand to hand, was there slain vnder the weight of his Club.

The Parents and Kindred of the partie slaine, with all the other Heardsmen together, immagining that this iniurie was not to bee endured, called Hercules, as a stranger, in iudgement before King Euander, who not long before, was fled thither from Peloponesus, and gouerned iu these parts, rather by authority, then any right of Seigneury, yet was hee a man very venerable, for inuention of Letters among rude people; and much more venerable, by Diuinity of his Mother Carmenta, who before the comming of Sibilla into Italy, was honoured of the people as a Propheteſſe. Euander hauing heard the case, and well noted the habit and stature of Hercules, which appeared to bee beyond ordinary manner, he demanded his Birth, Parentage, and Condition; but no sooner heard he his Name, Father, & Countrey, but presently he entered into these speeches; O Hercules, thou Sonne of Ioue, highly art thou welcome, my Mother presaged thy future being, telling mee, that thou shouldest encrease the number of Gods in Heauen; and that in this place an Altare should be dedicated to thee, which altar shold be honored by the richest people in the world, obseruing thy custome.

Hercules vpon these wordes, gaue his hand to Euander, in sign of peace, answering him that he vnderstood the Augury, and woulde himselfe see the Diuine will executed; whereupon, he built and dedicated an Altar, and selecting foorth the best and faireſt of his Oxen, they were giuen to be celebrated in Sacrifice, to Potitius and Pinarius, men of a family in those times, most honorable and famous. It fortuned, that the Potitij (as Liuie declareth) were much more ready then the other, to the solemnity: whereupon, the inwards or intrailes of the Beasts, were assigned to them. And the Pinarij cōming so tardy, and finding them burnt, the rest of the Sacrifice was appointed to them; and thence-forward it was ordained; that while the generation of the Pinarij continued, the Beasts inwards should neuer be giuen to them on the solemn day. The Potitij, enstructed by Euander, were presidents for many years at the like sacrifices; and till this charge was imposed on publicke seruantes, there wanted not of this solemne family of the Potitij. Which was occasioned by Appius Claudius, an enemy to this family; and therfore it was immagined, that in iust reuenge and displeasure of the Gods he was smitten blind.

2. I finde vnder good Authoritie, that the Brethren Arnales, were especiall Counsellors to the Romans, for preseruation of their Corne fields, and that they might produce plenty of graine. I find also, that the first inuenter of this Religion, was Romulus the Father and first builder of Rome. For Accalaurentia, the Nurse to Romulus, being a strumpet, gaining greatly by that base profession, and becoming rich beyond measure; of two Sons which she had, one of them dying, by way of adoption she made Romulus her owne son, instead of the dead childe; and when she her self died, she made the people of Rome heires to all her wealth. The people mernailing at so great a liberality, and desirous to make a liuing memorie of their Kings Parentage, they gaue order, that the womans name should be registred in their yearely Kalender; and the children descending of her Kindred, to bee called Brethren Arnales, of Serendo, which is a Latine word, signifying to sowe; and of Arui, that is, Fields; so forming their appellation, and at what time the authoritie of this Brethrens Priest-hood flourished. It is also recorded, that there were but twelue of them in number; and whē they receiued their order of Priest-hood, their heads were crowned with wreaths of ears of Corne, and a Bend or Stole of the like put about their neckes.

3. About the very same time, the knowledge or Religion of Angurie or Soothsaying, was brought to Rome out of Tuscany, where the people were verie excellent in that Science. It is saide, that a certaine man, whose Name by antiquitie of time, is not remembred, as Naso writeth, being banished thence, conducted as I think by hope and perswasion of safe Sanctuary, came vnto Rome. I am of the mind, that Romulus and Remus, in contending to impose a name on the Citty, vsed the same kind of Angurie; for M. Tullius Cicero writeth in those Bookes, which hee entitled of Diuination, that Romulus was very expert, and especially skilled in the science of Diuination. Numa, who afterward succeeded Romulus in the kingdom, ordained, that this science should be obserued

I think, that in writing the cuſtome which vvas kept in Diuination or augnry, one example may be ſufficient, becauſe therby may eaſily be comprehended euery other maner; therefore, out of all obſeruations of ancient writers that euer I could ſee, this was the cuſtome.

The cuſtome obſerued by Diuiners and Sooth-ſayers in their Diuination.

The Diuiner or Sooth-ſayer, who was to fore-tell what ſhould enſue, aſcended vp on ſome Fort or Caſtle, or ſome other place of beſt diſcouery, where hee ſate downe vpon a ſtone, turning his face into the South, leaning on the left ſide, and holding a crooked Wand in his Hande, commonly called the Augures Staffe. Hauing thence well noted the Citty, and the fields round about, praying to the Gods they would deſign the Regions from the Eaſt to the Weſt, and collocate the right hand partes from the South, to thoſe on the left hand in the North; then ſilently, determining the ſigne, which his eie from farre ſhould bring to ſight, holding the wand in his left hande, hee would ſet the right hand on his head, of whom he was to augurize, ſaying; O Father Ioue, if it be lawful that this Numa Pompilius, vvhoſe head I lay my hand on, ſhould be K. of Rome; giue a cleare ſigne thereof manifeſtly, euen there where I haue confined the place. Then naming what ſigne Ioue ſhold ſend, it was forthwith ſent, and Numa vnderſtood to be King; whereon he deſcended vnto the Temple, which ſhould be called after the deſigned Region from Heauen, by the litle wand. This forme of Angury, as elſewhere I haue ſaid, may ſerue for all other of the like Nature.

The words of Augury.

Many men of great Authority, ioined hand in this ſcience, crediting the famous skill of Accius Nauius the Sooth-ſayer. Tarquinius Priſcus, beeing deſirous (beyond the forme of auncient order) to alter many things, and make addition of as many, without Diuination. Accius Nauius, a Noble Augure of thoſe times, ſaid; that thoſe thinges appointed by Priſcus, were not good, becauſe they had not bin augurized before. The King grew offended thereat, and ſcorning both him and his Art, ſaid; Now Sooth-ſayer, vſe thine Augury, and ſee if thou canſt (with al thy skil) accompliſh a thing which I haue inſtantly conceited. Accius hauing conferred with the experience of other Augures, made anſwere, that the Kinges conceit was poſſible to be performed: whereupon Priſcus preſently replied; I haue already conſidered with my ſelfe, and ſay, that with this Raſor thou canſt not cutte this whetſtone through the middeſt. Cal now thy wits together, and vſe the inſpiration of all thy Birds, to try if poſsibly it may be done. It is affirmed, that Nauius inſtantly (without any delay) did cut the whetſtone through the midſt with the raſor. In memory whereof, a Statue was afterward erected, containing Accius Nauius in liuely forme, with his head couered, a Razor in the one hand, and a whetſtone in the other, and in a faire table of Marble, was the whole argument engrauen to perpetuity.

Accius Nauius, an Augure of great fame, who in the preſence of Tarquin, did cut a Whetſtone in tunder with a Razor.

A Statue erected to Accius Nauius.

The authority and credit of theſe Diuiners ſo encreaſed, and the Prieſt-hood of the Augures (as Liuie declareth, and Cicero in his Books of Diuination) as not any thing was enterprized for future ſucceſſe, either within doores or abroad, but firſt it paſſed the triall of Angury: and to this ſcience and order of Prieſthood, the moſt Noble men of the City, and the very cheefeſt Cittizens were wholly enclined. Tiberius Gracchus, the Father of Tiberius, & of C. in an aſſembly of the people, obtained to haue Conſulles placed according to his owne minde. The Tuſcan Augures ſaide, that hauing conſulted with their Diuination, they founde this creation of Conſuls not to bee good: for which, they were reprooued as fools and ignorant men. But Gracchus beeing gone to his owne Prouince, could then write backe to the Senate., that the Tuſcans ſaid true, and were no fooles, in ſaying; that the preſent Conſulles were by him moſt badly created, becauſe they were elected in a Tabernacle without the walles of the Citty, contrary to cuſtome and order by all their elders obſerued; and therefore, they ſhoulde renounce them for Conſulles.

Now, as this order encreaſed both in authority and reuerence, ſo did they likewiſe in number, inſomuch, that a Colledge was erected for Augures & Sooth-ſayers. At firſt, they were only created of three Tribes, to wit; the Rhamenſes, Tatienſes, and Luceres, and obtained together, that they might chaunge their number, and changing into vnequal number. According to this obſeruation, they began to create foure orders, contrarie to the the Common people grewe desirous of this honour, both in the Senate, and in all other places. Therefore, by meanes of the Tribunes, they compassed, that as they were partakers in all other matters, so in like manner they might exercise the Augures Priesthood. After many Seditions and garboyles, they obtained, that with foure Noblemen, fiue Plebeians might bee ioyned. And this was doone, when M. Valerius, and Quintus Apuleius were Consuls.

Flamini Dialis, an Order of Priests inuented by Numa Pompilius, king of Rome.

Numa Pompilius King of Rome, was the first that instituted the Flamini Dialis, because in former times, the King himselfe did exercise the Office both of King and Priest, without any differente at all, as manifestly is to be seene in Virgill, both of Priamus, and of Æneas. Anius the King (as the same Poet doth likewise witnesse) was King of men, and Priest of Phœbus. The like hath bin obserued of their Successors; as of C. Cæsar, of D. Augustus, & of many other Princes, who had (as wee may plainly see) the title of Pontifex Maximus, the chiefe Priest. Wherefore, Numa considering, that there might bee (in time to come) more Kinges like vnto Romulus, who (after his manner) wold leaue all care of Religion, and rather attend to matters of Armes; he ordained 4. Priests, by him called Flamines, who continually were to waite on the Diuine seruice; and them he dedicated to diuers of the Gods. One Flamine to Ioue, and hee was called Dialis: Two to Mars, and one to * Quirinus. They were called Flamini Diali, Flamines belonging to Iupiter (as Varro saith) because their heades were couered with Vailes, and bound rounde about with a Fillet of Wooll, whereby they hadde the name of Flamine; and Dialis was interpreted of Dion, which is, helping the Goddes.

Numa ordained foure Flamines at the first.

*The surname of Romulus.

All the other Flamines had Titles of those Gods, to whose seruice they were appointed. It was ordained, that those Priests or Flamini Dialis, should wear very honourable Garments, and sit in those Iuory seats, which (in those times) were onely graunted vnto the chiefest Magistrates.

The habit and honour of the Flamini Dialis, with diuers other of their dignities and priuiledges.

These men onely, were allowed to weare white Chaplets or Bonnets, because they were higher in dignity then the other; or else in regard of their sacrificing to Ioue, it seemed more proper to haue them vested in White. In all other occasions whatsoeuer, by their pontificall priuiledge and iurisdiction, many other especiall prerogatiues were graunted to them, which Aulus Gellius, in his Commentaries of the Attick nights, hath left at large described. In honour of their Religion, they rode on horseback. It was not lawfull for them to sweare, nor to carry the Fire for their Sacrifice, but in hallowed places. If any man entered into his Church girt, hee ought to be presently vngirt, and drawne forth againe by the haire of the head. They vsed not to wear any knot backward, or behinde them. If the Malefactor which was brought to be whipt, fel vpon his knees at his feet whom he had offended, it was held as a finne if he suffered him to be whipt. He that was no Free-man, ought not pol or to cut the haire of the Dialis. it was not lawfull for them to speake of, or touch a Goate, raw flesh, Ivy, or Beans. They might gather no clusters of Grapes, but on the top of the Vine. The feet of the bed wherin any one of them slept, ought to be besmeared with a certaine blew kind of Morter, and no other then himselfe might (lawfully) sleepe in that bed. The pairinges of the Nailes, and cuttinges of the haire belonging to the Dialis, were buried in the earth vnder Flintes or pebbles; and euery day was (to them) a Festiuall. It was against their Religious Order, for any of them to be bare-headed in the open aire, and none of the Flamines or priests ought to go vncouered. They might meddle with no Flower or Dow, wherewith any Leauen was mingled: Neither ought any one of them, either put off or on, any shirt or Linnen Garment, but in some priuat and couert place; because he must not be naked vnder Heauen, or in the sight of Ioue. At dinner time no man might sit, but only the sacrificing king. The Flamine marriage might be (by no meanes) separated, vntill death. They neuer entred into anie place where any dead bodies were. Marcus Varro, in those Bookes which he entituled the Originall of the Latine tongue, saith; That in ancient time, they had as many Flamines, as they honoured Gods; as the Dialis, Martialis, Quirinalis, Vulcanalis, Furnialis, Falagris, and many others of different manner in authoritie, and as we tearme Byshops, Arch-byshops, Cardinals, Patriarkes, and Metropolitanes:

The Vestall Virgines inuented by Numa Pompilius.

5 The beginning of Vestall honour (euen as of all other things) was found out by Numa Pompilius, although the Originall thereof be so auncient, that from the Troyans (Æneas beeing their chiefe) it was transferred to the Albanes, as Virgill hath very well recorded. To the Goddesse Vesta (by some learned Terra, the Earth, and Mother of the Goddesse) they vied (in perpetuall memory) to consecrate an eternall Fire, which they committed to the care and heedfull obseruation of many elect Virgines, Daughters, to the chiefest Senators: thorough whose neglect or careleſnesse, if the sacred Fire happened to goe out, or to be quenched; they were (with certaine Roddes) beaten by the chiefe-Priest; according as Valerius hath left written, of C. Licinius Crassus the High-Priest, who did beate them, that vsed not diligence in preseruing the fire. It was ordained, that she who was condemned of vnchastnesse, and had had the carnall knowledge of a Man, should be buried aliue.

An eternall fire consecrated to Vesta, and committed to the charge of many Virgines, Senatours daughters.

A seuere Law against vnchastnesse.

Labeo Antistius writeth, that it was not lawfull to accept into the Societie of the Vestall Virgins, any vnder the yeares of sixe, or aboue the age of ten; beside, that she must be the Child both of one Father and Mother: without any imperfection in speech, sight, hearing, or any other impediment of body. None might be admitted to be a Vestall, except her Parents (one, or both of them) had beene of ability to keep Seruants, and stood clear from hauing vsed any bad or infamous quality. It is further said, that such a one might be excused from the vow of Vestality, as had a Sister elected into the same Order; or tha ther Father were a Flamine, Augure; or of the ten men that made the Sacrifices; or of the* Epulones sect, or of other like Offices. The Spouse to the chiefe Priest, and the Daughter of the sacrificing King, had the same vacancie from such Sacrifices: And, as Capito hath writtē, no Election could be made of any mans Daughter, that had not his dwelling in Italie; and yet his Daughter might be excused, if he had three Sons beside.

Labeo Antistius so called of his great lips.

Who were excused from the Vestall Vow.

* That furnished feasts for Iupiter, and the other Gods.

Capito translated the Epitome of Liuie and Eutropius, into Greeke.

Next vnto the precedent decrees, many times it hath beene ordained by the Prætors Edict, that the Flamines Dialis, nor the Vestall Virgines should be compelled to sweare: But the Prætors words might serue in this manner. I commaund within my iurisdiction, by the publique Proclaimer, that neither Vestall Virgines, nor the Flamines Dialis, shall bee enforced to take an oath. In election of the Vestall Virgines, these were especiall obseruations. It was ordained by the Papian law, that at pleasure of the chiefe Priest, twenty Virgins should be elected by the people, out of which number they were chosen by lots. The same law saith, that by Antiquity, many other thinges grew into forgetfulnesse. In election of Virgines, it was sufficient enough, that any man being borne of honest place, might go to the supreame Priest, and offer his Daughter to the Priest-hood, she being able to vndertake such an authority: the obseruation of Religion reserued, because the Senate onely had power of the Law Papia. And then the custome was, that those Virgines were taken by the chiefe Priest, as if they had been surprised by the enimy, and the wordes vsed by him in the action, were these. If by the chiefest Law it hath beene allowed, that the Vestal Nunne or She-Priest, should offer these Sacrifices, which I am commaunded by the people of Rome, and by the Fathers: then (to that end) doe I take thee, ô Amata. They vsed to tearme euery Virgine Amata, as witnessing thereby, that the first Nunne taken to that Office by Numa Pompilius, was called by the name of Amata. Shee being thus taken, and led to the Castle or Fort of Vesta; presently, without enfranchising, or alteration of degree, she is freed out of her Fathers power, and obtaineth authority, to make her Will & Testament. I finde in the Commentaries of Lateranus, which he wrote vpon the twelue Tables of the Lawes, it is thus written. The Vestall Virgine is heire to no man or Woman, that dyed without Testament, neither can any one be heire to her, dying intestate: but her goods or possessions are to be publikely bestowed.

made to Marti Gradiuus. There were xii. men elected into this Order, who were called Salij, of Leaping or dancing, which they vsed in their sacrifices. To these men Tullus Hostilius added twelue more, when the Romans, conducting their men of war against the Fidenates; the Albans (vnder colour of treachery) rebeld against them, and would not fight, Metius Suffetius being their Captaine. For these men was appointed a very honourable kind of Vesture, with a Breast-plate of Steele. And they might weare Celestiall armor, which they called a Target or Shield, wherewith they leaped and danced through the Cittie, singing Verses along as they went; & it was appointed, that at the end of euerie Verse, they should name Mamurius. It is said, that (in those times) this Mamurius, was a very notable Smith; and a Target being faln from heauen, while Numa Pompilius and the Senate were sacrificing, it was committed vnto the saide Mamurius, that (by his Art) he should make many other, resembling that which fel from heauen. Which he hauing performed in very excellent maner, Numa commanded him to request whatsoeuer himselfe woulde make choise of, and it should be granted him. Whereupon, the ingenious workeman, not mooued with greedy desire of mony, but glory; requested that his name might bee mentioned by the Salij, at the ending of all their Verses and Daunces; which (as Liuie affirmeth) was orderly obserued in all their assemblies, and in their Sacrifices for long time after. The number in this Priesthoode increased in such manner, that a Colledge was builte for them; and afterward, a chiefe Magistrate was appointed ouer them in the Colledge.

The request made by Mamurius to Numa.

It is very manifest (according to Liuy) that Byshops (like as all the other Priesthoods) had their Originall by Numa Pompilius, and (for long time together) were created by no other persons, then the Senators. They were at the first but foure in number, but afterward, when the Common people (by meanes of the Tribunes) obtained part in all the greatest honours; they wold likewise participat in the priesthood, and with euery other most Sacred power. It was then concluded, that foure other Byshops should bee created of the vulgar people, in the Consulship of Marcus Valerius, and Quintus Apuleius. To all these there was appointed one Heade or Chiefe by Numa, and he was then called Pontifex Maximus, the Chiefe Byshop. He in his owne person, both noted and wrote downe euery thing, that appertayned to Diuine worship or reuerence; as best knowing what sacrifice, what day, & also what time best fitted for the ceremonies. Hee also had the care from whence such Monies should be collected, as were expedient for the charge of diuine occasions: as (in like manner) all other sacred things, either publicke or priuate, were subiect to the Holy priestes allowaunce. Whensoeuer any dissention happened about sacred Misteries or Religion; the people did helpe (both with their care and counsell) in his assistance.

Numa Pompilius, Author and Founder of this priesthood, conceiued this to be the best course, to auoide perturbation in all things, contempt of religious persons, and Diuine seruices; in which regard, he inioyned very especiall care to be had by such men. It is further said, that the chiefe Priest had a table, wherein to know the Ecclipses of the Sunne and Moone; as also a reason for all the festiuall dayes in the yeare, as monthly they happened. Varro Writeth, that Q. Mutius Scæuola, was wont to say, that of the words Potare and Fare, the title of Pontifex was compounded. But they would not so admit it, because they thought that Pontifex rather was deriued of Ponte and Facio, because (by them) was first made the bridge called Ponte Sublitio, and many times after very well repaired.

M. Varro, concerning the word Byshop in the Originall.

8. I do not find, that the Priests called Fecialis, were among the Romains, before Tullus Hostilius raigned. Neuertheless, as I do not maintaine, that Tullus was the first inuenter of them; so do I not also deny; but that Numa (the most Religious King of them all) might be the Originall of them. But be it howsoeuer, the first mention made of their name (according to Liuie) was, when M. Valerius was Fecialis, Tullus Hostilius raigned. It was the Office of the Fecialis, to stand as president, when publicke faith was made by the people. Also, it was adiudged to bee an vniust warre, except it were first denounced and made knowne by the Fecialis. When end or conclusion likewise was made of the warre, he constituted peace vnder solemne faith, which was teamed

The Office & quality of the Fecialis.

Fœdera, by the teſtimony of Varro: but by Ennius it is called Fidera, as induced by reaſon of making Faith, and therefore hee conceiueth, that Fecialis was formed of fides, and facere. The manner of offending or breaking (by the Fecialis) a league of peace, was ſuch, as (in Liuies opinion) none can be found more ancient. The Fecialis (ſaith he) demaunded thus of King Tullus. O King, doſt thou commaund, that I ſhall confirme or breake peace with the Paterpatratus, or king of Heraulds belonging to the Albane people? The King commaunding it to bee done; the Fecialis ſaith: Allow mee then (ô King) the herbage that I muſt carry with me. The King commaunded him to take the very beſt: whereupon he taketh the choiſeſt Hearbs out of the Herbage Caſtle, and againe thus proceedeth. Doſt thou (ô King) make me Meſſenger for thee, thy Kingdome, the people, and the Romaine Senate? The King replieth, that he doth. Then the peace being made, after many vttered wordes, concerning the Lawes on both ſides, he beginneth againe with a loud voyce, ſaying; Heare me, ô Ioue; Heare me, ô Paterpatratus of the Albane people; Heare me, ô you people, called Albanes; Heare mee from the beginning to the end: if I haue recited thoſe thinges contained in the Tables, and vnder ſeale, without fraude, or any deceit, and according as they ought rightly to be vnderſtood. The people of Rome will not bee the firſt breakers of ſo good Lawes; but if through lacke of good Councell in publike, by fraude or deceit they ſinne in ſuch ſort: Then doe thou (ô Ioue) that very day ſmite the Romaine people, as I doe this Swine; yea, ſo much the more violently ſtrike them, as thou art much more potent and powerfull. The words are no ſooner ſpoken, but preſently hee throwes a ſtone at a Swine, appointed there for the purpoſe, & then ſtreweth the Hearbs vpon the ground. The ſelfeſame forme and ſpeeches is obſerued on the contrary ſide by their Prieſt, and then by his Dictator: and thus is peace fully agreed on.

But when warre is denounced by the Fecialis, then this is the manner. The Fecialis carrieth a Speare or Lance, headed with Iron, and halfe burnt with fire, and ſtreweth Hearbes alſo all the way, euen to the Confines of them, againſt whom he is to menace warre. There, in preſenee of three men of good yeares, he openly declareth; That ſo farre hee came ſtrewing ſignes of peace, till hee found, that the people of Priſcus Latinus, and the Men of Priſcus Latinus, had dealt againſt the people and Senate of Rome, and had greatly offended them: wherefore, the people of Rome purpoſed to make Warre on Priſcus Latinus. In which iuſt cauſe (ſaith he) I, and the people of Rome, doe denounce war againſt Priſcus Latinus, and againſt the Latine people. When he hath ſo ſaid, he throws the Lance (ſo far as he can) vpon their ground, to the end it may be ſeene, that the warre is iuſtly vndertaken.

9 There is no difference (according to Liuie) betweene the Paterpatratus and the Fecialis; yet notwithſtanding, diuers haue comprehended, that there was and is ſome diſſimilitude: wherefore, I am the more willing to diſcourſe ſeparately, both of the one and other; and how the State then ſtood in eyther condition, it ſhall not ſeeme much from our purpoſe, if I deliuer what I haue obſerued. The vſe of the Paterpatratus declareth, that he was at the ſame time as the Fecialis was: becauſe when the Fecialis went to breake peace, he needeth both the help and authority of the Paterpatratus. They vſed equall aſſiſtance to Patrare, that is; to commaund the Oath, in place where peace was to be concluded on. Marcus Valerius being the firſt Fecialis, Spurius Fuſius was created the firſt Paterpatratus, in the firſt warre that Tullius Hoſtilius made againſt the Priſci Latini, hauing his bare head circkled with a wreath, made of the Hearbe called Veruein. The other Office, that is, to demaund any thing whatſoeuer; was giuen to Ancus Martius, according to the cuſtome of the * Æquicoli, a very auncient people, and the auncient manner of their behauiour, was thus. The Paterpatratus, and an Ambaſſador with him, went to the Confines of them, of whom the demaund was to bee made, his head beeing couered with a Silken Vaile, and there he vſed theſe wordes. Heare me, ô Ioue; Heare me, ô you confines, of what people ſoeuer they be; And heare, ô you Deities, honeſty and plaine truth. I am the publique Meſſenger of the people of Rome, and I come pioufly and iuſtly with this Ambaſſador; therefore giue faith to his words

Then doe they manifeſt the ſumme of their demaund, and call Ioue as Witneſſe thereof, proceeding thus. If I demaund for the people of Rome, or for my ſelfe, any thing of theſe Men that they poſſeſſe: deale with me ſo, that I may neuer participate in the ioyes of my Country. Hauing thus ſpoken, they paſſe on vp-on the Confines, deliuering the ſame ſpeeches to the firſt Man they meete withall. So entring the Citty Gates, and going on to the Pallace, there they declare (more at large) the full intenti-on. And if that bee not giuen them, which they made demaund of, within the ſpace of three and thirty daies; the time is no ſooner expired, but Warre is denounced, in this manner. Heare me, ô Ioue, Iuno, and thou Quirinus: *Heare me alſo all you Gods Celeſtiall, Terreſtriall, and Infernall. 10 The King of the Sacraments, who is alſo called the Sacrificer, had his firſt beginning, in the time of the firſt Conſuls, Iunius Brutus, and Marcus Valerius. The occaſion of this inuention, was the expulſion of the kings, becauſe they (without any difference) vſed to execute the Prieſts Office. Whereupon, the people, after they were thus excluded, thought it very ſtrange, that there was no ſacrificing and that ouer-much reputation was taken from Religion, by ſending thus their Kinges away: They therefore created a Prieſt, and becauſe he ſhould be of no leſſe authority then a King; they called him King of the Sacraments. Notwithſtanding, they would haue him to be vnder the cheefe Biſhops iuriſdiction; leaſt, being at his owne liberty, the expulſed Kings might returne, or be called backe againe. A voice heard in the Image before king Attalus.

whereupon she was brought (by Sea) to Rome, & many of the people going forth to meet her, singing Verses, and making much ioy: it fortuned, that by the great waight of the Statue, the ship sunk in the Riuer of Tyber; which caused the people to labour by all meanes, both with ropes, Cables, and other helpes of strength, to get it vp againe, but all proued to no purpose. There was then present among the throngs of Roman people, a Vestall Virgin, named Claudia Quinta, a Lady of incomparable beauty, who wearing more costly and sumptuous Garmentes then some thoght conuenient for her degree, was suspected to be immodest and vnchast. This goodly young Virgin, knowing the peoples idle suspition, and puritie of her owne soule, fel on her knees by the riuers side, and (as it should seeme) by that part of the Ship where the feete of the Goddesse lay, and holding a loose Girdle in her hand, which she had fastned vnto the Cable of the ship, vttered these speeches: Before them that haue accused me of immodesty, I beseech thee (O Sacred Goddesse) that by thy testimony my fault may be iudged: to the end, that beeing condemned by thee, I may by death suffer deserued punnishment. But if thou approue me to be innocent of such foule shame, let this my chast hand bee thy guide, to raise and conduct thee hence. Hauing thus spoken, and rising from off her knees, by her Girdle she easily drewe the Ship along, and (to the no little maruail of the people) guided the Goddesse into the Citty.

Scipio Nasica was only thought worthy to receiue the Image, and touch it vvith his hand. And to him it was committed, that he should cause a magnificent Temple to be built to the Goddesse, & Priests dedicated to her seruice; who according to the ancient Custom of the Goddesse, ought to be guelded. The reason of this institution is said to be thus: Cybele, which also was the name of this Berecynthia, loued a young youth in Phrygia, and gaue him charge not to breake chastity. But he being enamored on a Nimph, named Sagarida, slept with her one Night vnder a Tree, which was dedicated to the Goddesse. Cybele comming thither, and cutting downe the tree, killed the Nimphe; which the youth perceiuing, fled in hast to the neareste Mountain; & there, meerly confounded with griefe and shame for so foule a fault committed, hee did quite cut off the wanton instrument wherby he had so highly offended. Vpon this occasion, the Goddesse (in memory of this act) commanded that all such men as sacrificed to her, should bee guelded. It is further said, that the name of the Gaules or Galli, was deriued from a riuer in Phrygia, which was neare to a Temple of this Goddesse. And I find written, that whosoeuer entred into that Riuer, or drank of the water, it foorthwith caused them to run mad.

12. There were two men belonging to the Sacraments, or sanctified mysteries, whose charge and Office was, to read the sacred Bookes, the verses of Sibilla; and likewise, to interpret the deeds of the Roman people. Next, they were as Presidents at the sacred Ceremonies, which vsually were made to Apollo. And at all times when any Monster was born, or any prodigy happened, fore-telling the ensuing of some great accident, entering into their beds, before the Tabernacle of the Goddes, they would appease them with Sacrifices and praiers, that their displeasure might some whither else bẽ turned from them.

Of two men appertaining to the Sacraments.

Furthermore, by their Decree and order, all Sacrifices (for times of prosperity) were solemnly determined and apointed. I find no other mention made of this Priesthoods Order, vntill such time as a Temple was Dedicated to Castor, by the Sonne of Posthumus the second Dictator, who was then one of the two men: for his Father being Dictator in the Latine war, made a solemne Vow to performe such a Temple.

Sacrifices for times of prosperity.

A Temple dedicated to Castor.

These two men, being long time created in this order of Priest-hood, and the Common people coueting in like maner to create the Consuls among themselues, and so to meddle in all matters, they being no way else to be appeased, obtained at length, that on the same day as these two men were to be created, they might also create ten other men; fiue of the nobility, and fiue of the Comminalty. Heerupon, of two men they grew to be ten in number; and likewise to haue the name of the Ten men.

The creation of tenne men more.

13. By that which may be coniectured and comprehended, it appeareth that seuen men, tearmed Epuloni, were included in a kiude of Priest-Hoode. And

Of seuen men called Epuloni, and of their Originall.

And so much the rather it is to bee presumed, because in discoursing the vacancy of Vestall Virgines, it is saide, That the Sonnes of the Augures; of the ten sacred men; of the Flamines; and of the seauen men, called Epulonj, deserued, and had their lawfull excuses admitted. Whereby I gather, that among the other Priest-hoodes, this of the seauen men was included. Yet I know not how this matter should so fall out; because I can finde nothing (concerning them) worthy of faith and authority: wherefore I am the lesse forward, in affirming what office was committed to this Order. Neuertheless, I must needes say, that Pliny reciting an Oration of one that stood in some feare of his Auditours, saith; In the midst stood the Consul, and next, the seauen men, tearmed Epuloni. And euen to this present day, there is to be seene engrauen on a smooth Piramide in Rome, this inscription. Opera finita, &c. The worke ended the CXXX. day, by the Testament of Caius Cornelius, Tribune of the people, and seauen men of the Epulons.

The wordes of Pliny, concerning the seauen men.

Hauing determined with my selfe, to intreat of all other Magistrates, not appertainiug to Religion: we are then to consider, that some Magistrates were called Greater, and some Lesser, and what the lesser were, may breefely bee declared, because. Aulus Gellius writeth at large on this Argument, taking his instructions frō the books of M. Messala the Augure, & these are his words. The authority of the Noblemen is diuided in two parts. The greater is of Prætors, of Consuls, and of Censors, and yet neuertheless, there is not one kinde of iurisdiction or power among them: because the Censors are no Colleagues with the Prætors and Consuls, but the Prætors are Colleagues with the Consuls, and therefore the Prætors and Consuls haue not the power of the Censors, and the Consuls trouble not the Prætors and Censors. But the Censors among themselues, the Prætors and Consuls also among themselues, obtaine and enioy alike authority. The Prætor, as it were a Colleague with the Consull, cannot (in reason) vse the same power, as belongeth to the Consull, and to the Prætor; as wee haue learned from our betters, and as hath beene obserued before these times. And it is manifest in the thirteenth Commentary of C. Tuditanus, that the Prætor hath the lesser, and the Consull the greater authority: whereupon meere reason directeth, that the lesser cannot vse the power of the greater, nor the greater, the priuiledge of the lesser Magistrate. We in these times, creating a Prætor for the Prætors; haue followed the authority vsed of old, though wee haue not searched into the like power: for Censors, Consuls, and Prætors, cannot iustly deale in one & the same scrutiny. The rest of the Magistrates haue lesser authority, and therfore these other are called the Greater, and they, the Lesser Magistrates; the Greater are made according to the Centuriatæ leges, Lawes made by the whole assembly; and the Lesser, among the Tribunes priuiledges, but yet much more iustly, when it is done according to the Lawes Curiatæ, Lawes made by the same assembly.

Prætors, Consuls, Censors, and of their seuerall authorities.

By all these words of Messala (saith he) may easily be gathered, what the lesser Magistrates were, and vppon what occasion they were so called. Hee saith also, that the Prætor was Colleague of the Consuls, because they were created by one absolute power. And he granteth them to haue the greater authority, because their scrutinie or search was more firme, and better ratified then the other. The Consull may reduce all the other Magistrates scrutinies, and their conference or Parlement: the Prætor had not the like priuiledge at all times, or equall reducing. The lesser Magistrates could not reduce any thing from the Consul, or to any other Magistrate. In an equall action, he that is first called of them, and first obserueth the search; he goeth directly to his charge: because hee may not moone the people twice, neyther can he carry one to any other, if hee will haue conference, and deale with the people, although many Magistrates together may admit conference. By these words of Messala, is euidently discerned, that it is one thing to worke with the people, and another, to deale by speech or conference. Because, to deale with the people, is to request some thing, which their suffrages either commaundeth or denyeth: But to haue speech and conference; is simply to speake to the people, without any rogation or intercession.

14 There is no man doubteth, that the order of the Senatours did not receiue:

The original of the Senators.

ceiue Originall from Romulus. Hee was the first founder and builder of the City, and considering with himself, that it was sufficiently fortified with able youth, as also with others of competent strength; he conceiued also, that it was not the lest important matter, if it had like helpe, or much better ability of Counsell (elected to the number of an hundred) of the chiefest Fathers and Cittizens then to bee found; who (for their honour) might be called Fathers; and (for their yeares) Senators; according to the saying of Caius, that those (amongst the Lacedemonians) were called Senes, that were men of years, and ought to haue the place of Magistracie.

The order among the Lacedemonians.

Tullus Hostilius encreaseth the Senators number.

Afterward, such as were born or sprung from these first Fathers, were named Patricij. Tullus Hostilius made the number of them much more perfect, hauing vanquished Alba, and brought the Albanes thence to Rome. Hee then entertained among the Senators, the Tulli, the Servilij, the Quinti, the Gregani, and the Clodi. But the Kinges being expulsed, the Consull Brutus, perceiuing the Senat to be empty of honest persons, appointed, that those men who were cheefest in the Order of Knight-hood, should be made Senatours, and beare the name of Patres Conscripti, Enrolled Fathers. Whereuppon, from hence the Nomination of Conscribed Fathers, receiued Originall; and because he spake it, it had full approbation, and ioyned with the other Fathers.

Brutus the Consull altereth the Senate.

Patres conscripti.

The absolute authority of the Senate.

These Senators had such absolute authority, that they administred the maine importancy of all matters in the Commonwealth; in such sort, that neither the King, the Consuls, the Dictators, nor any other Magistrate dealt in any thing, vntill it hadde first passed Counsell in the Senate. For Tarquinius Superbus, hauing (beside the Senates authority) doone many things according to his owne will; was called Tirant, and (last of al) lost his state.

Tarquinius Superbus.

Three Degrees of Senators.

I finde that there were three degrees or orders of Senatours, because some were called Pedarij, others Patricij, and some others Conscripti. The Patricij were they that descended (by Birth) of those hundered, elected at first by Romulus. The Conscripti wer such, as, by decree of the Consulles, the King and the Censours, were brought into the Senate. But I finde the Patricij. Conscripti.

Pedarij to be so called for diuers reasons. Some say, that though they were in the Senate, they might not bee allowed to speake their minds, but only to giue their consent to the rest, and (with their feete) to expresse the same, by making some little noise, whereon the Latine sentence of them was, Ibant pedibus in sententias, and therefore to be tearmed Pedarij. Others Write, that many of the Senators being great Magistrates, came to the Senate in their Horse-litters or Coaches. Others, (hauing no Office of Magistracy) came after them on foot; and thereupon were called Pedarij. Marcus Varro saith, That there were some Knights, who hauing beene imployed by the greater Magistrates, and not (as yet) elected by the Censors in the Senat: They might not deliuer their opinion in the Senate, or giue any sentence. Onely it vvas lawful for them to be present with the rest in the Senate, and yeelde consent vnto that which was agreed on by their elders.

Pedarij, and the reason why so called by sundry opinions.

The saying of Marcus Varro, concerning the Pedarij.

Concerning the Consulles order in the Senate, all that I haue read, doe consent in this manner. It was the vse at first, that he (who by the Censors) was appointed chiefe in the Senate, should begin to speak his opinion; and other-whiles they graunted such as were elected Consulles leaue to begin. Cicero, in the book which he intitled the Elder Cato, of Old age, writeth; That they vsed to giue their preheminence to him of greatest yeares. Whereupon, he that was the most aged, hee began to speake his minde, and giue the sentence. Neuertheless, it is saide, that (by custome) it was introduced, that he who was desired thereto by the Consul, might be the first to speake. And yet it was not lawfull for him to intreate any man, that either was, or had not bin Consull. I find recorded vppon this custome, that Caius Iulius Cæsar, in the Consulship which he held with M. Bibulus, made entreatie (out of common forme or vse) to three seueral men, (to wit,) M. Crassus, Cneius Pompeius, and Marcus Cato. Afterward, Marcus Crassus, (as straining courtesie) began to entrea t Cneius ompeius, because his daughter was his Wife: but preuailing with M. Cato, hee accepted the charge, but spake so loude, and continued so long in his Oration, as all the time was welneere spent, that the Senate obserued in their arguing. Cæsar perceiuing that hee grew to no conclusion, but held on still; commanded manded him to be carried thence to prison. Cato obeying, and beeing led on the way towards the prison, the Senate rose and followed after him; whereat Cæsar being enuiously moued, staied, and commanded to let him go.

Of the assembly of the Senate, a Booke written by M. Varro.

Concerning the congregating and assembly of the Senat, M. Varro at the intreaty of Pompey, wrote a Booke when he was the first time designed Consull with M. Crassus: and it was conceiued, that he who (till that time) had bin so long in the Warres, would (in that respect) make the better obseruation of customs, and other ciuill occasions. In like manner he wrote a Letter to Opimius, wherein he saith, that the fore-named Booke was lost in the age of Varro. In which letter (saith Aulus Gellius) Varro wrote many things of the same argument; and there was set downe, what they were, that might cause the Senate to be assembled; as also to nominate the Dictator, the Consul, the Prætor, the Tribune of the people; the Interrex, the Præfect for the Citty; and that no other had authority beside, to congregate the Senate. Some adde (ouer and beyond the ordained authority) the Tribune militaris, or Tribune for the warres, who was first Vice-consull. The ten men who had then the Consuls power: the two men, created on especiall occasion, to order the Common-wealth: and that those men were of power to assemble the Senate. As for the Præfect of the City Latium, none do sufficiently proue, if hee might assemble the Senate, because (they say) he was no Senator, neither might speake his minde in the Senat. Yet M. Varro, and Atteius Capito do both affirme, that the Præfect of Rome Citty, had authority to Assemble them, as the Tribune of the people (before Law made to the contrary) had the like prerogatiue.

The seuerall Offices nominated in the Senate.

The Præfect of Latium.

M Varro, and Atteius Capito.

Their prohibition also are written of, Namely, that such men had authoritie to prohibit and gainsay, who had power ouer him that was to be prohibited, or wer greater in credit: which power they receiued either from the * Senatusconsultum, or the * Plebiscitum, or some other Decree from the purpose. But concerning the place where the Senate ought to assemble, or to request Senatusconsulti; it was flatly forbidden to be any where, that had not bin first ordained by the Augures and (by them) called a Temple. upon, when they met first togither in the Court Hostilia, in Pompeia, and afterward in Iulia, they being all prophane places; the Augures gaue order, that they should be made Temples, to the end, that (according to precedent custome) in them their deliberations might bee consulted on. Now, for meete time of the Senates Assembly, if it were before Sunne-rising or Sun-setting, it appeared vtterly vnprofitable. Wherefore, the Censor gaue direction, for the time most fit and conuenient.

The time of the Senates meeting.

What yeares the Senators were to be of, is very apparant, and that youths had likewise leaue to be in the Senate House: but Papyrius Prætextatus occasioned the absence of all youths afterward, as Valerius Maximus hath recorded. And then, it was ordained, that no person vnder the age of fiue and twenty yeares, should be admitted entrance, as we read in Plutarch in the life of Pompey the Great. The like is comprized in the Romans Ciuill Lawes, whence likewise we receiued these instructions.

The age of the Senators.

Plutarch, in vit. Pomp. Magnus.

Varro also recordeth, that hee who was to be admitted into the Senat, should first be a Sacrificer, and an Augure: and that his first speeches in the Senate, ought rather to be of Diuine causes, then anie humain matters. Moreouer he saith, that deliberations there, were in two kinds, by disputation; or (if the case were doubtful) by generall opinion: such order they obserued likewise, in conferring on Monies, pawnes, and punnishment of them that appeared not (on summons) while the Senate sat. As for them that appertained to Senatory Families, it was decreed, that vnder the appellation of any Senate person, they comprehended the Wife also, and that those children which were giuen in adoption, before the Father was admitted into the Senat, should also be Senators. They obserued also, that whosoeuer was of the patrician order, though the same were by adoption the son of a common Plebeian, yet he should continue a Patrician still: which law (in mine opinion) was scarsely obserued truely in those times; considering, that P. Clodius (being a Patrician borne) and coueting the Magistrates power of the Tribunitia, to make vse thereof against the faction of Cicero, gaue himselfe by adoption to a common man.

The Poſthumi, who were borne after the death of their Fathers, were yet neuertheleſſe, called Senatory men. But he that was conceiued, and borne, after that his Father had been remoued from the Senate: both Proculus and Pegaſus doe ſay, that he was not the Sonne of a Senator. But if before his Fathers remooueall, his Sonne was conceiued; meer paternal reſpect cleared him from any preiudice, and hee was eſteemed to be Senatory. But if before his conception, his Father had loſt the Senatory Dignity, and then dying, his Sonne fell into the power of his Grand-Father, (being then a Senator) ſo that he might ſeeme as not to be borne of a Senatour: ye was he (notwithſtanding) to be held as Senatory. 15 I find, that Romulus was the firſt that ordained the Tribunes of light or nimble Horſe-men, when hee ſelected three Centuries of Horſe; whereof he made vſe in all buſineſſes appertaining to the Commonwealth, and gaue them theſe Titles: Of the Ramneſi; of the Tatij; and of the Luceri. The Ramneſi were named of Romulus; the Tatij, of Tatius: but the Luceri, the reaſon of that name was not knowne, as Liuie remembreth, and nameth them all in this manner.

Ramneſi, Tatij, and Luceri.

Three Tribunes he appointed to thoſe Centuries, as Heades and Commaunders, and thoſe three were choſen forth of three Tribes. It is ſaid, that the Horſe in number were three hundred, in regard that the Curiæ (being thirty) might haue to each one ten Horſe. And the reaſon why he would haue them called ſwift or light Horſe, was; becauſe they ſhould be alwaies in ſpeedy readineſſe, whenſoeuer the Common-weales affaires ſo required. There be ſome, who affirme, that they were called Celer, or ſwift Horſe, after the name of a Man called Celer, who was the firſt (ordained by Romulus) chiefe or Commaunder of thoſe Centuries, according as Ouid affirmeth.

*The Tribes, Wardes, or Precincts of the Romaine people.

Ouid in lib. de Faſt.

16 The Originall of the Quæſtores creation, is very ancient, and they were ordained (ſome thinke) before all the other Magiſtrates. Gratian, in his Booke bearing the name of Times, hath written, that Romulus and Numa had two Quæſtores, who were not by them created, but by the care and ſcrutiny of the people. But if (as it is not certainelie noted) that Romulus had Quæſtores; it is manifeſt, that Tullus Hoſtilius the K. created ſome. It is ſaid, that they were called Quæſtores, becauſe their duty was to gather the publike Monies, and they had the charge alſo of the publike treaſury. Gratian further ſaith, that they vſed to read in the Senate, ſuch Letters as were ſent from this or that Man, and that they were named (by the Prince) Candidati. I find beſide, that ſometimes theſe Quæſtores examined Malefactors, and gaue them tortures. Whereupon, Varro wil haue it, that of Quæſtionarius, an Inquiſitour, or Giuer of the Strappado, the name of Quæſtor was impoſed on them. They vſed to create the Quæſtores, as wel from among the common people, as the Patritians, euen as all other Magiſtrates; which authority, becauſe it was giuen to the meaner ſort, had neither any admonition or prohibition. And as thoſe priuate men were to be called in queſtion by the Prætor; ſo is it likewiſe ſaid, that (at the beginning) they had authority to ſpeake their opinion in the Senate. And becauſe the Conſuls could not ſentence any Romain Cittizen to death, without commiſſion from the people; therefore it was ordained

17. Romulus being dead, and the Fathers bethinking themselues in what manner they might then best gouern the Common-wealth, and who should seeme worthy to succeed Romulus; as also, what course therein were best to bee obserued, that the people (who were as without a Head) might enter into no such disorder, as (thereby) to draw war from neighbors, vpon a Citty without a guide: they congregated themselues seriously togither, and concluded (after mature consultation) to make choise of an hundred fathers which should be diuided into ten bandes or Squadrons, ten for each company, & out of each company to elect one man; and he (with the other ten) should haue the charge of the other ninety. Out of these also, they made Election of one man, who should assume the place of a King; which dignity of his, was to last but fiue dayes, and the fiue dayes beeing ended, another was chosen; and so went it thorough them al, each man by his fiue daies, vntill a whole yeare was expired in this kind of gouerning.

But this Empery or rule appearing hurtfull, and the people complaining, that (for one King) they had now an hundred; the fathers likewise perceiuing what stirres might arise in challenging the sole Gouernment, they deuised what meanes might best rid them of so waighty a burthen, and throwing the same clog vppon the people, determined with them, that no Iurisdiction or power should remain to any future King, but only vnto such a man as they should make choise of. They further resolued, that he should be King, whom the people commanded to be elected as King, with this condition: That he should be said to be truly a king, if the Fathers gaue him their full Confirmation. Thē the Inter-Rex, or fiue daies king, called a Parliament, and said to the people, as followeth: *O you Quirites, create you a King, that may bee good, iust, and happy. If you create such a one, as may worthily be said to second Romulus; the Fathers will therein gladly ioyne with yee. With these conditions, they created him who should haue the generall gouernment. But in the time of vacancy, and when there was no King, he that had the chiefe power of the hundred, was called the Inter-Rex. It happned afterward, that wanting a King, and the Consuls being absent from Rome, as men imployed in the Common-weales waightiest affaires, and thereby to be excused by their absence; they coulde not find a man to generall liking. And therefore, being frustrated of a full and lawfull creation, the gouernment was referred to the Inter-Rex, by whose meanes they created their following Consuls.

The gouernment of the Inter-Rex.

18. There were two chiefe or capitall men, created in great authority, but if wee would vnderstand the Originall of these two especial men, we must then begin with the time of King Tullus Hostilius. He warring vpon the Albanes, had already conducted his army into an apte place; and Metius Suffetius, Captaine of the Albanes, came to haue conference with the King of the Romaines. Hauing long debated about the conditions of peace, it was finally concluded in this maner. There were then in the Albane army, three worthy Bretheren, who were tearmed the Curiatij, & these three Gallants must fight (body to bodye) with three other Romain Brethren, called the Horatij. The resolution being past, without anie alteration, the day of battaile was determined, and the order to bee obserued in their fight.

Hauing tried their manhood valiantly a long time togither, at length the three Curiatij (who were all sore wounded) happned to kill two of the Horatij. The thirde man seeing his Brethren slaine, and himselfe (as yet) sprightly and vntoucht, began to consider, that to defend his life against the Curiatij, ther was now no need of any lost time, or to stand still in a season so perrillous; and therefore he began to run about the Lists. He of the Curiatij, that was in weakest estate, immagining, that the death of his brethren had amazed his sences, and therefore sought the best meanes how hee might escape; pursued him very speedily. But Horatius turning suddenly backe vpon him, manfully slew him: and the second making hast to succour his Brother, beeing ouer-feeble for the performance, was likewise slaine; and euen so sped the thirde, who needed not many strokes to dispatch him.

Horatius triumpheth after his worthy victory.

Herevpon (by common consent) a glorious Triumphe was prepared for Horatius, and he riding back to Rome in that manner; no meane confluence of people came to meete him, among whom also was the Sister to Horatius. This Lady, who formerly had beene giuen by her Brother, in marriage to one of the Curiatij, beholding the spoiles of her slaine Husband hanging on his chariot: fel both into such loud and lamentable exclamations, as made all present very much amazed. Horatius taking her sorrowes discontentedly, perceiuing them to be a blemish to his victory, and a trouble to the generall reioycing; suddenly slew her. The Ttiumphe being ended, Horatius was brought before the King, from whom he was sent to Prison, and (in common opinion) thought worthy of death. But his memorable fortune, winning great grace and fauour with the King; procured his tryall to be delayed, and he being desirous also to haue his cause duely examined, would be one in his owne royal person, and therefore created two men more, who should heerein assist him to their vttermost power. The two chosen men pronounced Horatius worthy to dye: but then he appealed from them, and would put himselfe on the peoples sentence. At which time, the aged Father to vndaunted Horatius (halfe drowned in teares) fell on his knees before them, entreating, that hauing lost two of his Sonnes in battaile, and onelie for the honour of their Country; that they would not suffer him now to be depriued of the third. The people being moued to much compassion, and calling to minde, the no small hazzard of his atchieued victory; clearely acquitted him.

The Sister of Horatius was wife to one of the Curiatij, & killed by her own Brother.

The K createth two men, to examine (with him) the fact of Horatius.

The people deliuer Horatius frō death.

Thus grew the Originall of those two Capitall men, to whom (not long after) a third man was added, and so they became three. Now, because they were appointed to Capitall Inquisitions: they had the charge of those Prisons, wherein capitall Offenders were enclosed, and thereupon had the Name of Capitall Men. And this degree of Magistracy, had hand in the condemnation of Caius Manlius Capitolinus, from the people of Rome. And the same authority chastised all them, that dealt in the conspiracy of L. Cataline, according as Salust describeth.

19 Concerning the Præfect, Prouost, or Captaine of the Citty, there is nothing found written, before the time of Spurius Lucretius (Father to Lucretia) who was Præfect. I doe not heerein deny, but that there might be such Magistrates, and that all the other Kinges, from Tarquine forward, might create Præfects. But howsoeuer it might be, or was, the Reader is to take notice, that at all times, when the King had occasion to be farre off from Rome, he left (in his stead) the Præfect of the Citty. But as the Empire increased, so was the iurisdiction of all Italy committed to the Præfect. All delicts and offences which were found through Italy (as is witnessed by an Epistle sent from D. Seuerus to Cilionus) were brought before the Præfect of the Citty, in the beginning of which Epistle, are these wordes set downe.

Of the Præfect, Captain, or Prouost Marshall of the Citty.

A note for the Reader.

Epist. D. Seuer. ad Cilion.

We hauing committed the Gouernment of the Citty to thy faithfull trust; know from vs, that all such transgressions as happen in our Citty, shall appertaine to the care and cure of the Præfect thereof. The like we say, of all delicts and errors committed foorth of the Citty, within the circuit of an hundred miles euery way. But if he proceede any further, he shall be then out of our protection. Let him giue audience to Seruants, that flie for refuge to the Statues; or in complaining on their Maisters, for not making them free, they hauing bought their liberty by their owne true seruice, or best meanes. He must heare Maisters falne into pouerty: And such as are sicke and weak, that releefe may come to them from the sound and healthfull. His authority likewise extendeth, to confirme, and to banish. If any one shall faithfully affirme, that a Wife hath committed Adultery with her Slaue; the Præfect is to heare his information: because he may (by his authority) make enquiry, whether the accusation proceedeth on spleene, or fraud, or whether the act were violently committed, or no. He shall also cause to appeare before him, Gouernours of Wards, or fatherlesse Children, and Stewards of mens Landes or possessions, for enquiry of well or ill dealing in their offices: how they stand suspected, either for giuing Money to enioy their Gardianship, or deliuered any other bribes or rewards, without which, they had beene vnmeete for such authority; thority; Also, whether they haue abused and diminished the Orphanes faculties, or (by fraudulent conueyance) got any part of his patrimonie.

Other additions to the Præfects office.

Ouer and beside the precedent matters, D. Seuerus likewise added to the office of this Magistrate, That he should haue an eie to Seruants, least they swerued from their Maisters, to vnlawfull entertainers.

For Coyners of Money.

To be carefull of the Moniers or Minters, in carying themselues vprightly, and to make knowne all their treacheries against the Lawes.

For iniury done by Wife or children, or free-seruants.

That Maisters should not be iniuried by their Free-Seruants, or Iourney-men, as we call them: neyther by his owne Children, or his Wife, or his Neighbours. All these occasions ought to bee heard before the Præfect, who, according as he findes the offence, may punnish the Free-man menace, disfranchise, or proceede to some heauier kind of punnishment; as the like is to be doone, if he haue practised and conspited with any of his Maisters enemies.

For the Markets, and all other matters of sale.

He ought likewise to ouer-see all things that were to be sold, and giue admonition, that a iust value or price should not be exceeded. The Markets also were vnder his charge, for Oxen, Sheepe, Swine, &c. with the Shambles, Fishery, Hearbery, and such like.

In the Citty he might prohibite the faculties, pleadings, and Sessions, at such times as himselfe pleased, and (in like manner) appoint them.

At length, when this Man had long time continued in this high place; his Authority was giuen to the Prætor of the Latines Holy-daies, vntill (at some other time) the like creation should begin againe. And when all the other Magistrates made Holy-day, yet they gaue place to the Præfect of the Latines Citty onely. I haue left some other things vnspoken of, concerning the authority of this Præfect, but they are not of any great importance.

Of Consuls, and their originall.

20 The most auncient Writers doe consent, that the authority of Consuls was formed after example of the Kinges. For when the Kings were expelled, two men were created; to whom no lesse power was graunted, then formerly had beene giuen to the King: only excepted, that their Dominion endured but for a yeare. They had * Lictors, and all other Officers as the King was wont to haue. Now, because their especiall care was, to counsell what was most conuenient for the Common-weales benefit: thereuppon they were named Consuls, and to them was committed the diligent respect of al occasions, which they could conceiue to be fittest for generall good. The first Consuls, after the rule of Kinges was controuled, were L. Iunius Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus. Brutus concluded with his Colleague or companion, that (by turnes) one of them onelie should be seene with the Ensignes royall: to the ende, that the people (who had seen and knowne both the one and other) might not lament for the losse of one King, nor yet bee terrified with the sight of two. The Lictors or Sergeants were twelue in number, who with bundles of Rods & Axes, alwaies went before the Consull.

* Sergeants attending with Rods and Axes.

L. Iunius Brutus and L. Tarquinius Collatinus, the first Consuls.

The reason of twelue Lictors or Sergeants.

It is said, that Romulus instituted this number of Lictors, because as hee questioned with a Brother of the Augures; he beheld twelue Gripes or vultures on Mount Auentine. Many other Authors of credit hold opinion, that the Lictors, Commaunders, the * Sella Curulis, the Gowne, and the long Roabe, called Prætexta; came to Rome from the Tuscane people, confining on the Romaines. For it is saide, that the Tuscane people, being of twelue seuerall kinds, and hauing created their King; each people affoorded and gaue him a Lictor. They hold, that the word Lictor, was formed of Legare, because as suddainely as the Consull gaue commaund, eyther to apprehend, or to binde any man; they were as ready and officious thereto, and they gaue commaund also to any that was to appeare before the Consull. Iunius Brutus, one of the first Consuls, died in Warre, and P. Valerius remained aliue in the Consulship, because he was put in place of Tarquinius Collatinus, who for the hatred the Romains bare to his Progenie; had renounced his Dignity. Such was the mutability of the vulgares mindes, not onely to beginne false Calumniations against him, but also to intimate blames, suspitions, and (finally) vehement accuſations. Notwithſtanding all which, hauing called a Parliament, and iuſtifyed himſelfe beyond their expectation: he was the Authour of making a Law, that a Man might defend himſelfe, and appeale from any Magiſtrate. Then beganne the Conſulles Authoritie (which had long continued famous) to bee inferiour to kingly prerogatiue, and ſo largely ſpread the Seedes of Licence and Liberty, that quickely began too liberall a Harueſt thereof: for they left creating of Conſuls among the Fathers, and the Auſpici or hopefull ſignes, would neuer afterward come neere any other.

The declining of the Conſuls office.

At laſt, the Warres beeing ended with the Gaules, I meane that Warre wherein Titus Manlius Torquatus, taking the Chaine from the Gaule, that fought hand to hand with him, was ſlaine by him, and gaue the Sir-name of Torquatus to all his Poſterity: the Romaines waxing wearie of the Tribunes continuall ſeditions; gaue grant, that one of the two Conſuls ſhould be choſen by the Common people. The firſt Conſull (then) of the Plebeians or Commoners, was Lucius Sequatius, and the Plebeians hauing obtained before, that the Tribunes of the Souldiers might be choſen among them, becauſe they ſerued in the ſtead of Conſuls: oftentimes, in creation of the Tribunes, they made likewiſe a mixture of the Conſulles Authority, and that in ſuch manner, that many times it happened, that the Conſuls commaund was voide two yeares togeather, ſometimes more, and ſometimes leſſe, according as occaſion fell out.

Lucius Sequatius firſt Conſul of the Plebeians.

Concerning the Conſtitution or creation of the Conſuls power and priuiledges; I finde, that an aſſembly beeing called by the Conſuls, or by the two cheefe men, or by the Inter-Rex, or the Dictator of the Squttinie, which Man was elected of the Tribes, or by the congregating of the Centuries; and all theſe meeting in the field, called * Campus Martius: ſuch as were deſirous to require the Conſulſhippe, came into the Fielde, and then they were called Candidati, in regard of White Robes or Garments which then they wore. He that obtained moſt Suffrages among the people, or had his happineſſe by lot, hee was immedinly called Conſull.

*A Field neer Rome, where they made vſe of all manly exerciſes.

Now, becauſe wee haue formerlie made mention of the Squitinie, whom the Latines tearmed Comitij: it ſhall not differ ouer farre from our purpoſe, if we ſet downe what wee haue collected concerning them. Among theſe Comitij, there were ſome called Calati, and other ſome, tearmed Tributi. Calati, becauſe the Curiata Comitia were called by the Lictors. The Curiata were deuided into Centuries and Curij, and called Curiata, of Curij: who were thirtie in number, containing the Cittizens among them; whereupon, euery one of the Curij, was called by the Lictors to the Comitij or aſſembly. The Centurie were elected by voyces, and according to their yeares. The Tribunes were ſo named (as I thinke) of the parts of the Citty, and of the Tribes. It was not lawfull, to congregate the Centuriata Comitia within the Wals of Rome: becauſe it was accounted vniuſt, that an Army ſhould bee commaunded or gouerned, but in place moſt conuenient; which could not bee within a Cittie. Wherefore, the Centuriata vſed to aſſemble in Campus Martius, where by reaſon of ſpeedieſt ſupply, Martiall matters might be beſt diſcourſed, and men trained. Beſide this, it was neceſſary for ſuch as demaunded the Conſulſhip, that by themſelues (perſonally) they ſhould be with the Squitini or Comitij, becauſe it was not accepted, or giuen by a third perſon: which I perceiue they alſo obſerued in euery other Magiſtracy. Such as were Sonnes of the Family, and were not vnder the awe of their Fathers, or Grand-Fathers; might haue the Dignitie of Conſull, and might alſo be made free when they would, by their owne authority. Finally, it was concluded, that ſuch as were Conſuls; without any other freedome of their Fathers, were at their owne liberty.

21 Titus Liuius beareth witneſſe, that the Albanes had a Dictor (euen Metius Suffetius) before the Romaines had any: The firſt Dictator authorized in Rome, was T. Largius, who had formerly been Conſull: but it is not preciſely knowne in what yeare, and vnder what Conſuls. It is well obſerued, that in time of the Latines and Sabines Warre, and when forty Men had conſpired againſt

The Albanes Dictator before the Romaines.

Manilius Octavius Tusculanus

gainst the Romaines (prouoked thereto by Manilius Octauius Tusculanus, Son in Lawe to proud Tarquine, and who bare him company in exile) that euen then it was ordained, to create a Dictator in Rome. This Dignity (among the Romaines) was of very great importance, and their auncient Writinges doe testifie, that could none appeale from them: but he must be a Romaine Cittizen by blood, and (among them) consisted the Authority of the whole Common-wealth. All the Kings honours were attributed to the Dictator, and because he had cheefe rule ouer the people, therefore he was sir-named Maister of the People. Whence proceeded, that whosoeuer held any publique authority, as being bred or deriued frō the high Dictators office: they were likewise called Maisters, as the Candidi, of the Candidati.

What the Romaine Dictator ought to be, and of his eminency in authority, and all appertaining to him.

It was not the custome to create a Dictator, except when some suddaine and vnexpected occasion hapned, that threatned ineuitable ruine to the Citty. At first, it was vnlawfull to create a Dictator, vnlesse he were a Patritian: neuertheless, it fell afterward much lower; for in the Warre which the Romaines had with the Falisci, and with the Tarquines; then was created the first Dictator of the Common people, named C. Marius Rutilus; and then (in like manner) did they elect L. Plancus, to be Maister of the Horse, or Cauallery, a Plebeian also. This Magistrates power (being of such greatnesse) could be endured no longer then sixe months, and because he spake, nominated or elected the following Magistrates: therefore (saith Varro) he was tearmed Dictator, vnder pretence of this or the like authority, L. Silla and Iulius Cæsar gayned liberty, as coueting (so much as in them lay) to shunne the odious and infamous name of Tirants.

At what times they vsed to create a Dictator.

Dictator of the Plebeians.

Varro his opinion of the Dictator.

22 Such as were the Tribunes of the light Horse, in the Kinges time; the like (with the Dictators) were these other Maisters of the Horse. And as the Dictator had Iurisdiction ouer all the people; so had the Maister of the Horse ouer all the Souldiers. The first that was chosen into this place, was Spurius Cassius, created by Titus Largius, the first Dictator. To conclude, the Office of Maister of the Horse, was such with the Dictators, as (with Cæsar) was that of Præfectus Prætorium.

Maister of the Horse, and his office.

23 The occasion of creating Tribunes, was the deuision of the Common people with the Fathers, at Mount Sacer. For the Warre (on one side) being concluded with the Volscians, and (on the other side) with the Æqui, and with the Sabines; the Common people also hoping, that (by a promised Law) freedome should bee had from the burden of Vsury, and perceiuing (to their hurt) that the Fathers did but prolong the time: suddenly M. Valerius was created Dictator, to appease the popular sedition, and for ease of a most important warre. He hauing begun to intercede for the Common people, and finding both himselfe and them to be deceiued: hee renounced his Office, and went away from the people; who were not a little displeased, because the fathers thought, that the best way to quiet the peoples mindes (vnder colour of an Oath giuen them by the Consuls) was presently to lead them forth to Warre. The people taking the matter very ill, passed the Riuer Teueron, and went thence to Mount Sacer, which was three Miles distant from Rome. This bred such a terrour in the Fathers, not knowing how the Common-weale should be defended (being now destitute of all thinges necessary thereto) if Warre should be raised from any Neighbour Enemy: that they sent to them Menenius Agrippa, (a man dearely respected of the Fathers, and no lesse affected by the people) hee as an Ambassador, should comprenize this discontentment of the people. He speaking very gravely to them, induced the fable of the members, entring into conspiracy against the belly: which so highly pleased the people, that they consented to haue peace with the Fathers. But in the conditions of peace, they obtained; that there should be Magistrates of the Common people in the Citty. Whereupon ensued, that the Plebeians (from that time forward) were to haue two Tribunes in full authority, A. Virginius, and T. Vetusius then beeing Consuls.

The cause why Tribunes were created.

M. Valerius created Dictator, quickly renounceth his Office.

The people offended with the Fathers.

Menenius Agrippa is sent to the people.

Two Tribunes appointed of the common people.

Another time grew the like seperation, and then three Tribunnes more were added to the former two: Appius

Claudius, and C. Quintius, beeing Conſuls. Afterward, fiue other; in the Conſulſhip of M. Horatius Puluillus, and Q. Minutius: and ſo (in this manner) the Romaines came to haue tenne Tribunes.

Ten Tribunes in ful number, for confirmation of the Senate.

The authority of theſe men encreaſed in ſuch ſort, that whatſoeuer the Senate ordained, was of ſure ſtrength, if ſo be it were approued of the Tribunes. They ſtood at the entrance of the place, where the Senate were aſſembled (becauſe it was not lawfull for them to enter into the Temple) and thoſe matters deliberated by the Senatours, were committed to the Tribunes, to examine them. If they were for the good of the Common-wealth, they ſhould then ratifie them, changing, or adding whatſoeuer they pleaſed: and in ſigne that matters were confirmed by them, they ſhould ſet (vnder the writing) the Letter T.

The prerogatiue of the Tribunes.

But concerning the power of the Tribunes, if I might ſpeake at large thereof, I ſhould then alleadge the iudgment of Labeo Antiſtius, that excellent Lawyer, whoſe wordes are theſe, as I finde them ſet downe in Aulus Gellius. Wee reade (ſaith he) in a certaine Letter of Atteius Capito, that Labeo Antiſtius, was of great obſeruation, and very learned in the Lawes; yet was he extreamely enclined to liberty, and there-withall of ſuch courage; that D. Auguſtus beeing then Prince, nothing whatſoeuer was allowed to be firme or good, but what he found to be ſacred and iuſt in Romaine Antiquity.

Aul. Gellius ex Labeo Antiſt. Of Labeo Antiſtius the famous Lawier.

Afterward hee ſheweth, that the ſame Labeo, being called by a Commander of the peoples Tribune; ſent aunſwere by the ſame Commaunder, bidding him ſay thus to him that ſent him. Tell the Tribune, that hee hath no authority to call me, or any other: conſidering, that (accercording to the cuſtome of our Elders) the Tribune hath power to take, but not to call, or commaund. Wherefore, himſelfe ought to come, and then to giue commaund to him who ſhould be taken; otherwiſe, he hath no power to call an abſent man.

A bold anſwer ſent to the Tribune.

Aulus Gellius affirmeth, that the very ſame is written by Varro, in his Book of Humane things. This Varro, being one of the Triumutri, maintained; that hee was not to bee called by the Tribune of the people: And when he was Tribune, hee gaue no commaund that any Man ſhould be called. Matter of greateſt importance in the Tribune, was; that he went vp and downe (as a Mediator) in ſuites of Interceſſions, to prohibite, that no violence ſhould be done them by other Magiſtrates. His leaſt power alſo, was, in publiſhing the Lawes to the people, thoſe which were called Plebiſcita. In which Interceſſions, the authoritie of the Fathers making no interuention; they aſſigned ſuch Men as were ſent to the adminiſtration of the Prouinces, in ſtead of the Conſulles: as we may reade in Plutarch, in the Life of M. Cato, and eſpeciallie in the Tribune-time of P. Clodius. I finde alſo recorded, that when all the Tribunes were to agree vpon any matter, if one of them onely varried, and were diſcordant; he might doe more then all the reſt, and eaſily hinder any other that was contrary to him.

Varro in Lib. de Reb. Human. Of the Tribunes power and place.

Plutar. in vit. M. Cato.

24 I can finde no matter at all, concerning this Authoritie, vntill (vnhappilie) the Warre was made by the Romaines vppon the Æqui, which procured great terrour to the Citty. For the Conſull which remained at that time in Rome, for the better muſtering of Men together, and with the more ſpeede, onely to helpe his Fellow-Conſull, who was beſiedged: T. Quintius was created Vice-Conſull, Albus Poſthumius, and Spurius Furius beeing then Conſuls. And becauſe he was to be ſent in ſtead of a Conſull, he was (the rather) called Vice-Conſull. To him, and others in like place, all the enſignes of a Conſull was graunted, onely excepted, that but ſixe Lictors attended on him, in not vſing the ordinary iuriſdiction committed to the Conſull: albeit (not long after) theſe Vice-Conſuls beganne to haue equality in power and authority with the other. For the Confines of the Empire beginning to be enlarged; diuers charges in Warre were neceſſarily required. Whereuppon, it was concluded, that they which went foorth of the Conſulſhip at expiration of a yeare; ſhould bee Vice-Conſulles the yeare enſuing, and to them, by lots (deuiding the gouernments) all the Prouinces of the Empire were giuen in charge.

If the matter (peraduenture) were fiscall or penall, it better deserued reference to Cæsars Procuratour or Atturney. If he carried his Wife with him into his Prouince (which were better for him that he did not) hee might chastise her for any euill Act committed. And as he was not to refuse Royall presents giuen him; so ought he also, to obserue a certaine meane in receiuing them: because, as it were very inhumane to receiue none at all; so likewise it sauored of too much couetousnesse, to take all thinges whatsoeuer; but, beside presents sent in free guift, the Vice-Consull ought not to accept of any. Next, he might not buy any thing in one Prouince, to feede on in another. Hee ought not to treate, negotiate, or summarily define any cause, that had neede of further inquisition and examination. But if it concerned diligent enquire in some cases, as the obedience of Children to their Parentes, and (on the other side) what Children or Sonnes were to demaund of their Parents; such matters he might fully consult on, and define. He might also deale with free Seruants, that were ingratefull to their Maisters, or otherwise abused them; and commaund them to bee whipped, without councell of the Ciuill Doctor, or ordinary Iudge. He that wanted an Aduocate, eyther in regard of his pouerty, or powerfull oppression of his Aduersary: hee might, and ought to appoint him one, and take obseruation of the whole businesse, or any other of the like Nature (as in his owne right and lawfull authority) according as all other Magistrates had, to pardon or punish such delinquents. But because the flowing streame of daily occurrences, permitted not the Vice-Consull to attend all occasions: hee was suffered to haue his Legate, of whose office likewise we will speake somewhat briefely.

25 The Vice-Consuls, by the torrent of weighty affaires which continually came vpon them; vsed to send Legates into the Prouinces, who exercised iurisdiction, not as of themselues, or by their owne authority: but as it was committed to them by the Vice-Consuls; nor could they thus appoint them in their sted, except themselues had first bin in those Prouinces. If it happened, that any graue, waighty, or important matter came to the Legate, which required diligent care of the Iudge: the Legate ought to referre it to the Vice-Consull, because he had no authority to shed blood, nor punish by stripes. Neuertheless, he might giue iudgment in occasions of litigancy; and on such as had the tutelage of Orphanes. The vice-Consul vsed to ratifie arbitrated causes, and he might send no Legate, vntil himselfe were parted out of the Prouince. If peraduenture the Legate died in the Prouince; the Vice-Consull tooke the charge on him, as the Legate in his life time left it. And if the Vice-Consull, (vpon some earnest and important businesse) was to part from the Prouince: hee might referre any cause to the Legate, although it concerned the life of a Man.

26 I am of opinion, that the Ædilitas Plebei, was a very auncient kinde of Magistracy, and yet I make some doubt, whether the Ædiles were first created, before the Tribunes of the people. I remember, that (the Kings being expelled, and the separation of the people made at Mount Sacer) a great part of the Romaine people, remained a long time without any Magistrate in the Common-wealth, by whom it ought to bee defended. We read in Liuie, that not long after the Tribunes of the people were created, one of the Consuls dying in a Pestilence, and the other being grieuously sicke: the Ædiles of the people, tooke the charge of the Tribunes of the people on them, and the administration of the whole Common-wealth. Yet doe I not heereby inferre, that but (as then) their creation began; for it may be, that they were many yeares before. But the wealthinesse of the people encreased afterward in such manner, that out of their owne body or community, they yeilded Dictators and Bishoppes: yea, & many times (vniting themselues with the Fathers) they obtained of them, that two Ædiles of the people might be created.

ment for sollemne daies in the Kalender, both which were referred to their charge, they making deniall thereof: it is said, that the young Patritians challenged their aptnesse to such an Office, in honour of the Gods, and craued, that they might be made Ædiles. Their motion being no way misliked, but rather much commended: the Senatours concluded, that the Dictator should elect two Cittizen Patritians, who must be Ædiles; the Fathers and the Comitij, tearming themselues to bee Authours thereof. Whereupon were created two Patritian Ædiles, to wit; Cneus Quintius Capitolinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio. Last of all, there were two other created by Iulius Cæsar; who looking to the prouision of Corne, were therefore called Cereales. I finde among Authours, worthy of good credit, that the Ædiles receiued their name of Ædes; which signified a sacred Temple, and their charge was, to be carefull of Temples. And because they were created of the Patritians, they had the name also of Curules; because they were carried, either to the Pallace, or else where by Land, in Chariots or Litters. The Plebeians and the Curules are so wel knowne, that I thinke there needes no further report of their condition.

The two first Patritian Aediles.

How they tooke their name at first.

Concerning publicke Feasts.

The Ædiles appointed publique feasts to bee made, which was no small burthen: because it was ordained, that (according to their Dignity, and State of their Patrimony) such should bee their expences. Concerning this Order, Cicero giueth sufficient Testimony, in those Bookes which hee entitled De Officijs, where he makes mention of the time, when he himselfe was one of the Ædiles, and of Pompey the great. * Asconius Pædianus saith, that Pompey being created Ædilis, hauing (at his own cost) builded a maruailous rich Theater: beside the magnificent plaies which were there performed; would needs haue a sumptuous Chariot also, drawne by diuers Elephants. Whereby may further be gathered, that the Ædiles were at the charge of the feasts, & of the arguments of the Comedies; because they carried name of those Ædiles, vnder whose authority they were made and acted. The Ædiles appointed the places for all men to sit in, with due obseruation of their quality and degrees. Valerius Maximus writeth, that Attilius Seranus, and Lucius Scribonius, being Ediles, were the first, that (in sitting) diuided the Senate from the Plebeians. If a Buyer were deceiued by a Seller, in deliuering him a sicke or weake Beast, for a sound; his helpe was had by the Ædiles. They likewise had especiall care, that the Conduits for Water should be kept very cleane, and all other buildings neat and sweete. Finally, if bad things were sold in the markets, vnder the name of good; and rotten or corrupt wares, in stead of honest sufficiency: it appertained to the Ædiles to controule.

27 It was not lawfull for the Magistrates of the Common-weale, to take away the regiment of the ten men, who are said to be created on this occasion. The common people being daily mooued with new tumults, by electing Magistrates among themselues, to make lawes for freedome from oppression of Vsury; to contract marriages with the Fathers, and for confirmation of their owne possessions: by these means, matters (both diuine and humane) grew to an ouerthrow; and then, nothing was more desired then Common Lawes, to the end, there might be no lurking corner for enuy; which made them conclude, to deriue (from some place else) lawes for the Citty. Hereupon, three Ambassadors were sent to Athens, who should bring thence the written Lawes of Solon, hauing first well obserued the Customes and vsage of other Nations. The Ambassadours were these; Spurius Posthumius Albus, Aulus Manilius, and Publius Sulpitius Camerinus. These three men, three yeares after their departure from Rome; returned thither againe, and bringing with them the written Lawes: which Lawes, in regard they were to bee more fully perused, exemplified, & accommodated to their vse, there were ten men created by the Comitij of Centuries, to ouer-see them for the Common-weales benefit. The ten men were these; Appius Claudius, T. Genutius, P. Cæsius, L. Veturius, C. Iulius, Aulus Manlius, P. Sulpitius, P. Curiatius, T. Romulius, and Spurius Post-humius; from whose iudgement and censure of the Lawes, no man whatsoeuer should any way appeale.

Ten Tables made for the Lawes, that the people might aproue them.

This yeare (therefore) they made ten Tables, and publiſhed them openly, to the end, that the Lawes might bee heard of all the people, with authoritie giuen them: that they might amend, Correct, interpret, and deliuer their opinions; promiſing to be patient in attention, vvhile they were fully read and herd. After they had bin ſufficiently peruſed, they were ſet downe in writing for continuance, openly manifeſted, and the former Magiſtrate quite diſplaced. But a certaine conceit riſing among thē, that if two Tables more were added to them, the Romaine Lawes (thereby) would bee made moſt perfect: Heereupon, the Comitij were called together againe, euen in the former place of meeting; and there, other ten men wer anew created. Then Appius Claudius, to whome the charge of aſſembling the Counſell was committed, contrary to his duty, and againſt the forme of all good vſe: nominated himſelfe for one of the ten, calling theſe alſo to bee his Colleagues, Cornelius Maluginenſis, M. Sergius, L. Minutius, Quintus Fabius Vipulanus, Q. Petilius, Titus Antonius Merenda, Cæſius Dulius, Spurius Opius Corniceus, and M. Rabuleius. Theſe men, being verie deſirous to ouer-rule and commaund, made their appearance (the 15. day of May) in the Market place, with twelue Axes each man borne before him, interpreting the ſame to be a matter of the leſſe moment, becauſe they were created without apeale or prouocation. It is ſaid that at their firſt comming into the peoples preſence, they ſeemed as if they had bin ten Kings. And it is a matter (almoſt) exceeding beleefe, what a publicke feare this forme of behauiour bred in the Citty, wherein they were not much deceiued, nor their ſuſpition cauſleſſe.

Two Tables more to be added to the ten.

The ten men appear before the people.

They began to waxe cruell, and libidinous againſt the people. There vvas no matter heard or handled amongſt them, but it paſt rather by fauour and reſpect, then any Reaſon, Iuſtice, or Equity. They concluded together, that what matter ſoeuer they pronounced in publick, or elſe intended to do; if any man appeald from any one of the Confederates to another: he parted from him with ſuch ſatisfaction as he had bin better not to haue appealed from the former. It was a generall opinion, that they had agreed amongſt themſelues, and confirmed it by oath, neuer to ceaſſe this kind of Counſel, but perpetually to hold this Order of Magiſtracie, with Dominion ouer all the Empire. Vnder this condition paſſed the greater part of the yeare; and vntill the two Tables were added to the ten, there was nothing elſe current, but what paſſed by publication of the Centuriata & Comitij. Matters fadging thus, the yeare being ſpent, and no other tidinges heard from the Counſel: the people (not a litle lamenting their loſſe of liberty) began to mutiny, & moue a tumult. Inſomuch, that newes came, how the Sabines and Equi raiſed warre againſt Rome. Hauing pondered heereon awhile, the ten men aſſembled the people, and ſelecting an Army out of them, went to the Warre. While there they fought with variable fortunes, Appius Claudius, one of the ten, who remayned behind for gouernment of the Cittie, became inamored on a Plebeian Virgin, and practiſed (by what meanes hee might) to enioy her company.

The pride and inſolence of the ten men vnto the people.

The Sabines & the Equi menace warre againſt Rome.

The Father of the yong Maiden, whoſe name was Lucius Virginius, being abſent from Rome at the warre, where hee had a place equall to his worth and merite; had formerly affianced his daughter to a yong Gentleman, named Icilius, one of the Tribunitij. Appius tempting the Virgin with entreats and promiſes, yet no way preuailing to gaine his intent: altered his purpoſe to pride and cruelty, and complotted with one M. Claudius, an intimate friend of his, that as he ſat in his Tribunal to liſten cauſes: M. Claudius ſhould ſteppe forth, and challenging the Damoſell to be his ſlaue, to demand her in iuſtice, and he himſelfe would puniſh al them ſeuerely, that durſt take on them to approoue her freedome. This luſtfull wretch, taking aduantage of apt opportunitie, M. Claudius had ſeized the Virgin, as ſhe paſt ouer the Market place, calling hir his ſlaue-ſeruant, and the daughter of a ſlaue: commanding her to follow him, and offering to carry her away violently, if ſhe made any reſiſtance.

The compact betweene Appius and M. Claudius.

The Damoſell (hauing no other company then her Nurſe) cried out for aſsiſtance, becauſe there were many by, to defend her ſtom Claudius. But he told them, that they preſumed ouer-raſhly vpon his right, there was neither time or place (as then) for tumults. But if they miſtruſted what he had ſaid, he entreated them to go with with him to immediate iudgement. Appius sitting ready to entertaine the busines, demanded of Claudius, the reason of his disquiet, whereto he thus answered. This Maiden (quoth he) was borne in my house, and of a slaue my Seruant: some while after he was stolne from me, and (vnder the name of daughter) conueyed to the house of Lucius Virginius, where euer since she hath forcibly bin kept from me. But hauing now seized her in mine owne right; I craue that she may be sentenced, & that she may part hence with hir maister, or else you deserue not the place of a Iudg. Appius perceiuing so good a beginning, to the end it might not appeare, that he was rash in censure before examination; he caused the Maidens defenders to be called, who alledged, that it was a very vniust proceeding, to call the Virgin in question, her Father being absent about the Common-wealths affairs. Adding other cases of like moment, the young Gentleman Icilius (troth-plighted Husband to Virginia) and Numidius his Grand-father, came before the iudgment seat. Icilius making a great stir and noise, vsing words likewise very neglect & carelesly, as being of bold and vndanted courage: command was giuen him by a Lictor (by Commission deliuered from Appius) presently for to make his departure thence. But he resisting, imboldned by a resolued spirit, and the goodnesse of his cause, a great multitude of Romaines also being there assembled: Appius, to auoide any nouell accident, which might rise frō the people, caused him to giue securitie, that Virginia (the day following) should bee presented againe in iudgment. These ill-pleasing Newes were soone carried to her Father, who needed no other Spurre to hast him to Rome; where hee himselfe brought his daughter (accompanied with manie worthy Matrons) the next day before the Iudgement seate. With teares and humble intreats, the graue Olde Father desired to haue Iustice; and that the whole case might be publickly discussed; the like did Icilius and mournful Virginia, assisted by the voices of all the other Ladies.

But Appius, whose heat of lust admitted no reason, despising all their woful lamentations; mounted vp to his tribunall, where he gaue sentence, that Virginia was the Bond-slaue to Claudius. This Iudgement filled all the hearers with admiration; and Claudius offering to lay hand on the Maiden, with intent to carry her presently thence: her wofull Father stepped betweene him and the Iudge, and (with abundance of teares trickling downe his White Beard) vttered foorth these speeches:

Heare (O you Romaines) that I haue espoused my Daughter to Icilius, and not to thee Appius. I bred and brought her vp, that she might go vvith a virgins honor to marriage, and not to libidinous rape or deflouring. But if (in a Fathers true affection) my words may seeme offensiue to thee; pardon me, that in thy presence, and before hir face, I may demand of hir nurse, whither she know me to be Virginias father or no, that truth being acknowledged, I may part hence with the more contented minde. Then stepping to his Daughter, as if he intended to aske her some priuate question; he drew forth a Knife (which he had purposely hid) and there slew his Daughter, rather then she should be dishonored. The people amazed at this admirable resolution, gaue so loud a cry, that it drewe more people in multitudes thither; and Appius perceiuing a strange tumult toward, to secure his life, musled his face closely, that he might not be knowne in his escape thence. The people taking addantage of this occasion, for their recouery of the City; forthwith entred into Armes, and chose wronged Virginius to be their Commander: parting away presently to mount Auentine. Icilius (on the otherside) drew hon[illegible] his Fathers power of Souldiours; and in example of the Plebeians, tenne Militarie Tribunes were immediately created, who (accompanying the other Army) came in verie powerfull manner vnto Rome, forsaking Friends, Wiues, and Children, now to redeem the liberty of their wronged countrey.

The ten men, not a little confounded with this sudden alteration; made hast to assemble the Senate, and consult what might be done for safety of the Cōmonwealth. At length, after many and sundry determinations, with very bold reprehensions (by the Senators) giuen to the Ten men, calling them as many Tarquins: the Tenne were gladde and faine to submit themselues vnto the power of the fathers, so they might bee freed from publicke Iniuries, and all other doubted Daungers. bassadors should be sent to compound & quiet this great disorder. Heerupon, M. Horatius, and Lucius valerius, good men, and of great authority, were sent to deale with the people about the conditions of peace. The people demaunded (in their peace-conditions) that the ten men might bee punished according vnto their deseruings: but by faire and gentle language in the Ambassadors, such seuerity was mittigated. They were therefore contented, that their wonted Tribunes should be restored to them againe, and the gouernement returne (as formerly it had done) to the dignity of Consuls. By this means, the ten men renounced their Authority, and the Comitij were warned fot creation of the Consuls and Tribunes. Thus by this new ordination, the ten mens power was suppressed, and the State came vnto hir woonted honourable kinde of Gouernement.

The Præfect appointed for the prouision of Corne.

28. Because wee are discoursing on Offices of authority, I hold it reasonable, that we should say somwhat of the Præfect for Corne, who (in these times) was created out of the woonted order. I find nothing concerning this Magistrate, but that hee was vnder the Consulship of Appius Claudius, and P. Seruilius, which was the very same yeare, when Tarquinius Superbus died, neare to Aristodemus the Tirant. It is saide, that about this time, a contention hapned between the Consuls about dedication of the temple of Mercury, which finally was concluded with this condition; that he who should dedicate the Temple of Mercury, shold likewise be appointed for prouision of Corne. The people gaue the dedication to M. Pletorius, Captaine of the chiefe Squadron, not in regard that he deserud it, but as a shame and disgrace to the Consuls, for not carrying themselues vprightly in their Consulship. But not finding this matter so apparant in Liuie, I am induced to thinke, that it was their error, who tooke vppon them to write so manifestly; because I find, that not long after, L. Minutius was made Præfect for Corne. This office was very expedient in hard times, when Corn wanted, and men sold it very deare. It was his charge to procure Corn from all neighboring parts; and he might command any man (who had more then fitted for his owne House and family) to bring it forth to publick sale (how farre soeuer it were off) and to set a price thereon. By meanes of this Magistrate, the people of Rome (being many times in great want of Corne) had present helpe. Pompey the Great, hauing the same authority, & the same Magistracy, as we now speak of, setting forth from Sicilie, with a great quantity of Corne intended for Rome, the Mariners told him, that it was not good for them to put to Sea in a tempest or storm. Whereto, it is said (in his Countries behalfe) he returned this answere. It is good and necessary to saile, but it is not necessarie to liue. The care for Corne (afterwardes) grew into such fauour and authority, that all such persons as were not thoght meet, nor admitted to accuse in any other case: yet in this onely they had free admision, yea, though they were Strumpets (most infamous) and such like persons.

The Præfects power.

29 Through many deuisions of the Fathers, made with the people, who had demanded of them, that (out of their own condition) they might create Consuls, & yet by reason of the wars abroad, the people made no administration thereof: they were faine still to supply the Fathers with men, and giue way aswell to enemies far off, as to contentious Cittizens at home. The first discordancy among the Fathers, was in them, who supposed, that if the Tribunes were created of the Common people; it should be but vnder bare pretence of agreement. Whereby ensued, that matters were so caried, as (by the request of Camillus) the Fathers permitted Tribunes to be created, who should be in the sted of Consuls; aswell of the Plebeians, as of the Fathers indifferently, not altering any thing from the Consuls. Then were created three Tribunes of the Consuls authority, whom they called Military, & these were ordained by diuers numbers. Somtimes they were twenty; otherwhiles more, and then againe lesse. But the first three of all, were these; A. Sempronius Amacinus, L. Attilius, and C. Cecilius, all Patrittians; and the people were contented, because it seemed, that their owne desires were obtained. At that time also, some came from the Consulship, to be Military Tribunes, yet of Consull-power: as when M. Genutius and P. Horatius left their Consuls Office. And next to this Magistracy, was that (the name whereof is not expressed) wherein they were in like authority as the Consuls had; chaun-

The Office of the Censors.

30. Many yeares were past in multiplicity of warres, and among ciuill dissentions at home; al which time, the people of Rome were not burdened with Tributes, paiments, taxations, or the Lustrū; which was the Collection of Toll or custome euery fifth yeare, and purging the Citty by Sacrifices, acording to the ancient manner. For this waighty burden was not laid on the Consuls, who vnder-went the many important occasions of warre: but was recorded by the Senatours, who thoght fit to create a Magistrate for matters of waight, and yet not appertaining to the Cousuls place, to which Magistrate should be giuen the charge of the Notaries, of the Prisons, of the Bookes, of the Tables, of the Lawes, and of the Taxations.

The creation of the two first Censors.

Heereupon, and on better consideration, they created two Censors, Papyrius and Sempronius, and in regard of the Tribute-collections, they were termed Censors: M. Geganius Macerinus, & T. Quintius Capitolinus being then Consuls. It was also ordained, that this Office or Magistracy should continue for fiue years. But this long limitation was afterward altred, in regarde of the Censors insolence; and reduced to one man only, named Mamertius Æmilius, Dictator, in the Consullship of Iulius Virgilius, and M. Appius. It is wonderfull to consider, how much this preheminence increased in power, being raised out of so weak an Original. It grew to such height, as (in this authority only) consisted the Customes, the Romain Discipline, the Senate, the gouerning of the Caualery, the Iurisdiction of priuate occasions, and the taxing of the publick places and people in Rome: Alledging in the Senate, electing the Princes of the Senat, gathering the Subsidies, celebrating the fiue yeares Sacrifices, adding good men to the Senate, and commaunding such thence, as were thought vnworthy in his iudgement.

One Censor alone, and not two.

His great power & authority.

Remouing Senators frō the Senate.

I finde, that Caius Fabricius, beeing made Censor, he remooued P. Cornelius Ruffinus, a Patritian, from the Senat, because he had spent at one dinner at his table, ten pound in mony. Marcus Cato also did put from the Senate, the Brother of C. Flaminius, because (beeing entreated thereto by a Strumpet) he commanded a prisoners head to be cut off, he being (at that time) Vice-Consull in Gallia. What shall I say of the consuetudes of the Censors, in their aduertisements about all other occasions? Such as were corpulent and well-fed Souldiers, from them they would take both Horse and Armour, to the end they might the better breath thē selus. And if any delighted in sweet smels, or curious apparrell, they accounted it in them as a note of infamy, and therefore remoued them from the army.

The Censors managing of ordinarie occasions.

A Roman Caualiero (costly and delicate in Garments, but riding on a Leane and meager lade, so thinne and ouer-statued, that his bones might easily be counted thorough his hide) chanced to meete the Censors vpon the way. They demanded of him, how he came so neatly polished in attire, his countenance ruddy, and of so good complexion, and yet his horse so euill-fauoured and vnsightly? Whereto he answered; I my selfe haue care of my Cloaths and diet, but my seruant only looketh to my Horse. The Censors well regarding both him and his aunswere, without anie shew of humanity or reuerence, did leaue him to his own vanity, worthily condemned of notorious infamy.

Of a Romain Gallant, and his horse.

They obserued likewise another man, who was a Citizen, that vsed to yawne or gape very much, especially in those places, where they sat and gaue audience to serious affaires, and he did it with a very irkesome and vnseemly noise: but when they vnderstoode, that want of modesty was not the cause, but meere weakenesse and infirmity; they cancelled him out of their note of Taxation, requiring onely his absence from such place and occasions.

Of an vnwise Cittizen, that had an offensiue infirmity.

When the Censors went into such places where Weddings wer celebrated, and (according to their custome) demanded of the young men, if they tooke their Wiues with their owne free liking and ful contentment, or no: If they made answere, that they accepted the marriage, because their Parents so commaunded; their company was thence-forward despised, and themselues set downe in the Kalender of infamy. Because they held opinion, that it was much vnfitting for the Maiesty they presented, in open sight of their Censoriall seuerity, that an vnmanly, foolish, or ridiculous answere should be made to them. Many other such matters

Of celebration of Marriages, by their owne liking, or commaund of Parents.

ters might be spoken of; but concerning this argument, these may bee sufficient. Only I may not omit, that they helde it somwhat religiously, when one of the two Censors died, the other was sufficient to serue, both in his owne place, and for him that was dead. I know not how this fauor was admitted, but this I am sure of, that it was (not long after) apointed: that the one Censor dying, the other shoulde renounce his Office, and two other men be newly created.

A Censor dying, the surviuer to serue the place of both.

A reason deriued from the Gaules, concerning the Censors.

The cause of this obseruation was thus. In those parts where the Gaules surprized the City, one of the Censors being dead, the other was substituted in his stedde, which seemed to the Romains to be a sign of an euil Augury; whereupon, it was set downe as a perpetuall Law, that such succession should neuer more bee admitted. It was then vnlawfull to create any Censors, but onely of the Fathers: yet this grew (euen as all things else) to an alteration; and then the election fell to bee indifferent. The Censors also had authority, that they should limit the taking of Vsury.

Of three men to conduct the Colonies.

31 The Arcini, and the Ardeati, hauing had many and continuall fights together on their Confines, waxing at the length weary of warre (in regard of great slaughters and ruins made on both sides) committed their cause of contention to the Roman people, and made them Iudges of either's quarrell. Ambassadors being sent from each City to intreat this fauour, a Counsel was called, & (from the Magistrates) the case was referred to the people, whereon there grew verie greeuous contention. For three men beeing choosen to vnder-goe the charge of the whole businesse; P. Scaptius, a Plebeian, aged in yeares, rose vp and said: Consuls, if it be lawfull to talke concerning the Common-wealth; I cannot endure; neither will I, that the people shoulde erre in this matter. But the Consulles laughing (as at a man that doted) would no further heare him. Hee grieuing, and much displeased, that such a publicke cause should be betrayed and smothered; was (by commaund) remoued thence by one of the Lictors. He appealed from them to the Tribunes, and being brought before them, he began in this manner: I want not one day of ninetie three yeares old, and I do very well remember, that those Fieldes for which these two people contend thus together; belonged neyther to the one or other, but to Coriolanus; for I (at that time) was a warre-fellow with him. Coriolanus taking these fields by fortune of the warre, they fell (by that meanes) to the people of Rome. In which regard (methinks) plain truth should perswade the people, not to deceiue themselues in a case so apparant.

The wordes of P. Scaptius, in the Counsell.

His appeale and words before the Tribunes.

The granity and authority of the man, moued not so much, as the vse and commodity of the fields, and so highly preuailed the power of the Tribunes, that this cause appearing in this forme to the people; a Law was forthwith made, whereby the Fieldes were interessed to the people of Rome. This act greatly blemished the Maiesty and reputation of the Romaine Common-wealth; and the Romains were much blamed and reproued of their neighboring people, and of the Citties confining with them. The Fathers hadde no great liking of the matter, and not long after, a case of high iudgement hapning vnto the Ardeati, against the Volscians in their aide, beeing earnestly desirous also to cancel such an infamous sentence, they grew to this deliberation. In regarde that the Citty of Ardea (by ciuill warre) was reduced into the hand of a few, and consisted but of a few inhabitants, they must be written for a Colony, or sent (for present helpe) against the Volscians. This conclusion being told to the people, & pleasing them (much better) to bee Written downe Rutilians, then Romaines: the Ardeati were iudged to bee the chiefe, because their fields (at the first) had bin gorten by so infamous a iudgement. Then were three men elected to conduct these Colonies, to wit; Agrippa Menenius, T. Ciuilius Succulus, and M. Flutius Elus. I denie not, but that this Office or authority might consist of greater personnes, because it had so high and notable a beginning. It appertained to this place, to deuide the field to new Colonies, to designe the Citty, and appoint conuenient places for buildinges, to distinguish it also into wards & streets, ordaining & composing the Common-weale, in forme of an excellent, especiall, and well ordered Tabernacle.

While two sides contend a third (beyond expectation) preuaileth.

32 By continuall ciuill warres and dissentions, the Fathers being ouercome by the people; and hauing granted them, that one of the Consuls should bee created

Of the Praetors, and their authority.

ted of the Plebeians, they reserued onely this open way to the Consulship, and afforded the people that they might create one only Magistrate of the Fathers, and cause him to be called an appointed Prætor; whereof a reason being rendered to them of the land, they termed him Vrbanus, of Vrbs, which was the Citty. Afterward, such was the Authority of this Magistrate, that in euery priuat and publick iurisdiction, hee had the power to erect new Lawes, and to take away the olde. Last of all, his prerogatiue so largely extended, that whatsoeuer the Prætor commanded, in honour of him, was called an honourable Law. All the regall Ensignes were graunted to the Prætor, and almost all the Consuls adornments; but yet, no more then sixe Lictors, and the seat called Curulis, with euery other thing to them appertaining.

Power to make newe Lawes, and deface the olde.

The Regall Ensigns giuen to the Prætor.

Now, albeit the Prætors vsed but sixe Lictors, yet I finde in Plutarch, that Paulus Æmilius, Prætor, going into Hiberia, had twelue Lictors afforded him. The Prætors rode on White Horses, wearing likewise white Garments, and the Roman Footmen going by their Stirrops, were all apparrelled in white also, as Iuuenall affirmeth.

At length, an infinite number of strangers comming to Rome from all partes; and one Prætor seeming not to be sufficient for the multitude of businesse daily insuing, another Prætor was created, who was called the Pilgrim, because he heard the causes of Pilgrims and Strangers. But the Monarchy greatly increasing, the nũber of them likewise so inlarged, that somtimes there were eighteene Prætors, for the dispatch of occasions. And because it was thought inconuenient that Magistrates themselues should be seene publickly in the Night time, fiue men were apointed, who dwelt on each side the Riuer of Tiber, to execute the Office to such Magistrates belonging. But after the surprizall of Sardignia, Scicilia, Spaine, and the Narbone Prouince, there were so manie Prætors created, as Prouinces had beene taken, to the end, that some might attend the affaires of the Citty; and others also, apply the Prouinces businesses. Within a while after, Cornelius Sylla, added publicke tortures for Forgers of Writinges, Parricides, and impoysoners, and added foure Prætors also. Caius Iulius Cæsar, appointed two Prætors, and two Ædiles, who were to haue charge for the prouision of Corne, and (of Ceres) they were called Cereali; so that then there were twelue Prætors, and six Ædiles. Afterwardes, D. Augustus made vp the number of sixteen Prætors; and Claudius sought to haue added two more; but Tiberius placed one, and D. Nerua another, to render a faithful reason of the trust committed to them concerning the Treasuries priuat & publicke. And thus the number of eighteene Prætors was completed for gouernment in the City. All these things also they obserued, when they (as Magistrates) were in Rome: but when they went forth on anie voyage, there remained but one only for the businesse, and he was then called the Præfect of the Citty, which Præfect they before ordained.

Another Præfect was afterward induced, tearmed of the Latines Feriæ, who was created yearely, the other Magistrats being absent, for they then being superintendents of the warres, vsed to permit others into their iurisdictions, except the Præfect of the Land, who continued in the Citty onely.

3. Thorough the disastrous Fortunes of warre, vsury being buried, as it were, and the Roman people quite vndon, by great summes of debts, the Princes of the people likewise many times attempting to remedy such an vnsupportable difficulty: at length, all their minds inclined to concorde, and they (who were then Consuls) concurring heerein, referred the paiment of their debtes, to publicke care.

Of Fiue men called Dispensators or Stewards.

There were therefore elected fiue men, who by their dispensing and dealing with Monies, were termed Mensarij, Bankers, or Mony-changers. The notable Equitie, and great diligence vsed by them, deserued worthily, that their names should be honoured in all their Annalles. The men were these, C. Duellius, P. Decimus, M. Papyrius, Quintus Pompilius, and T. Æmilius, who dealing in so waightie and important matters, supplied (euermore) both the one and others part, with much modesty, and little iniury. And such was their care and hourely respect, as not only they auoided offence to any person, but likewise could no way be complained on, which was wonderful in discharging such a multiplicity of debts.

34. Iulius Cæsar, being slain in the Senate house by them that accompanied Cassius and Brutus, and it appearing, that Anthony (by all his endeauour) sought to sway the whole State, and becom Prince of the City: proceeding on in his ambitious thirst of rule, hee trod downe Cicero, Brutus, & all the rest of that faction, that were contrary to him, & compelled them to forsake Rome. But Octauianus (who had bin set downe as heire in Cæsars wil) being returned from Asia: Citero, and all other of that faction, ran to ioyne with his power. Whereon ensued, that Anthony being constrained to leaue Rome, was adiudged by the Senat as an enimy, and (for his vtter ouerthrow) Hirtius and Pansa (being Consuls, were sent forth, as also Augustus with his followers, who neere to Modena put him to flight. Anthony being thē in a very desperat condition in most humble maner made his recourse to Lepidus. Being then wel backt by his countenance and power, they inforced Octauianus, who aspired to the dignity, to make a league with them: by which combination, many murders were concluded, & multitude of great persons proscribed to death: Among whom, Cæsar granted Cicero to M. Anthony, by L. Cæsar, Vnkle to the said M. Anthony. These men (vnder pretext of pious Magistrats) excercised that bloudy tirany, which was called the Triumvirat, or office of three men, for gouernment of the commonwealth. But in short while, their intention was apparantly discouered, hauing brought al occasions (both diuine & humaine) into a hurly burly: for hauing consumed both their own & others treasures, with all their vttermost abilities; at length, Cæsar got the vpper hand, and being alone in authority, vpheld the Triumvirat for some ten yeares, as we may read in Suetonius Tranquillus.

35 Such as wer the Tribunes of the light horse for the King, or the Maister of the horse for the Dictator; euen such (about Cæsar) were the Præfects Prætorij. They, with Cæsar held the second place, and (as Lieutenants) corrected publick discipline. In such sort increased their authority (hauing at first but a simple beginning) that for a certain time, it was lawfull to appeal from the Præfectus Prætorius; but yet the order how the appeale ought to be done, was by censure of the Prince, in granting the appeal from so great a Magistrat. For the Prince held opinion, that such men as attained to this dignity, by their discreete and singular industry (carying due respect of his supreame power) should giue iudgment as if it had bin pronounced by himself. This authority had another priuiledg, that such of yongest yeares, being sentenced by the Præfect, could haue no excuse or defence from all the other Magistrats.

36 I find, that there was another kinde of Magistracy, for hearing of matters in the City of Rome. For the burden of warbusinesses being remoued from the other Magistrats to the Prætor only: there were ten men created for hearing of matters, holding the places of Prætors, al the while that the other remained abroad, and they were called Magistrats or Iudges of contentions. It is said also, that at the same time, foure other men were elected, who had the charge (as Surueyers) of the highwaies. And three other beside, for care of gold & siluer, atending on the coinage of the Monies, and matters in the Mints.

37 The famous Augustus, reputing that publick welfare and safety appertained to no one person more then to himselfe, ordained seuen troops or squadrons of men in the most needfull places of the City, to the end, that (with all expedition) they might quench fires, or any harms that by fire should happen. And it was ordered, that euery two Regions or Wards of the City, might commodiously be defended by one squadron onely; the Tribunes being chiefe of the troops, and yet aboue al, the Præfect of the Guard or Watch. And albeit (amongst the ancient Romanes) this charge was committed to three Officers for the night, vnto the Ædiles, and to the Tribunes: yet notwithstanding, there happning (in one day) more mis-haps by Fire, then they (appointed for that purpose) could haue care of, as necessity required; Cæsar Augustus thoght it very expedient, that a Præfect of the Watch or Guarde should be created. All occasions then concerning fires, thefts, and rapes, were dealt withall before the Præfect; except eyther the delinquents personnes were so stubborn, or the facts so famous, that they required reference to the Cities Præfect.

ons, if they escaped whipping. If any breach or decay appeared in such part of the house, where the Father of the family kept his thinges of most respect, eyther for housholde seruice, or benefit of the wars abroad: the case was discussed and sentenced before this Magistrate. For so wrote D. Augustus, to Erictheus his beloued Præfect, saying; If Garners or Granaries be rotten or wasted, it pertaineth to thy care to see them amended. Moreouer, it belonged to the Præfect of the watch or Guard, to haue his officers watch the greater part of the night; and beeing armed, and lighted Lanthornes caried with them; to walke all about the streets of the City, remēbring the people in their houses, to bee carefull of their Candles and fires. They commanded likewise, that euery one shold haue water ready in their houses; that if any such casualty hapned, it might the quicklier be remedied.

Great care to preuent fires.

3. We had like to haue omitted two Officers (whose charge was to order, settle, and place the Armies) thinking their imployment not to bee of any great importance; but seeing Liuy hath recorded them, we may not silently slip them. In the yeare when Appius Claudius (who afterward was sur-named blind) was Censor, M. Valerius, and Publius Decius being Consuls, two offices then began by the peoples gift (as T. Liuy saith) both of them appertaining to the Commonweal. One, which (by the Tribunes of the Souldiors) was created in the 4. Legions; and being a little before left, fell as a benefite to the Dictator & Consuls. These places by the Tribune of the people, was giuen to Attilius, and C. Martius. The other, was an ordination of two men by the same people, to restore, order, and settle the Armies by sea, & referd to the deliberation of M. Decius Tribune of the people. Not long after these publick fauors, 2. men were selected forth for night occasions; to whom (as I gather by some obseruations) in the difficult times of war and ciuil dissentions, the charge of the wals was cōmitted in trust, and a Guard for ouer-seeing the soldiers. It was also referd to their fidelity, to preuent all tumults in the night; all idle walking and talking, and that the City might be in absolut quiet. Finally, the seueral duties of such a Magistrate, were granted to the Præfect, termed de Concordia. The very names of these Magistrats, did declare their offices; and Liuy, the Authour of these matters, speaketh thē no further, nor find I other mention made of them.

39 It remaineth now in this last place, to speak somwhat of Cæsars aduocats or Atturnies, who was Iudge between Cæsar & the people of Rome, albeit custome induced, that soueraign greatnes (from whom proceeded the lawes, decrees of the whol Senat, and of the Magistrates) should not be subiected to law, whereof himself was head and president. And because it exceeded possibility to find a greater person thē the Emperor, that might in his priuat cases, and other mens actions, yeild a direct proceeding, without the Prince himself, to sit as Iudge in his own proper cause: it was therefore determined, that a Magistrate should be created, who (betweene Cæsar, and a priuate person) might sit in iudgment, and to be called Cæsars Procurator or Atturny. To this Magistrate was granted license, that whatsoeuer hee dealt in of the Imperiall affaires, was as firmely ratified, as if it had bin done by Cæsar him self. But if the Atturny alienated any thing belonging to the Emp. as if it wer properly his own, it was not therefore to be iudged, that the Emp himself had made such an alienation; but it was firmely aliened, whē Cæsars consent gaue testimony therof. If he bought or sold, dealt in Donations or bargains, they were not good; because his charge was not to estrange any thing of the Emperours, but to execute Cæsars busines diligently. Principally, he was to be carefull, that if a seruant of Cæsars was ordinary heire in any Will; hee shold command his succesion in that inheritance, & boldly do it in Cæsars name; because such matters as a slaue atained to was by the means of his maister. But if he were Cæsars heire, and the Atturny made mixture of a richer inheritaunce then his right; he was then no heire of the Emperors. But if the goods fell to Cæsar, which could not easily bee found: the Atturney ought to preuent the Emp losse, by diligent inquisition of the will, and due examination of euer party. Thus haue we sufficiently discourse of Cæsars Procurator, and al the other Roman Magistrats, from the beginning, to the time of noble Cæsar Augustus. The name of President was general, because the Vice-Consuls, Legates of Cæsar, and al the Rectors, gouerning Prouinces (as the Senators) were called Presidents.

CHAP. II.

Of Rome in her Moderne and later estate, since the Pope name to keepe his Court there, with his Cardinals, and other assistant Officers, &c.

Ou haue seene Rome in hir Infancy and first original, so farre as we could go by our best obseruations. We come now to speak of hir, in another kind of nature, since the Apostolicke See grew to be planted ther, and hir gouernment fell into the Popes preheminence. The authority of the pope, he being the chiefe, dispersed it selfe into so many members, that his Courtiers & followers grew into multiplicity of yeares, before they could well vnderstande that forme of gouernment; yet I will bestowe my pains to discouer the same fully, & as briefly as may be. First of all, there is the most holy and Apostolical Senat of Cardinals, whose head is the chiefe Priest, & therefore called Maximus, and the Cardinals are his members: of whom, though in our times there is no definite number; yet I find, that in elder times there were but twelue, after the example of the Apostles. These honorable Fathers vsed formerly, to come altogither (twice in the week) to visit the Pope: but in later daies, important affaires & busines being scanted, they meet once togither only; & this meeting is vulgarly termed in the Consistory, of the word Consistere, which is as much to say, as being togither: because on the day of their assembly, they stande firmly togither, for publick negotiations. In this Senat are appointed and ordained such as are elected to Bishoppricks, Archbyshoppricks, to Metropolitane and Patriarchall churches; when such places are vacant; the election of which men, belongeth to the Chapter, City, Prouince, king, or some other person: or otherwise they are elected by the Pope, and this his Sacred Senate, to whom (by a reserued Custome of al the Popes) this office properly is said to appertaine. Which reseruation, was woont also to extend to certaine Monasteries, which wer found to be taxed in the bookes of the Chamber, and in this sacred Senate were either to be granted, or recommended to apt & sufficient persons; and therfore those Monasteries were cald Consistoriall, because no other disposition was made of them, but by meanes of the Consistory.

In this place, they discourse on all matters which appertained to Diuine Reuerence, Faith, Religion, and peace of the Christian flocke, also for presentation of temporal patrimonies giuē to the church of Rome. In this Senate (as being the greatest in al the world) al Prouinces, all Iurisdictions, and all Kings were faide to haue their defensiue Fathers, whom they tearmed Protectors: whose charge then was, to propound the election, and other occasions of their Prouinces in the sacred Senat. He that propoundeth the case, ought to hear (in the election) al contradictions if any hapned, and to seeke out of many, for the fittest person to bee elected, or to take order for the Church vacant, with al things necessary to the said Church, performing the same by way of testimonie. Which inquisition or search, was vulgarly called, proceeding by Processe; wherein all things were orderly set downe, and recited at large by the propounder, he hauing first made his purposed preamble to the sacred Senat. Then was he to vnderstand the Senats answer, which (according to order) was subscribed, and sealed, and vnder-written, the Apostolicall answere. This answere, by such as gaue attendance for it, was presented to the Vice-chancellor, who framed another Schedule in his name; whereby he faithfully signified to the Officials in all places, that had charge of expedition, what belonged to them to see immediately performed. The relation thus obtained, the Suppliants required and procured to haue a Breeffe, conformable to the Relation; to wit. That it might first be done among the Abbreuiators, next indited in true forme among the Clearkes; and being written, to passe through all the other Offices; then to the Chancery; next, vnto the Apostolicall Chamber, and (sometimes) to be extraordinarily fauoured by the Secretary; of all which Offices we will speake in their due places. Being dispatcht, it hadde the Seale of Lead; and this last expedition, was to be done by the Officiale.

to the Pope, as being perswaded, that he had the selfesame blessings & graces conferred on him, as our Lord and Sauiour Iesus Christ bestowed on S. Peter, to wit; to loose & bind in earth, whatsoeuer seemed to his best liking. This prerogatiue of loosing and vnbinding, reserued by the Pope to himselfe, was granted by him to one of the Cardinals, whom we vse to cal the chiefe Penetentiary; & he, forsomuch heereof as appertained to him, consonant with the Law Diuine, and his owne saluation, did exercise this authority (committed to him by the Pope) by diuers Vicars and Substitutes, commonly called Penetentiaries, who were diuided into all the chiefest Churches in Rome; as S. Peters in Vaticanus, S. Iohn Lateranus, S. Maria Maiore, &c. But the dispensation to bee made in obseruation of human lawes, was not granted, except vpon some cause, and by himselfe, and by generall commission of the Pope. To heare first the suppliants in such cases; and after their demand wer known, to see if there were cause, whereby the desirer deserued to be herd, & whither the case thus required, were wont to be granted to the Pope, or no. Then hee writes it vnder Apostolicall power, and of his Office, and not by the Popes mouth; but by the generall commission affirmed in his letter, and his Commisions (authorized to write so) from the Popes mouth; and credit heerein is giuen to his assertion, as a matter belonging to his office. In supplications directed to the Pope, the rescription was in one of these kinds; Fiat in forma, Fiat de speciali, Fiat de expresso; by which variety of answer back, is declared to the Maister of the Taxations, the importancy of his request. And he, according as the Penetentiary hath varried in his forme, so doth he direct the other Officers, in taxation of paiment. But now adayes, the multitude of Lawes haue so increased, both of the Popes, the Counsels, and of Monasteries, that men (being formerly bound to a certaine rate) do desire againe their auncient liberty, and are the more humble seruants to the Penetentiary. But he, after he hath signed the suppliants request vnder his hande, the Bull is likewise dispatched vnder his name and seale. And because somtimes it is not precisely written yet cleare enough, what assertion of the suppliant is referred to his Iudge: the cause being so knowne, the act is absolued, and he restored to his Office againe.

These men, as Aduocates, do declare the extendure of the parties request, and plead the case (as it were) to the Penetentiary; from whom they procure to obtain the matter demanded, and to make expedition of the Bull. They vsed also, to set downe the whole proceedings in Iustice, with all the Allegations, Pro & Con, on either side, in true and faithfull manner. To this Office, belonged dispensations for marriages, in degrees prohibited by humain Lawes, Legittimation of Children, Dispensation for defect in members of such as had taken orders, or were beneficed. Moreouer, for incompatibilitie of many Benefices, Absolution for Homicides in foro de conscientia, and for clarkes in both kinds, with retention of Benefices, or dispensation to some other benefice. The like for Simony, or for banishment, for an oath taken voluntarily, for a false Oath, for communication of Vowes, and Licence for obseruation of any humain Law, especially to Regulars, of what Chapter soeuer they were; with Indulgences for place and person. Beside infinite Commissions, in forma Iuris, in declaring a Nullitie or Validitie of Matrimony, which they termd Declaratory. And in many other matters, much better knowne to them that are practised in such iudgments, or in the ecclesiastical courts, where they are frequently entercoursed.

3 Continually, suit is made for matters signed by the Pope, in cases that come of his owne voluntary, or out of his liberality; as concession of Benefices, and other gracious fauours, which are likewise generaly committed to the chiefe Penetentiary. Beside, there are some things concerning Iustice, about matters Ecclesiasticall, in most parts of the world, and also of the prophaned temporall patrimonies of the Roman Church, deuolued thereto by accounts of ecclesiasticall persons, or by the remission of princes, or by consent of other persons, and giuen to the Court of Rome. The Pope for all these occurrences, & for the speedier dispatch of suters; apointed two audiences, in which Courts both both those matters appertaining to grace, are made suit for; and those that do more properly depend on Iustice; for either of which, there is a Court of Audience, and they are termed by seuerall names, to wit; The Signature of Grace or fauour, and The Signature of Iustice. To each of these Courts of Audience are certaine Lawyers appointed, and to the Signature of grace, do belong all those Cardinals that are Lawiers: for very rarely or sildom are any Prelates thereto appointed, if they be not Lawiers, and they are commonly called Referendaries, ordained both for grace and Iustice, by both the Signatures.

Two Courtes of Audience appointed by the people.

The two Signatures.

The Office of the Referendaries.

Their charge and imployment is answerable to their Offices, to regard what is required by suppliants, as also, to ouersee whither the requests made, doe tend to such matters, as vsually were and are to be graunted, which accordingly they insert in the forhead of the supplication, & then signify the same to the Pope: or to the Cardinall appointed to signe it, that the demand may be lawfully granted. But if the suppliant desire any thing, that may be preiudiciall to some other bodye; it is not granted, vntill the other party be first called. If then the case appeare to be important, rarely (in former times) seene to be granted; or else so doubtful, as the Referendary scarcely knowes what to resolue therein: it is then referred to the Court of audience, among other matters of like nature, where the suppliant is sure not to obtaine it, vntill it be agreed on by al belonging to that Signature. Heereupon, and for ease in such serious affaires, the Pope appointed a Cardinal, to attend on both the one & the other Signature, who ordinarily graunteth matters, if they bee light; and great matters also, if they were wont to be granted. The vnder scribing De Iure, was vsed by the Pope, but he referred this Office to a Cardinall his Substitute; so that the Pope (very sildome or neuer) vnder-writeth De Iure.

For important and doubtfull cases.

A Cardinall attending on either of the Signatures.

No medling in one and others Office.

The Referendaries attending on the Signature of grace, doe refuse all supplications, containing matter appertaining to Iustice, because it hath much displeased the Pope, that any belonging to the one Signature, should meddle in the others Office, but euery man to respect his owne charge. One day in the Weeke, is appointed for the Signature, wheron the Referendaries do meet togither, & ioyntly consult, whither any matters that haue passed in the Courts of Audience, do require them to bee there present, or not. And heereupon, the (day before that appointed for the Signature) the suters vse to come with their Aduocates, to the Referendaries for either occasions; because sildome (or neuer) any contradiction is disputed on the day, in any cause, be it neuer so vrgent. Vpon the day of hearing, it is the Office of the Referendary, briefely to declare (in the Court) the Suppliants request, which passing the iudgement of the Fathers: he who sitteth as President, graunteth or denieth the suite, according as most or fewest voices do yeilde liking therof. And the Referendaries do obserue it as a Law, that if a request be once denied; they neuer after vrge it any more.

The Day appointed for Audience.

If the Suppliant find himself to be contradicted in his suite, hee cites him that hinderer, to com before the Referendary appointed for propounding the case, in this maner; Coram Reuerendo, A. let N. be cited to render reason, why the Supplication or Commission ought not to be signed. These citations are made answerable to the quality of the request, for appearance before the Most Holy, or Most Reuerend, because the Signature of grace requireth the presence of his Holinesse; and that of Iustice beseemeth a Reuerend Presence; where it is lawfull for euery Referendary, to propound what time is expedient for grant, each mans eldership and dignity beeing duely considered. But at the Signature of grace, if it be brought before the Popes presence; two onely haue their authority to propound, as their antiquity appeareth by the Court Roll. And yet in the time of Paul the third, very sildom the second man had leaue to speak, so that then (by little and little) matters grewe restrained to one propounder only, especially as the businesse increased.

In contradiction of Suites, what Citations are to bee called.

Obseruation concerning the Signature of Grace.

The Pope euermore subscribeth in this maner: PLACET, A. when it is a matter concerning Iustice: but if it appertaine to Grace, the Worde Placet is chaunged, and then hee Writeth; PLACVIT PETITVR A. and this Letter A. signifieth the Popes true Name, as Alexander. But if his name be otherwise; then, as Iulius the third, he writes I. that is, Ioannes Maria, & so from time to time. If at any time the Pope subscribe, not by any suite or entreaty, but as of himself: then he writes not Vt Petitur, but makes this addition, MOTV PROPRIO. But the Cardinal attendant on the Signature of grace, writeth alwaies in one and the same forme, to wit; CONCESSVM IN PRÆSENTIA, D.N. PAPÆ: and then he vnder-writes his own name, PP. CARDINALIS PARISIVS, which hee writeth not in the Popes presence; but this fauour is only granted him to doe it, by vertue of the generall commission he hath. The same words also are vsed by the Prelate of the Signature of Grace, belonging to the said Cardinal, and is his Vicar; but then he addeth (beside the Cardinals name) his own, in this maner: C. EPISCOPVS CESENNAS.

The Cardinal for the Signature of Grace

The Prelat of the Signature

Now, as concerning the forme of subscribing in cases of Iustice, when it is written vnto the Iudges of the Romaine Court, he settes downe, PLACET. D. N. PAPÆ, and then addeth his owne Name. B. CARDIN. IVDICIONVS. If he Write to the Iudges of the Prouinces, then he saith, CONCESSVM IN PRESENTIA D. N. PAPÆ, B. CARDIN. IVDICC. And sometimes he Writes, Placet prout de Iure. Placet arbitrio Iudicis. Concessum arbitrio, &c. Now, to know what is Written concerning Iustice, and to bee sent vnto the Iudges in the Prouinces; they come no otherwise to the Regents hand, but (without any other forme of Signature) are deliuered to the Datary, as likewise those of Grace are, writing onely in them the day of the date. Afterwardes, they are set downe in the Register, where (word by word) they are recorded in publique Bookes, and being first heard, they are then giuen to the Suppliants, or to their Sollicitors, in forme of a Letter for expedition. For speedier dispatch in these affaires, when the case belongeth to Iustice, there are three seuerall waies or meanes, to wit; by the Chancery; by the office of contradiction, vnder the Leaden Bull, or by the Secretary, in forme of a Brieffe, Sub Annulo Piscatoris, as cõming from concession, to the rescription. But if the matter be of grace and fauour; it is expedited by the same Chauncery, or by the Chamber, and sometimes by the Secretary extraordinarily.

Three wayes for dispatch of businesse belonging to Iustice.

4 The Office of the Chancery, hath a Cardinall thereto appointed, who is commonly called the Vice-chancellour, and his degree (by solemne iudgement of all other Officers) is the very chiefest, and before all other belonging to the Court of Rome, both for dignity, authoritie, and benefit. This man, in regard of his proper Office, is President and present at the expedition of all Letters (concerning Ecclesiasticall occasions) that passe through the world, and ordereth the expediters, who are a great number of them, as Abbreuiators de parco maiori (whose Office is, to endite Letters at request of Suppliants; which enditing is tearmed a rough draught, or coppy of the request) Clarks, Writers, and Abbreuiators also De parco minori, whom the Italians doo call Giannizzeri, Casters of Leaden Bulles, and Registers or Keepers of Records. Al these do attend on the expedition of Letters, in some one or other Negotiation. Next these, there are other Officers, who must be sought after in the time of expediting, for agreement of paiments of Annates, first fruits, and such like, attending on no other charge, but receipt of the said Annats, fruits, and like paiments, they being Clarkes in the Chancery, Groomes of the chamber, and Bankers of Monies.

Abbreuiators de Parco maiori

Abbreuiators de parco minori

The order of expedition is in this maner. After that the Suppliant hath gotten his Supplication to bee signed and Registred, he or his Sollicitor for him, dooth procure amongst the Abbreuiators, de Parco Maiori, that there may bee a rough Draught or coppie made of his request; which being in due forme enlighted, it is next drawne amongst the Clearkes in forme of a Letter, and Written in the Chancery among the bench of writers. Then it is taxed or valewed by him that is called the Rescribendarie; and vvhen he hath taxed it, another Officer, termed the Contatore, or keeper of the Accounts, sets his hand therto, when paiment of the taxations is made to the Clearkes. Afterward, another draght of the same is made among the Abbreuiators De Parco maiori, where another taxation is paide to the Sollicitor, as the sum of fiue * Iulioes, and there one of them likewise subscribeth his name. The Abbreuiators de Parco Maiori, hauing receiued their fees, they then send backe the Bull to the Abbreuiators, de Parco Maiori, at vvhose Bench or seat two Officers (thereto deputed) doe subscribe their Names, vnder the Name of the Abbreuiatour De Parco Minori.

*About the value of halfe a Crowne.

From hence, the Letter is carried to the Sollicitors Office, appointed for those Letters, called Giannizzeri, where payment is made, according to a taxation of so much in the hundred: for, if the taxation be of thirty Ducats, then two Ducats and two Carlines are deducted for the Chauncery; but if the taxe be vnder thirty, then one Ducat is paid, and two Carlines. From this place, it is afterward carried to another Seat of the Abbreuiators de parco minori, where sit the viewers, or ouer-seers, and there the Sollicitor paies a Carline to one of the Abbreuiators, who sets his hand to the Letter, a little beneath the subscription of the Clearke Apostolicall. But if the matter therein contained, be such as requireth the Annates paiment; then pay is also made to al the Officers in the Chancery ratably: as to the Giannizzeri, or Apostolique Sollicitours, to the Clearkes of the Exchequer, to them of the Chamber, the Groomes and Bankers. The foresaid payments beeing made, the Bull is brought backe with the supplication therein enclosed, to the Abbreuiator de parco maiori, that drew the rough draught. He peruseth the Bull, to see if it concord with the Supplication, and if he finde them correspondent; his iudgement passeth so, & then he writes down his name, in signe of approbation, which he testifieth, by casting the Bull, with the Supplication enclosed, from his Seat to the ground, and then the Keeper of the Chancerie, or his seruant for him, taketh it vp from the ground, and looketh aduisedly; whether it be subscribed by all the Officers, according as the cause requireth, and if the date doe agree with the supplications grant of date; which doone, he sends it to the Regent of the Chancery. His authority is, to see by whom it hath been iudged and allowed, which if hee finde conformable to his liking, he sends it to one of the Abbreuiators, to the end it may once more bee ouerviewed; and then deuiding the supplication from the Bull, hee layes it aside where it ought to be kept. If the Bull doe containe grace and fauour, then is it againe subscribed by his hand, and on the right side hee maketh a great text Letter A. and on the left, an I. drawne very large and long. Afterward, it is circumscribed round about with Text Lines, by the Clearkes and Abbreuiators appointed for such Bulles. This being done, it is laid on a certaine Desk, and all the Officers of the Chancerie being finished, the Officer of Lead commeth, and receiueth it from the Regents hand, he carrieth it to his leaden office, where hee fastens a Bull of Lead to it, with a silken little cord. Then the Keeper of the Chancery, perceiuing it to be returned to the Regent; he requireth it at his hand, that it may bee deliuered to the Suppliant; he hauing first paide a Iulio to each Man: then passing on by the Giannizzeri, there it receiueth finall expedition.

5 This Audience became so tearmed, on this occasion. There was a domesticke Audience of the Pope, where he himselfe both heard and discoursed on many matters: Whereupon, for speedier expedition, sixe Domesticke Prelates were made choise of, who were then called Clearks of the Chamber, as men elected to be of the Popes Chamber; because Cheros (in Greeke) is as much to say, as elected by lot, by which example they were tearmed Clearkes, they being all elected for diuine seruice. These Men were Domesticall Councellours to the Pope; with whom the Pope vsed to discourse on all thinges that belonged to him, and deuided from the sacred Senate; as gouerning of the Cittie, the whole Temporall Estate, and the accounts of the Exchequer. Heere the Pope elected Magistrates, and there (to this day) an oath is receiued by them of the Chamber, for faithfull behauiour in their Offices. Heere, the contracts and bargaines are handled, of such matters (on the Popes behalfe) as concerne publique dealing by his disposition. Heere, expedition is vsed in Letters of Benifices, euen as well as in the Chancery; when Suppliants make choise of this way, for quicker speede, or in regard of the businesse; or because such matter belongeth not to the Chancery; but requireth the expresse commaund of the Pope. Heere, Malefactors are sentenced for punnishment, be they Ecclesiastical or Temporall, according to the persons qualitie, or manner of the offence. Heere, the causes are heard, concerning Toules and and Taxes, and such like publike occasions appertaining to the Church, in all places of the World, or to the Temporall Estate of the Church, be it between priuate persons and a Generality, or priuate men and the Exchequer. Heere finally, concurrence is made, by way of appellation, or otherwise, for all such as are molested, in behalfe of the vniuersall Temporall State of the Church; as by a supreame and proper Audience of the Pope. But Romaine businesses ouer-abounding, both in Negotiations and other causes: the Pope (easing himselfe by little and litle from this burden) commeth now very sildome into this Audience; except it bee on important affaires, concerning eyther the Treasury, or slow expedition of his Buls. He vseth likewise (now a-dajes) separatelie to expedite some of the fore-named matters by himselfe, without the chamber Audience; as election of Magistrates, and other causes most importing, which he thinkes fit to dispatch alone: in execution whereof, he calleth to him such as are his Familiars, who also are tearmed Housholde Secretaries.

Matters dispatched by the Pope himselfe.

6 The Chamberlaine vseth, on behalfe of all the rest, and sometimes euen of himselfe, to write De Iure to the Iudges, as of all profane matters appertaining to Magistrates, of the Temporall Estate of the holy Romaine Church. And abroad also, for paiment of tenths, of Fruits, of Benefices, of spoiles, of dead Clearkes, and of other causes belonging to the Apostolique Chamber. He writeth alwaies, as by Commission, from the Popes owne mouth, and is credited, as occasions really appertaining to his Office; the forme of his writing beeing tearmed, Letters from the Chamber. The expedition of these Letters are in two kindes; the one, close signed and sealed; the other open, and deliuered vnder the Chamberlaines Seale.

Letters from the Cnamber.

7 Next to the Chamberlaine, the Treasurer is the cheefest, in regard of his office: and he is called Treasurer, because hee is put in trust with all the Monies, that are brought into the Apostolike Chamber, where his charge is to receiue it, keepe it, and lay out for expences, as occasion requireth. For some certaine yeares, not long since, they vsed to bring the Money to some worthy Marchant, who (by Commission from the Treasurer) receiued it, and paide it forth again as his Cashiere, being tearmed the Depositarie. Whereby the Treasurer hauing the lesse encombrance, vsed to passe diuers things vnder his hand, which (in their owne nature) appertained to other Officers. Especially in those occasions, that (else) were dealt withall by the Commissarie; as payments, bargaines, of buying and selling, Fruits and Rentes, and demises graunted from the Chamber; yea, almost in all other matters, only through weakenesse and simplicity in some, that scarcely knew how to manage their offices.

Of the Treasurer, and his Office.

The Treasurers Cathiere called the Depositarie.

8 Next to the Auditour of the Chamber, who is appointed for spirituall causes; the Gouernor hath his place, and he punisheth Offendours with the temporall Sword: for, being the main power of the secular Arme, he decideth causes of strifes, compacts, assurances, breach of peace, quarrels of vassals against their Lordes, although they extend forty miles about Rome. He heareth and defineth causes of Hire or wages, without any iudgement Seat, summarily, without Writing, according to the forme of the Romaine Statutes, and common reason; when there is no perticular Statute to the contrary. In all the recited occasions, he euermore preceedeth the Senatour, because the first recourse is made to him: but if all the parties be present at an instant, then the case is referred to the Senatour. And yet the Gouernour cannot excommunicate, or threaten any Ecclesiasticall censure; because it belongeth to the peculiar charge of the Auditour of the Chamber. Finally, this man (as Vice-Chamberlaine) is appointed to all the Law-businesses, and offices in the cittie, & by reason of his precedency, attedeth for the peace of the Cittie, and Court of Rome, being assisted by all other Officers of the Citty, and of the Court, in matters appertaining to the peace and quiet both of Court and Citty; which is much furthered by his help and fauor. But if you read the Chapter of Sixtus Quartus, and the Bull of Iulius Secundus; there you shall more amply bee satisfied in the Gouernours authority.

9 After

The Presidente of the Apostolique Chamber.

9 After the Gouernour, followeth another Officer, whom we call Presidente of the Apostolicall Chamber; whose charge is, to attend the affaires of the Treasury, and receiue the accountes of euery person, that is admitted entrance into the Apolique Chamber, eyther from the Citty, or the Prouinces. And there they sit as Censors, and confer in the Chamber Audience.

The aduocate for the poore, and priuate persons.

10 Because (in former times) some matters happened, betweene the Exchequer and priuate persons, in the Chamber Audience: it was concluded, that priuate persons should haue an Aduocate in this Audience, at publique charge, there to defend priuate causes, but especially the poore, in this Audience, against the Aduocates belonging to the Exchequer, or the Atturney generall.

The Exchequer Aduocate.

11 Then followeth another Aduocate, who maintaineth the Exchequer causes, not onely in this Audience; but likewise abroad, among the Iudges of the Romaine Courts; where he answereth by an Oath, for the Exchequer affaires, and he is one of the Conciſtorial Order.

The Atturney of the Exchequer.

12 Next to this Aduocate, the Procuratour or Atturney of the Exchequer hath his place in this Audience: and he discourseth, oppugneth and defendeth the Exchequer businesses, in this chamber of Audience, and among the other Iudges of the Romaine Courts. Exchequer causes are such, as concerne liberty, or publike Monies. This Office is very conuenable, to bridle euill Customes, and to preserue peace and quietnesse in any Christian Commonweale. In the Court of Rome it is of no meane power and authority, importing also very much, that both Princes and priuate persons should respect it, and to aduance a man of good learning and practise thereto. This Man sits as an assistant for the Exchequer, in the Chamber Audience, among the Fathers and other Iudges. Out of this Audience, he is acquainted with secret causes, hearing and ordering them after his owne will; giuing his voyce in all thinges, or councell at least, although he be no Iudge himselfe. He is allowed also to come into the publique Conciſtorie, and by his publique Office, may require and plead, as well as any of the Protonotaries, to haue a publique Instrument made by any of them, in perpetuall memory of thinges publiquelie done, and to continue in the Commonwealth for publike Testimony thereof: as, of obedience yeelded to the Pope by any Prince, or in matters doone of the like Nature.

Of the Commissary of the Apostolicall Chamber.

13 Next to the Exchequer Atturney, sitteth the Commissary of the Apostolique Chamber, who handleth, dealeth, and executeth the Negotiations of the Chamber, that tend not to cases of Iudgement. He is appointed for Exactions, Toules, looking to the Mint and Corne, beside other businesse belonging to the Chamber, and this charge (of his owne Nature) was wont to be no way vulgar. Yet in our times, it hath been much debased: because the Gouernour, the Treasurer, the Presidente, and the Exchequer Atturny, haue vsed the same authority belonging to the Commissary.

The Clearke of the Colledge of Cardinals, resident in the Apostolike Chamber.

14 Last of all the rest, a place is allowed in the Apostolicall Chamber, for him that defendeth the arguing, and entrances assigned to the Cardinals, and for what matter soeuer is to be discoursed on there, appertaining to the Cardinals: And he is called Clearke of the Cardinals Colledge, resident alwaies in the Apostolique Chamber.

Of the same Chamber audience, and of the Iudges of either banke.

15 Seeing we haue spoken sufficiently of the Members of this Chamber; let vs not omit to say somewhat concerning the maine Body. This Audience was wont to meete together three times each week, and in the same place, called the Apostolique chamber; where they discoursed on publique affaires, as already we haue declared, and heard what causes came before them there; as also committed abroad, and partly referred to other Ministers, as we haue elsewhere more at large dilated; to wit, vnfit expedition of Bulles by the Chamber; or controuersies among publique Magistrates, or Toules, and other publique entrances, for matters Ecclesiasticall in all partes of the World, and Temporall businesse also, concerning the Temporall estate of the Church, among the Offices in the Romaine Court, to whom assignement was made by the greater part, or among mong the Toule-gatherers, Receiuers, Collectours; or concerning them with persons priuate or vniuersall; or betweene those priuate vniuersalities; or finally, about any businesse of the forenamed Treasury. Beside these matters, heere were determined all causes of Merchandizes, which were brought from Sea by the Riuer of Tiber to Rome, or from the Mountaines, being termed Water-side occasions. For this businesse, two Iudges, Vicares, were appointed, attending at the Water side continually; one of them, being President for Sea-Merchandizes, comming farre off on the Riuer, and from beneath the City. He alwaies is called Chamberlaine of the Bancke, and this Office euer belongeth to a Cittizen borne of Rome: whose election and gouernment (euen of all the rest of the Audience abroad) was aunciently committed to the Romaine people, whom the frequent vse of Merchandize most imported. The other was appointed for Merchandizes which were landed on the Water side, and comming from those parts beyond the Mountaines; and he, as by a different name (from the other) was called the Banker.

Now, if any Offender (in these matters (would appeale to the Chamber, or be heard by these men, for his most commodious and speedieſt expedition: he commiteth his cause to one of the Fathers aside by himselfe, and hereupon grew their seuerall Names, of President and Banker. This charge hath bin sometimes giuen (euen for euer, as it were) to one Man alone, he being the ancienteſt Deane: but now a-daies it commeth to men by Order of Courtrole, and all the actions done by them, are written in the publike Bookes, called Apostolicall. Which Bookes are kept in a publique place, and in the Chancery, whereto the Notaries may goe at their owne pleasure. And they are keepers of that place, and there they Regiſter the Apostolike Letters, which are expediated from the Chamber, by the other Bookes of the Chancery, and were for this intent purposely ordained.

16 The number of Iudges in the Romaine Court, being very great, and many Offendours in the Prisons, who were to be heard each man by himselfe: it often hapned, that by want of Iudges, who were otherwise imployed, and (many times) very seriously; that matters were longer delayed, then the quality of the cause required, and to great annoyance of the Prisons. Heereupon they tooke another course, that the Fathers, as supreame Iudges, and Vicegerents to their Prince, piously vsed to visite the Prisons sundry times in the yeare; to wit, euery month each Prison. And yet, not all they that had place in the Audience Chamber, did meete together for this visitation: but hee that was Vice-gerent to the Chamberlaine, and (well-neere euer) one of the seauen Fathers, Clearkes, and with them, all the other Ministers of the Chamber formerly named, except the Treasurer and the President. All these, on the day appointed, went to sit in a publike place of the Citty (for some space of time) neere to the Prison; where calling the Prisoners before them by forme of order, they might be heard, if themselues were so pleased. The Fathers hearing the guilty, and vnderstanding the merit of their causes, by graue discretion of Iudges, invred to such matters: by power of their office, according to the condition of the cause, the time endured of imprisonment, and nature of the offence; doe eyther determine on deliuerance, or longer debarment of liberty; or otherwise on expedition, eyther for death, or other kind of punishment, which (by meanes of the Fathers) is tempered with pitty and mittigation, in this manner. If any man, for a case of ciuili debt, shall be long time detayned in Prison, and hath had testimonie (in the Audience) of his pouerty: the Fathers vse to speake for his releaſe, comforting the Creditor (according to his faculty) that the poore man may haue some further dilation, to make payment after such a rate, & with some security; sometimes vnder punishment in the Gallies, and losse of goods, if no security can be giuen.

From hence ensues it, that Creditors, at the instance of any imprisoned Debter; is vigilant, and euermore present at these visitations, and labour (by all their vtmost endeuour) for the poor mans deliuerance. This Office of the Fathers is very pious and pittifull, and with them are ioined some others (at liberty out of the Audience Chamber) by the Popes will and appointment; especially the Vicare in the Cittie, and in the Popes Dioceſſe.

Marshall Iudges of the Citty, at Corte Sauella, and the Iudge of the Salaria of Rome, at this day called Torre de Nona

17 With the two Keepers of the Prisons; to wit, of Torre de Nona, and Corte Seuella, certaine inferiour Iudges, called Pedany, haue their abiding; who haue their names of the places, because one is called Iudge of Torre de Nona; and the other, of Corte Sauella. The appellation of these Iudges, was wont to come from the Gouernours Court, concerning that of Torre de Nona, and that of Corte Sauella, from the Auditour of the Chamber. These Men, as ordinary Iudges, by this Appellation and their owne faculty, do so heare and descide matters done, as the Gouernor may also intermit them in Appellation of the Iudge-Marshall: but the other, in regard it belongeth to the Auditour, is one of those Iudges called Curules, inferior to a Superior, because this Iudge of the Curules, is a Iudge ordained of an inferiour degree, who makes his abyding at Corte Sauella, and attendeth on all them that follow the Romain Court; but not to excepted persons, or them that are of more humble condition, who haue also an ordinary Iudge for them. The Whoores and common Strumpers of the Stewes, doe yearelie pay to this Man a certaine Rent, which they tearme a tribute, and it hath had so long a continuance to this day, as no other reason appearing to the contrarie; it is gathered as by prescription, euen of them that are most vnwilling, and they are compelled to pay it.

18 Beside the ordinary Court, there is in Rome another Generation of Romaine Cittizens, to whom the Pope hath giuen a Prator, and them wee call Senators. These men commonly dwell in Campideglio, and (by ordinary authority) heare the causes of Romaine Cittizens. They haue three Vicares substitutes; two whereof, beeing Presidents in priuate Iudgements, are called Collaterali. These men are different in degree; because one is called the first; another, the second; and the third is called Iudge of cuill actions. If a Man do appeale from any one of these; there is a Iudge beside in Campideglio, who is ordinarily for all Appellations, whose sentence, if it bee conformable to the first Iudge; the party cannot by Lawe, (belonging to the Burgers of the Citty, which forbiddeth it) vrge any other appeale. There are also certain Tribunals, where all Arts or Trades (which are noted downe in little Tables, hanging in diuers Porches) are to be righted. Ther all the Mysteries are to be read, and election made of Maister work-men, who render account (as Ouer seers) for others of the same Society: and yet the party offended, may appeale from their sentence, to certaine men cald Conseruatores of the citty; that haue their abiding also in Campideglio. This iurisdiction of Campideglio, was confirmed by Pope Iulius the second; Leo the tenth, and last of all, by Paule the third.

19 There is yet a third kind of persons, who are Priests, to whom the Pope (as a matter proper and appertaining to himselfe) hath graunted a Vicare. This Man (as well in Rome, as in the whole Dioceſſe) hath the same authority in all things, as the Pope hath: for all Priestes are subiected to his iurisdiction, and he heareth Clearkes causes, in matters belonging to the Church, and the Ecclesiasticall Courtes. Hee imposeth also the forme of pennance to Penitentes, conferreth the Sacraments of the Church, and (by law of the Dioceſſe) calleth Congregations, visiteth Churchess and regulare Monasteries, where there is no exemption by especiall reason. Beside this, he hath some charge of his Ordinary, though it cõmeth not by his general deputation: as to enquire, correct, punish, remoue, and to giue Benefices. Hereuppon, Popes vsed to graunt the fore-laide matters, onely by his permission, concerning Benefices that were abroad. And by vigour of this permission, the Vicares iurisdiction extended to all Lay-

But in other matters, where queſtion is made of proprietie of thinges; he can proceede no further, but to ſixty Ducates of Gold of the chamber. Now concerning the fore-named cauſes, his authority ſtretcheth forty Miles out of Rome, and in thoſe occaſions hee dealeth of his owne ordinary power, and within the ſumme of ſixty Ducates limitted. The Pope hath likewiſe giuen him all thoſe Pontificall priuiledges, which euery Ordinary exerciſeth in his Dioceſſe, which come not in generall within his Vicares deputation, & which cannot bee committed to their Vicare without diſpenſation, and Licence of Faith: As to conſecrate prophane places; reconcile vnhallowed matters; promote to ſacred Orders; elect any Biſhop in times prohibited; and to puniſh the delict of any Body (in reſpect of the Church) out of Cleargy; as blaſphemy, vſury, periury, inceſt, and ſuch like. 20 After that matters in Rome grew to ſuch height, that all parts of the World had recourſe to the Pope, as well for accounts of Benifices, as diuers other occaſions beſide: all ſuiters, not onely priuate perſons, but Princes and Kinges alſo, had their cauſes queſtioned in the Court of Rome; eyther by diſpoſition of reaſon, nature of the action, weakeneſſe in the Prince, or verily, by conſent of the offendour. And ſuch was then the deuotion of our forefathers, that they voluntarily excited people from all parts of the World, to make their remorſe to Rome, onely to be eſteemed moſt holy Trauailers. All therefore recited cauſes (prouided that they wer not Conciſtorial) were heard by the Pope, and he himſelfe, deuided from the Senate, heard thē in his Chappell, & then (for their expedition) cald none but Lawiers: whereupon, they are now at this day called Chaplaines, and ſerue in the Chappell for diuine ſeruices. But the Byſhops eaſing themſelues by (little and little) from this buſineſſe granted: that they ſhould haue all ſuiters a part, and their cauſes, and therefore (by a new name) they became to be termed Auditors of cauſes in the ſacred Pallace, and according to their relation, the Pope ordered his ſentence. originall in the holy Citty of Ierusalem, and passed there her first yeares of Infancy, with a great part of her adolescency: When as the Sarazins were Maisters of the holy Citty, and of the Country all about the sacred Sepulcher of our Lorde, which was ruined about the yeare of Saluation, 1012. by the commandement of Equin, Califfe of the Sarrazins, and continued so ruined, vntill the time of Constantine Monomachus, Emperour of Constantinople, who, at the intreaties of the Christians which then dwelt in Hierusalem (with the consent of Bonenfor Elmenius Stensibus, Califfe or Soldane of Ægipt) built it againe at his owne charges, in the yeare 1048. About which time, certaine Gentlemen and Italian Marchants of the Cittie of Melphes, frequenting the Portes and Maritime Citties of Syria and Ægipt, and bringing good Marchandizes into those Countries; won themselues much loue and liking, not onely of the Citties Gouernours, but also of the Califfe of Ægipt. And being well disposed Christians, they would oftentimes goe to Hierusalem, to visite the holy memorable places: and hauing no place of retirement in the Citty, they obtained fauour and permission of the Califfe, to build there a Church and a Pallace, for their owne vse and habitation, as also for others of their Nation; in that quarter of the Citty, where the Christians might dwell neere to the holy Sepulcher. There they erected two Monasteries; one, in honour of the blessed Virgine Mary, called S. Maria de la Latina, (differing from the Greeke Churches which were in Hierusalem, and placed there an Abbot of Mont-Casina) & was built to lodge Christian Pilgrims therein. The other, was dedicated to S. Mary Magdalen, as a place of entertainement of all such women, as should aduenture thither in Pilgrimage, they beeing also religiously gouerned. Not long after, they builded an Hospitall, wherein to lodge as well all sickly Trauailers, as any other Pilgrimes of honest disposition, with a Church also thereto belonging, beeing both dedicated to S. Iohn Baptist. These Monasteries, Churches, and Hospitals, were long time maintained by the care and cost of the Amalphitanes, who founded them: and vntill such time as the Citie was conquered by the Christians from the Infidels, and that Godfrey of Bullen was there elected King, which was in the yeare 1099.

1 THE Citty being thus won, F. Gerard was the first Rector or gouernor of the Hospitall of Saint Iohn, who, when the Citty was besieged by the Christians, was very ill dealt with by the Infidels, and was long time (by the) kept captiue Prisoner, because they distrusted, that he had some secret intelligence with the Christians, which beleagered the Citty. But after that the Christians were Maisters thereof, hee was deliuered out of Prison, and gouerned both wisely and charitably the hospitall of Saint Iohn, perswading and inducing Christian Kings and Princes, to enrich & endow it with their liberality, which (indeede) they did in bountifull manner; so that in France, Italy, Spaine, and other Prouinces of Christendome, the Hospitall of Saint Iohn found good Benefactours, and attained (in short time) to great reuennewes and possessions. In the yeare 1113. Pope Paschall the second, receiued F. Gerard, and the Knights of Saint Iohn vnder protection of the Apostolique Seat, and graunted them great priuiledges; ordaining, that after the decease of F. Gerard, they should proceede cannonically, to the election of another Rector or gouernor who was afterward cald Great Maister, of the Order or Military Hospitall of Saint Iohn of Hierusalem, a name which continueth yet to this present, after fiue hundred yeares from the beginning thereof.

2 IN the yeare 1118. F. Gerard departed out of this life, in the Papacy of Gelasius the second, and when as the order of the Knights Templers began. After his decease, there succeeded him by election, F. Raymond de Puy, who was a professed Knight of the Order: Albeit, some holde opinion, that F. Roger succeeded deceased Gerard, and gouerned the Hospitall of S. Iohn, from the yeare 1118. vntill the death of Baldwin, second of that name, King of Ierusalem, who dyed in the yeare, 1131. *F. Knights) made Statutes for the Order, formed and inſtituted a rule of life, which all the following Knightes were to obſerue. He was called Great Maiſter of the Order, and yet he qualified that Title, by calling himſelfe Seruant vnto the poore of Chriſt Ieſus, and Guardian of the Hoſpital of Ieruſalem. This Great Maiſter, perceiuing that the Reuennewes of the Hoſpitall did daily increaſe, and that hee could not better imploy ſuch wealth, then againſt the Infidels, by making war vpon them: he made offer to the King of Ieruſalem, of himſelfe, his ſtrength, and all his Knightly Brethren, who bare in their Streamers and Enſignes, a Croſſe Argent, in a field Gules. And thence forward, theſe religious Brethren were diſtinguiſhed into three degrees: for one company were Knights, another Captaines, and the thrid Seruants, not hauing (from the beginning) any other difference among them, but that ſome were Eccleſiaſticall perſons, and the other Layiekes. And from that time forward, there was not any enterprize in Paleſtine againſt the Infidelles, but the great Maſter was preſent therat in perſon, with his religious Knightes: who were firſt called Knightes Hoſpitallers, or of the Hoſpitall of S. Iohn of Ieruſalē, afterward Knightes of the Rhodes; and laſtly, Knights of Malta. They grew into ſo great credit and reputation, that they were imployed in the mannaging and guiding all affaires of chiefeſt importance. Among others, Gerard Gebert, Knight of this Order, was ſent by Foulks King of Anion into England, to treat on the marriage of Conſtance (Princeſſe of Antioch, Neece to the Queen Meliſenda, and Daughter to Prince Boemond) with Raymond, Sonne to the Earle of Poictiers, who was then in the Court of Henrie King of England. In like manner (this marriage being thus concluded, by the ingenuity of this Knight) at the ſame time, Raymond Berengarius Earle of Barcelona, and Prince of Cathalonia (who had conquered the Iſles of Maiorica and Minorica from the Moores, and in ſingle combat) defended the chaſtity and honour of Mahauld, Wife to the Emperor Henry the fiſt, againſt two Allemaigne Knights, that had falſely accuſed her of adultry) to ſhut vp the concluſion of his daies, reſolued to take the habite of this famous Brother-hood, and in that ſacred profeſſion, he perſeuered all his life time after, which was in the year 1131. Not much differing from this time, it is reported, that three Knights of this Order, being natiue French-men of Picardie, and detained then by the Soldan of Ægypt in Captiuity, were admirablie deliuered and tranſported out of Egipt, with Iſmeria, Daughter to the ſaid Soldane, to the place where (at this inſtant) is the Church of Noſtre Dame de Lieſſe, and this happened in the yeare, 1139. In the yeare 1153. Raymond the Great Maiſter, cauſed the ſiedge to bee yet ſtill continued before the Cittie of Aſcalon, which the Infidelles had defended againſt the Chriſtians more then fifty yeares: and at length, it was yeelded to the ſaide Maiſter, the 12. day of Auguſt 1154. which was in the tenth yeare of King Baldwine the third. In acknowledgement of a prize ſo ſignale, & beneficiall to all Chriſtendome; Pope Anaſtatius the fourth, gaue and granted very great priuiledges, to the Order of theſe Knights of S. Iohn of Ieruſalem, the firſt day of Nouember, in the ſame year, exempting them from the iuriſdiction and controle of the Eaſt Eccleſiaſticall Prelates, which was the cauſe of great troubles, betweene the Byſhops of the Country there, and the Knights of this Order: albeit the Pope and his Cardinals maintained them ſtil ſtoutly. Some haue held, that this Great M. Raymond was a Florentine, but the moſt credible opinion is, that he was a French-man, a Natiue of Daulphine, iſſued of a verie Noble Houſe, called Du Puy: whereof, namely, Iacques Roſius the Italian, (who hath amply written the Hiſtorie of this Order) is an ingenious witneſſe. He dyed in the yeare 1160. with this reputation; that he had beene a Man of good and vertuous life, fearing God, valiant, wiſe, and aduiſed in the affaires of the World, and one well approued in warlike exerciſes.

3 AFter that Raymond was deceaſed, there ſucceeded in the Maiſterſhip and gouernment of the Order, F. Auger de Balben: of whom there is found nothing deſeruing Memory: but that (in his time) died King Baldwine the third, who

4. Arnold de Comps, was next elected Maister in his place, who was a Man of great Spirit, valour, and councell. And in short time after his election, he entred into Ægipt, with Amaury, the new King of Hierusalem, who made warre vpon the Califfe of Ægypt; because he refused to continue and pay the annuall Tribute, wherein hee had bound himselfe to King Baldwine the third, for a perpetuall payment to the Kings of Ierusalem. Arnold, after he had (with great wisedome and courage) gouerned the Hospitall of S. Iohn about foure yeares, he dyed in the year 1167. and then succeeded him

Insomuch, that he was enforced to borrow Money at interest, with condition; that if hee tooke from the Infidels the Citty of Belbeis (aunciently called Peluſium) hee should stand acquitted to his Brotherhood (as indeede hee did) and victoriously performed his promise, the third day of Nouember, 1168. In which year he held a Chapter generall in Hierusalem, where perceiuing that hee was greatly indebted, and had charged the Hospitall, with more than an hundred thousand Crownes of meere debts; being also much grieued, that his attempts found not equall issue to his desires: he determined to renounce his great Maistership, which he did in the yeare 1169.

Ioubert*, a very religious Man, for his Successour, who in the yeare 1176. ioyned himselfe with Phillip Earle of Flaunders, that was then come into Syria, to assist King Baldwine the fourth against Saladine, who had a very powerfull Armie, miraculously vanquished by the Christians, that were but few in number, in the Moneth of Nouember, 1177. at which time the Emperour Fredericke Barbaroſſa, and Pope Alexander the third were reconciled together. At length, Saladine withdrew himselfe from the Country of Damas, in the yeare 1179. And then dyed Ioubert Maister of the Hospitallers, a Man very charitable to the poore, and sickly. It is said, that meere conceite of greefe, to behold (so manifestlie) the ruine of Christian affaires in Syria, with the shamefull and damageable truce, made betweene the King of Ierusalem, and the Earle of Tripoli (by his example) with Saladine; was the onelie cause of abridging his daies, hauing gouerned the Order of S. Iohn, about ten yeares.

8 IN his stead was elected Roger de Molins, a Man of high discretion and courage. In his time happened a great dissention betweene the Prince of Antioch, and the Patriarch of the said place: and this Roger was chosen to be Mediatour of peace and agreement betweene them, which followed in the yeare 1181. This Roger (with Heraclius Patriarch of Hierusalem, and Arnold de Troge, Maister of the Knightes Templers) was sent by the King of Hierusalem (in qualitie of an Ambassadour) into the West, to require ayde of the Christian Princes. These Ambassadours were kindly entertained by the Emperour, King Phillip Augustus, Gods Guift, Sir-named the Conqueror, the Kinges of Scicilie, England, and Hungary: they returned backe againe into Syria, all but the Maister of the Templers, who died by the way. And Saladine hauing besieged the Citty of Ptolomais, the Knights of Saint Iohn and the Templers (ioyning together) disordered the whole Army, and Roger the Great Maister, fighting valiantlie, there dyed, with the fall of his Horse vpon him, and smothered in his Armour, as also beeing much troden on with the Enemies Horses. His body being afterward found among the dead, was buried with great woe and sorrow. And notwithstanding this losse of the Great Maister; yet the Knights of Saint Iohn and the Templers, won the day of battaile against the Turkes and Sarrazins; of whom dyed then in the fielde about fifteene thousand, the first day of May, in the yeare 1187. 9 F. Garnier of Naples in Syria (which was the auncient Citty of Sichem in Canaan) was elected Great Maister. In his time was a bloody battell fought betweene the Christians and Infidelles, wherein the King of Ierusalem (named Guy de Lusignan) was taken Prisoner, with the very cheefe Lordes of his Kingdome. It is saide also, that the Christians had then the true Crosse in the battell, but it was taken from them by the Infidelles: and almost all the Knights of Hierusalem, and the Templers, were one part slain in the battaile, and the rest beheaded in cold blood. Garnier, after hee had fought verie manfully, yet being mortally wounded in many places of his body; by the goodnesse and swiftnesse of his Horse, escaped into the citty of Ascalon, where ten dayes after, he departed into a better life, the foureteenth of July, hauing beene great Maister but two months and sixe daies.

A great and wofull losse to the Christians.

10 THe twenty day of the said month of July, 1187. the Knights that were in Hierusalem, chose Fr. Ermingarda'Aps, to be their Maister. The second day of October, in the same year, the Citty of Hierusalem was submitted to the power of Saladine: 88. yeares two months and seauenteene daies, after that it was delitered (by Godfrey of Bullen) from the hands of the Infidels:

Then were expulsed out of Hierusalem, the Knightes Hospitallers, Templers, and all the Latine Christians, of which Christians, the Hospitallers redeemed from captiuitie of the barbarous, to the number of two thousand with their Money. All the Churches of the Citty were then polluted and prophaned, except the Temple of the Resurrection: which was bought with a great summe of Money, by the Christians of the East. After the losse of Ierusalem, the Knightes Hospitallers were continuallie in Armes, faithfullie assisting the Christian Princes, that had put on Crosses, for the recouery of the holy Land, and did actions (of high desert) at the siedge of Ptolomais: which, after a long siedge of three yeares, was regained from the Infidels by the Christians, the twelft of Iuly, 1191. And in that Citty, the Knightes of Saint Iohn kept then their ordinary aboad and residence. And in the very same yeare, the Christians wonne a notable victorie against the Barbarians, and Saladine their chiefe: wherein they were worthily assisted by the Knightes Hospitallers, and Templers. The yeare following, beeing 1192. in Winter, dyed Ermingard d'Aps the Great Maister, in the citty of Ptolomais, and then was chosen in his place

But because hee was of too stiffe nature, ouer-rough, surlie, and seuere: hee encurred the hatred of the greater part of the Knightes Hospitalers. About this time, Simon, Earle of Montfort, was sent by King Phillip Augustus, with an Army into Syria; where finding much disorder, he tooke truce for ten yeares with the Infidels, in the yeare 1198.

Difference betweene the Hospitallers and Templers

In the time of this tranquile estate, there chanced a great difference, betweene the Knightes Hospitallers and Templers, grounded on this occasion. The Hospitallers complained, that the Templers had enterprised too farre vpon their Iurisdiction, with much contempt, and violation thereof. Which quarrell (after many rough encounters and skirmishes) was appeased and accorded, by the interposition of King Amaury, the Patriarches of Antioch and Ierusalem, and other Princes and Christian Prelates, who comprimitted this difference, in the Name of Innocentius the third, which fell out very successiuely. For, after that GOD (the onelie Staffe and stay of all affaires in the Holy Land) had permitted this friendlie vnity, betweene these two Millitarie Orders of Knight-hood, King Amaurie of Lusignan so preuailed, that the Great Maister and Knightes of Saint Iohn, might liue with him in the Isle of Cyprus, where hee graunted the Gouernment of the Kingdome to them. In the yeare 1205. King Amaurie dyed, so did Queene Isabell, who appointed her Daughter Mary (which shee had by Conrade of Monferrat) to be her Heire, and he left her to be tutored and guided by the Knights Hospitallers and Templers.

21 IN the same yeare, Iohn de Villiers, a Frenchman born, was created Great Maister of the Order. In his t ie, the City of Tripoly was taken from the Christians, by the Infidelles, as (in like manner) were the Citties of Sidonia and Baruth, in the yeare, 1289. all which, were ransacked, ruined, and burned, and the Citty of Tyre brought vnder the Soldans subiection, whereon the christians of Ptolomais were glad to seeke their owne peace. During which time, the Great Maister went to Brunduſium, with the Great Maister of the Templers, to sollicit the christiā Princes of the Croisade, and the Soldan came to assaile the Citty of Ptolomais, which was vertuously defended by the Knightes of the Hospitall and Temple, with manie braue sallies forth vppon the besiedgers. Especially the Great Maister Villiers, who was sore wounded, with long sustayning the whole charges of the Barbarian Infidels, the Knights Barricadoing themselues in a quarter of the Citty, which yet was afterward taken on Friday, the 18. of May, the same yeare, 1292. With this great losse, the christians were driuen out of the Holy land, 191. years ten months, & 3. daies, after it had bin conquered by Godfrey of Bullen. The Great Maister, with the rest of his Knights, fled (for safety) to the Isle of Cyprus, where they were very kindly entertained by the king of the Island, who assigned vnto them and the Templers, the Citty of Limoſson, which was a Port Towne or Hauen on the Sea. There did they inhabit; and there did the Great Maister assemble two generall Chapters, one in December, 1292. and the other in October, 1293. making therin diuers good Statutes for the Order: and in the yeare, 1294. he died at Limoſson, and then succeeded him

22. F. Odo des Pins, borne in Prouence, in the time of Pope Boniface the eight. He incurred the hatred and disgrace of the knights of his Order, by reason of his negligence and couetousnesse. And there was a purposed determination to depriue him of his Great Maistership; but it was impeached by the Pope, to auoid scandall, and at length hee was cited to appeare at Rome in person, to answere the complaintes of the Hospitallers, and thitherward he trauailed. But before hee could see Italy, he died by the way, in the yeare, 1296. hauing (in the precedent yeares) held two generall Chapters at Limoſson. He carried also a long with him, a Manuscript Chronicle, wherein he had appealed certaine Letters of the Popes, containing Excommunication, whereby he pursued and releeued his owne Appeale.

23 THe Knights hearing the death of their Great Maisters des Pins, elected (at Limoſson) the 24. day of March, 1296. F. Guillaume de Villaret to succeede him; who was of the same Countrey of Prouence, and Prior of S. Gilles, where he was at the time of his election. But hauing intelligence therof, he trauelled immediatly to the Kingdome of Cyprus, and gouerned in his charge very prudently. In his time, Vsan Cassanus, King of the Tartars, became a Christian, and recouered the Citty of Ierusalem, where hee placed the Knightes Hospitallers and Templers in Garrison, in the yeare, 1300. He tooke the Citty of Damas likewise, but it was quickly regained by the Infidels, and the Hospitallers and Templers returned then to Cyprus againe, where the Great Maister departed out of this life, in the yeare, 1308. hauing held fiue generall Chapters at Limoſson, and seen the vtter ruin of the Knights Templers.

24 THe great Master being dead, Folquet de Villaret, of the same Nation of Prouence, was elected in his room. He was a man of liuely spirit and corage, and seeing that hee had attained to this Soueraigne dignity, he resolued to put in execution a matter, which (in his predecessors daies) had often beene intended; but could not any way be effected (viz:) to depart depart from the Isle of Cyprus, and to get a dwelling some where else, which he very happily performed. For, in An. 130°. the very yeare of his election, hee made a voyage to Constantinople, and afterward, into France, wher the Pope gaue him the Isle of Rhodes (if hee could get it) which with his Knights he conquerd, in the year 1309. and seauen other Islands neere adioyning. So that thither was the residence of S. Iohns Knights transferred, and then they were afterward called Knights of the Rhodes, yet keeping the name of S. Iohn of Ierusalem still. Not long after, Otthoman first Emperour of the Turkes, came and besieged Rhodes with a potent Army: but it was releeued by Amadis the 4. Earle of Sauoy, and Ottoman was compelled to raise his siege. After which time, the Earls of Sauoy wore on their Armors a Crosse Argent, in a field Geules, in memory of the helpe they had giuen to the Knightes of the Rhodes.

In the year, 1314. the Knights of the Rhodes, conquered the Isle of Lango, with other Isles in the Archipelague. And in the yeare, one thousande three hundred and seauenteene, Folquet the Great Maister (pleasing his owne Humour ouer-much in his Victories and Conquests) beganne to grow haughtie, proud, and insolent, which brought him into contempt of his Companions. Whereupon, the Knights reuolted from him, and if he had not saued himselfe in a Castle, they had seized his person. But in regard they could not get him, they deposed him from the dignity of Great Master, and in his place, elected

25. Maurice de Pagnac, whereof Pope Iohn the twenty two, beeing aduertised, he was greatly offended thereat, and sent two Prelates to the Rhodes, to informe themselues of the fact, with command to cite the great Masters de Villaret and de Pagnac, to appeare at Auignon in person, Gerard des Pins, being appointed Lieutenant Generall in the meane while. At this instant time, Orchanes, Emperour of the Turkes, came boldly and besieged the Isle of Rhodes. But the Knights had an admirable victory against him; for there were then tenne thousand Turkes hewne in pieces. In this interim, Maurice Pagnac died at Montpellier, Anno, one thousand three hundred twentie two, and Folquet de Villaret, was re-establisht ed in the dignity of Great Maister. But he perceiuing, that it was against the liking of his fellow Knightes, renounced his Great Maistership, in the year one thousand three hundred twenty three, and liued as a priuate Knight, vntill the first day of September, 1327. when hee died, and was buryed at Montpellier.

Orchanes Emp. of the Turkes besieged Rhodes, but to his foile.

26 THe same yeare that he gaue ouer his dignity, the Knightes of the Rhodes, chose Elion de Villeneufue, borne also in Prouence, and Priour of S. Gils. In the year 1343 a league was made between the Seigneury of Venice, the K. of Cyprus, and Knights of the Rhodes. And the great M. hauing won the name of an hapy Gouernour, died the twenty seauen of May; at Rhodes. In his life time, hee had enclosed the Great Maisters Pallace with wals and Towers, and diuided the Languages, Bayliwicks, and other dignities of the order. 1327.

A League of peace and amity concluded.

27. AFter the decease of Villeneufue, Deo-dono, or Gods guist, (a Natiue of Prouence) was elected Great Maister. About foure yeares before hee was promoted to this dignity, he had fought with an horrible and monstrous Dragon, that greatly afflicted the Isle of Rhodes. And hauing killed the Monster, hee was therfore so highly honored and esteemd, that his memory yet remaineth renowned to posterity. In the yeare, 1347. he aided the king of Armenia against the Soldan of Egipt. Pope Clement the sixt, held the Knights of Rhodes in such esteem, that almost all the Forts in Italy (belonging to the See) were gouerned seuerally by one of them. In the yeare, 1351. Constance K. of Armenia, became a Brother-Knight of Rhodes. And in the yeare, 1353. the son to Iohn Canta-cuzen, Emp. of Constantinople, came and required aid of the Great Maister of Rhodes: who after he had gouernd this Order of S. Iohn 7. yeares, 6. months, and ten daies, died the 7. of Sept. in the saide yeare, 1353. and was buried in the Church of *S. He was Maister but one year, eight months, and seuenteene dayes; for, falling into a grieuous sickneſſe, hee died in the city of Rhodes, the 24. of auguſt, 1355. He was a man of very exemplary life, and so seuere, that he was sur-named the Corrector of Customes. Hee held a generall Chapter at Rhodes, 1354. wherein manie good Statutes were made.

1355 29 AFter the Great Master was deceaſed, according vnto accustomed forme, Roger des Pins, borne likewise in Prouence, did next succeed him. In his time, the Pope perſwaded the Knights of Rhodes, to buy the Principality of Achaia, of Iacques de Sauoy, Prince of Piedmont, and the Knights of Rhodes made a generall assembly in the Citty of Auignon, to effect the treaty of buying of the sayde Principality of Achaia, and to reforme some abuſes, crept into the Order. For their Statutes were nowe traduced into the Latine tongue; & to all Princes were sent authenticall Coppies or Volumes of them, by appointment of the great Maister. And in the yeare, 1359. the Great Commaunder, and the Marshall of the Order, were sent into France (in qualitie of Ambaſſadors) to be visiters and reformers. There was an assembly of the Knightes, called at the Citty of Carpentras, but it could not holde in regarde of the great Maisters death, who died the 28. of May, 1365. and was much lamented, but by the poore especially, to whom he was a great and charitable Almoner.

1365. 30. RAymond Berengarius, of Prouence also, was next chosen great Maister, who had bin before the Commander of Castle Sarrazin. In his time, the King of Cyprus, and the Knightes of Rhodes, made a league together, & tooke (perforce) the Citty of Alexandria in Egypt, which they ransackt, spoylde, and burnt. The Armenians being expulſed by the Sarrazins out of their dwellings, were charitably entertaind by S. Iohns knights, in the Isle of Lango: and at the same time the Citty of Tripoli in Syria, was taken and sacked by the King of Cyprus, and the Knightes of the Rhodes.

The Citty of Alexandria spoild and burned.

In the year, 1371. the Great Master was (by the Pope) elected Nuntio from the Apoſtolicke seat, to appeaſe the humours & diuiſions which were then in the Kingdome of Cyprus: whether he went in perſon, and both by his Authority and wiſedome, he soone seased all the troubles and molestations. The Great Maister hauing gouerned his Order about 18. yeares and an halfe, departed this life, in the yeare, 1373.

The great M. elected Nuntio.

31. IN the same yeare, Robert de Juliac, or of Gulieh, great Prior of France, was chosen Great-Maister, who (at the time of his election) had the charge of his Priory: but vnderstanding the newes, he went forthwith to Auignon, where he was receiued with great honour; an assembly general of this Knightly order, being then there held, and the Great Maister had the gouernement of Smyrna imposed vpon him, vnder paine of excommunication. At his comming to Rhodes, he qualified all the contentions which had hapned in the time of his absence. At this time went the Pope, to hold his seat at Rome againe, which he and his predeceſſors had kept at Auignon, for the space of seauenty one yeares, 1376. In which yeare, the 9. of June, died the Great Mayster, and then

32. IN his place came John Fernandes d'Heredia, a Natiue of Arragon, in the citty of Valentia, who was Priour of Cathalognia, and Castillian d'ampoſta. Twice he had bin married, and (chaunging to be a Widdower) hee was made a Knight of Rhodes, in the time of Villeneufue, who was then Great Maister. Beeing then but a simple Knight, hee went to visit the holy Sepulchre, and other memorable places in the Holy-land. He was also Ambaſſadour from Pope Clement the sixt, to the Kings Phillip 6. of France, and Edward the third of England, and did very good seruice to king Phillip, in the year 1346. For he being dismounted from his Horse, on a day of battel against the English, he gaue him his owne horse, whereby the King escaped to a place of safetie. In like manner, hee fortified the Bastions and new wals of Auignon, whereof he was made Gouernour by the Pope. Beeing great great Maister, he took his way to Rhodes, in the yeare, 1377. and being required by the Generall of the Venetians army, to vnite their forces together: they went to Morea, in the year, 1378. where they besiedged the Citty of Patras, and tooke both it and the Castle. The Great Mayster (fighting man to man with the Gouernor of Patras) slew him manfully. Afterward, in an Ambuscado of Turkes, he was taken prisoner, by reason hee was too well knowne to them. Whereuppon, to worke his liberty, Patras and other places (which had bin won from them) were redeliuered to the Turks. And yet notwithstanding, they would needes carrie him with them into Albania, where they kept him as a slaue three yeares. In the yeare, 1381. the great Maisters freedome was bought with mony; and hee returning to Rhodes, the Ambassadors of Smirna came to desire succor of him. In the yeare, 1391 Baiazeth Emperor of the Turkes, made some preparation to besiedge Rhodes: Whereupon, Phillebert de Naillac, Prior of Aquitaine, was sent by his fellow-Knights to Auignon, with Letters to the great Maister, to require aide against Baiazeth. Naillac retnrning to Rhodes, in the yeare, 1396. Heredia the great Maister died, & was buried at Cassa.

At the Spring time, he was inuited by Sigismond, K. of Hungaria, to come and assist him with his Knights, against Baiazeth, which hee did in person, in the yeare, 1397. And then was a battaile foughten at Nicopolis, where Baiazeth had the victory, the King of Hungary beeing glad to saue himselfe, and (with the Great Maister) retyred to Rhodes. Thither also did the Emperor of Constantinople send all his precious Iewels, to be kept by the Great Maister, fearing least Baiazeth should surprize Constantinople. But hee was disappointed by Tamburlain, who ouercam Baiazeth, and kept him captiue in a Cage of Iron, so long as he liued; and the siedge of Constantinople being raised, the Great Maister sent home againe the Emperors Iewels. After the foil of Baiazeth, the great Maister, de Naillac, failed with an armie into Caria, and there builded an inexpugnable fortresse, which hee named Saint Peters Castle, in the yeare, 1399. vnder the raigne of Charles the sixt K. of France. In the yeare, 1403. there hapned warres betweene the King of Cyprus and the Genewayes; which was pacified and ordered by the wisedome and authoritie of the Great Maister: to whom the Souldan of Egypt sent an Ambassador, for request of peace.

In the yeare 1409. the Great Maister gaue his personall assistaunce in the Counsell of Pisa, assembled to quench the Schismes which were then crept into the Church; and the guard of the Conclaue was committed to the Great Maister, when Alexander the fift was elected Pope. The saide Maister was likewise at the generall Counsel of Constance, where three Popes were deposed, and Martine the fift elected, Anno. 1414. the gard of the Conclaue beeing then againe giuen to the Great Maister. Trauailing into France, he held a general assembly of the Knights at Auignon, afterward at Florence, and last at Ancona: whence returning to Rhodes, Anno 1420. he held there a generall Chapter, & in the beginning of Iune, 1421. he died.

34. AND then in the deads place, Anthony de Fluviano, or de Riuers, reported to be a Native of Arragon (but more say of England) was created Great Maister. In his time began the general Counsel of Basile, 1430. And not long after, the Soldan of Egypt (puft vp with the victory which he wonne at Cyprus) brake the Truce, and prepared a great Armie, with intent to besiedge Rhodes. But when he heard, that the Great Maister was prouided of sufficient strength to withstande him; he left off his determination, and so the Order that way remained in quiet. This Great Maister founded and endowed a chappel in the City of Rhodes, which (afterward) hee made a Church for his Knights. And the 25. of October hee died, after he had gouerned (in his place) with much wisedome, 16. yeares and an halfe.

mained in Auuergne, wherof he was Priour. Before he would go to Rhodes, hee made a generall assembly of his Knightes at Valentia, in the month of December, 1438. When he cam to Rhodes, he began to build the new Hospitall for sicke people, which the precedent Great Maister, (by his will) had appointed to be done at his expences. In his time, Pope Eugenius the fourth, was deposed by the Counsell of Basile; and Felix the fift, created in his place, who was held at Rome to bee an Antipope. In the yeare, 1440. the Soldan of Egypt, being come neer to the Port of the Isle of Castel le Rouge (which apertained to the Knights) and from thence turning towards Rhodes, he was put to flight by an army of the Knights, who had but eight Gallies; and in the Souldans armie there were eighteen; and there were slain about 700. Sarazins, beside a great number that were wounded. This foyle did so highly offend the Soldan, that he leagued himselfe with Amurath, Emperor of the Turkes, with intention to make himselfe Maister of the Isle of Rhodes, and to kill or expell thence, that famous Order of Knight-hood.

Heereupon, in the yeare, 1444. hee came and besiedged Rhodes, which was vertuously defended by the Rhodian Knights; and in the month of September the same yeare, a generall assembly was held at Rhodes, to helpe the ensuing necessitie of the order. So the yeare following, the Great Maister (by aduise of the Pope and the King of Cyprus) made peace with Amurath, and helde a generall Chapter at Rhodes. At which time, the D. of Cleues passed by Rhodes, in his returne from Ierusalem, where he had visited the Holie places. In the yeare, 1451. a generall assembly was made at Rhodes, wherein, the administration and gouernement of the Treasure, and whole fraternity, was giuen to the Great Maister: who in Anno 1452. after the death of Amurath, renewed the peace with Mahomet the seconde his son. And yet the yeare following, Mahomet became Master of the City of Constantinople, the 29. of May: when (being not a litle proud of this fortunate succes) he sent to the great Master of Rhodes, that he should pay him yearely, two thousand Ducats, in name of a tribute, otherwise, he purposed not to hold (any longer) the peace sworne betweene them. Whereunto the Great Maister made a couragious answere, to wit; That neither his religion, the Isle of Rhodes, nor himselfe were Subiects to any, but God and his Church; that he would neuer pay Turk any tribute, being rather resolued to dye (both he and all his Knightes) then to endure Christian Libertie, (which euer had bin free) to come nowe (by his meanes) into thraldome. Whereupon, he sent Ambassadours to the Pope and Christian Princes, to entreat supply from them, against the periured Mahomet. And in the yeare, 1454. the xix. day of May, he died, hauing valiantly gouerned his Order sixteene yeares, six months, & thirteene dayes.

IAcques de Milly, borne in Auuergn, whereof he was Prior, succeeded as Great Master, the first of Iune, 1454. being in his Priory when he was elected, & his Nephew George de Boisrond, brought him first tidings thereof. Whereupon, he immediatly went to Rhodes, and helde a generall Chapter the same yeare, in the month of Nouember. In the yeare, 1456 the Isle of Rhodes was greatly afflicted with pestilence and famine, whereby it became halfe desert, and to re-people it againe, many generall citations wer sent abroad to all the Knights, to meete there at a certaine time. The yeare 1457. Mahomet besiedged the Isle of Lango, & the Castle of the Isle des Singes: but hee was couragiously repulsed, the Knightes hauing a very happy and singuler victory against him, which caused Charles the 7. King of France, to send the Knights (as a guift) sixteene thousand Crownes. The Bayliffes, Commanders, and other Officers of the Order, beeing then enioyned (by a generall Chapter) to come to Rhodes, for the more secure defence thereof. The xvii. of August, 1461. the great Maister died, hauing (with much prouidence) gouerned his charge in harde & troublesome times, seuen years, two months, and sixteene daies. He was greatly lamented, because he was very benigne, affable, and humaine, desirous to preserue peace and vnity among his worthy Brethren.

The yeare 1464. the Venetians army besiedged the Citty of Rhodes: but the siege was soone raised, and the Venetians returned home to their Countrey, the war being appeased by the wisedome of the Great Master, who caused the Tower of S. Nicholas to be built, at the mouth of Rhodes Port, in the very same place, wher (in elder times) the great Colossus of the Sun (numbered among the seuen wonders of the world) had stood. As a helpe to this building, Phillip Duke of Burgundy, gaue ten thousand Crownes of Gold. The yeare 1467. the great Turke sent Ambassodours vnto Rhodes, to mediate a peace between him and the Knightes Hospitallers: but they worthily refused it; and in presence of the Ambassadors, denounced warre against the Turke. The generall Chapter being then transferred from Rhodes to Rome; & the Great Master being present in person thereat, he died there the 21. of February, 1467. and was buried in the Church of S. Peter.

No sooner was he come to Rhodes, but he receiued intelligence, that the great Turke prepared a puisant army, purposing to be siedge either Rhodes or Negropont: wherfore, hee sent for a great number of the Knights, that were then absent, to come forthwith for defence of the Iland. Moreouer, he leagued himselfe with the Seignury of Venice, against the Turke. Neuertheless, in the yeare 1470. Mahomet forcibly tooke the Citty of Negropont, the last day of July, committing verie great and horrible cruelties, killing (in colde blood) all the Latines there to be found, and (by sound of Trumpet) he proclaimd open war against the Knight of Rhodes; which enforced them to seeke all meanes for their best defence, prouiding euerie way to withstand the Turkish Army. But in this time of preparation, the eight day of Iune, the Great-Master died of a long lingering disease, which had afflicted him a whole year together: and after him succeeded

39. Peter d'Abusson, born in Auuergn, Priour there, and Captain of the Citty of Rhodes. He being chosen Great Maister, solemnly took his Oath (according to custome) to keepe the statutes of the Order. Hee visited the whole Isle of Rhodes, and made very great prouision to defend it against the Turks army, sending for all Knights and Commaunders appertaining to the Order, to repaire thither for defence of the Isle, and renewing peace with the Soldan of Egypt. The same year, King Lewes preuailed to haue a Iubily in France, in fauor of the knights of Rhodes; taking order, that the monies thereby arising, should soly be imployed for their defence. And by this Iubily cam great store of Money, wherewith Castles and fortifications were builded in the Ile. Truce also was taken, betweene the Knights, and the King of Tunis, for thirtie yeares; and the Knights of the Sepulcher at Ierusalem, were ioyned with the Rhodians of S. Iohn. In the yeare, 1479. Mahomet the second, Emperor of the Turks, helde a solemne counsell, that Rhodes should be besieged with a powerfull Army, as indeed soone after it was. In which siege, many sallies forth were made, and the Turkes daily repulsed and chased; albeit they were an 100000. fighting men, and the army consisted of 180. saile. The Great Maister, was much succoured by Mesire Antoine d'Aubusson his Brother, Viscount of Montelis, who was a great Warrior, and a most skilfull Captain, he was elected Captain Generall for the besieged. In few daies, the Turkes gaue 3700. shot with the Cannon, against the Citty wals, and a maruellous assault was made of 40000. Turkes, who neuertheless were valiauntly resisted, albeit the Great Maister receiued (in this fight) fiue great wounds, one whereof was thought to be deadly. In the end, so worthily were the assaylants withstood, that they were enforced to raise their siedge, hauing lost a great number of their Souldiers, & the Army of Turkes returned (with mightie shame and disgrace) to Constantinople, after they had besiedged the Citty, for the space of 89. daies. After this siege, Mahomet the second, concluded to come in person to Rhodes: whereupon, a generall assembly assembly of the Knights was made. But the death of Mahomet hindered this deseigne, and his Sonnes Bauazeth and Zizime performed the warre, after the decease of their Father, which gaue some breathing time of rest to the Knightes of Rhodes. And yet Zizime (in person) came to assist the Great Maister, withdrawing himselfe to Rhodes, in the yeare, 1482. wher he was receiued with great honor, and from thence conducted into France. In the time of this Great M. D'Aubusson, the statutes of the Order were reformed, and brought into one Volume: Peace being concluded betweene the Knight and the Great Turke Bauazeth. The great Maister, was made a Cardinall by Pope Innocent the eight, and Legate also into Asia, with honour of Legate, and general of the legued Army against the Turk. Finally, he died at Rhodes, Anno 1503. the third day of July, full of honor and reputation, and was interred with great funerall pompe. He had liued 80. yeares, three months, and 4. daies, and gouerned the Order 27. yeares, and xvi. daies.

40 THere were 387. Knights assembled at Rhodes, when the Great Maister D'Aubusson died, who elected for his successor, *Emery D'Amboi*s, Brother to *George L'Amboi*s, Cardinall and Legate in France, Arch-bishop of Rouen. He was a French-man by birth, & great Prior of France, at the time of his election, Guy de Blanchefort comming into France, to accompany him in his voyage to Rhodes, wher he was receiued with much applause and reioycing, because the Kinges of France and Spain had written verie fauourable Letters on his behalfe, to the Knights of the order. He was no sooner there arriued, but he held a general chapter, wherein was concluded, that a sumptuous Tombe of Brasse should be made, for the deceased Cardinall Great Maister. In the yeare following, they obtained a very famous and nauall victory, against the Soldane of Egipt, vnder the conduct of Phillip de Villiers, of the Isle Adam, a French Knight of the order, & afterward he was Great M. 41 AND the same yeare, 410. of the Knights were assembled at Rhodes, where they chose Guy de Blanchefort, borne in Auuergne, and Nephew to the deceased Maister D'Aubusson, to be great maister. In his time, the generall Lateran Counsel was holden at Rome, where Fabritio Carretto, Admirall and Procurator for the order of Rhodes, was Captaine of the Guard to the said counsel. This great M. de Blanchefort, embarking himselfe at Nicea in Prouence, to make for Rhodes, was surprized (by the way) with a dangerous sickenes, whereof hee died the 2.. of Nouemb. a yeare & two daies after his election.

42 IN his sted, Fabritio de Caretto, born in Geneway, and an Italian by Language, was created Great M. in an assembly held at Rhodes, the xv. of December, 1513. where were then present 550. Knights of the order the said Carretto hauing formerly bin Admiral of Rhodes. In the yeare 1516. peace was made between the Knights of S. Iohn, and Tomombeus Soldan of Egypt, successor to Campson Gauri, who (but a short while before) was slaine in a battaile, wherein Selim (Emperor of the Turks) had the victory against him. And Tomombeus was as vnfortunat, for in the yeare, 1517. he was taken, and strangled at one of the Ports of the great Cayre, by the appointment of Selim. And this was the cause, that the great Maister fortified the Isle of Rhodes, to his vttermost power, sending Ambassadors to the Christian Princes, to let them vnderstand the great victories of Selim, the sooner to take order for sending succour. But Selim dying, his son Sultan Solyman succeeded him: and in Ianuary, 1521: the Great M. Carretto finished his daies at Rhodes, leauing great prouision and munition for warre, which soon after did seruice to his successor.

The very same yeare of his election, the xxii. of Ianuary, 1521. Sultan Soliman resolued to besiege the Isle of Rhodes, executing the last Will of his Father Selim: whereof the Great Maister being aduertised, he made his preparation by al possible meanes) to withstand the Turkes enterprize.

Sultan Solyman executed his Fathers Selim last will.

War betweene the Emperor Charles the 5. and Frances the 1. King of France.

Dilligently did he strengthen the City of Rhodes, sending for supply into Christendome, which as then hee coulde not haue, by reason of the Warre hapning betweene Frances the first, K. of Fraunce, and the Emperor Charles the fift. In the month of Iune, 1522. began the memorable siedge of the Citie of Rhodes, which was besiedged with an army of two hundred thousand Turkes; and afterwardes the army encreased vnto three hundred thousand men. The besiedged defended themselues most courageously, and verie worthy exploits of war were there performed, especially by the Great Maister, who (during the siedge) did neuer put off his Armour. The assaylants were in many attempts repulsed, and in one of them, twentie thousand Turkes remained dead in the place: Solyman hauing then a purpose to raise his siege, but that there were some close Traitours, who hindered him from so dooing, and yet they did not escape vnpunnished.

The losse of Rhodes, to the great griefe of all Christendom

At length, the Great Maister (receyuing no succour) was enforced to surrender the Citty, vpon composition, the 24. day of December, 1522. the Turkes hauing lost more then an hundred thousand men. Solyman would needes see the great Maister, and when he beheld him, teares issued from his eyes, in meere compassion of him. So the first day of Ianuarie, 1523. the Great Maister (with fiftie saile) departed from Rhodes, and tooke his way towardes Candie: after that the Isle of Rhodes had been in the power of the Knights Hospitallers, for the space of two hundred and thirteen yeares, to wit, from the yeare, 1309. to the end of the yeare, 1522. After this losse of Rhodes, the Great Maister, and his valiant Religious Knights, had not any assured place of abiding, vntill the Isle of Malta was giuen them by the Emperor Charles the fift. For they departed first into Candy, from thence they went into Sicily and Italy, where the Pope lent them the Citty of Vitterbo, and where they held a generall Chapter. Afterwardes, thy soiourned for some small time, at Cornetto; then at Villefranche, and at Nicea. While they remaind at Nicea, the Great Maister made a voyage into England, and from thence to Fraunce; where being at Lyons, a great sickenesse tooke him: but after his recouery, hee went to Cambray, to holde the Baptisme of Font for Phillebert Emanuel, Sonne to Charles Duke of Sauoy. Afterward, comming with his Brethren-Knights to Malta, on Wednesday morning the sixte of October, 1530. he caused a Pallace to be there erected, for the abiding of him and his successours, calling it Castel Angelo, building another Pallace also in the olde Citty of Malta. When he had gouerned his order thirty yeares, and seauen monthes (being aged seauenty yeares) the xxi. of August, 1534. he died at Malta, and was buried in a Chappell, which hee had builded neere to Castel Angelo, and then succeeded him by election ued. Albeit he was discontented that they had not sent some of the Gallies, nor the great Carrack of the Order, for his conduct thither; wherefore he disarmed and destroyed the Great Carrack, which caused many complaints against him. Verie often would he discourse of the siedge at Rhodes, because he gaue generall notice thereby, that there he had lost one of his eies. He made a goodly Parke of Deare. and a very beautifull Garden in the Isle of S. Michael, and there would hee spend the greater part of the day, which raysed occasion of murmuring against him, that he was slacke in his p.blick gouernment. and no way carefull to prouide the Isle of Malta, of needefull supplies against the Turkes forces, for he trusted too much in the strength of Castel Argelo. In his time, the citty of Tripoli in Barbary was lost by the knights of the order, & taken by the Turks, which droue him to no litle fear & amazement. In the year, 1552. Leo Strozzi, an especial Commander of the order, made an attempt vpon the Isle of Zoara, which had very harde successe, because many Knights were then slaine of all Nations, especially manie French, Auuergnacs, and Prouenceals. It being declared to the Great Maister, he grieued extraordinarily thereat, and saide; That a greater losse had not happed to the Order, since the surprizal of Rhodes. He builded the Castles of S. Elme, and S. Michael, and being eighty years old, died the 6. of Sept. 1558 hauing gouerned xvi. yeares, x. months, and xv. daies, and was buried in the great Maisters Chappell.

Before the taking of Rhodes, he was Gouernour of the Isle of Lango; & after the losse thereof, he departed (with all the Knights vnder his gouernment) and ioyned his power in Candie, with the army of the order. In his time Charles the fift, Emperor, attempted to go in person to the Kingdom of Tunis in Affrica, where he was assisted by the Gallies belonging vnto the Order, and the Knightes also, who performed there great exploits of armes: especially, in the surprizing of Goletta, which was held to bee a Fort vnconquerable. This war being ended, the Great M. aged 72. yeares, died; hauing gouerned only xiiii. months, and xxii. daies, and was buried by his predecessor Villiers. 1534.

45 Desire, or Didier de S. Iaille de Tolon, borne in Prouence, and Prior of Tholosa, was next made great Maister: when lifting vp his eies to heauen, he vsed these words: O my God, if thou thinkest me fit for this great charge, I will not refuse the paine and labor. In his trauailing towards Malta, being very aged, so soone as he arriued at Montpellier, hee fell into an extreame sicknesse, whereof he died, the 26 of Sept. 1536. and was buried with much solemnity, in the church of the Commandery of S. Gilles, without the gates of Montpellier. When the Knights were aduertised of his decease, the xviii. of Octob. in the same yeare, they proceeded to the election of 1535.

1558. 46 C*Laudius de la Single*, borne in France, was next created Great Maister, and at his election, there were then present at Malta, aboue foure hundered Knights of the Order. Hee Gouerned verie discreetly, by Counsell of fiue Worthy Knightes his Officers and Attendants, (to witte;) by his Steward. Maister of the Housholde, Maister of the Horsse, the Treasurer, and Secretary. So that the Order was in great happinesse, during the time of his Maysterships, hauing obtained the priuiledge of Neutrality, of King Henry the second, and Charles the fift, Emperor, who made warre against him.

Hee was verie Valiant, Religious, and a most profitable Administratour of the Orders reuennues, in whose Treasury he left aboundant store: dying of a Catarrh, which had much suffocated him, after he had attained to the Climacteriall yeare, 63. of his age.

47 F. Iohn de Valette, borne in Prouence, succeeded next as Great Maister, and his election was verie pleasing to all the Order of Saint Iohn, because he was generally beloued of all the Nations, and vniuersally desired, as most Woorthy of that charge and Dignitie. In lesse space then two yeares, he was generall of the Gallies, Bayliffe of Lango, Great Commaunder, Priour of Saint Gilles, and Lieutenant to the great Mayster, and nowe at length Great Maister also. 1561

Seuerall dignities in litle space.

Hee did so affect his Knightes and Order, that, after the day hee first entered into it, he would neuer more returne into his Countrey. So that by making continuall residence there with them, he passed thorough all the Degrees and offices of honour in the profession: appearing still (in all his actions) to bee of rare iudgement, perfect integrity, & incomparable valour. So soone as he was aduanced to this Soueraigne dignity, he resolued to builde a new Cittie at Malta, vpon the Mountaine of Saint Elme, knowing that all the other Fortes were not sufficiently munited, to endure the batterie of a potent enemy: yet this disseign was deferred till a further time. He fortified the Castle of the Isle of Gozo, and forsaking his abiding at the Castle of S. Angello, came and dwelt within the town of Malta, which hee defended most valiantly against the siege of the Emp. Sultan Soliman, when he was grieuously wounded in his leg, in the year 1565. But the siege being raised, to the shame and confusiō of the Turks; he greatly strengthned the Isle of Malta, and began to build the new City, which was called Valette, according to his sur-name, and whereof himselfe solemnly laid the first stone, on monday the 28. of March, 1566. And by the sollicitude of the Great Maister, the building thereof, continued on still, eight thousand persons beeing daily employed therein, and fiue hundered thousand Crownes monthly paid to the workmen. At length, the one & twentie of August, 1568. the Great Maister died, on the like day as hee was promoted vnto his place, hahauing gouerned eleauen yeares, fullie compleat.

1558. 48. After the obsequies of Valette the Great Maister, they proceeded to elect a new successor, which was Pedro de Mente, an Italian borne, and Priour of Capua. Immediately after his promotion to the Maistership, hee caused his predecessors bodie to be carried into the New Citty, and to bee honourably buried in the Chappell of our Lady of Victory, for he worthily deserued to be surnamed the Father of Souldiers, the Shield and Defender of the Catholicke faith, and the great persecutor or queller of proud Infidels. This new Great Maister, before he attained vnto so high degree, had made good proofe of his wisedome and valour, in sundry other honourable and woorthy Offices. For hee was first, Patron of the Gally, which was Captain or Commander of the band. Next, Lieutenant Generall of the Gallies, Castillion or Gouernor of the Castle. S. Angello at Rome; he was then Admirall, next General of the whol Fleet, and Ambassador for the Order to the Popes Pius the fourth, and Pius the fift. He came from Rome to Malta, when he was chosen Great Maister, and followed his charge so effectually, that the new Citty was finished, and thither hee purposed to transfer the dwelling of the Order. For the good Old man, thought it as great honour, to dwell in the New Citty, and make it habitable; as it was for his predecessor Valette to build it. In his time, the memorable Nauall battaile of Lepanto was fought, and victory obtaind against the Turkes, wherein the Knights of the Order did many woorthy actions of armes. 1572 49 Iohn, Bishop of Cassiera, borne in Auuergn, did next succeede him, in the yeare, 1572. Before his election vnto this Office, his Vertue had appeared in diuers waighty charges. For, at the enterprize of Zoara, he was Ensigne-bearer to the Order, and defended the Standarde very worthily, bringing it backe with him to Malta, when both it and himselfe were smitten into the Sea, yet both of them saued by a Gally belonging to the order, after he had a long time fought vndantedly against the Infidels. Soon after, he was

With his owne Money, hee builded the great Church dedicated to to S. Iohn Baptist, in the new City of Valette, endowing it with a 1000 Crownes of annuall Reuennues, erecting also a goodly Sepulcher, for interring therein the bodies of the Great Maisters his predecessors. There happened some discontentment betweene the Knights and him, which shortning his daies, he died.

1582 50 And the twelfth of Ianuary, 1582. Hugues de Loubenx Verdale, born in Prouence, was elected Great Maister. He was but a yong Knight, yet both learning and Military knoledge shined clearly in him. For he was in the attempt at Zoara, where he declared himselfe to be truly valiant, and had many honourable offices impoſed vpon him. He dying, 1595. 51 Martin Garzes, a Natiue of Arragon, succeeded him next as great Maister. Hee quallified the discontentments amongst his Brethren-Knights, & tooke away those Taxes which had beene impoſed, and interdicted (for a time) the Officers of the Order, to giue a newe forme to his owne Gouernment, and to the good liking of all the Knights. He did expreſſely prohibit, that not any Knight, (nor the Great Maister himselfe) might particularly haue any ship on the Sea, to vse any Piracies for his owne profit. Hee died also at Malta, and lieth buried in the Sepulcher of the Great Maisters.

Discontents pacified amōg the Brethren.

1601. 52 The Knights assembling for a new election, the tenth of Febr. 1601. Aloph de Vignacourt, borne in Fraunce, was created Great Maister. In the yeare, 1566. he comming to Malta, with great store of other French Gentlemen; vpon a flying rumour that the Isle was likely to be besiedged againe by the Turkes army, they all entred into the order, vnder the Great Maister Valette, receiuing (afterwardes) sundry great Charges, wherein his wisedome and man-hood was euidently discernd, hauing bin captain of the Citty Citty of Valette, and not long after, great Hospitaller of the order. He yet continueth in the Office of great Maister, a great comfort (we hope) to Christendom, and a terror to the Ottomans Empire, whensoeuer they shall attempt the hurt of the Isle of Malta, where the famous memory of that ancient Order of Knight-hood of S. Iohn of Ierusalem, is still kept and maintained.

CHAP. IIII.

The seuerall Orders of Knight-hoode, both Ecclesiastick and Secular; as they haue beene, and are yet honored in this Christian World.

Ecclesiasticall Orders.

Knights of S. Iames of Compostella.

1070. IN the yeare, 1070. this Order of Knight-hood began in Spain, after that Ramirus had won the most famous victory, in the Prouince of Compostella, against the Moores.

At first, their number consisted but of thirteene, and it was lawfull for them to take wiues. There was a chiefe man chosen of this order, by the name of Great Maister; who (together with the other 13.) had power to elect other knights.

The badge or note of honour of this Knight-hood, was a Red Crosse, carying the forme of a downe pointed sword. At the Feast of All-Saints, was their meeting appointed, that they might confer about their affaires. Many years haue they continued, with many priuiledges, & scarsely any but they (called Augustines) holde any such lawes.

Knights of Saint Iohns of Ierusalem, vvho were afterwardes knights of the Rhodes, and at this day are called Knights of Malta.

1099. IN the yeare, 1099. the Cittie of Ierusalem being recouered against the impulsions of the Infidelles, by Godfrey of Bullen, Duke of Lorraine. About that verie time, a certaine Hospitall was erected by the Christians in Ierusalem, consecrated by the name of S. Iohn Baptist, for the entertainment of Pilgrims. Soone after, was this Order of Knight-hood instituted, and the first Rector or Ruler vvas called Gerrard, and the next after him, Raimond. These Knights wore a Blacke Garment, with a Crosse Argent, in a field Gules, vpon their breasts.

In the yeare, 1308. beeing enforced from their former abiding by the Turkes, and the Isle of Rhodes granted them by Pope Clement the fifte: they were (in that regard) called Knights of Rhodes. 1308.

In the yeare, one thousand fiue hundred twenty three, Rhodes being wonne from them, Malta was affoorded them; whereon to this day, they are called Knights of Malta. 1523.

The duty of this Knight-hoodes Order, was, to fight for the Christian faith, to releeue the oppressed, to defend Widdowes and Orphanes, &c. Nor was anie one to be admitted into this Order, that was descended of a Moore, Iew, Mahumetist, or any such ignoble race.

Knights Templers, or Knights of the Temple.

1117. ANno Dom. 1117. Gotfredius Aldemarus Alexandrinus, and Hugo de Planco de Paganis (Godfrey Duke of Lorraine, and King of Ierusalem being dead, and Baldwine then raigning) this order of Knight-hood first began, and a seate was granted them in the temple of Ierusalem, whereuppon, they were called Knightes Templers, or Knights of the Temple.

By entreaty of Stephen, Patriarch of Ierusalem, Pope Honorius brought in this Order, and confirmed their Society, giuing them a White Garment, whereunto Eugenius the third, added a red Crosse on the breast.

The charge of these Knights, was, to guide trauailers on the way of Ierusalem, and to entertaine strangers.

1310. Anno Domini, 1310. Clement the fift (who then held his See in France) by perswasion of Phillip King of France, gaue order for the vtter subuersion of this Knight-hoods Society, and all their Colledges, throughout our Christian Worlde, whersoeuer they were builded: in regard of a most abhominable trechery, by them intended and ratified.

Knights Tentons, or Knights of Allemaigne.

1130. SOne after that Ieruſalem was regayned from the Chriſtians, one Teuto a Nobleman, and abounding in Riches, inſtituted this Society of Knight-hood, building an houſe (for their entertainement) at Ieruſalem, called, Hoſpitium Virginis Mariæ.

Among this Order of Knight-hood, neither Knight of Malta, nor any other, except a Germain (and he likewiſe to bee Noble by birth) could be receyued into their degree. Their garment was White, and a Blacke Croſſe figured vppon their Breaſts.

In the yeare, 1184. theſe Knights (the Citty of Ieruſalem being ſurprized by the Sarrazins) Ptolomais was graunted them: but beeing likewiſe driuen from thence, they came into their Countrey of Germanie.

In the yeare, 1220. they intreated Fredericke the ſecond, Emperour, that hee wold ſuffer thē to take Arms againſt certaine fugitiue Idolaters in Pruſsia: who beeing by them ſubdued, they obtayned there a new ſeating, and their Dition or Lordſhippe of Lsuonia was then added to them.

Calatrauian Knights, or Knights of Calatraua.

IN the yeare, 1130. this order of Knight-hood was inſtituted by Sancho, King of Toledo, in imitation of the order of Saint Iames.

Theſe Knights, tooke the name of Calatraua, which was a place graunted vnto them, where (in former times) had ſtood a Church, that belonged to the Knightes Templers: And when the Sarrazins were ouer-powerfull for them, thoſe Knightes were conſtrained to ſurrender this place vnto them.

Theſe Knights did were a black Garment, with a red croſſe vpon their breaſt, and were ſaid to be of the Ciſternian Order, holding in Spaine large poſſeſsions.

Knights of Alcantara.

1250. THeſe Knightes, held their name of a Citty in Caſtile, called Alcantara, and were of the Ciſternian order.

They had a goodly Temple neere to the Riuer Tagus, where they helde very ample poſſeſſions.

Their Enſigne or Badge was a Greene Croſſe.

Knights of the Redemption.

IN Anno Dom. 1212. this order was inſtituted by Iames King of Arragon, who Conquered the Iſlands called Baleares or Maiorque and Minorque, in the Spaniſh Sea. 1212.

It was the Office of theſe Knights, to redeeme captiues: whereupon, the Title of Redemption was giuen them: they wer alſo called Knights of Mary.

Theſe Knights Order was confirmed by Gregory the ninth, Biſhoppe of Rome. And they wore a white Garment with a blacke Croſſe vppon it.

Knights of Monteſia.

THis order was inſtituted much about that very ſame time, as the Knightes of Calatrana were. 1150.

They deriued their name from Monteſia, in Valentia, where was their place of abiding.

The Enſigne of theſe Knightes, was a red croſſe.

Knights of the Holy Sepulcher.

THeſe Knightes (who deriued their name of Chriſts Sepulcher) did weare two Red croſſes. This order (at this day) is quite extinct, or (as ſome do imagine) the Order of the Knights of Malta, is ſaid to be ſomewhat neare it. 1219.

Knights of Chriſt.

IN Anno Dom. 1320. this order was inſtituted by John the 20. Biſhop of Rome. The place of theſe Knights abiding, was in Portugal. 1320.

A Black Garment, & a double croſſe, were the Enſignes of this Knight-hoodes order.

A little red Croſſe, reflected with Gold, they wore vpon their Breaſts.

Theſe Knights did weare coſtly Garments, and fared delicately: whervpon they were vulgarly cald by the Italians: Frati Gaudenti.

They might not were any gilt Spurs, or vſe any Gold on their Horſes Furniture.

1048 THis Order was confirmed, or (as ſome will haue it) reſtored by Pius Quartus. And yet the Knightes of this order (are ſaid to be) in the times of Baſilius, and Pope Damaſus, when Iulian the Apoſtata raigned, & then they flouriſhed, as ſome do affirme.

Knights of the round Table.

The Secular Orders. IN Anno Domini 516. Arthur, a worthy and warlike King, raigning in the Iſle of Brittaine, the Countrey beeing infeſted and troubled with Armies of Saxons, &c. was yet (by him) very valiantly ſupported, and his fame out-ſtretched to the remoteſt Regions. Afterward, when peace was eſtabliſhed, that other knightly mindes might bee inflamed with the like glorie: this Order he inſtituted, which continued (with others) in long and honorable obſeruation.

The Order of theſe Knights was (eſpecially) in the Citty of Wincheſter, as ſome haue recorded; and their yearelie meeting was there, at the Feaſt of Pentecoſt, or Whitſontide.

Knights of the Garter.

1349. IN the yeare 1349. Edward the third, King of England, hauing had great victories againſt the French, and other neighbouring Nations, did inſtitute this Order, and conſecrated it to Saint George.

The King appointed a Garter to bee the Enſigne of this Order, wrought richly with Golde and precious ſtones, which ſhould circle the leg beneath the knee, and on it to haue theſe words apparantly diſcerned:

HONI. SOIT. QVI. MAL. Y. PENSE.

The number of theſe Knightes, are twenty ſixe, whereof the King himſelfe is the chief.

The time of this Societies meeting, is the Feaſt of S. George, and celebrated at Windſore.

These Knights do weare the Enſigne of Saint George (fighting with a Draggon) faſtned to a rich Chain or Collar, which weighed or valued, neither more or leſſe, then eighty pounds of Engliſh Money (as hath beene ſaide) in former times. Their Garments is Purple, with a red Croſſe.

Knights of the Starre.

ANno Dom. 1350. John King of France, being much mooued with the glory of Edward the third, King of England; did inſtitute this Order of Knighthood, entitling it by thoſe 3 Magi, who (going from the Eaſt to honour Chriſt) were guided by a Starre. 1350

The Enſigne of this Order was a Star, ſet eminently in the Hat: and the words were Monſtrant Regibus Aſtra Viam.

The founder of this Order, beeing much moleſted with the difficulties happening in warre; could not perfect what he had inſtituted. And therefore (within a ſhort while after) this Order ceaſed.

Knights of the Band.

IN the yeare 1367. this Order was inſtituted by Alphonſus King of Spaine, the Son of Ferdinand and Conſtance. 1367.

Theſe Knights did wear a certain red ſcarffe or Band, of three fingers bredth, which (like a Stoale) was faſtened on the left Shoulder, and ſo came vnderneath derneath the right Arme, thwart the body.

Into this Order, younger borne Brethren onely (of Noble descent and Family) and none of the elder, might bee admitted.

Many Articles (belonging to this Order, and to bee obserued by these Knights) are at large set downe by Sansonino.

Knights of the Annunciation.

1409 ANno Dom. 1409. Amades or Amadeus, as some write, the sixt, Sirnamed the Greene Earle of Sauoy, deuised this Order, who were tearmed Knightes of the Virgine Mary, and for this reason instituted: because Amades the first Earle of Sauoy (with wonderfull fortitude) defended Rhodes against the Turkish powers, in his memory it was thus celebrated.

A Chaine or Collar (such as Knights vse to weare, made of Gold and Siluer Plates, and fastned together with little Linkes) each Man had about his necke, with these Letters engrauen thereon, F. E. R. T. that is; Fortitudo eius Rhodũ tenuit. Thereat hung also (by another small Chaine) the Picture of the Virgine Mary, with the Angels salutation.

Knights of the Golden Fleece.

1429. IN the yeare 1429. Phillip, Sir-named the good Duke of Burgundy, instituted this Order, and dedicated it vnto Saint Iames.

The number of these Knightes were twenty four, whereof the Duke of Burgundy was the chiefe.

They vsed to weare the Picture of a Golden Sheepe, affixed to a Chaine, inter-wouen like flames of Fire.

Charles the warlike Duke of Burgundy (who also is said by euery one, to bee the first Founder of this Order) added thereunto these words: Ante ferit, quam flamma micet.

But now at this day, the Knights haue these words:

PRETIVM NON VILE LABORVM.

Knights of Saint Michaell.

1469 IN the yeare 1469. Lewes the eleuenth, King of France, instituted this Order at Amiens, and dedicated it to Saint Michaell.

The beginning of this Society, consisted of a Band of Men, to the number of thirty sixe, the very cheefest and noblest Peeres of the Kingdome, beeing Knights cleere from all detection; and the very cheefe of them was the King himselfe.

At this day, there are a great number of these Knights, and the Kingdom of France is not now so respective in their election, as at the first.

These Knightes weare a Chaine of Gold daily, wouen like little shels, valewing two hundred Crownes: And thereat hangeth the Picture of Saint Michaell fighting with the Deuill, the words being these; Immensi tremor Oceani.

These Knights did vse to meet euerie yeare, at the Feast of Saint Michaell, in the Church of Saint Michaell on the Mount.

Their Garments by Henry the second, King of France, were appointed in very honourable manner.

Knights of Saint Stephen.

IN the yeare 1561. this Order was instituted by Cosimo de Medices, Duke of Florence, and the same confirmed by Pius Quartus. 1561.

The Ensigne of these Knights, was a Red Crosse, worne on a blacke Garment.

The Statutes of this Order, doe not much differ from thē of Malta Knights: and they were allowed to haue Wiues.

The Duke of Florence, is alwaies the chiefe of this Order, and it is not to be censured by any of the religious degrees, but properly it dooth hold a freedome in liberty.

Knights of the Holy-Ghost.

IN the yeare 1578. Henry the third, King of France, instituted this Order, and named it of the Holy-Ghost: the memory whereof, was to be celebrated in the time of Pentecost: vpon which day, the King was borne, and succeeded also in the Kingdom. These Knights are an hundred in number, and the king himselfe is President. 1578

This

This Feast is celebrated yearely the first day of Ianuary, in the Augustines Church in Paris, by the Parisians.

The Ensigne of these Knights, is a Doue (in which forme the Holy-Ghost appeared) in midst of a Crosse.

The last or lowest degree of Knighthood, is theirs, who (as reward of their Vertues) haue Golden Spurres put on their Heeles, and vulgarly are called Knights.

Concerning Knights Bannerets, who had that Title giuen them by the Kings of England in Warre, Knights of the Bath; And Baronets last of all deuised, they being also created by the Kings of that Kingdome: because they are of another Nature; I passe them ouer, without vsing any further speech of them.

CHAP. V.

Of a strange Custome (though scarsely commendable) vsed by the People, in the Kingdome of Cathay, for marriage of their Daughters, when they want means of Wealth and dowry.

Concerning the seatage of Cathay.

SOme Geographers doe place the Prouince of Cathay in Asia, and others in the higher India: but it matters not much to me, in what part soeuer of the World it is scituated; for I am not a little ashamed, to read the manner of their daughters marriages, when they haue no meanes to bestow Dowries on them, which I finde to be thus related. Their Daughters hauing attained to the able yeares of marriage, and they wanting means whereby to aduance them: they bring them into a publike place, where making a noise, by beating two boards one against the other (which may bee heard almost as audibly, as the sound of a good Bell or Trumpet) the people thereupon assemble together. The appearance being made to generall liking, the Maid that then is in question of mariage, must be mounted on some Piller or ascent of Stone, where best she may be seene: and there, by commaund of her Parents (hauing Garments made for the purpose) she vnlaceth and openeth all her nakednesse backward, and so suffers her selfe to be seene for a long space before them. Hauing laced her Garments againe, shee makes the like shew of her naked fore-partes, hauing first taken away her hairy excrements, if of such there bee any: And then, whosoeuer best fancieth her, and shee him; they are allowed to be Man and Wife, prouided that he haue meanes to cloath and keepe her.

A dishonest fashion in matying Maids.

For my selfe, I condeme this custome as sauage and brutish, and hold the Cathayans to be very grosse people; albeit, they both say and beleeue, that the whole World (beside them) dooth see but with one eye, and they directlie with both. I confesse them to be of great spirit, in matter of Architecture, for (in all the World) are not to be seene more beautifull Temples, nor so richly elaborate Pallaces, Bridges, & other buildinges, then in that Country. Neither can any where else be seene, more goodly fashions of silken Cloathes, fine Linnen Cloathes, Cloath of Golde or Siluer, workes of Gold-Smitherie, Painters, and other ingenious Artificers. People for knowledge in Phisick, the Mathematiques, and Astrologie, they are not to be equalled. But in matter of ciuillity and pollicy, I protest they vnderstand iust nothing: in regard they compell their Daughters to discouer those partes, which ought to be with care concealed, and brute Beastes themselues doe obserue it. I am of the minde, that they should do much more honestly (notwithstanding their Custome) when they would haue their daughters to become wiues; to be contented with sight of their naked armes & Breasts: for if those parts do appeare to good liking, the rest of the bodie must needs be answerable. In like manner, it would be more ciuill and commendable, to follow the Law of Licurgus, who prohibited any guifts or dowries to be giuen to Maidens: to the end, that poore Mens Daughters might speede as well as the Rich do, and not blush to be seene as well behinde as before.

The Author's opinion concerning this bad Custome.

The Cathayans are people of great Spirit.

Learned Phisitions, Mathematicians and Astrologers.

Licurgus made another Law beside, that Maids should go to publike playes and daunces, starke naked, except little cut

Lycurgus his Law, for Maids to com naked to publike pastimes.

cut Buskins onely, which they wore on their Legges: and this he did for diuers reasons, whereof I will alledge some. The first was, because he noted, that many young Men were so enamoured of Maides and Women; that they became vtterly lost in iudgement, and forgot all man-hood, appearing rather to be brute Beasts, both in desire and heat, then any way endued with reason or gouernment. Such immoderate Amouristes, would euermore be present (he supposed) at such assemblies, their to behold their naked Goddesses, and seeing their vnsightly partes, so neere neighbouring to the receptacle of all vncleannesse and loathsome conuayance of the Bodie: they would distast and abhorre such slauish affection, and declare themselues of more manly carriage, and that such a wretched shape deserued no such torments, forbearance of Meate and Drinke, and many Night sleepes losses. Another reason was, that Maides should not bee ashamed of those partes which Nature had bestowed on them; but feare to commit any foule Act with them. For he vsed to say; that Maids and Women should blush rather to commit any sin, then to shew the necessary parts of their bodies.

Lycurgus his second reason

The follie of Maides and Women now adaies.

There are some Maids and Women now a-daies, who (I think) are perswaded, that Men doe desire they should haue great and fat Thighes, as the Cathayans did; because, they labour to ground this perswasion in Men, by their spacious, huge, and round circling Verdingales. Moreouer, they exceede the Cathayans, who onely were naked vnder their garments: but our Women can haue close Breeches or vnder-slops, not of meane matter; as of fine Linnen, Fustian, and such like; but of Sattin, Taffata, Veluet, Cloth of Gold and Siluer, though they openly shewe them not. For by our lawes, we hold and account them as infamous persons, that freelie, or without cause, doe shew such secrecy. Me thinkes it were more seemly for those Cathayans, to were close breeches of such rich stuffes, to adde thereby a grace and alluring to those parts, and so prouoke men the rather to seeke after them for mariage: then that they should be vsed by any Women among vs (in manner as I haue formerly said) not suffering them to be seen, much lesse to be toucht. I know not, whether they wear them for pride or profit, but this I am assured, that it hath giuen occasion to many men, to iudge strangely of such women, & to repute them scarse chast.

Women vsing to wear vnder breeches.

Aduise to the Maides and Women of Cathay.

Let vs then moone a question; to wit, whether women doe attract and allure more Suiters and Followers, rather by their nakednesse, then when they are seemly cloathed? For my selfe, I couet not to determine any thing, except by plurality of opinions; yea, of Men of good iudgment, who haue bin in those Regions and Countries, where Men and Women do vsually go naked; as in many places of Affrica, almost throughout the Indiaes; the Land of the Caribes; and in all the Brasiliane Territories (containing more then sixe or seauen hundred leagues) in which Countries are more goodly Women, and better formed, then are among vs. For ye shall finde none there, either corrupt in body, crooked, lame, or otherwise deformed. And yet they neuer knew that cruel law of Lycurgus, King of the Lacedemonians, which was; that euery Infant, Male or Female, appearing in birth to be mishapen, was presently put to death.

A pretty question mooued and answered

Countries where are very goodlie Women.

A cruell and bloody Law of Lycurgus.

All those Spaniards, Portugalles, French-men, Flemmings, and English-men, beside diuers others, that haue beene very conuersant in those partes, where the people goe daily naked, they haue affirmed: that such manner of going, is neither sightly nor pleasing, and that nothing makes a Woman to bee more dispised and contemned, then to behold her ordinarily naked. Wherefore I conclude, that the Cathayans are not to be imitated, that so freely discouer their parts of shame, onely thereby to gaine Husbands; nor the Affricanes, Indians, Caribes, or Brasilians, who goe naked, not for ostentation, but by Custome, either in regard of the countries great heate, or by not being acquainted with the vse of Garments: but rather wee ought to cloath and conceale those partes, which Nature her selfe hath placed so farre off, both from the sight of our selues and others. As expresly is discerned by the wordes of our Sauiour Iesus Christ, commending Charity aboue all thinges: in giuing meanes to the poore, whereby to cloth them, not only for their defence against heate, cold, raine, stormes, and byting Flyes; but also to hide their partes of shame.

CHAP. VI.

Of a good Custome among the Locrenses, or Locrians, that he who would be the Authour or maker of any new Law (if it were not allowed for good and profitable) must presently be hanged.

THere were sometimes a people, commonly called Locrians, and the Metropolitane Citty, was tearmed Locris, or Locros, scituate in the Countrey of Greece, neere adioyning to Beotia. This people, while liued vertuously, and admitted no innouation among their Countrey Lawes, but carefully kept them of their Predecessors; their Common weale continually flourished, and neuer could they be ouer-awed by Tyrants, where-with they were enuironed, and very much enuied, but rather made themselues much feared and admired.

The Citty Locris neere to Beotia.

And to preuent, that no man should be so bold, as to induce any nouell laws among them, whereby to vrge alteration of them so long embraced; they made an Edict, and thereby (according as Demosthenes recordeth) ordained: That euery Cittizen, that sought to bring in any new kind of Law, must come with an Halter about his Necke, and deliuer his Law publikely before al the people; to the end, that if the New Law were not receiueable, and highlie profitable to the Common-wealth; he might presently bee hanged, as a condigne recompence for his hasty forwardnesse.

The new law maker, must declare his Law, with a Halter about his necke.

In all well instituted Societies (saith Aristotle) and by Lawes well ordained, it behoueth to vse very diligent regard, not to diminish or change any thing, (how little soeuer it be) of the Lawes, and warily to fore-see matters, that (by little and litle) may intrude themselues. For if (then) resistance bee not vsed, it will fall out as in a disease of the bodie, whereto, if at the beginning of the sicknesse, prompt remedy be not applyed: the disease so increaseth by slow degrees; that that which (at first) might easily haue beene holpen, becommeth (by negligence) quite incurable.

Aristotles rule for well ordered Societies.

A good Similitude.

The first signe to be obserued in an Estate, tottering towardes ruine, is, when we behold vnbridled liberty, and facility in dispencing with good ordinances; nothing being daily more listened vnto, then flying nouelties, tales, and rumours: because Law is a singuler reason, imprinted and stamped in Nature, commaunding thinges which ought to be done, and prohibiting the contrarie. The Ethnicks were much more conscientious in keeping their Lawes, then Christians; for, if we would looke into many Lawes of the Emperours and Christian Kinges: we should finde no meane store of Nouell Lawes, forged in fauour of some one; and them of more Antiquitie, to be either quite cut off, or much modified. Following the opinion of Machiauell, who hath left written: That a Prince may make laws, contrary to them of auncient standing, prouided, they be for his owne profit.

The euident apparance of a lost Estate.

Ethnickes more obseruant of lawes, then Christians.

A wicked aduise of Machiauell.

It was demaunded of Archidamus, Sonne to Zeuxidamus, King of the Lacedemonians, what were they that presided and commaunded in the Citty of Sparta? He made aunswere, that they were the Lawes. Surely, his reply was to good purpose, for in a well gouerned Common-wealth, chiefe authoritie is to be referred to the Lawes: for it is not permitted to any Magistrate, either to attempt against, or decline from the Lawes. Another, named Pausanias, and likewise King of Sparta, beeing asked; whether it were any great offence, to swerue from the auncient Lawes, and leane to them new made: replied, that it was a very great crime. For (quoth he) it behoueth that Lawes should haue authoritie among men, and not men among Lawes.

The aunswer of Pausanias.

Chilo, one of the Wise-men of Greece said: That all Men were bound to obey the Lawes; and Princes themselues ought not to be exempted from them. Crœsus, King of Lydia, demaunded of Pitacus the Mitilenian; Where was the best and cheefest Gouernment, who answered. It is in that that place, where the Lawes haue Soueraign authority; for there Tyranny (how little soeuer) could gaine no admittance. The saying of Agesilaus. Agisilaus, King of the Lacedemonians, said; That the multitude of Lawes, resembled the multitude of Phisitians, who, where they abounded, the like abounding of Diseases was found. In like manner, Where were plenty of Lawes, there likewise was the greater store of Vices.

The saying of Heraclitus. Heraclitus the Ephesian, said: A Man of Honour ought (no iot lesse) to hazzard his life for the Lawes, then for the Walles of his Country: Because (quoth he) a Cittie may subsist without Walles, but not without Lawes. Lawes vtterly vnprofitable in France. At this day, Lawes seeme to litle purpose in France; for the good haue no need of them, and the wicked or vicious care not for keeping any one of them. By the precedent discourse, and sententious sayings of many worthy men, it plainely appeareth, that for the best conseruation of any Common weale, and to keep it in continuall flourishing; the ancient lawes ought strictly to be obserued, and no easie admittance of any new, because it giues way to euill disposed persons first to decline from them, and then (afterward) to trouble the quiet of the State.

CHAP. VII.

Of the strange life of Diogenes, the Cynick Philosopher; with a breefe repetition of some of his witty sayings, propositions, and answeres.

Five seuerall Men named Diogenes. I Finde among good and credible Authors, that there were fiue seuerall Men, all of them bearing the name of Diogenes, and each of them, both for his vertue & singuler learning, wel deserued report to posterity. Howbeit, omitting all the rest, our present purpose is, to speake onely of Diogenes, the Cynick Philosopher; whose learning, life, and rare qualities, though they seemed strange and vnimitable, yet their foundation was vertue and goodnesse. He liued continually in voluntary powerty, exposing his body to all toil and trauaile. The life of Diogenes in willing powerte, and his prouision against al extremities In Summer, his lodging was on the Sand, in the sight and heate of the Sun; to arme him with patience against violent warmths. In Winter, he would embrace huge Statues of Snow and Ice, for better inuring himselfe to the extreamity of cold. His feeding was on grosse Viands, and none of the best neither; to the end, he might neuer perish for want of sustenance. He neuer had any certaine place, where hee might determine his absolute abiding: but whersoeuer hee came and stayed; there he fed, drank, and slept. He would neuer speake, except cause required, and looke what Garment he wore all the day, the same was his Couerlet likewise all the night season. He had a certaine Scrip or Wallet, wherein he kept all his Victuals together; and a Staffe, which serued him as his Horse, when he felt himselfe sickely or weary. A Woodden Dish was his Cup to drinke in, whersoeuer he trauailed: but, beholding a Boy (one day) drinke Water in his hand, he brake his Dish in peeces, saying; Why should Art finde me a Vessell to drinke in, when Nature hath bestowed one much better on me? Diogenes refused all things whereof he had no neede. The like did he by a Woodden Trencher; seeing another Man make vse of one made of bread, and did eate it afterward, to piece out his dinner.

This Philosopher spent the most part of his dayes in Athens, which hee had made his retirement, beeing banished from his owne Gountrey. Diogenes liued in Athens, and dwelt in a tun. A Tun or great Tub (open at the one end) a long time was his House and dwelling; all things else being contemptible to him, but Vertue onely, and great was his feare to commit any sin. His contempt of Riches. As for riches and honour, he counted them as nothing; but helde them in like slight regard, as he did them that enioyed them. It was an vsual saying with him, that he did not a little admire Mens vanity, in quarrelling and killing one another, for Dignity on the way, or taking the wall: neuer beholding any contention in them, who should excell each other in vertue. His comparison of an ignorant rich man. A rich ignorant or vnlearned Man, he alwaies compared to a golden Sheep; that had a goodly fleece, but no goodnesse else. And when he demaunded any thing that was needful for him, he said, he did it not in begging maner, but but as asking due reſtitution; for that the goods of rich men, were properlie gathered to be the poores inheritance, becauſe they wer gathered of the poor.

How Diogenes inſtructed Beggars to get an Almes.

He had a certaine behauiour, which (in outwad apparance) ſeemed to ſauor of folly, and yet it had a miſterious and concealed vnderſtanding. Many times he would reſort to Images and Statues of ſtone or wood, and make an humble requeſt for an almes; as if he had ſpoken an liuing perſons, & his reaſon was: that heereby hee learned patient ſufferance, becauſe men would as ſoone deny poor men charity, as thoſe dumb Images did when he deſired an Almes, he made no exception of perſons, but vſed theſe words. If thou vſe to giue any charity to the poor, the let not me paſſe without ſomwhat; for I am the neediest of all other. But if (as yet) thou haſt neuer giuen to any man, begin with me, and it will teach thee how to beſtow on others. Comming (on a time) into a certaine mans houſe, who ſometimes had beene wealthy, but his eſtate was now very poore: he found, that he had nothing to ſup withall, but a poore Sallet of ſower herbs; whereupon, he ſaid to him. Had thy former diet beene no better, thou haddſt been ſure now of a better ſupper. Whereby he gaue him to vnderſtand, that his riotous and lauiſh waſt before, made him now to vſe neceſſitie as a vertue. Being demaunded at an other time; what biting of any Beaſt was moſt dangerous? He anſwered. Among wilde beaſts, the ſlanderer and backe-biter: & among the tamer ſort, the flatterer. One asked of him; for what cauſe Gold looked ſo pale and wan complexioned? Becauſe (quoth he) all men (like Theeues) lie in waite to ſurpriſe it. Another man aſked him, if he wanted a Seruant; and he told him no. Who ſhall then bury thee (quoth the other) when thou art dead? Any he (ſaid Diogenes) that will dwell in my houſe. Some were deſirous to know of him, when was the fitteſt time for marriage; and he replied: Young Men may marry at all times for leaſurable repentance; but old men may tarrie, for little is their need; inferring thereby, that marriage (in neither age) required ouermuch haſtineſſe.

His own kind of begging an Almes.

To a prodigal men talne into pouerty.

For Backe-biters and Flatterers.

For the complexion of Gold.

A fit time for marriage in young or old.

Thus, as Diogenes was free both in life and behauiour, ſo was he likewiſe in any words paſſing from him. For, as on a day he went thorow a ſtreet, and beheld a goodly houſe, belonging to a Lord of very diſhonorable life; looking theron more aduiſedly, hee perceiued (in faire Carracters) engrauen ouer the Gate, theſe words: No diſhoneſt perſon hath here any entrance. Turning himſelfe ſuddenly about, to ſuch as then paſſed by him, he ſaid: If this Inſcription be true, which way doth the Lord and Maſter enter into his owne houſe? Not long after, trauailing into the Country, he came (by chance) to a little Village, altogether as poore, as ſillily peopled: yet the gates thereof were extraordinarily great & ſpacious, whereat, falling into a loude laughter, he ſaid. Be wiſe ye Inhabitants, and ſhut vp your wide Gates betimes, or elſe all your Towne will run out by their meanes. He chanced to paſſe by a company of Archers ſhooting in Croſſe-bows, among whom there was one very meanly practiſed, for ſtill he ſhot faire and farre off from the marke; which when Diogenes noted, euer as that man ſhot, he would enter in, and ſtand directly before the But; and beeing demaunded why he did ſo? He anſwered. Heere is my ſafeſt ſtanding, when this man ſhooteth, for here (I am ſure) he meanes not to hit me. Looking on a young Lad, very well proportioned of body, but wicked in qualities: Alas my Boy (quoth he) why doſt thou tary ſo bad a ſword, in ſo ſeemely a Scabberd?

Of a faire and goodly building.

Of a litle Towne with great Gates.

Of an vnskilfull Archer.

Of a fair Boy with foule conditions.

There were diuers, who commended a man that had giuen a ſmal gift to Diogenes, to whom he ſaid: Why do ye not much rather commend me, that deſerued it, before he had the wit to giue it? Vnderſtanding thereby, that it is better to deſerue a fauour, then to performe it vpon due deſert. He neuer vſed to aske Money, as a guiſt from any man, yet (contrary to his cuſtome) he once required a great ſum of Money of a prodigall Companion; who being offended thereat, ſaide: Why doſt thou vrge me in ſuch an vnreaſonable requeſt? Whereto he anſwered. I aske of other men reaſonably, as hoping often to ſpeed with them: but my demand is thus liberall to thee, becauſe I intend to moue thee no more; taxing (heereby) his immeaſurable expences. Whence proceedes it (quoth one vnto him) that men more gladly giue their Almes to the Lame, Blinde, Gouty, diſeaſed and diſmembred, then to Philoſophers and Men of learning? Whereto his anſwere (in my conceit) conceit) was apt and excellent, saying: Such is their bounty, because they feare to become sooner diseased like them, then any hope they haue of euer beeing Philosophers, or so much as louers of learned men. The sayings and wise answeres of this Philosopher, were almost infinite, and I may the easier passe them, as being well knowne to the whole world.

He was very iudicious, discreet, and deeply learned in al the Sciences; for he was Scholler to Antisthenes, in the life time of Plato and Aristotle, and dispised all Arts that were vnprofitable, & them that studied them, more for curious knowledge, then the exercise of vertue. He reproued Astrologers, that gazed on the heauens, and regarded not what they held in their hands. He would tell Musitions, that they could better tune their Instrumeuts, then temper their owne disordered affections. When he heard an Astronomer argue skilfully of the Stars, he demanded of him; When he came last out of heauen? To a Logitian, that (by Sophisticall Arguments) laboured to disproue all motion; he scorned to make him any other answere, but walking vp and downe before him, saide. What, is this motion, or no? The renowne of this Philosopher did extend it selfe so largely through the world, that Alexander the great comming to Athens; desired to see and confer with him, of diuers matters concerning vertue. At length, Alexander said vnto him. I perceiue Diogenes, that thou art poore, and standest in need of many things: wherefore, demaund what thou wouldst haue, and I will giue it thee. To whom Diogenes replied. Which of vs two dost thou thinke is in most necessity? Either I, who desire nothing but my woodden dish to drinke in, and the least morsell of bread: or thou, that art king of Macedon, and yet exposest thy life to multitudes of perils, onely for further extent of thine Empire, insomuch, as the whole world sufficeth not thine auarice?

Diogenes on a time, was surprized by certain Athenian Pirats, yet his hart and speech neuer faild him in prison, but being brought to a place, where he should bee sold to him that offered most for him: a Merchant comming thither, demaunded of the Trumpeter, who had the charge to sell him, by what authority he exposed him to sale, and whether he were a bond man or no? Whereupon Diogenes said to the Trumpeter: Tel this man, that thou wilt sell him a Seruant, that knoweth how to commaund and gouerne his Maister. Aulus Gellius and Macrobius doe affirme, that he made this answer to Geniades, who was the man that bought him, and brought him to his Inne; Diogenes said to his new Maister. Take heede Geniades, for now it stands thee vpon, to be obedient to whatsoeuer I shall councell or command thee. Whereto Geniades replied, that it were against all reason, for the Seruant to commaund his Maister. Diogenes answered. If a sick man do chance to buy a wise skilfull Phisition: shall not hee doe well to obey, and follow his councell? In like manner, if an vntutored Mariner (for his safer conduct) happen to buy a cunning Pilot, will not his passage be the freer from perill? If this appeare to be profitable, in cases of sicke and bodily infirmity, or preseruation of life from infinite dangers: how much more then is his merit, that knowes how to order and direct the Soule, being respected but as a wise and vnderstanding Philosopher? All these sayings were well obserued by Geniades, for hee vsed the aduise of Diogenes in all his businesse, and made him Maister of his Children, to their no little benefit and aduancement. In this manner, and with such exercises, Diogenes liued the space of ninety years.

Some hold opinion, that he died by by the byting of a Dog. But others doe affirme, that when he saw himselfe to be old and feeble, without strength, or any longer desire of life: containing still the same constancy and courage wherein he had formerly liued: he caused his owne death, the very same day that Alexander the Great dyed. A little before he yeelded vp the Ghost, his Schollers perceiuing him so neere his end, desired to know, where he intended to be buryed? He replied, that hee would haue them leaue him in the open fieldes vnburied. They maruailing hereat, told him, that therein he was not well aduised, because, beeing left in that manner, the Birdes and Beastes would feede vppon him. Why then (quoth he) lay my staffe by me, and I will keepe the Birdes and Beastes from comming neere me. At this answere they fell a laughing, saying; it were in vaine to do so, because the dead do neyther see nor feele. Why then (quoth he)

CHAP. VIII.

Of diuers and variable Natures in Men, beyond vsuall and naturall inclination, and whence the occasions doe proceede.

THe diuersity of complexions, and inclinations in Men, is a matter very marualous, and greatly to be considered; for among so many as we doe daily behold, there are very few, or scarcely any to bee found, that are conformable in Nature one to another. You shall see some one man, that cannot abide some one kinde of meat; And others say, that there is no tast or relish in their meat. Some will say, that they cannot feede well, but in company; And others, doe take no delight in their food, except they do eate it alone by themselues. All which variety of accidents, doe plainely testifie the great power of God, and of his vncircumscribed wisedome; who pleased to send such strange kinde of complexions, among so great a multitude of men. For let vs admit the case, that man had still enioyed the benefit of his owne free-will; yet it is most euident, that diuers dispositions & actions, variable promptitudes, complexions, and conditions, (next vnto the will of God) are occasioned by influences of the Stars and Planets, as second causes and instruments, wherewith God is serued, because they haue a working in inferior bodies. And in regard, that among such an infinite multitude of men, there are som things more notable and apparant, then frequent or common: we will make some short discourse of them, according as they are set down and iustified by good and approued Authours.

Seneca writeth of a Man named Senecius, who was very rich, but of strange and extraordinary condition: for all thinges that he would haue to doe him seruice, must be of excessiue greatnesse, or else he could not endure them. The Cuppes and Glasses wherein he vsed to drinke, hee bought them of such hugenesse, as hardly could he lift them with both his hands. He sought to haue Horses for his riding, of monsterous stature; and that which was much more ridiculous, hee would weare shooes, which were foure or fiue times bigger then his feet. He alwaies vsed to goe very fast in the streetes, and still on tip-toe, as we tearme it; to seeme more great & high, then he was by nature. He could neuer abide Women of low stature; but coueted and fancied such as were hugely big and taule. He would neuer eare Figges, Oliues, Pease, Chiches, or such like small Fruites; for he contained the same affection in all other things. His garments were so long, that they trailed after him in the streets, the like he did both at bed and boord: so that vpon this immeasurable appetite, he was cõmonly cald, Senecius the great. Pliny writeth of Marcus Crassus, Grandfather to the other Marcus Crassus the Triumuir, that was slaine by the Parthians: and he tearmeth him Agelastus, because he was neuer seene to smile or laugh. We read of Socrates, that he was neuer beheld more pleasant or melancholly, at one time, then at another. And Pomponius the Poet, who neuer belched or brake wind vpward or downward. Marke Anthony neuer vsed to spit at any time. It is a matter against Nature, which the learned Pontanus writes of himself; that he neuer felt any stitch, pricking, or ach in his bodie: albeit, he would sometimes wilfully fall on the ground, and yet notwithstanding, hee could feele no paine. In the same place, which is in his book of heauenly things, he speaketh of another man, who neuer in all his life time, did drink either wine or water. But Ladislaus, King of Naples, once compelled him to drinke, and it much endangered his life. I know not if that bee more admirable, which Theophrastus writes, of a man named Peninus; that in his whole life time, did neither eate or drinke any thing else but water. Aristotle speaketh of a certaine Maiden, who being in her infancy norished with poyson: could as well digest it all her life time after, euen as we doe our naturall food. Albertus Magnus giueth credible assurance, that hee saw at Cullen in

S. Augustine declareth, that he saw a man in his time, who could moue his eares like as a horse doth, one while the one, and afterward the other, and then again both of them together: howbeit, Aristotle maintaineth, that man onelie (among all other Creatures) cannot stir or moue his eares. He saith moreouer, that without stirring his head, or touching it with his handes; hee could raise or lift vp al the haires on his head, and make them fall flat vpon his face: afterward, he could likewise raise them againe, and return them orderly to their due places, which (questionlesse) was very strange, and argued admirable dexterity. He further declareth, that he saw diuers men, which could counterfeit the notes and singing of Birds; so naturally (and with such perfection) with their mouths, that very Birds were beguiled by them; witnesse a Moderne and late Vicount. He tels of one beside, that had a strange kinde of cunning (though discommendable and beastly) in breaking winde so readily below, and with such variety of sound; as if hee had sung to some musicke. In breefe, we read of infinite things, quite contrary to common vse; both concerning the sences of hearing and sight, as in legerity of race.

Strabo the sharp sighted. Solinus and Pliny do both testifie of a man named Strabo, who in the time of the Punick war, could (from one of the Promontories of Scicilie) discerne the Shippes setting forth from the Port of Carthage in Affrica, and count them one by one; albeit, the distance was more then fiue and fiftie leagues. They speake also of Amistis, the Lacedemonian, opposing himselfe to Philonides (who was noursed and brought vp with Alexander the Great) auouching, that they did runne aboue a thousand and two hundred stades, which are more then an hundred and threescore thousand paces. They adde moreouer, that a Page or Lacky of the age of nine yeares, did runne (from mid day to night) the full distance of seuenty and fiue thousand paces. Quintus Curtius, in the History of Alexander, speaketh of a Man named Phillip, who was Brother to Lysimachus; he being armed, did follow Alexander, (riding in great hast) on foot, without any stay or breathing (as we vse to say) the space of two hundred stades, which containe foure and twenty miles in Geometry. Plato writeth of Socrates, that no man liuing could endure so much trauaile and paines as he; yet would he neuer rest, although he might do it. Beside, such hunger and thirst, (as was able to kil any other man) he could abide without any annoiance, oftentimes following the wars daily, without any wearinesse or debility. When he had aboundance of victuals, he would eat no more then at any other time. In times of greatest frosts and colds, when no other men durst be seen out of their tents and dwellinges, except they were well wrapt in Furs: Socrates would walke abroad in no other garment, then that he wore in Summer, and go barefooted in the Ices and Snowes, distasting it no more, then they that were best hosed & shod. One while he wold stand a whole daies space vpright on his feet, without mooving or stirring out of the same place: then would he (afterward) walke all the whole night, without any signe or shew of desiring sleepe.

Pliny maketh mention of a certaine man, whose sight was so excellent, and his hand so ready; that he wrote all the Iliades of Homer, in the compasse of so much Paper, as he could very easily enclose within a Nut shell. The same Pliny (warranted also by Solinus) maketh report of one called Callicrates, who was such an ingenious Sculpture and Caruer; that he could make Flyes and Ants in Iuory, so small, and yet so absolutely perfect, that it behooued such as would see them, to haue a very cleare sight.

It is a matter very meruailous, concerning both good and euill properties or qualities in diuers people. For, it is most notorious, that ther are both men and women in many places, whose eies are very venomous, and by looking intentiuely vpon a thing: the very acuitie or piercing subtilty of the sight, doth (in the meane while) both infect, and performe apparant harme, and when it is done on children, it is cald, bewitching by the eye. Solinus and Pliny do affirme, that there was Family in Affrica, who had the priuiledge, that if (in anger) they looked looked vpon any Fielde or Meddow, it dried vp immediatly; the like they did to Trees, and were the death of many Infants. In Scythia also there were Women of the same quality. Our auncient Phisitions haue experimented, & some (of latter times) doe confesse, that there are men in the world, of very venomous Nature; not onely by their sight, but likewise by their spittle. The blood of a red and freckled Man (if it be taken from him while he is enraged) is very venomous: yet God hath giuen the benefit to some men, by their spittle, to heale the byting of a mad Dogge, though others (thereby) can doe great iniury. These properties are to be known in cases of lesser efficacy. For it is most certaine, that let some man kill any Foule, they will suddenly fall into such putrifaction; as hardly any stomack can endure to feed on them. Againe, let such a party salt any meat; the flesh cannot possibly receiue the salt, but corrupteth presently, and yet the like (as hath been tried) could not be done by another body.

Pliny further auoucheth, that (in his time) there was a Kinred or Linage of people neere Rome, the men whereof, would go thorow any fire, without the least scorching. There was also another Family, who were called Marsi; and they could heale the biting of Serpents, onely by the touch of their handes, as is approoued by many good Authours. These things are to be credited, especially when Pliny affirmeth any matter for certain; then boldly may faith be giuen to his wordes: though many times hee speaketh of things, which may seeme to deserue little beleefe. But then it is to be noted, that he neuer maintaineth any thing, as by heare-say from others; but onely such as himselfe hath seene or experimented.

Plin. lib. 7. Cap. 3.

Men that heale the biting of Serpents.

Pliny is a good and sufficient testimony.

That which Suetonius writeth of the Emperour Tiberius, is also very admirable, for he saith; that when hee rose in the night, although he was in neuer so obscure a place, and without any light: yet could he see (for a long whiles continuance) as perfitly, as if a lighted Candle had stood by him, yet, soone after, he could not discerne any thing. Quintus Curtius, and many other Authours say the same; that when Alexander the Great was in any sweat, it yeilded (of it selfe) a most sweete and pleasant sauour.

Many more haue written of sundrie men, priuiledged by very strange & no common qualities: but because in such arguments as these, I haue affected and aymed at breuity, I need wander no further in this discourse. For I perswade my selfe, that a sufficient view may bee had of Mens strange complexions, by these alledged examples, deriued from true testimonies, and ancient Historiographers worthy of credit: not warranted by Poets or Fatists, from whom I make no account to fetch any verity. CHAP. IX.

Of the great and large extendure of the Romaine Empire: Also, how, and in what time it began to decline and waxe feeble.

IT is most apparant, that not any other consideration, can deliuer more certaine & intire knowledge, concerning the instability of worldly occasions; then that of the great and large extendure, which sometime belonged to the Romaine Empire, comparing it with that small portion, which the Emperours of Rome haue since then enioyed. For, in ancient & elder times, the most part of that, which is contayned and inhabited in Europe and Affrica, was subiect to the Romaine Empire, and likewise a great part of Asia. Thereto was subiected Fraunce, Spaine, England, Germanie, withall the Prouinces of Italie, and the Mediterranean Islandes: All Greece, Thrace, Hungaria, Polonia, Dacia, and as wee haue alreadie said, the very greatest part of Affrica, Mauritania,

The Romaine Empire is witnesse of the Worlds inconstancy.

The greatnes of the Romaine Empire in elder times, and how largely her limits extended.

nia, Numidia, Carthage, Lybia; and (beside great store of Realmes and Prouinces) Ægipt, and all her Confines. In Asia, Arabia, Siria, Iudea, Palestine, and Mesopotamia, they went through with their powers, and extended their dominion, euen to the famous Riuers Tigris and Euphrates: which happened in the time of the Emperor Traiane, who stretched his limits so far as the East Indiaes, conquering the Cities of Seleucia, Ctesiphonta, and Babylon, making Prouinces also of Armenia and Albania. In former daies, they had all the lesser Asia, Pontus, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Galatia, Bithinia, Cappadocia, and so many other Regions; as I know not when I should make an end, if I were to name them particularly. All which goodly length, and large scope, became restrained (through the pusillanimity of some Emperours) into one onely and little part of Allemaigne or Germany, and Italy: wherfore we will declare how, in what manner, and when this huge Empire began to diminish.

The Empire restrained into a small part of Germany and Italy.

The principall and most notable wound, which the Romaine Empire receiued, and the very originall of her ruine; proceeded from the Gothes, a people greatly renouned in Armes, descended from the Northerne Scithia, to destroy and ruinate al the rest of the world beside. But to deliuer the matter in due forme, I must make a backe retreate for a while, to recite breefely the whole History. For I would amply describe, how many times the Gothes haue molested and affronted this Empire; how many Prouinces they destroyed; and how often they were repulsed; what victories they obtained, and yet were also vanquished by the Emperors and Romaine Captaines. But the discourse would be ouer long, and therfore it shal content me, to keep the same course we haue already continued, with breuitie and best order to please the Readers.

The Empires first wound grew from the Gothes.

To auoide confusion of opinions, I will forbeare to dispute, from what part of Scythia they descended; or making declaration, which were they that named themselues Ostrogoths, and others Vuisigoths; because heerein is no difference, but that the Ostrogoths liued more towardes the East. To conclude this point, they were all Gothes, and so will I name them, without any other note or difference among them. Passing ouer many things, that neede no repitition; Cornelius Tacitus writeth, that in the time of the Emperour Domitian, the Gothes enterprized to make war on the Romaine Empire. And, in some short while after, the Emperor Traiane took truce and peace with them; hauing first receiued assurance from them (vppon great promises) that they should abide at home in their Countries quietly in peace, and so they continued for the space of ninety yeares. But this time being expired, they began to rise againe, and make another entrance vppon the Empires lands: against which attempt, the Emperor Antoninus made opposition, and vanquished them. Twenty years after, they became incensed againe, and assayed to passe the Riuer Danubius; wherein they were hindred by the Emperour Gordianus. Ten yeares after, being aduertised of his death, and in the time of the Emperor Phillip; they leuied an Army of three hundred thousand men, and subdued the Countries of Thrace and Misia, without any abilitie of resistance. Made proud with these victories, long time after the death of Phillip; they renewed warre againe, in the raigne of Decius his successor, and entering by the Country of Rome, Decius (in good equipage) got before them, and gaue them battaile. In which resistance (after cruell effusion of blood) the Romaines lost the day; and there remained Decius, who neuer after was seene, eyther aliue or dead, and there likewise died his Sonne.

The Emperor Antoninus vanquished the Gothes.

The Gothes army of 30000. men.

The Romaines conquered by the Gothes.

Afterward, all the Successors (well neere) of Decius, did euermore carrie themselues weakly in their wars against them: so that, in the time of the Emperor Valerian (who was conquered by Sapor King of Persia) the Goths made themselues Maisters of Thrace and Macedon, and also of Bythinia and Nitomedia in Asia, yet were they valiantly fought withall, and discomfited in Achaya, by Macrinus. Matters proceeding in this manner, when Claudius (second Emperor of that name) came to succeede in the Empire; he gaue them battell, euen one of the most cruell and deadly, that any Histories doe make mention of. For it is most certaine, that three hundred thouthousand Gothes perished in this fight. The rest that remained, the Emperour was victorious ouer, and expelled them out of those Countries which they had formerly gayned: Moreuer, he surprized such an huge number of them, that there was not one house in the Empire, but it had a Goth Slaue in it. Their so often restauration, and re-assembling in warre, after so many ouerthrowes was receyued by diuers Emperors, was an euident Testimony of their great multitude and power: for continually (after such great destructions) they would returne a fresh in armes to the field, euen as if they had sustained no losse at all.

The strength and multitude of the Gothes.

The king, and fifty thousand Gothes slaine.

It happened within a while after, that the Emperour Æmilianus bad them battell in his owne person, wherein was slain their King Canobius, with fiftie thousand Gothes beside, that stroue to renewe the warre again; so that (then) they seemed as vtterly ruinated. But growing to bee repeopled, in the reuolution of 30. yeares: they mustred infinit troopes together, to bee reuenged of their passed harde fortunes; and being an army of mightie power, possessed themselues of Sarmatia. By meanes whereof, the Emperour Constantine the Great (who was gone to Constantinople, purposing there to keepe his Imperiall seat) made head against them, so foyling and killing them; that the Gothes) weary of vanquishing, and beeing vanquished) desired truce of Constantine, and afterware peace, and did him seruice in war, against Lycinius, as formerly they had done the like to the Emperor Maximianus, against the Parthians. In this maner, by many Confederacies & Friendships with the Romans, they receiued warwages of them, because they were reputed very valiant and warlicke Souldiours. Since which last rout or ouerthrow, they liued quietly for more then threescore yeares, in Scythia, whence they first parted: and now they became to be no more feared, because they seemed as vtterlie bruised with their passed Trauailes; and therefore, were verie gladde to liue in quiet.

Constantine the Great, conquereth the Gothes.

Another Nation cald the Hunnes, dwelling by the Riphean Mountaines.

The foresaid time was no sooner ended, but it fortuned, that another people, called Hunnes (who were likewise of Scythia, and neere neighbouring to the Riphean Mountaines) warring with great spleene and hatred against them; & scorning that they should inhabite so neare them: became Conquerors of them, and (prouing the stronger side) chased the Gothes out of their Countries. They perceiuing their great number, and yet to be thus violently expulsed (being compelled by meere necessity) did send their Ambassadors to the Emperor Valens, intreating him, that he would giue them some Country to liue in, and (as his Vassailes) they would obey him. Whereto the Emperor condiscended, and suffering them to passe Danubie, gaue them the Country of Misia, according as Orosius Writeth; where they held and liued in peace, vntill two Captaines belonging to the Emperor Valens, named Maximus and Lycinius (who had parted and deuided the places of their abiding, and kept there as a Guard for the Countrey) vsed them badly, tyrannically robbing them, and (thorough extreame Auarice) compelling them almost to vtter famishment.

The Gothes sued to the Emperor Valens for an abiding place.

Maximus and Lycinius, Captaines te the Emp. Valens.

Heereuppon, they were enforced to enter Armes, and to vse by force, that which by loue and fair meanes was denied them. So passing on further then their limitation, they entered Thrace, destroying, robbing the Country, burning and wasting the Cities and Townes al along as they went. Against this impetuositie and violence, the Emperor Valens opposed himselfe, presenting them battaile, wherein he was vanquished; and beeing wounded with a Dart, was fain to flie and saue himselfe in a Village house, where the Gothes (being Victours) put fire to it, and burned him therein. Pursuing their fortunate successe, they besieged the City of Constantinople, which was worthilie defended by Dominica, Wife to the Emperor Valens.

The Gothes enter into armes againe.

The Emperor Valens foyled and burnd by the Gothes.

Gratian, Nephew to the Emperor Valens, succeeded the Empire, during whose raigne, the Gothes (glorying in such a victory) assailed the Romaine Empire; and made warre in so many places thereof, that it was in great daunger to bee lost. Which Gratian perceiuing, as also the danger and distresse hee was in (hearing the great renowne of Theodosius, born in Spaine, a very valiant man both in peace and warre) he elected him as his companion in administration of the Empire, creating him Captaine, to controule the pride and fury of the Gothes. Imitating the Emperor Nerua, successor to Domitian; rian, who seeing himselfe to grow Olde, & the Empire fall into much decadence, made choise of good Traiane (borne also in the same Cittie of Spaine) who (by his wisedome and valour) not only defended the Empire, but likewise augmented it, in large extendure of Lands and Riches, more then any other did. In this maner, Gratian chose Theodosius (whom manie reputed neere Kinsman to Traian) and he became so worthy a Captaine, and afterward so wise an Emperor, that he hadde many victories against the Goths, of whō hee slaughtered so great a number: that he compelled them to begge peace, and yeild themselues tributary to the Romain Empire, bereauing them of all that they formerly vsurped, and abated thē in such sort, that (all his life time) they were peaceable subiects to him, and tooke pressemony of him, to serue in his wars; beside, they had neither king nor Captain (while hee raigned) but such as hee allowed them.

Theodosius vanquished the Gothes, and made them tributarie to the Romaine Empire.

So remained the Empire of Rome in peace, and restored (by him) to her first authority, albeit it was not accomplished without much trauaile, and great aduenture of his person. But after the death of Theodosius, this great Dominion turned topsie turuy (as we shall relate) although it was daily augmented so much in 1100. yeares. After which time, it fell into such decadence, as neuer (since then) could it be releeued: except by the Nouell recidiuation, which it had by Mahomet, and reduced it into the same pouerty, wherein the greatnesse thereof first tooke Originall.

CHAP. X.

The History of the Romaine Empire, further prosecuted, vvith the Successe of the Gothes, and their Surprizall of Rome.

THeodosius dying, leste two Sonnes, the one named Honorius, and the other Arcadius, with one daughter called Placida; betweene whome, he deuided his Empire. Now, because they were verie young, and vncapeable of gouernment, hee left them two notable Tutors; the one, called Ruffinus, the other Stellico: Ruffinus, for the Countries in the East, and Stellico for Italy and the West. This Stellico was a verie worthy Captaine, wise, and prouident; and the other (being euery way as valiant) pursued high and famous enterprizes. Whereupon, enuy and ambitious thirst of rule, got footing between them; and they perceiuing the Princes to be ouer yong, applied their seueral practises vpon the Empire; Ruffinus for himself, but Stellico for his Sonne. Now, because this could not be easily compassed, in regarde that the people of the Empire bare affection vnto the sonnes of Theodosius, remembering the Vertues and goodnes of their father: these climbing spirites (in the couertest manner they could deuise) both desired and sought all meanes, whereby to throw Warre and distresse vppon the Empire. For they being men of great imploiment might thereby continually command, & preserue their awfull authority ouer the people.

Practising against the yong Princes, by their Tutors.

Moreouer, by such election as might be made of them (as formerly had beene done of Consulles and Captaines) they might (as occasions gaue way) entermeddle in the gouernment of the Empire.

The first of them that made discouerie of his intent, was Ruffinus; for hauing (by some quiet means) prouoked strangers to make warre; and he being elected Captaine or Chiefe Commander, assayed to haue himselfe named Emperor; wherein failing, for this presumption he was put to death by the apointment of Honorius, who (by this time) was growne to pretty stature. Stellico, who was much more ingenious, and better knewe how to play with time, hauing ioyned Arcadius in mariage with one of his daughters: forestalled (thereby) all suspition of any badde thought in him. Yet notwithstanding, seeking all apt waies to compasse his enterprize, he secretly sollicited the Gothes, the Vandals, the Hunnes, and other barbarous Nations, to rise against the Empire, assayling them himselfe sometimes, and meerely prouoking them to Warre. Besides, hee sent Messengers to them, to giue them hope, that they might easilye conquer diuers countries in the Empire: all which he did, vnder absolute perswasion, of being elected Generall (as we haue alreaalready ſaid) knowing himſelfe to bee the moſt able man for armes that thoſe times afforded. For, albeit Honorius and Arcadius were then tall youths; yet their care (as yet) extended not to the Countreyes Gouernment, as Princes ought to do.

The Gothes bring a potent army.

Now came the Gothes with a main army, and Stellico beeing choſen Captaine againſt them, obtained ſome fewe victories: but they were in ſuch ſort, that no generall Conqueſt was intended, but only to lengthen out the warre without finiſhing; yet heereby he won himſelfe ſuch reputation, that whatſoeuer he did, needed no other approbation. In the meane while, the Gothes elected Alarick as their King, who went into Italy with a mighty army, againſt whome, Stellico oppoſed himſelfe very powerfully: and although he had much diſaduantaged the Gothes and their King, yet it was plainly perceiued, that greater matters might haue bin performed, had he bin ſo pleaſed. Alarick who was a man of great fore-ſight, and of good vnderſtanding, diſcerned apparantly, that Stellico deſired no concluſion of the warre, leaſt then his means of commanding ſhould ceaſe: for, by a ful conqueſt, he could not attend the comming of ſom other barbarous nations, as namely the Vandals, who hee knew certainely would attempt againſt the Empire; and he being diſcended of their Nation, conceiued the greater hope, that (by their helpe and fauour) hee ſhould the eaſier ſeize on the Empire, and ſo aduaunce his ſonne thereto.

The Gothes entred Italy in armes.

Stellico ſeeketh to prolong the war againſt the Gothes.

In this maner, Alarick being throughly acquainted with the drift of Stellico; priuately aduertiſed Honorius thereof, deſiring that he would graunt him peace, becauſe he ſought nothing elſe, but ſome ſmall Countrey to liue in, with his people; in ſigne whereof, hee tendered him his faithfull ſeruice. The Emperor being thus certified of theſe proceedings; and looking into the cunning Stratagems, with all other ſuſpitions inducing to the purpoſe; clearly perceiued the intention of Stellico. Neuertheleſſe, he diſſembled (as yet) all apprehenſion thereof, & yeelded to the requeſt of Alarick, graunting him to inhabit a certaine part of Gaul.

Alarick dealt couertly with Honorius for peace.

Alarick is granted his abiding in Gaule.

While matters thus waued vppe and downe, manie daies paſſed on, quite fruſtrating the perſwaſions whereto Stellico bended his courſe. And albeit (according to the agreement) Alarick remoued with his army, to take poſſeſsion of the place aſsigned for his dwelling: yet notwithſtanding, Stellico practiſed ſecretly with a Captaine of his troopes (a Iew born, and named Saul) who pretending ſome perticuler quarrell againſt the Goths, ſhould find meanes, that vppon one day in the Eaſter, when the Gothes (as ſuch Chriſtians as they were) ſhould celebrate their feſtiuall, to ſet vppon them vnprouided, and in this maner of aſſault, to kill ſo many of them as he could. For, his Office of captain, being void in this time of peace, the warre (by this meanes) would be begun againe, and Stellico aduaunced to his former dignity. The Iew performed his deſire, and aſſayling the Gothes, made a great ſlaughter of them: but in the end, he made them amendes with loſſe of his owne life: for the Gothes being quickely aſſembled, ran violently vppon him and his people, and he (with a great number of them) there periſhed.

Stellico ſplotteth with a Iew againſt the Gothes.

A great ſlaughter of the Gothes by a Iew.

Alarick beeing much offended at this treachery, marſhalled his forces againſt them belonging to Stellico, who made ſhew of fearfulneſſe, and woulde (by no meanes) aduenture themſelues that day: but diſpatching a Trompet to the Emperor, required to haue more men for his aſsiſtance. The Emperour well knowing (before) the cunning of Stellico, and ſtanding in dread of his further meaning; ſent ſuch a potent Army to the field, & ſome others put in eſpeciall truſt for the purpoſe; as there was both Stellico and his Sonne ſlain, few or none being acquainted with the reaſon of his death, or the treaſon by him intended. Now, albeit Honorius had well prouided againſt this ſcandall and danger, yet could he not ſodenly take order for creation of a newe Captaine, ſo excellent and meete to manage matters in fielde. And Alaricke pondering heereon, that this might be occaſioned by the Emperors direction, or that Stellico miſcarried in his owne purpoſed miſchiefe, tooke aduantage of ſo apt an opportunity, and went on towards Rome, without any impeachement by the way, putting to fire and ſword (al) along as he iourned, and planted his ſiege before the Citty, in the yeare eleuen hundred, threeſcore and four. of the foundation therof. But finding by his firſt aſſaulte, that the manhood and courage of the Romaines, yeilded ded ſlender likelyhood of any ſpeedy ſurprizall: he beſiedged it on all ſides verie ſtrictly, and his ſiedge continued two whole yeares together.

Many Authors haue thus written, concerning the aſſault and taking of Rome by Alarick: neuertheleſſe, the actions of Armes therein performed, haue been ſo briefe and ſlenderly deſcribed, as almoſt nothing thereof can be ſaid. They that haue written thereof, are Paulus Oroſius, in his ſeauenth Booke; Paulus Diaconus, in the Hiſtory of Honorius; Iordanus, or Ienardus, in his Hiſtory of the Gothes; S. Auguſtine in his ſeauenth Booke of the Citty of God; and S. Ierom, in the beginning of his Epiſtle, as a thing that happned in his time. Iſidore alſo ſpeaketh thereof, in the Hiſtory of the Gothes, with many other Moderne Writers: who (all agreeing together) ſay, that ſo it hapned. Moreouer, one ſaith, that as Alarick went marching againſt Rome, and as a Chriſtian, though fierce and cruell: there trauailed a Monke before him, of great Authority and holy life, yet could it not poſſibly be knowne, of what place hee was. Alaricke affoording him audience, the Monke councelled and admoniſhed him to leaue off this euil purpoſe, bidding him remember that hee was a Chriſtian, and (euen for the loue of God) he ſhold moderate his paſsions, for hee ought not to take any delight, in ſhedding ſo much Chriſtian blood, conſidering, that Rome had neuer offended him. Wherto k. Alarick thus replied: Man of God, let me tell thee, that my going againſt Rome, is not of mine owne wil: but contrariwiſe, I aſſure thee, that euery day there goes a man before mee, who much conſtraineth and importuneth me, ſtil ſaying; Set on Alarick, goe againſt Rome, deſtroy it wholy, and bring it to deſolation.

The Religious man beeing amazed at theſe words, durſt make him no anſwere, but ſuffered the King to proceede in his purpoſe. I found this written in the Annals of Conſtantinople, annexed to the hiſtory of Eutropius; whereby it appeareth, that this aduerſity of Rome, was by the eſpeciall rod or ſcourge of God. Paulus Oroſius affirmeth as much, and ſaith. That euen as God drew Lot out of Sodome, to deliuer him from deſtruction; euen ſo, did he free thence Pope Innocent the firſt, who (ſome few dayes before the ſiedge) went out of Rome, to viſite the Emperor Honorius, who was then at Rauenna. Notwithſtanding, Platina ſaith; That this deſolation hapned in the time of Pope Zozimus: but it may be, that it began in the Papacy of the one, and finiſhed in the others Gouernement. Saint Ierom was likewiſe (in theſe yeares) out of Rome, in ſolemne penitence in the Deſerts of Ægypt.

Rome being thus beſieged, the Gothes and Romains performed many woorthie deeds of Armes: and ſo reſolute were the Romaines; that they kept it till extreame famine came vpon them, for S. Hierome ſaith; When the Citty was taken, there were found very few priſoners; becauſe deuouring famine had conſumed, and (wel-neere) brought them all to death. For they were compelled to feede on infected victuals, and one did eate another: the Mother ſpared not her nurſing infant, but (enforced thereto by famine) ſent it backe to the place frō whence it came at firſt ſo little; Theſe are the very words of S. Ierom.

Hier. vbi ſupra.

Among Authours there is great variety, in what manner Rome was taken. Procopius the Gracian ſaith; That Alarick perceiuing his forces inſufficient to take it, concluded to compaſſe his determination by treachery, and faigning as if hee meant to raiſe his ſiedge, made a certaine kind of truce, and ſent three hundred priſoners into the Cittie, with whom he had compounded during their impriſonment and durſt relie vpon their vowed promiſes; for fulfilling ſuch inſtructions as hee had giuen them, only to enioy their liberty, and other great benefits. The deſigned time being come, the priſoners that were at liberty in the Citty, to the number of three hundered; tooke one of the Gates, in deſpight of the Guardes which kept it; and thereat entered Alarick furiouſly, with all his followers.

Variation among authors concerning the ſurprizall of Rome. Procopius the Greeke.

Others ſay, that by the induſtrie and command of a Great Romain Ladie, this Gate was giuen into the Gothes power; & that this action proceeded from meere pitty in her, to ſee poore people ſuffer ſuch extreame euils. For ſhe was perſwaded, that the enemy could not performe ſuch cruelties in the City, as the Romaines acted vpon themſelues.

A ſecond opinion, concerning a worthy Lady of Rome.

the Gothes. But by what meanes soeuer it was, they all agree together, that before any person entered the Citty, K. Alarick proclaimed (on paine of death) that none of his followers should be so hardie, as to touch one liuing creature of them, that had betaken themselues into Churches for their safety, especialy those Churches of S. Peter and S. Paul, which accordingly was obserued; but all the rest of the City was sacked and spoiled; in which siedge, perished many thousands of persons, beside multitudes of prisoners taken. Among whom, was the Emperors Sister, named Placida, who was deliuered into the power of Attaulfus (one of the cheefest in the Army, and a verie neere Kinsman to King Alarick) which Attaulfus in short while after married her.

King Alaricks Proclamation for such as fled to sanctuary.

Placida the Emperors Sister taken prisoner.

The day following, they made themselues (wholly) Lords of the Cittie, and (for the more ignominy and disgrace to the Empire) the Soldiers made one Attalus Emperor, whom they carried vppe and downe in habit of an Emperour; but the next day after, hee was made to serue as a slaue. Thus remaind the Gothes three or 4. daies in Rome; and then setting fire on it in diuers places, they departed out at the further side therof. Al which while the Emperour Honorius was at Rauenna, where he could not but heare these wofull tidinges; yet did hee declare no compassion for the Citty, whereof hee bare the Title of Emperour. This is the first time, that Rome (being in hir ful strength) was subiected to the power of strangers. As for the Frenchmens entraunce in the time of Brennus, I make no reckoning thereof, because it was but in Romes nonage or beginning, and had not attained to such might, as she did afterward. But from this time of the Gothes, the City and Empire went continualy to wasting. And many other times (since then) it hath bin ouercome and destroyed, whereof we wil briefely report the most notable successe; to the end, that all men may knowe the frailty of Kingdoms and worldly powers, and how Rome (sometime the Ladie of our vniuersall Nations) hath beene made subiect and Slaue to all manner of people.

An Emperor made among the Soldiers, in scorn of the Empire.

The Emperor Honorius was at Rauenna in all this spoile.

The first decadence of Rome after the Gothes.

Not many daies after, Alarick was gone out of Rome, hee would haue set saile towardes Sicily; but fortune returned him backe into Italy, and hee died in Cosenza, a Towne in Calabria. In regarde of his death, the Gothes elected (as their King) the fore-named Attaulfus, who had taken to wife Placida, daughter to the Emperor Theodosius. Hereuppon, this new-made King returned to Rome, with intent to ruinate and confound it to the very foundation, to dispeople it vtterly, and to burie the name thereof in obliuion: which determination hee had executed, but that the teares and intercessions of his Wife, preuailed with him.

The death of King Alarick, and Attaulfus made King of the Gothes, who threatned the vtter ruin of Rome.

These things, and many other passing, the Gothes departed out of Italy: but forty yeares after, the Vnandels or Vandalles (who were likewise a Northerne people) came thither, vnder conduct of their K. named Gensericus. They entred Italy with a stout people of Affrica, ouer whom they commanded: and comming to Rome, entred without any resistance, because the greater part of the Inhabitants were fled thence. Thus the Vandals (and their King Gensericus) remained in Rome, the space of foure daies: during which time, they made what spoil and hauock they could, and then set it on fire in many places.

Gensericus K. of the Vandals entered into Rome with his power.

The second spoile of Rome

Seauen and twenty yeares following this surprizall of the Vandals, (which was in all seauenty two yeares, after the Gothes had entred vnder King Alarick) the King of the Ærules and Thoringes, named Odoacres, came with a mighty armie against the Citty of Rome, which the Cittizens perceiuing, and how vnable they were to withstand so potent an enemy: went forth and entertained him amiably in peace, which caused him to name himselfe King of Rome, and there he raigned fourteene yeares.

Odoacres King of the Erules and Thoringes, goeth to Rome

Afterward, Zeno comming to succeede in the Empire, sent Theodorick King of the Gothes, (who in those dayes) were become friends to the Romaine Empire, & Theodorick going against Odoacres, with a powerfull Army, only to recouer Rome, performed his purpose; and hauing the victory ouer Odoacres, not onely chased him out of Rome, but likewise out of Italy. Then tooke hee on him the name and kingdome, ruling there for the space of thirtie yeares in peace, and without anie contradiction. He dying, his Sonne Atalarick raigned there, eight or ten yeares, with his Queene Amalasunta.

the Empire, the Gothes returned againe into Italy, vnto the Ensigns of their most cruell King Totillus. But Bellizarius and Narsetes, most excellent men, exceeding all other in valour, and being Captaines in Italy for the Emperor Iustinian: did vanquish the Gothes diuers times, in the yeare of our Lord, fiue hundred & eighty. This Totillus, after he had many times besieged Rome, and fought sundry hardie battels; at length, (by secret treason of some within the Citty) he won it; Pelagius being then the chiefe Bishop, who was found therein, and by his teares and earnest entreats, Totillus was mooued, to moderat the cruelty and slaughter which his people vsed to the Inhabitants. This done, the cruell King sent his Ambassadors, to require peace with Iustinian, and because hee did not freely graunt it him, but referred him to Bellizarius (who was then Captaine generall in Italie against him) hee grew to great discontentment with himselfe, for sending to the Emperour, and to be thus denied. Heerupon, he destroyed almost the whole Cittie, nothing remaining but the third part of the walles: he caused the Capitoll to be burned, and the greater part of the Cittie; euen all that possibly hee coulde, commanding the Dwellers to get them from thence.

Rome betraide and won the first time.

Rome almost quite destroied by Totillus, and the Inhabitants expulsed.

When the people had deuided themselues into diuers other Neighbouring Citties and Townes, he led thence with him many of the Senatours, and such as were of greatest respect in Rome; leauing the Citty wholy vn-inhabited, and most Goodly sumptuous buildings vtterly desolate. In briefe, such was the ruine and destruction, as neuer after could it be reduced to the former condition. Albeit Bellizarius (after his entrance into it) repaired a great part of the wals and dwellings, and gaue title to the Romaine Princes; fortifying their Cittie, so much as in him lay; and procuring the return of many dispersed Inhabitants, who had fled to sundry Neighboring places of Italy, now to beginne a New Population of Rome. In such good sort was it repaired, that it was strong enough to out-stand a second attempt of Totillus, who came againe, & laid his siege to it. But in regard that Bellizarius, at his departing out of Italy, carried thence with him the Manly courage wherewith such a Citty should be defended: therefore, King Totillus had his second surprize of it the more easily, and vsed effects quite contrary to his former. For, insted of againe destroying it, he laboured to restore what he had ruined, & such Cittizens as had fled (being feare-full of him) he caused their returne with verie kinde Welcome, and Royall Feasting.

Bellizarius repayed a great part of Rome.

Rome the sixt time surprized, and by K. Totillus, but in very strainge manner.

Some Authors say, that the cause of this strang alteration, proceeded by these meanes. That he had sent into Fraunce, with request of one of the Kings Daughters in marriage, and answere was returned him; That he would not giue him any one of them, because he knew him not to be King of Italy, for if hee were King thereof, he would not labour so much to destroy it, but rather striue to maintaine it in all her rights. Others affirme, that repenting himselfe for his passed cruelties, he made a Vow to S. Peter and S. Paul, to restore Rome againe. But howsoeuer it was, it fell out to prooue so, and this was the last time that the Gothes entred Rome: for they lost it before many daies were past, being vanquished by the woorthie Narses, or Narsetes, Captain to the Emperor Iustinian, who threw them whollie out of Italy, whereinto afterward, they neuer re-entred.

The opinion of Authours, touching the kind mutation of Totillus the 2.

The Gothes last entering into Rome.

Neuertheless, it plainly appeared to other Nations, that Rome was no difficult thing to be conquered and taken. For in short time after, the Longobards went into Italy, where making themselues Lords of Cisalpine Gaule; by that occasion it is called Lombardy to this day. This hapned three yeares after the ruine made by Totillus, and vnder the raigne of King Clouis: then went they on to Rome, where they mainely besiedged it, and did great dammage to the Neighboring parts, albeit they could not take the Citty. Some while after, and in the life time of Gregory the third, Luitprand their King, besiedged it likewise; and being vpon the point of taking it, hee left off his enterprize, at the intreaty of Charles Martel.

The Longobards entred into Italy, and sharply assaulted Rome, but could not take it.

Luitprand king of the Longobards besieged Rome, but would not take it.

After which, and in the yeare seauen hundred and two, another King of these Longobards or Lombardes, called Attaulphus, besiedged it once more, in the time of Pope Stephen the second; & although he entred not into the Citty, yet did hee engirt it with the most cruell inuasion, that euer hapned since the Tyrant Totillus, Attaulphus another Lom ard King, most cruelly besieged Rome, and very neer tooke it.

Ins, and worse (for the extreamity) then he performed. And, if Pepin, King of France, and Father to great Charlemaign, had not gone to succour it: without all question they had entred in, and then it had beene vtterly destroyed, as appeared by the spoile they made without. This calamity being ouer-blowne, Rome had some respite, by the fauour of Charlemaigne; and so much the rather, because the Empire then came into the West.

Notwithstanding, by succesſe of time, and in the yeare of our Lord, eight hundred thirty three, Gregory the fourth beeing Pope, and Lewes Emperour: Sarrazins (Disciples of Mahomet) descended with a mighty Army into Italy, and hauing destroied Centoncella (at this day cald Ciuita vecchia, or the old Citty) they went against the Citty of Rome, which they both besiedged, and tooke; prophaning the Temple of S. Peter. When they had performed many ignominies, and burned all they could: they returned vnto their Shippes, enriched with many Prisoners, booties and spoiles.

The Sarazins entred Italy with a mighty power.

Rome taken the seauenth time, by the Sarazins.

Rome hauing endured all these misfortunes, Gregory the seauenth came to succeede in the Papacy, who had great wars against Henry, Emperor of Germany; and the Emp. pursuing his iniuries, brought his armed troupes before Rome, wherein he besiedged the Pope: but the Romaines defended the Citty couragiously, and the Emperor resisted with such constancy, that the siedge continued a very long time. Neuertheleſſe, in a battaile well ordered, he surprized the Citty, by meanes whereof, the Pope fled to the Castle of S. Angelo: in which place, being also belegered, he was succored by a great number of Normans. When the Emperour perceiued, that his stay could not (well) be long; hee destroyed (first) many goodlie buildings in Rome: and at his parting, he left the greater number of his Men in the Citty, to defend it with the Romains, who were then of his faction. Many more Normans comming to ioyne with the rest, in fauour of the Pope; the two Armies encountred together diuers times, and such was the dammage which the Citty receiued on both sides: as the greater part thereof was burned. For this was especially obserued, that whatsoeuer the Normans could seaze on their Enemies, were they houses, or what else: they were burned, raced, and laid flat with the Earth. The Capitoll it selfe, which had beene againe builded, and wherein the Emperor Henries people were fortefied; was again burned and quite ruined. Finallie, the Normans and the Popes side got the victorie, but with such wofull hauocke and desolation of Rome: as neuer since then it could be restored, nor euer will be, to her first estate. Some that haue written, do auouch, that neither Totilas, nor any other Nation; did euer cause so much losse, as might be compared with the hurt it then receiued. And that it must needes be true, it is apparant at this day to bee seene, for Vineyards, Gardens, and other empty places, doe supply roome where Churches, & other things (very remarkable) then stood, the which wofull ruine, hapned in the yeare one thousand eightie two.

Henry Emperor of Germany besiedged Rome, & tooke it the eight time, with much destroiing it.

The most part of Rome burnt in this combustion.

Rome neuer can be restored to his first dignitie.

Wherefore, whosoeuer shall well consider these misfortunes: will finde, that there is not any Nation in the World, (hauing heeretofore beene subiected to Rome) that in such diuersity of times, cam to spoile. And for a last example, in our time, by meanes of our sins, especially of them there inhabiting: the Emperiall army (consisting of Spaniards and Germans) came before this Citty, tooke it, and sacked it. And because in the first assault, Charls Duke of Bourbon (a French Prince, and one of the worthiest men in his time, who was then Generall Commaunder of the Emperour) hapned to bee slaine: his Souldiers (beeing at liberty) committed such ennorme cruelties, that they acted euen all the villainies they could deuise, except setting the Churches on fire. Which proceeded (as hath beene presumed) by the iust iudgment of God, albeit the executioners thereof were not clear from grieuous sinnes: But it is necessary that scandals should happen, yet woe to them that cause and commit them.

Rome taken and spoyled the last time, vnder the conduct of Charles Duke of Bourbon.

CHAP. XI.

That there is no height of spirit, valour, courage or Man-hood, truely commendable; but such as is necessary, & grounded on vertue.

MAny Authours, both Ancient and Modern, haue deliuered their iudgments concerning Man-hood or Valor: but yet so weakely, and without any true validitie, as nothing can be collected from such instructions; but meere Cowardise, and debility of courage. For they being empty of such naturall capacitie, as should conuay them to so high a knowledge: haue sought for such a Iewell in ruinster places, and not where the perfect mades of this vertue is to be truly found. The French, Germaines, English, Italians, and Spaniards, haue (like Fresh-men) discoursed on this Argument, vsing so many words, and little grace; as if they were depriued of all meanes to write on such a subiect. For now a-daies, Man-hood is so slenderly practised among Noblemen; that it appeares no other then a cloud of Vanitie, which disperseth it selfe at the first noyse of an armed Enemy. Because it is impossible for him, who hath no other courage, then a braue apparance onely (which is more proper to threaten, then to hurt an enemy) to forme any true resolution in his Soule, of being then valiant; when hazzard disputes with reason, and feare coapeth with honour so rudely; that gallantry in desseignes, proues goutinesse in performance. Herevpon was it, that Maherball spake so courragiously to his Numidians, on the great battaile day at Cannas; We come not hither to looke on, but to conquer; we are not here for shew, but for our liues. For the Romains dispute about an Empire, and not for the excellency of Affricke or Europe. If ye couet flight, to preuent the great tempest that may fall vpon yee; let me aduise ye, to get ye gone, before ye be chased. For otherwise, they that shall haue more courage then you; to preserue their liues, will haue more breath to pursue the ruine of yours, then you can (by flight) can be assured of safety. Considering, that as there is no neede of fight, where no victory is to be had for the Conqueror, nor rout for the conquered: So let no man fly, when flight is not auaileable; retreat being much more daungerous, then fight.

The small regard of Man-hood among Noblemen.

The words of Maherball to his Souldiers at the battaile of Cannas

These, or the like wordes, vsed this great Caprain, Maister of the Horsemen to Hannibal, who was so happy in armes; as neuer was any slacknesse noted in him, no, not in the battaile of Zama, which he lost; by fighting rather against the rigour of Heauen, and the destinies waiting on the huge Empire of Rome; then by the violence of his enemies, who conquered, onely because they could not be conquered. Whereto we may adde, that whatsoeuer outward note or effect, could deliuer (for happinesse) in a wise and valiant Captaine: it was exactly deliuered (that day) by Hannibal: who (in so hard a necessity) did all the offices both of head and armes, so many times, and for so long a while together; that Scipio himselfe, after the battaile was won, made this loude exclamation, O Rome! What shouldst thou yet suffer, if Hannibal were liuing?

The perfect valour remaining in Hannibal.

The words of Scipio concerning Hannibal.

Now, it is most certaine, that the Affricane fought by power, being commanded by the Magistrats of his Common-weal, to whom he made apparant their errour, and his owne experience; accompanied with such perfect Man-hood, as he would neuer make vse thereof, but where it was so needfully required, that meere necessity tooke away all suspition of vaine glory, and the issue gaue testimony of the beginning; to wit, effectes of their cause, more then legitimate and necessary. To whom then, shall not this true Valour in Scipio seeme admirable, that neuer came to manly triall, but by necessity? And hauing conquered, made no such assurance of his victory by his enemies foile; as by diligent search of their loue and amitie?

The absolute man-hood, remaining in Scipio.

A wretched fortune attendeth on some Nations, wherein no Lordes or Gentlemen are found, to delight in the imitation of this auncient Man-hood, whereto so many Vertues were enchained: that they seemed rather a colligation of wonders, then any simple qualitie, reaped in the Fielde of a strong and couragious soul. There are so many inciuilities mingled with our Man-hood, that they simpathize rather with wild Goats, or the heat of Bulles; then with the reall excellencie of humaine Nature, which beeing the Image of the Diuinitie, figures vnto vs another kinde of strength and courage, then that which is proper to brute Beasts onely. For their transport, is desseigne, fury, fight, and hugenesse of body, wherein assuredlie, they so far exceed vs, that if we esteem Manhood to consist in sudden fury: we shal find our selues more feeble then all other Creatures, worthily deseruing to be termed vnreasonable, & much lesse excellent then Lyons, Panthers, & Tigers, the least enraged whereof, so little feareth the brutall fury of any Man, (how King Pyrrhus his demand concerning the Romaines, of Cineas his Ambassadour.

Pyrrhus King of the Epirotes, demanded of his Ambassadour Cineas, what manner of people the Romaines were? he answered: They are goodly men. What more (quoth the King.) They are aduised, said Cineas. What else? saide the King. They are valiant, quoth Cineas. Is this all? replyed the King. No, said Cineas, they are (beside) vertuous and honest people. Why then (answered the King) we shall deale with three enemies more then I dreamed of. True replied Cineas, and the legerity of the Tarentines makes the fourth. But it is all one, prouided, that the merits of Italy doe not exceede theirs of Greece: for the Epirotes and the Romaines must act a Tragedy, whereof the Tarentines will be the Iudges. The common Theater is Italy, the Gods & victorie will leane to him perticularly, that shall declare himselfe to be most worthy. How-soeuer it be, replied Pyrrhus, reason is on our side: for we haue crost the Seas, to yeild Iustice to the Tarentines, and mercy to the Romaines; if we be Maisters of the day. As for the rest, they are Sonnes to them whom our Fathers haue beaten, & we cannot be conquered; without doing iniury to the vertue of our Auncestours, who were neither lesse, or more valiant then we be, if we would enter into possession of one another.

A worthie resolution in a King, and fit to be imitated

Vndoubtedly, these were words, or rather Oracles, well becomming a Christian Captaine: and what were their effects, but meere perpetuall miracles? Romes fortune and vertue fell flat vnder his valor; the Sea stouped her breast vnder the weighty burthen of his Ships; the straites of Scicily opened wide (like mouths) to receiue his victorious triumphant fleet; and Greece (his Countrey) had more honour then disgrace, in being subdued by so vertuous a Conquerour. And yet notwithstanding, in striuing to be a more forward Souldier, then so good a Captaine; hee lost his life, not in the midst of his victories, but in the beginning of his triumphs, and vpon the very end of a fight. For, pursuing (to no purpose, and against all prouidence) a young Lad of the Citty of Argos, that was carried away in the assault:

The iniurie which ensueth by too much rashnesse.

he was slain by the stroke of a Tile, which the Mother of the lad threw at him in the pursuit. Was it not enough, that hee had shut vp King Antigonus, who had called him forth to fight? that he had commanded the day, & prouided security against the assailants; but he must yeild himselfe to common seruices, which are more ignominious to great Commaunders (being done out of time) then they can bee honorable to the meanest Souldier, that serues no other God, but occasion, and seekes no pay, but applause and vulgar knowledge?

The death of King Pyrrhus by his owne follie.

When it was told the wise Antigonus, of a certaine Polyperchon, that being excited thereto, or rather drunke with boldnesse; ran into the army of Eumenes, and had broken fiue Corps du garde of the Argiraspides, but was staied at the sixt. It is nothing (answered Antigonus) for I haue seene an Elephant much more signale and commendable in courage, that trauersed the whole army of Demetrius, and yet was neyther slain nor taken. Hyrodes, Prince of the Parthians, beholding a Hyrcanian mainly galloping into the field, & smitten down at the first encounter; instantly gaue him this farewell. We are not now (my friende) at the passage of a Riuer, where euery one striues for entrance into the Boat, before his Fellow; but we are heere to grow enamored of victory, and she is a Goddesse so full of Maiesty, that shee scornes to looke vppon Fooles and mad men. Pelopidas, the hodour of Thebes, failed (by this meanes) in the day of battaile, which he hadde against the Tyrant Phalaris, of whom hee had won a verie great victorie: which at length he robd himselfe of (by vnaduised courage) in running rather to the ruine of a particular Thessalian Souldier, then to the conseruation of his Army, and the establishment of his Common-wealth; which was left more desolatee by his death, then this vnperfected victorie yeelded assurance and safetie to Beotia.

Gaston de Foix might serue vs for a sufficient example, without borrowing any among the Greekes or Romaines, whose losses (in the like cases) may the better direct vs to Wisedome. For the French vse to say, that (without all question) they wholely lost Italy, and their owne good fortunes together; when the saide Gaston lost himselfe. For he enuying the brauing valour of some Gallantes, too apt in spurring on such as had betaken themselues to flight: more to bee seene, then for any hope hee could haue of recalling them, lost his owne life. And his fall might be compared to that of a great and mightie Colossus, whose ruine not onely hurteth whatsoeuer is neere neighbouring; but thinges much further of, by very distant separations.

An excellent comparison concerning true valour.

Like as the bright Luster of the Easterne Opalles, doe figure and represent to our eyes, the very liuelieſt Colours of all precious Stones; euen so is perfect Man-hood endued with this particuler Vertue, that it giueth to him (who is therewith possessed) a generall acquisition of all such varities, as may builde vp a faire Nature, and make it euerie way compleate. But he who is simply valerous, and hath no other merit, but onely a giddie and skipping kinde of courage: is borne rather for his owne hurt and ruine, then any aduancement; except he will goe liue among sauage Beastes, for whose humour (perhaps) he may be more capable, if they should make any dangerous sallie vpon his person. To this purpose, the famous Captaine Epaminondas, compared a valiant man, that had no other vertue; to a great goodly Shippe, wherein is nothing but a saile. Shee is not carryed by any Conduct, or whether the Mariners desseigne had appointed their Commerce: but fortune onelie is her course; the Windes her Pylot, and she hath no other anchorage, but ship-wracke. Yet if it so happen (as it may, though rarely) that hauing contended with the angry Heauens, and iniuries of the Seas, thee bring her selfe (vnbruised) into some safe harbour: no glory is therefore to be ascribed to the goodnesse of her prow, to the best form of her poope, nor to any cost bestowed on her building; but onely to the opportunitie of the place, the nature of the Windes, the depth of the Water, and calmnesse of the Seas, that altogether, or one for all the rest, rather left her so without dommage, then warranted what thus hapned, they being insensible of good or euill.

Epaminondas his comparison of a valiant man.

Sildome such aduenture is seeue, but only this is a meere comparison.

To what end (I pray ye) serued the hot and spleenitiue Manhood, of Charls Duke of Bourbon, who would needs enter Rome, among the pell-mell furie of his foot Souldiers, that saw not the ouerture of the breach, but with the eies of pillage and Rapine? Beeing abandoned in this sort, by the transport of gaine, and bootie of the Cittie (which was thē more allarmed, then assaulted) their generall intention was to vanquish, onely thereby to enrich themselues; and this was the sole command of the assault, yea, the absolute forme or cause of the fight & victory. Wherein, the Conquerour (not knowing how to conquer his owne impaciency) declared himselfe vnworthy of such fauor, as the Heauens had then prepared for him to make him Maister of the Queen of Citties: which could not haue been subdued, but by so Noble and famous a Commander, who (out of his death) begot a second life, and conuerted his particular triumphe, into a generall mourning: for the Army and Cittie (which was then spoiled) were very far dissemblable, in condition of their fortune.

Charles Duke of Bourbon, that sacked Rome, and lost his life thorow his owne rashnesse.

What Man-hood was that in Polydamas, who (all alone, and disarmed) ran after a great and strong company of Theeues, amongst whom he was slaine: more satisfying (therein) his owne fury, then good intention, which was, to cleanse the Country of them? He wounded, slue, and chased the greater part of those common enemies to mens society: but what did he heerein, either for himselfe, or others? When his verie death, caused more courage & violence in the remnant of them that remained aliue; then the whol heap of them (before) had together? Could not he haue mustered the community of Greece, and selected young Spirits of his owne hot temper? with such a sindiquat, he might haue made opposition, rather against their flight, then violence, and (by this means) had the grace to vanquish them at the first sight, and by this first too, rather haue punnished, then vanquished them. For so base a victorie, better becommeth the pursuit of a Prouost of iustice, or a polliticke Magistrate; then the dreaded Armes of a Prince. Were it not that one must haue the charge, when the leudnesse of men so far aboundeth, that Theeues and Pirats may better giue the Title of army (yea, of a great Army) to their conspiracy; then of a simple simple company of misse-led men. As it happened in the time of Pompey, who was to fight with so great and prodigious a multitude of Sea Rouers: that the very Conquest of them, rather got him the Name of Great, then all the victories he had in Asia. This likewise was the verie greatest honour, that euer the valiant and inuincible Hercules attained vnto, if the Greekes write truely.

A good aduertisment to all Noble-men.

I am the more willing to continue this subiect, because it were no dishonest wish, that the Man-hood of all our Nobilitie, would declare it selfe (more then it hath done) in diligent search of Morall Vertues, and opposition against all vices, for whose destruction, they were first created by God, and secondlie by Kinges. For, let me tell yee, that the best and most famous Houses in Europe (let me not say of the whole World) were sometimes plain Yeomanry, & extracted out of the common Masse: out of which, some apparant and remarkable vertue gaue them distinction & separation. Because a recompence so faire and glorious, moued braue courages (in quest of such occasions) to become partners in the like benefits: which the meere courtesie of Kinges (animated by this subiect onely) established, to make differences between more and lesse, good and better, the Comparatiue and the Superlatiue.

Th Original of the best houses in Europe, and their separation.

Much commended, but little knowne.

Man-hood is commended by many, yet known of very few; because it is much more easily praised, then learned, or practised. It ought to be in the hart, like pure and cleere water in a Cesterne; whence it may be fetcht for diuers seruices, and all for no other end, then mens commodity. Some to make drinke therewith; others, Bread; others dresse their meats, Water their Gardens, and wash, as occasion is required. In all these vses, it is not onelie profitable, but also very needfull: and yet it may be abused, for ouer-much thereof, doth rather returne disaduantage, then any benefit. To elect it (then) for our best seruice, is not according to it selfe; as in a liuing thing; but answerable to manlie iudgement, & discourse of reason: which appropriateth the quality and quantity of this Element, according as the occurrence and neede thereof, shall require his vertue and succourable power. It is euen so in Man-hood, one while it is imployed for the establishment of Kinges;

The vse of man-hood exampled by water, in vsing it.

for the conseruation of their Estates; for particular defence of our assayled persons; and for perfection of the weake and innocent. Out of this, or the like subiect; it is ridiculous, changeth into fury, and gets the name of madnesse, rage, and desperation. This immaculate Virgine shunneth such a Spirit, as hath more cowardise to offend a Man, of whom hee thinkes he hath receiued an iniurie: then true valor, to do him grace, by letting him rather know the pardon, the the pain; the precept, then the punishment. Hereon was it, that Diuine Plato was wont to say. If we were all iust; Might would bee condemned in humaine societie, for Iustice doth all by her owne proper Vertue. Shee made Aristides both courageous and patient. She made him more necessary the Themistocles; more victorious then Miltiades; and more happy, then all the other Athenian Captains.

The application in the vse of man-hood.

The saying of the diuine Plato concerning Iustice.

It is impossible then, to be very valiant, without being iust; or to be iust, without courage; because, it is not faintnesse, or want of Spirit in the heart, that makes a Man acceptable in all Companies: but rather a Celestiall heate; which mounts the Soule beyonde common pitch, and seeketh after a commendable contentment, by delight which others apprehend in seeing our actions to hold euen gate with their good, as much (or rather more) then they doe with our owne. We are not bound to those boistrous wordes of Alexander the Great, when he said; That he did not abandon hazzards, but to be honoured and renowned among the Grecians in generall, and particularly, of the Athenians: Who seemed (neuertheless) vtter Enemies to his Fortune, as formerly they had beene to his Father Phillip. Such speeches issued from the mouth; nay, the very heart of a Man, an Atheist: who had no other God, but Vanitie; no Reason, but Couetousnesse; no Iustice, but feare of contempt; Fortune for his Armes, Asia for his pay, and the rest of the World for his hope. Little was his care, if the whole Earth were afflicted, for the weake Subiect of his fraile satisfaction: for hee receiued but the rinde or shell of goodnesse, and tooke (from euery one) the whole heape of happinesse, which Peace onely bringeth.

There is no valour without iustice, nor Iustice without courage.

The words of Alexander the Great.

Wordes more like an Atheist, then a worthy King.

All occasions of the great battailes he gaue, were conceiued on a sole desire, to shame and disgrace all Princes in the Alexanders enuying of all other Princes onely to exceede them in might and courage.

World, whom he ſought to oblige by his victorious Armes; and by the Graces he did them, to beleeue, that hee excelled them in power and courteſie. Nor had he any other intention beſide, either to aſſure the eſtates of Greece, or doe any good to his Countrey, much leſſe would hee exalt any of his partakers: for all his proiect was, not to be equalled by any one in his life, nor ſeconded after his death, ſaying, not long before. He that hath no part in my Glorie, can be no Heire to my Conqueſt: How then ſhould I make a Succeſſour, that neuer could haue any Companion?

The ſaying of Alexander, not long before his death.

He well declared, that his valour was imperfect, when he ſlew his Friend and Benefactor Clitus, reprooving him for his ambitious vanitie: beſide, it was very vnorderly done, and out of due time. He ought to haue expreſſed the truth of courage, in ſupplying the defect of the others indiſcretion (if he pleaſed ſo to iudge it) then ſo furiouſly to bee his Deſtroyer and Murderer. Demetrius had more valiancy (but leſſe Fortune) then Alexander, conſidering, he pardoned the Thebanes twice; but many times the people of Athens. Whereas (quite contrary) Alexander ruined Thebes from the top to the bottome, and neuer left the Athenians in peace: but when time ſerued not to proclaime open Warre; his mind being then buſied and imploied in much greater matters, & yet notwithſtanding, leſſe perillous. For, it is moſt certaine, that had hee elſe-where conuerted his fury (rather deſtenied, then premeditated for the ruine of Aſia, which (was in his time) the principall ſubiect of Gods wrath, of whoſe vengeances he was the onely Organe:) doubtleſſe he had ended his Fortunes in Greece, and his triumphes had extended but the length of Macedon, which remained more vnuanquiſhed, then victorious, by the Armes of this Shittlecocke of the Heauens diſpleaſure. At whoſe ending, all Tytants in the world tooke their beginning, and the vniuerſe it ſelfe, was more ſhaken (then maintained) by the accidentall valour of this Monſter of ambition, and of pernitious glory. For he had no Law, but ſuperſtition; no Magiſtracy, but prodigious and vnſociable diſdaine. Yet could he outwardly ſeeme milde and familiar, becauſe he affected this neceſſary vertue in a great Prince: eſpeciallie in ſuch a one, that exaltes himſelfe (without any right or election) into others Empires and Monarchies. For power doth not ſo much ſtrengthen the nouelty of a Kingdome; as hope, which ſubiectes (halfe deſperate) doe deriue, from the accoſtable and kinde behauiour in him, who (in effect) hath forced, and (in apparance) ſtriueth to ſurmount their feare, of being worſſe entreated afterward.

Demetrius compared with Alexander, for more valiant, but leſſe fortunate.

Alexander was tearmed Gods ſcourge in Aſia.

Affability a neceſſary vertue in a great Prince.

The Empire of the Romaines, was of longer continuance then the other, becauſe it daily begot more Friendes then Enemies, and onely began to looſe it ſelfe; when they grew to diſdaine the Northerne people, who being farre off from Italy, by long diſtance of Seas, Riuers, Mountaines, and by ſo great a length of ground: the Gouernors ſeemed to be meere proprietaries or Owners. By means whereof, they committed ſuch prodigious violences, as were to be wondred at. But the patience of the afflicted, kept in, and continued ſo long a time, for a iuſt and neceſſarie puniſhment, that the Arreſt being concluded on: the North (at length) leapt out of her limits, and brake the Ice of her heart in ſuch ſort; that the ſhiuers flew ſo farre as Rome; yea, and with ſo ſtearne a ſtrength, that their power and Iuſtice (vſing neceſſity as their beſt helpe) made a meere break-necke of the Worldes pride. For hauing nothing but valour, and no equity in their firſt Oeconomy, they became ſo humbled; that their fall remaineth (to this day) very dreadfull, and it would exceed credence, in men moſt learned, if the ruines did not render a more apparant teſtimony, then all our Hiſtories.

The Romain Empire continued longer thē the other.

The Northerne people long wronged by the Romans

CHAP. XII.

That all ſuch, as had no other vertue, then meere and naked valiancy, or valour; haue ended their daies very vnfortunatly.

IT is a caſe without all queſtion, that the firſt Monarches more eſtabliſhed their

The wisedom of the first Monarcks in establishing their Empires their Empires, by election which they made of their Friendes and Enemies; then by force of Armes, or relying on their power. And true it is, that the people of Asia, had (naturally) more might and courage, then the Grecians; who notwithstanding, did almost daily beat them, because they had no other helpe, but such a transport of spirit, which being linked to indiscretion and fury: admitted no other meanes of conquering; but that which Nature enstructs brute Beasts withall, being furthest off from all iudgement. When the Grecians degenerated from the wisedome of their Ancestors; they suffered themselues to bee led by the Romaines prouidence: who were a people, not so goodly of Body, so well proportioned, or of like courage to them of * Attica; where the Ayre was of such temperature, as nothing wanted, to be desired. Euerie one knoweth, that Greece was not onely the Mother of Sciences, but of all the Pagane Gods, and of all those most remakable thinges, which our auncient Histories doe make mention of. It was the birth place of Hercules, Theseus, and Perithous, who knowing nothing else to be maistered in the World; went so farre as Hell to exercise their violence. Thence they drew out Cerberus, with his three heades, and (some say) they cornuted wretched Pluto: a goodly act no doubt, aunswerable to the birth of * Calais and Zethes, who rid the Countrey of the Harpies, that deuoured the foode of blinde Phineus. There was Meleager born, and all the Argonauts in generall. Of thence was Achilles and Diomedes, who wounded Mars and his Concubine Venus. Of thence was Alexander, Pyrrhus, Demetrius, Themistocles, and Alcibiades, all which, hauing giuen a subsistance of valiancy to their world: had Children to their Successours, that suffered themselues to be conquered by the Heardsmen of Calabria, and Shepheards belonging to the Romain fields; onely because they were lesse wise then valiant, in comparison of their predecessors, who had true iudgment, both in the one and other.

* A Country in Greece, between Achaia and Macedonia, where Athens stood.

* The Sonnes of Boreas (by Orithia) that had wings to flie.

Theseus in the Labyrinth of Creete, ouercame the Minotaure.

Theseus had neuer got out of the Cretane Labyrinth, if hee had not brought more discretion to his enterprize, then meere valour. For he did not vanquish that great and dreadfull Monster, halfe a Man, and halfe a Beast; but by deuise and singuler cunning: in regard, that the prodigious Bull was endued with more strength and courage, then hee could be; the Nature (both of Man and Bull) being common and indifferent to him. Moreouer, it was (in manner) nothing, to haue surmounted such a confused masse of Flesh, because he had more need of conduct, to get foorth of the Forrest where he was enclosed; then power to warrant him against a violence, which was soule-lesse to all reason. And surely as offence (in another body) trained him vniustly to this hazzard; euen so was hee deliuered by strange vertue, which was as well acknowledged, not to be Domesticke to his owne Spirit, as he declared indiscretion and improuidence in his returne, which appeared more signale in the deplorable death of his Father, then any wonder could be discerned in his victory: for he was more prepared by wisedome in the King of Creetes Daughter, then well atchieued by vertue in the Athenian Prince.

The meanes how Theseus was deliuered, not by his owne valour, but by wisedome in the Daughter to the King of Creete.

The selfe-same (doubtlesse) happened to Iason, Captaine of the Argonauts, who beeing (well-neere) inuincible for humaine valour: had yet all been vtterly lost, without the industrie and prouidence of ingenious Medea. For shee knew how to conuert the Armes of the Garrisons of Colchos, quite against thēselues, for whose vse and preseruation they were onely destined. Here, amazement surmounted the courage of our young Conquerants, and their valiancy had no other vigour, but onely for flight: till she alone, without any other Armes then inuention; changed their feare, to a chearfull heat for fight; their incertitude, to assurance; and their vnauoydable ouerthrow, to a victory sudden, and done at an instant.

Iason and his Argonauts, deliuered by the ingenuitie of discreet Medea.

The meanest Fortresses would appeare impregnable to humaine valiancy, without Art and inuention of a sprightly minde: who vniting the one with the other; bringeth supernaturall things to passe, or (at least) such as are extraordinary. The Poet Lucretius mockt our first men, that made bodily strength their best benefit of defence, vsing their teeth, nailes, feete, and handes, as their safest Valiancie and discretion linked together, bring admirable occasions to end.

Good armour is not the best defence.

safest Armour, and beeing guided by courage, without order or direction; ran head-long into ineuitable dangers. Homer also tels vs, that the Captaines of best ranke (as well in Europe as Asia) were singularly well armed: as Aiax, Sarpedon, the Son of Mars, Diomedes, Glaucus, and Patrocles, that perrished with the Armes of Achilles: who was not so hardie, as to run and reuenge the death of his perfect and intimate friend, till he had gotten him new Armour; to wit, much better then that hee had before. He, that (to shew himselfe couragious) throwes his vnarmed body into charges, breaches and assaults; declares the actions rather of a mad man, then one that is valiant. Some men haue bin seene, one, to cast him selfe into a Fire; another, fall vpon the point of a sword; a third, leap suddenly into a deep Riuer, or from the height of a dreadfull Rock; according as frenzy altereth and misguideth the ordinary mooning of his disease. A fourth, as vnhealthfull in mind, guideth his life by the pathes of death, onely by defect of apprehension, which cannot, neither ought to bee lawdable or imitable: but onely in such, who being weary of life, doe defie both fortune and perrill, and become obedient to dispaire and melancholly, which makes them to esteeme death more sweet then life.

Difference betweene madnesse and valour, end very easie to be discerned.

A Macedonian banished for being vnarmed on the day of Battell.

Alexander the Great, banished a Macedonian from his Troupes, because he was vnarmed on the day of battaile, which he fought at the Riuer Granicus, saying to him. In this manner (my small Friend) we vse to goe to Weddings, and not to war; where he that is best armed, cannot be cleare from perill. The Spartanes condemned a young man of their Citty, to a very great penalty, because on the day whē the Thebanes gaue their assault; he came naked to the fight, where (notwithstanding) his fortune was equall to his valour, deliuering such proofe of high desert, as themselues, by whom his folly was condemned; adiuged a great salary to his valour, which had beene perfect, if it had been exercised in better forme. Lysimachus being vanquished by a Thessalian Prince (that was reputed barbarous, and slenderly acquainted with glorious actions) when he was mockt for his foile, made them this answere. Mine enemy (whatsoeuer you conceiue of him) seemes to haue as much wisedome, as fury: for, the fortune of Alexander, and himselfe pertaking with me, could not make me inuincible; because I was ordained to be one of this Princes heires. But the misprision I made of my companion, deceiued my possessed assurance of conquest, and enabled mine enemie to fight, when I thought him more capable of flight, then of assailing. But why then (answered one) did you vndertake such a difficult attempt? Because (qd. he) I had courage enough to execute it, if meere valiancy had onely bin necessary.

Actions are not good, wanting their due forme.

Lysimachus conquerd by a Thessalian Prince, his speeches at the instant,

When rich Crassus was vanquished by the Parthians in Assiria.

When rich Crassus was ouerthrowne in Assiria, by the Army of the Parthians, which were farre lesse in number, then that of the Romaines; a Patrician said to Cato: This rout seemeth to me incredible, considering the courage of many strong Legeonaries; whereto Cato replyed. There would haue beene much better apparance, if the couetous eye of Crassus had not lookt more to booty, then to the charge: which was more easily desired, then taken, and yet more easily taken, then kept. For it behoueth, that (in euery desseigne) wisdome should exceed the power of execution, and execution to arise, not from possibility, or apparance; but from truth and certaintie of the matter, which distinguisheth it selfe by no other time, then when we are assured of it. This sacred Lady Wisedome, onely taketh intermission, to haue greatest priuacy with such, whom she iudgeth worthy of her fauour; which is continuallie combined with Prouidence, Iustice, and Necessitie.

Wisedome is the best guide in all our actions whatsoeuer.

It is not might only, that surmounteth the ouergreat agitation of the Billowes, iniurie of the Winds, and their immeasurable violence. Might onely, doth not oppose it selfe, and make resistance against the Tempest of that ayre, or those turbulent stormes, that beget and forme the ruine of Passengers. Might onely, doth not facilitate the entrance or issue, of straites or narrow passages on the Seas, Riuers, and such like places: neither can it onely compell the rigour of seasons, nor their quality, to be either more or lesse intemperate; nor to fortify vs against dangerous change, from our first dwelling, to any other. In all these, might is but as an humble seruant, to a million of much fairer,

Might hath little or no Maistery in it selfe, concerning infinite occasions.

fairer, or (to speake better) more lawdable and necessary vertues, for the atchieuing of such high enterprises: wherein (oftentimes) meere Valiancy, simple valour, and courage onely (badly guided) and ouer-rudely imploied; is more dammageable, then beneficiall; and lesse sightly, then well beseeming. For, to speake truely, a braue and generous Spirit, thought it were naked of all other Grace; yet it carrieth with it an admiration aboue capacity: which followeth not other vertues, as by a selfe allurance, but inciteth their imitation out of his owne splendour.

Hercules numbred among the Gods, and the especiall reasons why.

Hercules was not numbred among the Gods, for the sole benefit of his greatnesse in courage: for, in Heauen, as much esteeme is made of a weak man, as of him that is most strong and vigorous. Seeing that it appeareth, to be rather as a defect of his bodie, which is ill disposed: then any iniury naturallie linked to the Spirit, of such as are more timorous, and lesse couragious then others. It was the Iustice of Hercules, that made him dreadfull to the wicked, and wonne him the fauour of euill ordered Common-weales. His Charitie made him necessary, for the mallice of his time, that abounded in tyrannies and cruell oppressions. His courage made him the lesse apprehensiue of daungers; yet oftentimes dispairing of their good issue. The greatnesse and Nobility of his Parents, made him the more famous, and knowne through all partes. But his setled Resolution, to be an vtter Enemie to Vices, and a partaker with Vertues, much more requisite: that onely made him commendable among all men. I say, the braueſt Spirit (in his time) durst not enuy his glorie, nor compare their actions of greateſt merit, with the very meaneſt of his. Courage was one in number of his merits, neuertheleſſe, it was not the principall, in regard hee ouercame many, that ought him nothing in that point: not reckoning Lyons, Hydraes, and other prodigious Beastes vanquished by him, to whom he might well haue seemed as a prey, if cunning and knowledge (by what meanes to shunne their violence and fury) had not beene a better subiect to him of hope, then of feare, in such bold enterprises, which alwaies were grounded on neceſſitie, occasion most apparant, and vndertaken with iudgement.

The words of K. Artoxerxes concerning his Brother Cyrus.

The great King Artoxerxes, compared courage onelie, to a sparke of Fire, which dyeth as soone as it is borne, and hath more apparance, then body. Hereby (quoth he) I perceiue, that my Brother and Enemy Cyrus, will be but of small continuance: For he is of the Nature of small Coales, which are good for nothing, but to kindle great Wood, and then suddenly they extinguish, because the great Fires flame, disperseth and scattereth them among the light Cinders. It came so to passe, for Cyrus enflamed all Greece and Asia, against the said Artoxerxes, who was much better qualified then his Brother: on whom rashnesse bestowed wings, to fly more swiftly to his owne ruine; then to prepare any danger for others. For they that had lesse power, and more pacience then he; assured their liues by the hazzard of his, beeing more carried by the violence of his owne courage, then by the strength of his enemies.

Cyrus, a very rash and intemperate man.

O inconsiderate courage, principall Artezane of so many sudden losses, so many deplorable deaths, so many cruell Wounds, and so many light enmities! Thou art more hurtfull, then succourable to mankind. Thou art deadly Enemy to reason; thou blindest iudgement; thou art the Father of pride, and the peruerter of all order. Thou makest Families desolate; Wiues, to bee Widdowes; Children, Orphanes; Cities, Deserts; Common-weales vnpeopled; and Kingdomes, shaken into shiuers. Thou neuer dost any good, except when faire hap (in such as inherit thee) beguiles their certaine hope, and all occasion, of loosing thee. The good thou dooſt, ensueth from hence, that thou hast not strength enough, to weaken the deſtiny that saues and deliuers thee, or (to speake better) the diuine benediction, that armes it selfe in thy succour, and opens an assured passage to the inconstancy of thy motions; which leads thee (without eyes) hither and thither, like a Skiffe beaten with the Windes and Billowes, euer ready for wracke, as often as eyther the one or other gaines the maistery, and lifts it vp betweene those two light elements. Rashnesse is the mother of Murders, the the Witch that conceiueth contempt, bringes forth deſpaire, and nurſſeth froward opinion. Thou art Foe to humility, and haſt no ſhame, becauſe thou art blinded; neither any vnderſtanding, becauſe thou ouer-turneſt the braine, and engendreſt the Palſie, both of the mind and bodie. Thou haſt no Law, but ſudden aptneſſe and inclination; to be guided by thine owne tranſport; to aſſure thine own diſpaire: that the rule of thine opinion, the Soule of thy diſtemper and thy deſire of reuenge; may make booty of impoſſible things. Thou only makeſt vs companions with beaſts; takeſt reaſon from vs; ſetteſt diuorce betweene Body and Soule; depriueſt vs of election; robbeſt vs of our owne wils; and deſtinateſt vs to offer ſacrifice, euen to all kindes of miſeries and calamities. It was thou that didſt build Hell, and Armed the Angels againſt God, yea, euen one Heauen againſt another. It was thou that madſt the confuſion of languages, when thou mountedſt thy head as high as Heauen, by the proud top of audacious Nimrods Tower. From thy Womb, improuidence firſt receiued life, and all violent and inſolent actions, tooke their former Eſſence. Thou makeſt vs preſumptuous and miſerable, full of melancholly, out of our ſenſes, and meerely mad men; by diſpoſing vs to fiery diſeaſes, whereon firſt roſe the name of a fiery Ague. Thou makeſt vs all furie, draweſt vs out of our ſelues, to be more beaſtlie then Beaſts, to whom (by right) belongs the chiefe vſe of thine imperfection. Thou diſtinguiſheſt no times; but makeſt all ſeaſons equall; all perſons indifferent; all iudgements, venters; all authoritie, contemptible; all Iuſtice, powerleſſe; the Magiſtrate doubtfull; and Lawe weake and imbecile, beyond her Nature. Thou raiſeſt people into Armes; mockeſt all Superiors; formeſt * Anarchies; exalteſt the wicked againſt the good; tyraniſeſt our duty; ſeduceſt obedience, and excludeſt fidelity from our hearts, when they are thereto moſt willing. Thou art neuer pleaſde, but in pleaſing thy ſelfe; accounting patience to be faintneſſe; counſell, excuſe; diſpoſition, delay; mildneſſe, fear; and humility, ſottiſhneſſe.

To conclude, from thee ſpringeth the chiefeſt miſhapes that can come to Men; by teaching them an opinion of duty, as a ſhadow without a ſubſtance, debilitating their actions, & deſtroying (by immoderate power) all thoſe Vertues, which Iuſtice eſtabliſheth in this great Theater of worldlie affaires, and would depend vppon diuine aſſiſtance; but for ſuch a daungerous plague to all mankind.

His like commendation of Wiſedom and prouidence, & how needfull it is to be our guide in all our actions.

But O deare Wiſedome! How neceſſary art thou for the helpe of vs all? Thou ſerueſt for an eye, or as bright day to our Soules, like thoſe windowes properly deſigned to any goodly building. Fooles come to knowledge of thee, when thy vertue is not auileable for them, but to their ſorrowes; and when repentance whips them, for not entertaining thee in due time. Raſh courage commends thee, in the verie depth of his fall, and exalts thee aboue the height from whence he fel, becauſe he did not accept thee as guide and directour. The vnfortunate terme thee, to be none of their faction; and the fortunate aſcribe the vertue of their content, onely to thy merit. The Blinde doe borrow eies of thee, whereby to direct them, and the beſt ſighted (ſeeing thee) ſtand like meere Mummers, gazing at the glory of thy bright radiance. Thou ſerueſt as Sentinell in Armies; as a Rampier for Cities wekly defended; as a faithful Guard to forſaken Princes; as the cheefe Starre for Marriners to ſaile by; and the firſt innuentreſſe of all Commerce. It is by thy Grace (next vnto God) that Kinges hold their Empires; that Kingdomes are eſtabliſhed; Magiſtrates ordained, and Policies authoriſed.

It is thou that makeſt Kinges venerable; that keepeſt people in awe; the feeble in aſſurance; the ſtrong in ſuſpition; bringeſt offenders to puniſhment, and containeſt the honeſt minded in their quiet being. It is thou that giueſt eſteeme to valour, and keepeſt courage in contempt; vntill it bee enriched by thy aſſiſtance. It was thou that gaueſt Teſtimony to God, of the Royall Prophet, when he ſaid: I haue known Dauid, the Sonne of Iſai, a Man according to mine owne heart; in Wiſedome and greatneſſe of Courage. It was thou that madeſt the ſame Dauid acceptable to the mildneſſe of of Ionathan, and ſuſpitious to the mallice of Saule. Thou gaueſt gouernment to Ioſeph in Ægypt, Cadmus in Beotia; Ianus, in Italie; Triptolemus and Ceres, in Scicily; Bacchus, in the Indiaes; Saturne, in Aſia; Pompilius, at Rome, and Vliſſes euery where. Thou madſt graue Neſtor much more reſpected, then the furious and raſh-headed Aiax; yea, more then the vntameable Achilles. In briefe, it is thou, that onelie inciteth and compelleth maſſiue puiſſance, for more imployment of the bodie, then the mind, wherein thou declareſt thy ſelfe to bee the Genius, and fauourite of the Deuill.

* A people without Prince or gouernment.

He returneth to his primitiue Argumẽt of meere valiancy.

Returning now to meere Valiancie, to form a neceſſary perfection for him; I ſay, that all ſuch, as haue had nothing but courage onlie: haue loſt themſelues wilfully, and were thereto trained thorow their owne default. And (on the contrary) where Wiſedome and true Iudgment hath managed the buſineſſe; the maine matter hath not onely beene preſerued, but eſtabliſhed from periſhing, euen to immortality. Courage, (let me not ſay inconſideration) ruined the two new Potentates of our time: for the one exalted himſelfe aboue the Towers of his young authoritie; and the other became a founder of ſuch a Fortune, as was blunted by the meere incontinency of his owne deſires. I confeſſe, that courage lookes ſweetelie (at firſt ſight) in the eye of raſh conceit: yet will ſhe bee courted onely by the wiſe, I would ſay, by vertuous mindes; that conclude the perfection of their happineſſe, by the Iuſtice of their actions; ſhaping them alwaies, to bee as commendable in deſſeigne, as by attempt and finall concluſion. The one, (without any other fore-ſight, then goodneſſe of the place) promiſeth himſelfe an inuincible permanency: but the other iudgeth what is to come, by the iſſue of his precedent actions, which carried no ſplendor but by the vglineſſe of theirs, that ſuffered them to ſhine in ſuch true radiance, as they themſelues could neuer attaine vnto.

The two worthy ſpirits of our latter times ruined by their owne temerity.

How many haſty heads haue I ſeene periſh, without any benefit to their Countrey, but onelie their owne example, as an admonition to preuent the like calamitie? how many Families haue I knowne deſolated, by this plague of ſuppoſed happineſſe, Glory and Life? How many young Gentlemen haue I ſeene buried, that (but for this daungerous diſeaſe) had rather beene an admiration to Straungers, then ſorrowe to their Friendes, by ſuch vntimely loſſe? How many braue Caſtles haue I ſeene abandoned, by the raſh fall of their Commaunders, who would needs ſeek Death in their Enemies Trenches; and wilfullie looſe their liues there, when neither vndermining, Cannons, ſcalado, or breach could preuaile againſt them; albeit, they were euen as common and familiar to them, as deſire of ſuperiority? How many Prouinces haue I ſeen deſerted, by the ouer abounding courage in ſuch, whom election and not lot, made their Gouernours? How many wilfull people haue I noted to periſh; aſſemblies diſſolue themſelues; Comminalties abrogated; factious heads run to the libbet, training Troupes after them likewiſe, much more indiſcreete, then faultie? Meere Courage is a double death, that ſtifles reaſon, and makes the body inſenſible of the thing, which moſt offendeth it; yea, killeth and ruinateth it altogether. Meere Courage is a double debilitie of Spirit, which altereth the Heart and Soule, principall Iudges of the humain Common-wealth, and Oeconomie of the little World. Meere Courage, is a double Enemy, that betrayeth vs by miſ-gouernment, and leadeth vs into the Ambuſh, which our Enemies wiſedome prepared for vs. Meere Courage is a double aſſurance, promiſing and performing victory, to him that out-reacheth vs in iudgment and councell. Meere Courage, is a double Engine, that ſhaketh our naturall cariage, and changeth vs into that, which is much leſſe proper, then the thing that animates and moſt enflameth vs.

The harmes enſuing by meere courage, in the body of Man.

Example is woſull, when it hurteth any Countrey, by loſſe of ſuch as can hardlie be ſpared.

I grow the larger in this Argument, to abate the prodigious pride of greatneſſe, and to annihilate the preſumptuous excellence, which they giue themſelues aboue others, who (oftentimes) are rather inferiour to them in happineſſe, then in merite. They attribute our Soueraigne and principall Felicity, to a braue and ſwaggering oſtentation, as to the onely Lady and Queen of this life: which (notwithſtanding) is not to be be found in vs, but by the knowledge of true humanity. I am sworne Enemy to Court-flatterers, and Mountebancke Diuines of these daies, who hold opinion, that to induce, & thrust a man on to the rule of duty: there is nothing more conuenable and necessary; then to shew him all that is glorious in him, or worthy of most precious esteeme. Alasse, by this way, Princes (intemperate enough of their owne Nature) can meet with nothing but Rockes, which bruising themselues against, they mustneeds fall into the Gulfe of ignorance. Al this Cabala is practised to no other end, but to puffe vp vaine-glory, and to make apparance esteemed for an effect. By this meanes, a man labours to conceiue a good opinion of himselfe, and then aduentures vpon some enterprize, wherein he cannot chuse but faile. For the chiefest vertue in a man (that is truelie Man) according to the rule of truth; is properly placed in the slender estimation, which he ought to haue of his own miserable condition, whereinto he was deiected by the fall of our first Father: by iust consideration whereof, all vaine glory and presumption will bee beaten downe in vs. For, if we duely weigh, in what manner our first grace is disgraced of Celestiall fauour, and that (in stead thereof) we are plundged in the bottomlesse death of corruptions, all the parts of our Soules becomming so possessed with sinne, that each man, in himselfe (as the Eagle of Doctours, S. Augustine saith) is made a meere Enemie to Nature; If wee were liuely touched with the rigour of our importune mallice, and those out-ragious defectes, which betrayes vs in perticuler conduct of our liues: we would immediatly depart out of our selues, as empty and vnprouided of all goodnesse, and seek our glory elsse-where; yea, our Dignitie, Fortune, and perfect contentment; by sighing after those glorious qualities, as desirous to giue a new Title to humaine Nature, the name whereof being so infamous and monsterous in it selfe.

It is our case, that being puft vp with the little glory, which remaineth of our Originall, and tearmed (by our diuines) a portion of the Diuinity: we exalt our selues in such sort, that we grow proud of those things, which appertaine onely to the goodnesse of God, yea, and that in such manner, as he refuseth further to assist vs; because we referre that to our owne proper and peculiar vertue, which is due to his grace onely, being the sole Artezane of our cheefest felicity. We neede not bee proud of vnderstanding our primatiue excellency, if wee consider withall, in what darkenesse wee are enueloped, and detained in the Prison of that Curse, which is likewise falne vppon vs, by the timerity of him, who, hauing touched what was forbidden, threw into obliuion that Wisedome, which might haue kept him to the subiect and obiect of his first condition. Alas, we conceit, that we haue something properly resident in our selues, which opinion beeing presented to our vnderstanding: abuseth our weakenesse, and eleuates vs to ingratitude; yea, euen to the ouerweening boldnesse of Nimrod, who thought to touch Heauen with his litle finger, as Lysimachus with the point of his Lance. Man hath naturally in him a Spirit, too capable of entertaining this life; and some discretion also of good and euill, grauen on the Table of his conscience. Hee hath likewise in him, some naturall knowledge of God. But all these thinges are sullied in him, much like to pure and good Wine, infected by the foule fauour of the Caske; which makes it loose the grace both of goodnesse and beauty, throwing a sower, harsh, and hurtfull tast to health on it.

In this manner, the iudgement remaing with him, whereby to discerne the most from the least; is imperfect & confused in part, and whatsoeuer is solide in him, slydeth away in meere vanity. As (for example) his courage, or (to speake better) his will, which (without will) ouerthrowes it selfe by frenzies, and impetuous heate: according as his errour enstructeth him to runne, and as his bad Nature transporteth him with motion, which was not so familiar in the first man. In breefe, the intelligence that courage onely (in Man) hath of his own good; is nothing else but an horrible sourse of errour, which declares it selfe in plurality of most necessary desseignes, and not onely ly therein, but in this faire and holy consideration: to wit; That the Heauens doe alwaies retaine their ordinary motion; The Waters their inconstancy, and course ordained; The Birds building their Nests; The Fruites fructifying according to their times; And finally, that no Creature (inferiour to Man) committeth any fault in his worke. Whereas (quite contrary) he drawes himselfe from his propertie, to resolue and conuert into his contrarie; hauing lesse shame then the Molosses of Albania, and lesse feare then the Vultures, which follow battailes, and seek the furious encounters of cruell and dreadfull Armies.

The Molosses of Albania.

We must deriue then our conclusion in this point (at least) if we followe Christianity, and the duty of a Christian Soule, which neither can, or ought to glorifie it selfe, but in the Grace of God; we must conclude (I say) that all our vertue, be it great or little, commeth from no place else, but Heauen; or, to speake better, from the first, chiefe and Soueraigne Architect: who, without considering or regarding any thing beside himselfe (fore seeing our weaknes) is willing (of his owne good pleasure) to helpe some, by placing them in honor, as vessels of his Almightinesse, and to leaue others in their own iudgment. So that the one haue Grace, which is not due to them, neither is giuen them, but by diuine clemency; and the other receiue such punishmét as they deserue. For it is in Gods power, to communicate himselfe to them that are vnworthy (but onely by his grace) and not to vse the like to euery one; to make his iudgments admired and to enforce our diligent search, for that, which wee esteeme more requisite for him to giue, then we are worthy of. Onely we are so much the lesse capable of this fauor, by how much there is nothing more certaine; then that God will neuer pardon a man of violent courage, and of prompt execution in doing euill, being led by the rage of his own angry reuenging hart.

Wherein any Man ought to place his greatest glorie.

God respecteth them that are vnworthy, but enabled by his grace.

The whole drift of my scope in this Argument, is nothing else, but to enstruct Princes, that they ought to ioyne piety and pitty with their State affaires; and further to assure them, that their courage (without wisedome) is rather the fire of Gods anger, then any marke of perfect valour. The Gothes, Hunnes, & Vandals, may testifie the same, whose rage made an vniuersall terror in three great parts of the World, running here and there, like a tempest arising on the calme Sea: which yet (at length) dissolued of it selfe, and brought more amazement then perill to the beholders. The Gauls also witnessed as much, who, being growne great with courage, and improuident in their blindfolded hope; ran to ruinate the buildings of Rome, & not to the Conquest of the Cittizens. Tell me, I pray ye, to what end serued such hastinesse, temerity, and insolent fury? To what purpose were the Gaules so violently transported; but onelie to tell the Romaines, that their Enemies were more vincible, then vneasie to be vanquished? That their fury, was without desseigne; their rage, without any premeditation; their rash leape, their owne breake-necke; their enterprise, a meere Chaos of distempered wils; and the issue of all, a shame very dammageable, a ruinous infamy, and a perticuler scandall to that Nation.

The violence of the Gaules in sacking Rome.

Courage (saith a learned Gentleman of France) is not for these times, when Men are growne madde; nor for these daies, wherein follie possesseth vs, transport commaundeth vs, and the verie Atomies of inconstancie, doe forme a body to our intentions. We make Warre with the Spaniard in a leafe of Paper; we gad thorough all our Parliament Chambers; our Cannon is yet in the Mettall Mine; our Artillerie carriages yet growing in Forrests; our Pikes in the liuing bodies of Trees; our Souldiers in the purse; our Captains in creation; and our enemy (who hath not so much courage, as to enterprise any difficult thing, without a solide & robust bodie) mindes not the defiance in writing, but victorie, destroyeth Picardie and Champaigne; and, in stead of Paper warre, which leadeth our Frenchmen by the nose, to the seuerall quarters of the Citty: he brings his Ensignes before our Bastions, his Trenches to our wals, & his Souldiers to our breaches. Of al which, our own rashheaded ambition is the only cause, & somwhat else, whereof I spare to speake at this time,

CHAP. XIII.

Of a strange and wonderfull accident, that happened in the Islands of the Molucaes, about the yeare of our Lord, 1525.

I Haue long time forborne, to remember in this labour of important occasions, an admirable accident, which befell in the Islandes of the Molucques, seated in the East Indiaes. Whereof (neuertheless) there is not any mention made, in the Booke of the generall Historie of the Spanish Indiaes, nor in Hierome Osorius, Byshop of Sylues, neither in Lopez de Castagneda, and other Historians of Portugall: but onely in the Booke of Laurentius Surius, Germaine, Chronicler to Charles the fift Emperour, entitled; The Historie of all memorable thinges, as well Ecclesiasticall as Seculer, happening within seauenty and eight yeares, in all partes of the World, beginning at the yeare 1500. But the saide Surius heard this strange accident, by people worthy of beleefe, who made report thereof to the Emperor, because they were there present at the time; and since then, I my selfe haue heard it confirmed by diuers honorable Gentlemen, who trauailed for certaine knowledge thereof.

Laurentius Surius, Chronicler to the Emp. Charles the fift.

The Islandes of the Molucques are many in number, but among the rest, there are fiue, more great and remarkable then all the other; which are named Tidora, Terrenata, Mata, Matila, and Mattena. In which Islands, there is much greater increase of Spices, then in any other as yet discouered: as of Pepper, Nut-megges, Ginger, Cloues and Maces. Moreouer, the Countrey aboundeth in Rice, which is their onely Corne, and in many other Fruites. The Spaniards were the first that discouered these Islands, and made very great profits of them, by Traffick of those Spices at meane prices. Which when the King of Portugall vnderstood, he made knowne to the Emperour Charles the fift, King of the seuerall Spaines; what wrong hee offered him, by sending his nauall Armies to Traffique in those quarters, because they belonged to his partage, which had beene made betweene the Kings of Castile and Portugall, by Pope Alexander the sixt, a Valentinois, who had heard the discoueries of the new lands, made by both these Kings, and the differences depending betweene them, for gouernment of them. Whereupon, of his own meere good will and motion, hee gaue the Indiaes to the Kinges of Castile, and all the Coast of Affrica to the Kinges of Portugall; with charge, to conuert the Idolaters and Gentiles to the Faith of Iesus Christ.

Fiue especiall Islands of the Molucques.

The Spaniards first discouerers of the Molucques.

And to the end, that the one should not presume any way against the other, he commaunded a line to be drawne vpon the Globe, descending from the North to the South, & passing towards the West more then 400. Miles from one of the Isles of Cap verdi; because it should not touch any iote of Affrica, which appertained to the King of Portugall. This line deuided the whole World, and serued as a borne or limitation, to the Conquests of both these Kinges. The partes beyond the line, belonged to the Spaniards, and those on the hither side, to the Portugals. And yet, notwithstanding this deuision, each of these kings was perswaded, that the Molucques belonged to his seuerall part, and there was a long time of contention (there-about) betweene them. But the Emp. hauing neede of Mony, to serue his Warres in Italy, Germanie, and Fraunce: quitted his rights to the King of Portugall, for three hundred and fiftie thousand Ducates, whereby the Portugals haue (euer since) enioyed the sole Trafficke, to their great and inestimable profit.

The partition of the World made betweene the Kings of Castile and Portugall.

The Emperor sold his right to the King of Portugall.

At that time raigned in the great Isle of Tidora, one named Manser, a Man well skild in Astrology, and very affable, contrary to the nature of Mahometane Religion: for hee entertained the Spaniards courteously, as afterward hee did the Portugalles, permitting all his Sub-Subiects to be instructed in Christian Religion, and so many of them as pleased to bee baptized, the Portugalles hauing brought thither Priestes, and religious persons for the purpose. In the meane while, the Deuill (enuying that Gods Kingdome should be so freely furthered, in these rich and populous Islands) quickely altered the estate of Christian Religion: for this good King Mansor dying, his Sonne (succeeding him in the Kingdome) not onely interdicted the Portugalles Commerce with his Subiects; but also commaunded his people (as suddenly as they could) to kill them, and that none should be so bold, as to make profession of Christian Faith, or to meddle with any matter thereof. This was no sooner vnderstood by some, who were but badly affected to Christianity: but (before they could preuent it) many Portugals were slaine, and such as had any means of escape, fled into their Ships, lying neere at Anker, and returned home to Portugall with these ill tidings.

The death of King Mansor, and succession of his Son.

Heere ye are to note, that after this disloyall act, of so euill vsage towardes Strangers, and breach of fidelitie, without any cause giuen to procure it, (albeit the deceased King Mansor, whose owne Letters cleared him from all such barbarous and Mahometane perfidie, had graunted to the Portugals, free libertie to slay any that hindred their Commerce, or any way scandalized their Religion, which they refused to doe) they carried themselues very patiently, in all the iniuries that these Mahumetist Moluccques offered them, who were much assisted in their violence, by the Arabian Marchants, that repined and grudged at the Christians fauour and authority. After (I say) this massacre of Christians; for the space of two yeares, the Land of Tidora, and other Isles thereto adiacent, became to bee barren, that had before beene as fruitefull, as any other Countries in the World.

The fauours granted by K. Mansor to the Portugals.

Heauen reuenged the Christians cruel oppression.

Their Trees brought forth no more Fruites nor Spiceries, and albeit the grounds were sowed and re-sowed many times together; yet did they not produce any Corn, and the Rice which they kept for further sowing, putrified of it selfe. The sweete Waters became salt; the Cattell, as Elephants, Oxen, Kine, Camels, Sheepe, and such like, dyed (well neere) all, and caused the death of many people beside. All which notwithstanding, these wicked Mahumetists would not acknowledge their Apostasie (the greater part of the Island hauing made profession of Christianity in the life time of Mansor) abiuring the same now with their new king, who was of a wauering and inconstant Spirit.

The King of Portugall, named Iohn, hauing heard by such as escaped, the Treason and inury committed on his people, was not thereby dismaied; but arming himselfe with royall courage, and not regarding the great distance of two thousand leagues by Sea, with other difficulties of passages to the Moluccques; leuied an army of four hundred men, who (two yeares after this massacre) arriued in the Hauen of Tidora, which is a great Citty, and whereof the whole Island beareth name. The Army landed, and (placing their Artillery) gaue great terror to the City, and erected a Fort on the Sea shoare: the King, with his Islanders and other Neighbours, labouring to hinder the Portugals purpose. Here we are to consider, that the principall Armes of the Islanders, were poysoned Arrowes, which they could deliuer from their Bowes very dexteriously, and those arrowes were very dangerously bearded, otherwise they went starke naked, as all the other Negroes doe.

A second Army of the Portugals against the Moluccques.

Twenty thousand of these men of war being thus assembled, they ranne with such boldnesse and courage vppon the small number of Christians; that they had all beene immediatly slaine, if these Apostate Moluccques (God so appointing it) had not beene suddenly surprized with a mightie feare and terror, & that in such sort, as the Weapons fell to the ground out of their handes. For the Sunne (albeit it was then the houre of midday) was so obscured, as hardlie could they discerne one another. The earth trembled and quaked, and fierie stones fell downe from Heauen, which bruised and battered their Mosquees or Temples. The Trees were strangely rent and torne, the roots being turned vpward. This tempest beginning somewhat to slake, the Portugals ranne vpon the affrighted Barbarians, and slewe the greater number of them, not any one Christian being so much as wounded, and the Islanders flying, the Portugalles remained Conquerors, and finished vp the remainder of their Fort.

The Molucques enter into consideration of this admirable accident

The Molucques hauing considered with themselues, that this losse sustained in battaile, the barrennesse of the Land, the Earthquake, terrour, darkening of the Sunne, the fiery stones falling from Heauen, and the Tempest which rent their trees in such sort, could not happen but by Gods heauy displeasure, and that their Prophet Mahomet could not be God, but rather an abuser and imposture, and that the Christians were assisted by the true God indeede, and to him onelie (and to none else) repaire ought to bee made for safetie, as well in this World, as that to come; Considering also, that the Famine, barrennesse of the Earth, and Mortality both of Men and Beasts, which hapned in the precedent yeares, was, because they had forsaken Christian Religion, and (returning to the Mahometane) had cruelly murdered them that enstructed thē in the truth, without any iniurie offered on their behalfe: Hereupon, they concluded to make peace with the Christians, with promise (thence forward) to liue in loue and fidelity with them, embracing Christian Religion againe. Moreouer, such as had not formerlie beene baptized, they caused them then to bee baptized, whereof there was so great a number, that in the space of a Weeke, more then fifteene thousand were become Christians. Beside, diuers of the neighbouring Islands, hearing of this wonderfull accident, came thither in great numbers to doe the like. Since which time, the Countrey returned, to the former fertility, & the most part of the people haue continued in Christianity. And not only these of the Molucques, but many of the great Prouince of China, of the Kingdomes of Narsingua, Bindana, Bennaga, Ioana, Cor, Calecuth, Arabia, and others, became Christians, who before were Idolaters, and of the Mahometane Religion.

The Molucques forsake their former Apostasie, and returne to Christianity.

Of other Nations that became Christians vpon this accident.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of some, who haue counterfeited sickenesse, to exempt themselues from businesse and imployment: And of others, who (in mockery of Men) haue feigned to haue their imperfections; and falne (truelie) into sickenesse, and the same deformities.

Martiall, who was a notable scoffer, makes a mockerie at Cælius in his Epigrames, who counterfeiting to bee Gouty; annointed himself with Oyles and other things, wrapping and binding vp his ioynts, because hee would haue nothing to doe at the Court, either by night or day, or attend (as Courtiers doe) vpon any great person. But in the end, his fortune so fell out, that he happened to haue the gout indeede. Appianus Alexandrinus reporteth also of another Romane, who, to escape the proscriptions of the Romaine Triumuiri, and not to bee knowne for what he was, by such as might take notice of him: kept himselfe close, and wore an emplaister of veluet vpon one of his eyes, which hee continued for a long time. After all such search and pursuite was passed ouer; the man took off his plaister, and found the vtter losse of that eye indeed.

Cælius, that counterfeited to haue the Gout, became gouty indeed.

A Romaine that dissembled to haue but one eie.

The reason of his fall into this accident, is plaine and apparant, in regard that the eye, not performing his action (which is to see) looseth it selfe. As may be gathered by such, who haue long time beene imprisoned in some dark Caue or Dungeon, where no light could be discerned; and haue lost their sight, or very greatly impaired it, by discontinuation from beholding light. Serpents containe the same quality, for when they come forth from vnder the Earth, where they hid themselues all the Winter: they see not any iote at al, and therefore they are the more easilie killd. This Cælius, who became Gouty, it may be, that idlenesse, the cloaths wrapped about his ioyntes, with the ranck & hot Oyles applied to his limbs and and Arteries, hauing made attraction of the humours; caused such goutines. For, if a bruise, receiued by a straite shooe, or a seame of some hardnesse in a stocking, hath many times occasioned the Gout, according as some learned Phisitions haue written: much stronger reason then is there for the fore-named matters.

A strange accident happening in France

But of another History, which I my selfe credibly knew to happen, I cannot alleadge any naturall reason. During those troubles of the vnion or league in Fraunce, it chanced, that (neere vnto a Castle) certaine honest men were set vpon by Theeues, and robd in such sort, that they had nothing left them but their shirts. When they perceiued the Castle, they went presently thither, and entreated the Lord thereof, that hee would lend them some assistance, for apprehension of the Theeues: in regard that he had a certaine knowledge of them, and was armed with such authority, as might (at least) helpe them to their Garments againe. But the vncharitable Gentleman would afoord them no fauour; no, not so much as to see them: but feigned that hee had the Collique, and was vnable to stirre out of his Bed, or to attend vpon any businesse whatsoeuer. It was then the coldest season of the yeare, and the Seruants (albeit vnknowne to their Maister) lodged these despised poore men, (for that night) in a Stable; whence they parted homeward on the next morning, without drawing the least courtesie that could bee, from that vngentle Gentleman. Now, I know not whether it happed by iust vengeance of of Heauen, or by some naturall occasion thereto leading: but he fell into the Collike indeed, and keeping his Chamber for it, the space of twenty daies, at last he died by violent extremity thereof.

Diuine vengeance happning on a dissembling Gentleman.

An Abbot of Guyenne, and Archdeacon in a Bishoppricke, was cited by the Bishop and Chapter, to appeare at a visitation, for assessing of each Benefice in the Diocesse (according to their faculties) for the releefe of poor Parishes, from whence they deriued dismes and rents. The Abbot made excuse, saying hee had a plurisie (which was meerely false) & therefore he could not be there present. But within few daies after, hee was taken with such a grieuous paine in his side; that hee kept his Bed a whole yeare together, and was glad to haue his side cotterized in two places; all which notwithstanding, he could not recouer health while he liued.

An Abbot iustly punished for his dissembling.

Snibdager, King of Swetia, being very couetous, counterfeited deafenesse, to the end, he might heare no requestes made to him, for bestowing of any gifts. For in that Country, he negotiated his whole raigne, by conference with the King, and not by writing or petition, as they do to this day: But in short time the King became both deafe and blinde indeed.

A strange accident happening to a king

I knew a young Scholler, descended of good Parentage in the Franche Countie, who was a very facetious Scoffer and mocker, and continually vsed to counterfeit the gate, gesture, and behauiour of his Sister (the Wife to his elder Brother, descended of a verie worthy and vertuous familie, and had brought great estates and meanes to his Brother) but she was lame, and as she halted, so (in scorne) he would doe the like. But (no doubt by Gods iudgement) he chanced to breake one of his Legges, which could neuer after be recouered, or brought to any forme, but that he halted downe right to his dying day.

a scorner that became lame by meere mockery.

Mothers vsed to correct (& with very good reason) their Children, when they counterfeited squinting in their eyes, gogling, blindnesse, limping, wry Mouthes, and other imperfections and deformities of body. For as a bodie so young and tender, wil easily apprehend any bad impression; so, oftentimes it fals out (by what meanes I know not) that they are suddenly surprized, euen in their wanton and mocking imitation. And assuredly, I haue seene many, who haue become sicke, in attempting (by scorne) to resemble sicknesse: especially, if such dissimulation hindered their due presence from requisite occasions; and Children, in mocking at others, by succesſe of time, haue falne into the same disease or infirmity.

An especiall duty in all good Mothers.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Vertue and excellency of Hony, and how it ought to be vſed and applied.

Of Tadeus the couetous Phiſition of Florence.

Adaus, the Florentine Phiſition, a Man moſt couetous, for he would not go forth of the Citty, to viſite any ſickly and diſeaſed perſon; except hee might haue fiftie Crownes allowed him for his paines; and to viſite Pope Honorius, he had each day allowed him an hundred Crownes. This Man peruſing the workes of Cardanus (who left a ſmall Treatiſe, which was (as yet) neuer imprinted to our knowledge, for hee liued in the yeare one thouſand two hundred and foureſcore) found certaine places, where hee diſcourſed of Milke, Wine, Beere, and many other thinges: but he obſerued one eſpeciall Chapter, concerning Hony and Manna, & that he alleaged Galen therefore, but declareth not out of which Booke he deriued his Authority. I enquired of many learned Phiſitions, whether it were true or no, that Galen had written on any ſuch matter? Some told me, that they had neuer reade any ſuch thing in his Workes: yet others affirmed, that hee had made ſome report thereof, in his Booke of the Preſeruation of Health. But whether it be ſo or no, ſeeing the diſcourſe is commendable, and full of learning: this Chapter ſhall containe ſome portion of his relation, to the end, that the Reader (not as yet there-with acquainted) may vnderſtand the Vertue of Hony.

Of Hony and Manna alleaged by Galen.

Gal in lib. de Conſer. Sanit.

He deliuereth it for certaine, that Galen had ſeene two men, very different in yeares, for the one was old, and well neere; decrepite; and the other, in the beſt time of his age. Theſe men were moſt contrary in opinion, concerning Hony yet brought to agreement, by ſtore of good reaſons, as you ſhall perceiue. The Auncient and decrepite Man ſaide; that Hony made him verie healthfull, becauſe it gaue warmth to his Body; ſtayed the fluxe in his belly, when it greatly pained him; cleanſed his Lights and Lungs, when they were ouer-charged with raw and indigeſted Phlegme, onely by ſpitting; made his Vrine come orderly, and (conſequentlie) diſcharged the Reines. Hee had alſo ſeene ſome, who were inpoiſoned with Opium, and had daungerouſly fed on venomous Muſhromes or Toadſtooles; that recouered ſound health by the vſe of Hony. He ſaid moreouer, that he had had an inueterare & ſordide Vlcer in one of his Legs, for which he could compaſſe no remedy, by application of manifold very likely helpes; and yet he was thorowly cured, and the Vlcer conſolidated by Hony onely. He ſaid alſo, that he heard of many, who were cured of Tetters, Itch, and Ringwormes; by application of Hony: beſide, diuers others, that had loud tinklings, noyſes, and winds in their eares; yea, & were almoſt ſtark deafe; yet holpen by Hony. It cauſed quick motion in the Pulſes, and (vſed as a Gargariſme) it is a ſinguler remedy againſt the ſquinzy, Kernels in the Necke, ſwolne Aldmonds in the Mouth, and ſoreneſſe in the Throat. Applied to the eyes, it took away thicke miſtes and vapours, which oftentimes obſcureth ſight.

The old Mans allegation in defence of Hony.

In breefe, the old man was aſſuredlie perſwaded, that there was not a better Aliment or Medicament in all the World, then Hony; according to the experience he had made thereof, vpon his owne perſon. Hauing ſpoken theſe things with good iudgment and diſcretion, he held his peace, and Galen commanded the other party, to ſpeak what he could concerning Hony, ſo highlie commended by the olde Man; admoniſhing him withall, to deliuer his minde without paſſion or choller, and likewiſe to ſet aſide al partiall affection: For Galen found (accidentally) theſe two Men thus diſputing. The young Man being Chollerique, prompt, ambitious, and impacient; perſwaded himſelfe of victory before hand, and to preuayle againſt the graue man. But Galen, who had great credite in many partes of the world (in regarde of his ſinguler knowledge, and renowne of his learned labors, being alſo Phiſition to the Emperors M. Anthonius Aurelius Verus, and to his ſucceſſor Commodus) required ſilence; and hauing heard the aged mans report, was as deſirous alſo to heare the young man, and Galen commãded the yong man to ſpeak.

Galen a Man of great authority.

Two Men different in opinion as touching Hony.

and giuing him a signall when to begin, he arose vp (as in anger) and proceeded in this manner:

The young mans declaration against Hony.

I protest to speake nothing at this instant, concerning Hony, which I haue not experimented in mine owne person; and it may be, more truly and certainely, then he hath any way made proofe of the like. I protest withall, that it is the most pernitious aliment or medicament, that can be vnder heauen. For, I haue diuers times made vse thereof (vpon vrgent necessity) hauing beene surprized on the Sea by Pyrats, who kept mee captiue for diuers moneths; when I was constrained to feed thereon, enforced thereunto by meere hunger: but hauing eaten it, I found my stomacke wholly vndigestable, with much procuring to casting, which brought me (at length) to such gripes in the belly, that by the meanes of Windinesse, which it extreamely caused, I looked for no escape with life. Beside these things, it brought mee to a dry Cough, and engendred such a number of worms in a friend of mine: that, notwithstanding hee drank e Vineger, for want of better Wine, he must needs haue dyed, if hee had not voided them.

The vse of Hony il applied, what it worketh.

The vsing of Hony, after my deliuerance, made me fall into a Feauer Tertian; during which time, by aduise of som, I dranke nothing but Hydromell, or Metheglin, which is a Breuage made of Hony, and sodden Water, boiled till the third part thereof bee consumed, and it prolonged my disease: but so soone as I made pure Water my drinke, I mended presently.

Moreouer, the skinne being (by a mischance) a little flayed off my foot; by the aduise of some Women, I vsed an oyntment of Honie, which neuer brought any skin againe: but when I applied a litle burnt Paper thereto, it dried and healed it verie speedily. Briefly, I conclude, that Honie is neither Aliment, nor wholsom Medicament, either for the inwarde or outward affections: but contrariwise, it is verie dangerous and hurtfull to Nature. He pronounced these wordes with such vehemencie and affection, according to his vse and behauiour; as if he wold haue torne the aduersarie partie in pieces with his teeth and nailes.

Galen then spake with great Modestie, (albeit he was by nature, as Chollerick as the other) that both of them had deliuered the truth, & no man needed to make anie doubt, because hee would make it presently apparant. It is most certaine (quoth hee) that this aged man speaketh nothing but truth, declaring what goodnesse he findeth in Honie; because Honie is hotte, and all Aliments or Nutriments of hot Nature, doe agree with all persons, ages, and sexes, temperately, or of cold complexion. But this man is of a Flegmaticke complexion, old, subiect to many cold distillations, Flegmatick, and Quotidian Feauers; and therfore it is no marueil, though he giue such assurance, and finds the vse of Hony wholesome for him. But yet it is verie likely, that he doth not vse it indifferently, as it is brought from the Bee-hiue, but rather prepareth it: for he causeth it to be boyled, sodden, and taketh off the scum, in which maner it nourisheth and conuerteth into good blood. If it much holp him in restraining the Flux of his Belly, it was in this regard, that being in that maner prepared, it had no mordication in it, neither excited any gripings, as it doeth when it is crude and raw, as my Great Schoole-maister Hippocrates hath left written. And whereas hee saith, that it made speedy discharge of his Vrine and Reines, from Sand and Grauell, whereto in age he becam much subiect: surely, being boiled with Water, (which the Physitians call Mulsa) it hath out of question, such Vertue. By coughing and spitting, it cleanseth the Lightes and the Liuer; and the Pipes being charged with colde Flegmes (diseases which depend vpon age) when it is thus reduced into a Syrrope, and taken in Morninges long before feeding, it is verie soueraign, and excellent also, to make olde people liue merrily.

Hony boyled or sodden is the cause of good blood.

Against coughing & spitting.

It cannot bee good for such as haue drunke Opium, or cold poison, by misaduenture, follie, or pride of mind (as now adaies the Turkes, and a great part of the Grecians vse to do) but it is necessary that the Honie should be verie aged, as, of ten or twelue yeares at the least, boyled and clarified in Wine of ten or twelue yeares old; and being so prepared, it correcteth the great coldnesse of the saide Opium or poison. Against Mushromes or Toade-stooles (which are commonly venomous) vndoubtedly, it is a most certain remedy, as he hath formerly said: but it must then be Old Honie good against Opium & poyson.

Against Mushromes or Toad-stooles.

The vertue of Hydromell or Metheglin.

be ordered into a Syrope, as in that nature it is vſed, to diſplace phlegme, and an old dry cough. Hidromell or Metheglin gargarized, doth very well cleanſe all hinderances, which proceede from any thicke phlegme, either in the throat, Vuula or the Almondes. Concerning the ſordide and inueterate Vlcer, which he ſeemeth to haue had in his leg, and cured it by the helpe of Hony: the caſe is very euident, for Hony cleanſeth, cleareth, and is vtter enemy to all ſordity or filthineſſe, and hauing thus neated the Vlcer; it eaſily heals & cloſeth it vp. Touching that which he alleadged, of ſome, who haue diſtilled & put Hony into their eares, being deaffened, full of windes, and aſcending vp into the braine: this muſt be vnderſtood of very old Hony, ſodden with foure times as much old Wine, for all hot medicaments (as very olde wine and Hony are) they doe diſperſe windes very eaſily, and other cold cauſes, which procure deaffeneſſe, and other accidents in thoſe parts.

For olde and foule Vlcers.

For deaffenes and windines in the head.

That it cauſeth the drying vp of Iteches, Tetters, Ring-wormes, and other ſuch like defoedations in the ſkinne; proceedeth from hence, that it is abſterſiue of his owne nature, and a great enemy to al corruption, for whatſoeuer thinges are confected in Hony, will neuer corrupt. By the ſame reaſon, it worketh the death of Itches and Tetters, which are nothing elſe, but meere vncleanneſſe and filthineſſe of the body. In regard of ſight, queſtionleſſe, being mingled with a little Fenell water, and ſo diſtilled into the eyes; it quitteth them from blearings and wateriſh humors, which congealing in thē, doth greatly trouble the ſight, eſpecially in ſuch as vſe ouermuch weeping. To conclude, Ladies and Gentlewomen doe waſh their faces and hands therewith, to keepe them ſmooth, faire and white. And Cato was wont to ſay; That to liue long, we muſt vſe Hony within the body, and oyle without.

Againſt, Itches, Ring-wormes and Tetters.

Againſt the weakeneſſe of ſight.

The ſaying of Cato.

Galen thus finiſhing his proofe (by very good reaſons) that the olde man had ſpoken truely; would not ſo giue it ouer, but though the young man (who was oppoſitiuely contrary to the other) had declared ſo much againſt Hony; yet would he maintaine the truth of his ſpeeches likewiſe. And directing his eye to him, began in this manner, diſcourſing with plenty of words, after the Aſiatick courſe, and not Laconically, as his good and ancient M. Hypocrates was wont to do in his time. Let no man count it ſtrange (quoth he) if thou doe miſlike the vſe of Hony, and lay ſo much blame vpon it: for it is very contrary to thy nature, being of an angry and chollericke temper, hot in action, and eaſily diſpleaſed. And though I had not heard thee ſpeak, nor beheld any action of thine: yet very ſight had beene ſufficient to me; thy haire being red, thy skin yellowiſh, thy body leane and meager; theſe are enow whereby to direct iudgement. Firſt, let me tell thee, that diſeaſes are neuer cured, but by their contraries, for whereas thou ſaidſt, that thou hadſt a Feauer tertian, and ſuppoſed it to come by the vſe of Hony, a food enforced in the time of thy captiuity: I make no doubt at all thereof, for Hony conuerteth it ſelfe quickly into red choller, in any body naturally hot, as thine is, and I wonder it did not more hurt vnto thee, becauſe it was in no manner prepared. For albeit that many viands are good, yet there be ſome that (before they are eaten) doe require preparation, to correct a certaine malignity, which they haue naturally in them. As Coriander, which is venemous of it ſelfe; Neuertheleſſe, corrected with Vineger, it is an excellent medicine for the ſtomack, trauailed with indigeſtions, and filled with windeneſſe. In like manner, crude and raw Hony, not repurged from his excrements; offendeth the ſtomack, engendering a deſire of caſting, and deſcending into the inteſtines, begetteth there ſuch windineſſe, and ſo painefull gripings, as are not poſſible to be declared, and therfore thou haſt affirmed nothing but truth. As for the drie cough which it raiſed in thee, there is no doubt thereof, for but by eating it rawe; ſome part thereof muſt needs fal into the conuoye of the lights and liuer, as it doth in all liquid things (that are thick and impure) receiued into the body. And his tartneſſe or ſaltneſſe (not being ſcummed away before) prouoketh a dry cough, yet auoyding nothing in ſpitting, becauſe no matter at al was deſcēded to the lights & liuer. Which hapned not in like ſort to this old man, for he had phlegm enough in him, to let fall downe ordinarily vpon thoſe parts. But fot that report, that Hony ſhould engender wormes; it is quite contrary to all reaſon; becauſe all things ſteeped in Hony, are exempt from vermine mine or corruption. But if it fall out, that a man vſing Hony, had wormes before, or is enclined naturally to them: then it doth maintaine and nouriſh them, euen as Suger doth; but it can bee no cauſe of their generation.

Hidromell or Metheglin, for what perſons it is good.

Concerning Hydromell or Metheglin, drunke in the continuance of thy Feauer Tertian, and preſumed to prolong the ſame: there is nothing more certaine, then that this drinke (compoſed of Hony and Water) did it. But it was not cauſed by any defect in the liquor, which of it ſelfe is moſt wholeſome, for Men of melancholly habitude, and for diſeaſes of black Choller and Phlegmaticke: but for any chollericke perſon, ſuch as thy ſelfe is, moſt certaine is it, that it is a true foment, and a maintainer of fiery Agues, euen ſuch as thine then was, and he was greatly to be blamed, that thereto did aduiſe or councell thee. And whereas thou ſaieſt, that it is an enimy to ſuch places, as the skin is flaied or gone off: it is to be conſidered, that it was no Vlcer, like vnto the other; for it detergeth, cleaneth, and dryeth not. To regenerate new skinne, we muſt not apply deterſiue Medicins: but ſuch as are deſiccatiue, without any mordication. And I credit well, that burnt Paper was much more conuenient for it: but yet we muſt not ſay, that if Medicines be badly vſed, they are not therefore good, being fitly applyed.

Burnt Paper good to procure new skin.

Galens concluſion of theſe two contraries.

I conclude then (by theſe reaſons) that you both haue ſpoken very well of Hony, albeit ye are ſo different in opinion: but all your contrariety hath no other ground, but that the younger man of ye both, did not vſe Hony duely, and with conſideration and good iudgement, according as the circumſtances required. Thus Galen gaue ending to this Controuerſie, and it was to be feared, that if Galen had not thus moderated the matter; the difference had cauſed blowes between them. Such debates and contentions, are daily ſeen in Countrey Townes and Villages; when a man will raſhly commend his Scithe, Hatchet, Sickle, Dogge, Bull, or Cow, beyond his Neighbours, and thereupon are ready to goe to Law. But breaking off [illegible] diſcourſe, becauſe I would not be [illegible]enſiue to the reader: I wil adde another Chapter, to declare whence the matter of Hony is taken, and how it is made.

Contention quickely cauſeth quarrell.

CHAP. XVI.

How Hony is made; Whence Manna proceedeth; Of the Aiery Hony; And of Sugar.

HOny commeth from the Dew of Heauen, which falleth vpon the Herbes and Flowers, and is ſuckt vp by the Bees, and encloſed in their ſtomackes: afterward, it is vomited or caſt vp at their mouthes, and they preſerue much part thereof in the hollow of their Iawes, to liue theron during winter, and other hard times. Prouident Nature hath ſo well ordered al thinges, for the benefit and commodity of Man; that ſhee hath beſtowed many vertues and vigours on thoſe pretty Flies, in gathering ſufficient for themſelues, and liberall extendure for Man alſo. For it is a great merchandiſe, helpfull for diuers Maladies, and a ſinguler nouriſhment for ſome bodies, as may bee gathered by our former diſcourſe.

How the Bees do make their Hony.

Natures prouidence for Man.

Nature hath beene ſo bountifull to Man, and ſtill continueth the ſame affection; that ſhe cauſeth great quantitie of this Hony dew to fall, euen like raine vpon the earth in ſome Countries, vpon the Mountaines, and places where Frankinſence groweth. To gather it, the Inhabitants lay fleeces of Wooll vnder the Trees, and beat the Trees, to cauſe the Dew to fall vpon the fleeces, which drinke it in: afterward, they preſſe the fleeces, and receiuing this hony-dew into conuenient Veſſels; they boyle and purifie it, making vſe thereof in their foode, as alſo in their Medicines, as they thinke beſt, and it is much better then that which is wrought by the Bees.

Hony-dew falleth like raine in ſome places.

Galen ſaith, that there fell ſuch great quantity of this Dew (in his time) in his Countrey of Pergamus; that the Countrey people (greatly delighted therein) gaue thankes therefore to Iupiter. Ælianus writeth alſo, that there fell ſuch Galen his report of Hony dew.

ſuch plenty thereof in India, in a Region which is called Praſia, and ſo moiſtened the Graſſe, that the Sheepe, Kine, and Goates feeding thereon, yeelded Milke ſweete like Hony, which was very pleaſing to drinke. And when they vſed that Milke in any diſeaſe, they needed not to put any Hony therein, to the end it ſhould not corrupt in the ſtomacke: as it is appointed in Hecticke Feauers, Conſumptions, Tiſickes, and for others that are vlcered in the inteſtines, as is confirmed by the Hiſtories of Portugall.

Hony hindereth Milke from corrupting.

Euripides and Aelianus of the vertues of Hony.

Euripides ſaith, that meere Hony fell vpon the Trees in Media; and Ælianus ſaith, that in Trapezonde, the people gathered Hony on the Boxe-tree leaues; and albeit it was bitter, and of ſtrong ſauour, yet it cured ſuch as were mad, and them that were tormented with the falling ſickneſſe. Doubtleſſe, it is very likely, that Hony ſhould relliſh of the Plant or Hearbes quality, from whence it is gathered: for if the Tree be venomous, ſuch will the Hony bee, and if the Hearb or Graſſe be healthful, ſo is it likewiſe. Which was very well obſerued by Dioſcorides, who ſaith; In Heraclea of Pontus, there was ſome Honie ſo venomous, that it would reduce all the body into a ſweat, and take away their ſenſes, that did eate thereof: but the Hearbe Rhue being preſently taken, was an immediate remedie. In Sardignia it is gathered of very bitter taſt, becauſe it may bee, that much Worme-wood or Sothernwood groweth in that Countrey: and yet notwithſtanding, it is not venomous, but irkſome to taſt.

Hony both medicinable & venomous.

Dioſcorides concerning hony

Hony gathered in Sardignia.

And to the end, that nothing may be omitted, of what may be ſaid concerning Hony; I finde, that there is another kinde of Dew, beſide the former, which congealeth of it ſelfe, & is found and taken vpon the leaues and branches of Trees, vpon Hearbs and ſtones, and ſometimes on the very ground, forming it ſelf into litle Grains, like Gum, which falleth from heauen before break of day; being very ſweete in taſt. And this dew or moiſture, is called grained Manna, the beſt whereof commeth from Calabria, where they take it on their common Aſh-trees, vppon the wide commons, and (many times) vpon ſome other Trees, by ſome ſecret of Nature. It maketh the belly looſe, without any violence, as by daily experience it is to be ſeene, for if a man take the waight of two ounces and an halfe thereof; it releaſeth the belly gently, and purgeth choller particularly: nor is there any feare, in giuing it to Women great with childe, and young ſucking Children, if they neede any purging. Now adaies, becauſe in ſtead of Hony, moſt part of men doe make vſe of Suger, as being more amiable vnto Nature; it ſhall not vary much from our purpoſe, if wee enter into ſome breefe diſcourſe thereof.

Another kind of dew beſide the former.

Grained Manna, the beſt is of Calabria.

The vertue of this Manna in vſe.

Suger is but the Pith or Marrow of certaine cultiued Reedes or Canes, naturally produced, and boiled in Water, vntill it grow to ſome hardneſſe. The Suger, whereof our auncients (as Pliny, Galen, Dioſcorides, Paulus Æginetus, and others) make mention, was none other, but that which came forth of the Cane, by a riſt made thereinto, as being ouer full of ſugred pith, which congealed to the Cane like a Gumme; and long-time (both before and after) no other kinde of Suger was knowne, but onely that, which quenched thirſt in the hotteſt fiery Agues. Quite contrary to the Suger of theſe daies, which prouoketh thirſt, and turneth it ſelfe into bitter choller, euen as Hony doth. This Hony was then rare, and all Sauces, Conſerues, Confections, Opiates, Electuaries, and other medicinable compoſitions, were made with Hony; only through defect of knowing Suger in thoſe times.

The definition of Suger.

The naturall Suger vſed by our elders.

But ſince Madame Auarice diſcouered the Art, of preſſing and boyling thoſe Suger Canes, deriuing thence great aboundance of Suger: it hath happened, that the Indians haue (and yet yearly do) cut the Suger Canes, making alſo a yearely planting of thē. And therefore there needeth no maruaile, if thoſe great Suger Canes be not to bee found, wherein nature ſhewed her effects, and ſo (by conſequent) the naturall Suger vſed by our fore-fathers, is vtterlie loſt. In ſtead whereof, our moderne rimes haue vſed Suger-candy, which is artificiall and cleare, drawne forth of minerall Salt; being ſucked vp on the tongue, whereby it wholely reſembleth the Suger of our Auncients.

The Difference between Hony & Sugar in vertue.

The comparison which our Physitions make betweene Hony and Sugar, is, that they are both Abstersiue, Deiccatiue, and Resolueable; but yet Sugar much lesse then Honie. Sugar is not so contrarie to the stomacke, as Honie, neither so hot, that it may be numbered amongest those Medicines, which may be administred in Feauers: and this is the opinion both of Galen and Auicen.

How long time it is since sugar was first knowne.

The inuention of boyling, and making it into a Licquid kinde of Loaues, for common Traffique and distribution (in such great quantity) through all parts of the world, began within these last 500. yeares. In which time (yet farre off from the Originall) the Affricans, and people of Asia, being Neighbors to the Indiaes, got the sight of making Sugar in India, & preparing their grounds aptly for Sugar Canes; by transporting some of those sugar Canes into their Countries, and husbanding their tillage for them. Afterward, they communicated the manner therof to other people, as (at this instant) there is verie good Sugar made in Egipt, Madera, the Canarie Ilands, throughout all Barbary, Sicily, the Isles * Baleares, in some partes of Spaine, and other places. The Reader may perceiue by this Discourse, in what case Honie is good, and in what euil: how it ought to be applied, and in what things it is best vsed; What difference there is betweene Honie and Sugar, and the generation both of the one and other. By obseruing also the disputation, which hapned between those men of different yeares, some profit may bee gathered; in what kinde it is wholesome, Nutritiue, and Physicall; and in what Nature also, dangerous and hurtfull.

CHAP. XVII.

How the Gothes vsed to elect their Kings, Great, Fat, and Corpulent of Bodie. Contrariwise, how the Sarrazins wold haue their Kings to be Meager, Leane, and of small stature.

IT were needlesse to declare, what maner of people the Sarrazins vvere, hauing formerly spoken sufficient thereof, in a Chapter onely thereto appertaining. And for the Gothes likewise, somewhat hath alreadie bin saide, and the rest remaineth to more conuenient place. My instant purpose is, to relate of what stature and habitude of bodie, both those Nations vsed to create their Kings, therby to appeare more apt and proper for command ouer them. The Gothes would not elect anie man to be their King, except he were tall, great, grosse, and verie corpulent. On the contrary, the Sarazins would haue no King to commaund ouer them, except he were little, lean, and low of stature. Whosoeuer considereth well on these matters, will find neither side to be voide of reason, albeit their opinions were so opposite; and therefore wee will begin with them of great, grose, and corpulent condition.

Kinges far, great, and tal, and others leane, lowe, & little.

Hippocrates, the Prince of Physitions, saith; Great stature is verie seemly & commendable in a young man, and it begetteth him much grace; but it is an vnprofitable charge to age, and much worse then smalnesse. Doubtlesse, a Prince of high great apparaunce, and goodly shape, is much more respected by the greater part of his people; then one that is lowe, leane, and little. To approue this, certain Normans, hauing made a Voyage into the Countries of Brasile (where the people were tearmed Saluages, and went whollie Naked, feeding on humaine flesh) brought backe in their Ships diuers Captaines of the Caribes. and made a present of them to King Charles the ninth, who was then young in yeares, onely about the age of fifteene. The Saluages perceiuing his great attendance, and that euery one was verie respective of him, demanded what he was? One told them, that he was the King, who absolutely commaunded all France, a Countrie of large extendure, and well peopled. The Caribes answered, saying; Surely, there was but ill proceeding in the election of so young a King, rather this man, or that man had bin much better, pointing their fingers to two Switzers of great corpulence, and were of the Guard belonging to the said King.

Aphor. 54. lib. 2.

The Normās voyage to Brasile.

The iudgement of Saluages in choise of a King.

It is contemptible and vnseemelie, to behold a chiefe person, as the king, Captaine, or other men of command, to bee of small stature, and their seruants great. The first King of Israel, which GOD chose and gaue to his people, was Saule, Men of small stature, much despised.

a man of high and great ſtature. After ſuch ſightly perſonage, commended by Hippocrates in a yong man; he addeth, a great diſcommoditie, ſaying; Great Corpulence is inſupportable and hurtful to age, becauſe a great man being old, becommeth bending or bowing, and hath labor enough to beare the bigneſſe of his bodie, by the puffing vp or ſwelling in his legges. Moreouer, for the moſt part they are Cowardes, without magnanimitie or bodily ſtrength: For neither their ſpirits, natural heat, or animal forces, are ſo well aſſembled and vnited, as in them of leſſer corpulence.

Hippoc. Aphoriſ. 54. Lib. 2.

Great ſtature is very hurtful to age.

If occaſion ſo required, that ſuch men ſhould be expoſed to danger, either by Sea or Land, or ſome misfortune or aduerſity ſhold befall them, they wil quickly ſhake and tremble with feare: vvhich hapneth thus to them, becauſe their Naturall heat languiſheth, their ſpirites are thin and little. and their blood leſſe boyling. Beſides, Naturall Vertue ſpendes it ſelfe, when it ſpreads into a long & large extendure; which vniting and encloſing it ſelfe in a little bodie, is much more vigorous and powerfull, then that which is heer and there diſperſed. And that which yet is worſe, what grace could the Gothes finde, in a bodie ſo great and groſſe? For ouer and beſide, that they muſt needs be vnable for all royal actions, either in bodie or vnderſtanding; ſo likewiſe, life could not prolong it ſelfe ſo wel in them, as it commonlie dooth in leaner bodies. The reaſon is, becauſe groſſe corpulency hath not ſo manie vitall ſpirites, neither ſuch plentie of bloode in the Veines and Arteries, as Leanneſſe generally hath. For, Fatneſſe doth cauſe great oppreſsion, whereby (ſuch men) doe verie ſoone ſuffocate vnder anie laborious trauell, or ſharpe diſeaſe. It procureth alſo, that in the leaſt ſickneſſe or indiſpoſition happening to them; they thereby become daily tired, panting, ſighing, grieuing, hartleſſe, deiected, and in ſuch ſort emptied of all courage, that life it ſelfe (thogh tenderly affected) is tedious and irkeſome to them.

The diſcommodtie of great or groſe corpulence.

A good reaſon againſt corpulency of body.

Men of leſſer ſtature, haue (naturally) a meruailous vigor, and the faculties of Nature ſtrongly combined. We may diſcerne in them verie excellent graces, both Corporall and Spirituall, with ſingular promptitude and ſubtiltie of mind, and that in ſuch ſort, as not only they excell, or equall (at leaſt) the others in any diſpoſition: but likewiſe, in ſtrength and ſwiftneſſe, as alſo in goodnes of ſtomack for eating or drinking. I haue oftentimes noted in our Armies, ſome French men of ſlender ſtature, who haue bin drinking a Vie (as we terme it) with Switzers and Germaines, great of bodie, and verie fat: but the Switzers and Germains were ſooner drunke, became ſleepie, reeling, and fell to the ground, vnable to vſe any function of ſoule or bodie; then the other light timberd men, that went away clenly. The cauſe of all theſe thinges remaineth, not only in great capacitie & largeneſſe of the Veines and other Veſſelles: but likewiſe in heate both Naturall and vehement, which boileth, concocteth, and conſumeth all. Likewiſe, in a ſtrong and firme braine, which doth not eaſilie apprehend or receiue fumes: but, in ſuch maner, as a Tile made red hot with fire, or as a hot Iron, that ſlips water off, being caſt vpon them; alſo, like to a verie drie ground, which ſuddenly diſpatcheth and conſumeth Water caſt on it, for there it looſeth it ſelfe, and paſſeth away, as in a ſubtle vapour.

Small ſtature preferred before fat Corpulence.

Concerning men of indifferent ſtature

Moreouer, that commonly there is more magnanimitie and valour in a litle bodie, then in the corpulent, may be approued by the Annals and Hiſtories of Fraunce, in the life of King Pepin, called the Lowe or Little man, Maior of the Pallace, who liued about the yeare, 750. He was of no corpulence, yet contained in him a great ſpirite, generous and robuſt of his members: which was the cauſe, that all the people of France, reiected Childerick (who was their legitimate and Naturall King, a man of great ſtature) and hauing ſhorne him as a Monk, did locke him vp in a Monaſtery, there to end his daies, becauſe he was tearmed Do Nothing, a Coward, dull, and ordinarily addicted to drunkenneſſe.

Pepin the litle man preferd before Childerick the great.

We read in the Romain Hiſtories, that a man of Gaule, of immeaſurable greatneſſe, and higher (by the head) then anie in the Army, called or Challenged anie Romaine to fight with him in ſingle combate. Among all the reſt, Marcus Coruinus (being a man of lowe ſtature) could not endure this inſolence and arrogancy in the Gaule, but vndertook the fight with him, and ſlew him, in faire warre, as we vſe to tearme it.

Of a great Gaule, and a little Romaine.

We

The aduised care of the Carthagenians.

The Carthagenians were of no such humour as the Gothes and Sarazins, for their eyes were not fixed on Fatnesse or Leanesse, great or small stature; but on a man that was magnanimious and Vertuous, not any way respecting either bodily beauty, or feature. In briefe, I find that the Gothes were not so able in the election of their Kinges, as the Sarrazins. In like manner, they were people void of Letters or Learning, and those battailes which they won, consisted more in multitudes of men, then any industry or magnanimity.

The Sarrazins were great louers of learning

On the contrarie, the Sarazins. Affricanes, and Arabians, had amongst them many men of great Learning, and well read in all the Sciences. Amongst all other excellent qualities, they were very skilfull in the choise of their Kinges; as being able (by Phisiognomie) to gather mature iudgement of their Magnanimitie, Vertue, and Vices; well knowing, that in great and grosse Bodies, neyther Science, Good Spirite, or Generositie, hath (commonly) any abiding. And to this Day, they are knowne to be good Physiognomistes, and, but for them, all the Learning which the Graecians left vs, had vtterlie beene lost, thorough those bloody warres of the Gothes, Vandalles, Ostrogothes, Vusigothes, and other barbarous people.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the abuse committed, in carrying sweet Drugges, Powders, and Perfumes, about Men or Weomen: What harme thereby ensueth, and at what time they came to be first vsed, and of their properties.

Very bad accidents insuing by the cariage of sweet sauors

METhinks, that the Romans dealt both wisely and worthily, in ordaining (at the request of their Censors, P. Licinius Crassus, & C. Iulius Caesar) that no man shoulde sell any sweet Odours, or Arromaticall Vnguents, which commonly were brought forth of strange Countries. For this law, they had (vndoubtedly) very great reason, because such sweet perfumes and sauours, do make men effeminate, weak in the brain, and all the other animal parts: engendering nothing else, but vertigiousitie or giddinesse, and great torments in the head, with trembling of the Nerues, procuring (by these meanes) a pale and bloodlesse colour in the Face, and the verie selfe-same accident, which Quicksilner causeth amongest VVorkers in Golde.

Galen in Aphor. 28. Lib. 5.

Hippocrates and Galen doe both confirme as much, saying beside, That they do beget great paines in the head, and all such as make vse of them in wearing them about their bodies; it is only but to attract voluptuous Loue, whether it be in Men or Women. It was neuer seen, that any braue Princes, Captaines, or men of great erudition, and that made account of vertue, did vse any of those Perfumes, or Muske sauours. Not any (as I haue already said) but the voluptuous, or such as haue som defect in their bodie, do carry such smels about them; as a strong vnsauoury breath, which commeth from the brain, or some Vlcer in the Lights and Lunges, beeing commonly called, a corrupt & stinking breath. Or for rotten teeth, ful of putrified food sticking in them. Or for such as haue a Goat-like sauour, by reason of an ill-seinting sweat vnder their arme pits, & other parts of the bodie. For such people, I say, it is permitted (as a shaddow to their defects) to carrie Perfumes, or sweete Powders about them, or else to haue their Garments perfumed. Martial speaketh the verie same in his Epigrams to Posthumus. The Easterne people did much more vse these sweete Vnguentes, then they of the VVest; and were extraordinarily addicted to Luxuries and Voluptuousnesse, beyond all other parts of the world.

Sweete Perfumes serue to couer the bodies imperfections.

Who are alowed to weare perfumes.

The verie greatest antiquitie that I can finde, for the vse of these sweete Vnguents, is in Genesis, where it is said, That Iacob sent such guiftes into Egipt, because there was a great dearth of Corne, and to be fauoured of Ioseph, who distributed the Kings corn out of his Garners, which he hadde reserued to preserue his people, or to make profit thereof, or rather, by diuine inspiration. Salomon in his Canticles, speaketh of most sweete Oyntmentes, especiallie in the first Chapter. The like dooth his Father DAVID; and that hee did Annoint his owne Face.

Plutark. in vit. Alex.

After that Alexander had conquered Darius, there was found (amongeſt the other ſpoiles) a little Coffer full of moſt ſweet and ſingular Vnguents. We read in Herodotus, that Cambyſes King of Perſia, and Sonne to Cyrus, ſent his Ambaſſadors with very rich preſents, and veſſels full of precious Oyntments, to Macrobius, King of the Ethyopians. But the King hauing vnderſtoode by the Ichthyophages, (who brought him this Preſent) in what manner thoſe compoſitions were made: would by no meanes accept them, becauſe, they were too effeminate for him.

Herodot. in Euterp.

In troth, this barbarous Moore gaue a good Leſſon to vs that are Chriſtians, and thinke our ſelues to excell all other in the worlde for Vertue: that wee are much more barbarous then hee, and all his Countrey of Ethyopia. For, in theſe our dayes, wee cannot bee content with perfuming our Garments, and the haire on our heads; but many are growne to ſuch horride immodeſty, as to annoint thoſe ſecretes both in men and VVeomen (only to prouoke Luſt, and for the more laſciuiouſneſſe) which were not ordained for any ſuch brutiſh wickedneſſe. Many alſo, haue their Beades made of ſweet Perfumes, not to vſe in their priuat Oriſons, but only for Vaine-glorie, and where any interchange of affection is, to procure the better meanes for voluptuous pleaſures, and ſeeme more acceptable to his wanton Miſtris, or ſhee to her as idle ſeruant. Incenſe beſtowd in churches, or on hallowed Altars, are matters of no great value or moment. And yet the Altar of God in Ieruſalem, vvas not perfumed but with Sitim woode, according to his owne appointment.

On what beaſtly pleaſures ſweete perfumes are now a-dayes imployed.

Let me not heerein be miſtaken, as if I would inferre, that Beniamine, Storax, Amber, Muske, Ciuette, and ſuch like, which are the principall foundation of Vnguents, Pouders and ſweets, are wholy to bee reiected; for they are of great Vertues, and haue peculiar properties againſt diuers diſeaſes, and then they may lawfully be vſed, but not abuſed. Not as did Muleaſſes King of Thunis, who in the yeare, 1554. hauing left his Kingdome, to require aid of Charles the fift, Emperour, fearing the Turkiſh forces, which the Admiral to Barbaroſſa prepared againſt him; whereſoeuer hee went, hee abuſed theſe bleſsings very highly. For he had ordinarily (well-neere) ſerued in to his Table, a Peacocke, and two Phesants, farced full of moſt precious and odoriferous Vnguents, amounting to aboue 200. Crownes: beſide his other delicious Sawces, Pottages, & meats dreſſed in like maner, and this was plainly ſeene at Naples. He was ſo extreamly beſotted in theſe ſweete ſauours, and yet without cauſe or neede, that when he was caſt out of his kingdom for his cruelties, wherein he was re-ſeated by the ſaid Emperor, and at the ſacke of Thunis by the Spaniards, when he returned to his Caſtle, and found his Cabinet emptied of thoſe precious perfumes, which the inſolent Souldiers (not knowing their value) careleſly threw away; he ſaid. That he grieued more for his Delicate Drugges, then if he had loſt his whol kingdome, which he had but newly reconquered, by the helpe of the Emperor.

Muleaſſes king of Thunis, greatly abuſed ſweete ſauours.

An yd'le conceit in a King.

Going afterward againe, to entreate freſh ſuccour (being ſtill feareful of Barbaroſſa) while hee went about this buſineſſe, he placed his Sonne (as his Lieutenant) in his Kingdome, who ſeazed it only to himſelfe. Which when Muleaſſes heard of, he returned (with a few people) backe to Thunis, thinking they wold open the Gates vnto him; but hee found the contrary, for his Son hauing ſlain about fifteene hundred of his Followers, and finding the King to be none in number amongſt them: at length his Father was knowne, only by the ſweete ſmell of his Odours and Vnguents; and his Son Amades beeing poſſeſſed of him, cauſed his eyes to be pulled out. Beholde, what benefite this wretched King gotte by his ſweete ſauours and perfumes, being vſed vpon no cauſe or neceſsity. I haue known too many, that bearing ouer-much affection to this vanitie, and enriched vvith more wealth then wiſedom, haue vtterly loſt their health, and falne into exceeding pouerty.

The ſon ſupplanteth the Father in his abſence.

The miſerable end of Muleaſſes.

Thus yee ſee, what I haue collected for yee, out of many good and auncient Authors, concerning the vſage of drugs or ſweet Perfumes; what euil vſe is made of them, and how being vnfitly applied, they are the chiefe cauſes of manie maladies, and ſeruing (for the moſt part) for nothing but voluptuouſneſſe. I hold Opinion, that no man dooth more abuſe them, then a man that ſhoulde moſt reſpect

CHAP. XIX.

¶ Of Amber-Greece; From whence it is brought: The worth and properties thereof. And certaine Fables (concerning the ſame) refuted.

MY purpoſe is not, to ſpeake of that Amber, which is bred among Rockes of coloured ſtone, and (by his Native Vertue) attracteth Straw thereto, as the Adamant doth Iron: But of that ſweet Aromaticall iuice of Amber-Greece; wherof, becauſe many men haue diuerſe opinions, concerning the production of a thing ſo rare & precious, I thought good to make ſome briefe diſcourſe. I woulde gladly alſo refute diuers Fables, deliuered in publicke conference thereof, without alledging any Authours in my concluſions, that write or ſpeake by heare-ſay; but onely ſuch perſons as haue ſeen the places from whence it is had.

There are two ſeuerall kinds of Amber.

Concerning the name of Ambar or Amber, it is ſo called in all Countries of the name. Our ancients haue ſuppoſed, that it is the ſeede of the Whale, which is left by her vpon the Waters, and ſo is gathered, becauſe in the Bellies of ſome Whales, there hath beene found thereof. Nicholas Monardus, a Spaniſh Phyſition, ſaith; That in the year, 1560. (himſelfe being preſent) a Whale was taken neere to the Canarie Ilands, which are teamed the fortunate, and in the Bellie thereof, was found aboue foure pounds waight of Amber. Afterward, he was alſo preſent at the taking of manie other, with their young Ones, but not a iotte was to bee found in any one of them. Others are of the minde, that amber is nothing elſe but the excrement of the Whale, which he auoydeth by his egeſtions in April and May: becauſe hee then feedeth on certaine fruites growing on the Sea-bankes, which are verie odoriferous. Some do affirme, that it is not any excrement of the Whale, but of another huge Fiſh, as great, or much more in greatneſſe exceeding the Whale: and it hath a head more hard then Marble, & neuer ſwimmeth but in the Northerne Seas. But all theſe coniectures come nothing neere to truth, becauſe all thinges of good and great ſauour, do com from Countries and Regions which are hot; as experience deliuereth by our Spiceries, of which, no one kinde was euer knowne to be produced, from Northerly or cold Countries.

Of the name Ambar or Amber.

Variety of Opinions, how Amber is found, & how men come by it.

I finde ſome other Authors, who ſay, that Amber is ſought for and found, being deuoured by a Great Fiſhe, named the Azell, which dying, and floating vpon the Waues, hee is quickely knowne by Marriners, that ſeaze on him with their Hookes, and ſo dragge him on the ſhore. There opening his Bellie, they finde ſtore of Amber; but that is onelie good and pure, which they finde againſt his chine-bone. But there is no aparance of truth heerein; for Amber is not anie kinde of poiſon, but a dear Friend to the heart and life. On the otherſide, Fiſhes doe neuer ſeeke anie thing to hurt them, except by Trecherie vſed to them, and that men do mingle Venom among other foode, which is apte and proper for them, as they do to Lyons, Wolues, Foxes, Leopards, Rattes, and diuers other harmefull Beaſtes, that liue on the land. Many alſo haue bin perſwaded, that Amber is a kind of froth or ſcum of the Sea; but this Coniecture, is euen as Fabulous as the other. For, Amber is not found in thoſe Seas, where Whales doo frequent, and much leſſe in any place where the Sea is continuallie full of Billowes, or ſtore of froth appeareth.

A ſtrange Fiſh in whom Amber is ſaide to be found.

Amber is a louer and friend to the heart.

Amber ſuppoſed to bee a ſcum or froth of the Sea.

Theuet ſaith, that hee Learned of diuers Arabes, Iewes, and Eaſterne Greeks, diſperſed heere and there thorough the Turks iuriſdiction, that there are certain

A verie erroneous opinion of Andrew Theuet, concerning Amber.

Birds in the Isles of the Veiques (which are scituated in the way leading to Mozambique, towards the North) as great as our Geese, and called by them Aschibobne. These Birds, doe ordinarily withdraw themselues, farre off from any Inhabitations of men, and pearch in the Night time, either in these vn-inhabited Islands, or on the toppes and pointes of Rockes and Clifts, for auoyding disturbance in their rest: and there they mute in great aboundance, because they company in huge flightes together, euen as our Cranes or other Wilde Fowles do with vs. It is saide, that this Dung or muting of these Birdes, is true Amber, which beeing concocted in the heate of the Sunne, purified by the Moones power in the Night, and refined by the ayres subtilty, which keepeth continually vpon those promontories: it so remaineth, till the Sea doth swell and rise (either by those violent Windes, or some out-ragious Tempest) and carrie it thence away. Floating thus, by Morselles or Fraggements vpon the Waues, it is one while cast into Creekes, Hauens, or Neighboring Strands: and another while, deuoured or swallowed vp by Fishes. But, it beeing a matter vndigestiue, they are enforced to cast it vppe againe. And the other, that continueth still swimming hither and thither, yeeldeth a reason (by these seuerall meanes) of three kindes of Amber. The one, is of a Whitish Colour, which is the true Naturall qualitie of fine Amber-Greece. The second, is more Clowdie and obscure, and yet good account is likewise made thereof. But, as for the thirde sort, which hath beene swallowed by Fishes, and sent vp againe, thorough the lacke of Digestion, being Blacke, waightie, and of much lesse sauour, they reckon it to be of slender perfection, and therefore, make no esteeme at all thereof. But all these thinges, come nothing neere vnto the trueth, and I am verie sorrie, that Theuet (hauing trauailed so much) shoulde set downe this in Writing, euen in the verie same manner, as I haue deliuered it, beeing a matter no way likely or probable.

Three seueral kinds of Amber.

Æcius and Simeon Sethius, only Writers concerning Amber.

Æcius, and Simeon Sethius, Greeke Authors, who onely and chiefelie haue spoken of this Amber, do say; That it is a kinde of Bitumen, comming foorth of the Fountains or Springs in the bottom of the Sea, and that by floating vpon the water: it becommeth hardened, as manie things else doe, which houer vppon the Seas, being first bred in them; all which while, they are soft and tender; but comming forth, they wax presently hardned, as Corrall doth. This Amber thus floating, when the Seas are angry and tempestuous, as many times they bee: there is store thereof found among the Rocks and stones, as also about the trees growing on the Sea-shores, when the East-wind, or else the North-east (but more enclining to the East) bloweth.

Places where the Amber is found.

A great quantitie thereof is found in Sofala, and in the Isles of Comaro, Demogra, Mozambique, and along this Tract, euen to the Isles of Maldina, or Naledina, which looke into the East. But when Zephirus, or the Westerne Windes do moue the Seas to choller, then is a great quantitie found in the later named Islandes. There haue beene some fragments found floating on the Sea, as great and tall as any man; and others of the bredth of foure spannes, and twentie in length. Some do affirme, that they haue a whole Isle (as it were) all built of pure Amber; and within some fewe daies after, when search was made for it, it was dispersed, and could not be found.

Ilands where the best Amber is found.

Garcias d'Orta, a Portugall Physition, from whom I tooke this latter opinion: and with whom, the best iudgements of these times doe giue consent, for, being alwaies found veritable, and hauing been present in the Countries where this drug is had, where hee kept possession of an Island belonging vnto the King of Portugal, wherein great quantity of Amber was daily founde: hee was of the same minde with Æcius and Sethius, & heard them when they deliuered their Iudgement therein. Hee saith also, that in the yeare, one thousand fiue hundered fiftie fiue, neere to the Promontory of Comaro, a great lumpe or proportion thereof was founde, which waighed more then three thousand pounds waight, and hee that found it (supposing it to be a kind of Pitch or Bitumen) sold it almost for nothing. For himselfe, hee sayeth; the very greatest lumpe that euer hee saw, did not exceed aboue the waight of fifteene pounds. But the Merchants which trauaile into Ethiopia, giue good assurance, that that they do ordinarily behold pieces of much greater ſcantling: for all the paſſage from Sophala, euen to Brana, aboundeth plenrifully in Amber. In the country of Braſile, there hath bin ſome found, and yet is, but very rarely. In the year, one thouſande fiue hundered thirtie, a fragment was there found, contayning the waight of foure poundes, in ſayling vnto a Porte of Portugall, called Setuball.

Amber found in the beakes of Birds, and cleauing to cockles in the Sea.

Some ſay, that Amber hath bin found in the Beakes or Billes of certaine Birds, which may be ſo: and cleauing to ſome Cockles and Scallops of the Sea, which I immagine happened, by being faſtned thereto. But, Maiſter Nicholas Raſſetus, a verie Learned Man (my intimate Friende, liuing yet in Paris) and curious in ſearch of the rareſt thinges; ſhewed mee what manner of Beakes thoſe were, and we plainly perceiued, that they were the beakes of Sounds or Cuttle-Fiſhes, and not of Birds.

Amber eaten by the rich Indians.

Amber, is of great eſtimation among the Wealthie Indians, for they eate it in their Meates; and looke how much the price appeareth in bigneſſe, ſo much the greater is his price in Value, euen as of precious Stones. There is no Countrey or Region, where more ſale is made thereof, then in China: for, as the Portugales obtained fauour of the China Kinges, to Trafficke with that kingdom, and bringing thence ſome ſmall quantitie of Amber, they ſolde the Waight of twentie Ounces, for fifteene hundered Crownes: Which beeing vnderſtoode by other Merchants, they broght thence more ſtore afterward, becauſe (thenceforward) they would not pay ſuch a hye price in that Countrey.

Amber ſold at deare value in China, Fraunce and other places.

In Fraunce, it is commonly ſolde (at this day) for eight or nine Crownes the Ounce, at the leaſt: Neuertheleſſe, it is ſometimes more, and ſometimes leſſe.

Amber maintaineth helth and long life.

Let no man count it ſtraunge, that it is ſo curiouſly coueted by Rich and Noble perſons; for it hath manie eſpeciall properties, whereby to preſerue ſoundneſſe of Health, and to maintaine long life, as I will briefely declare. First of all, it ſtrengtheneth the Braine, appeaſing all paines therein, either of the Nerues or Heade, comming of Colde cauſes: by chafing the fore-head therewith, and all the Head ouer, or making a good bigge Emplaiſter, and mingling a little Oyntment of Muske with it, lay it ſo to the Head. If a good lumpe thereof, be hanged about the Necke of Man or Woman, tempered with a little Lignum Aloes, and a ſmall quantity of Musk, the very ſmell thereof cheareth vp a dull braine, augmenteth memory, and reuiueth both the ſpirits and heart extraordinarily. Beſides, it is a ſingular remedy againſt the plague, and all colde deſtillations, onely by perfuming a Night-Cappe therewith. There is nothing more beneficiall for auncient people, and to lengthen life in them; if they moderately vſe it in ſmelling either in perfuming their Garments, anointing their faces, or mingling it amongſt their Meates. A litle pouder of the Load-ſtone compounded with it, and applied Emplaiſter-wiſe to the Nauell, it holdeth and reſtraineth the Fruit, that it fall not before due and conuenient time. It is a ſingular Remedie, not onely againſt the procidence of the Matrixe, but likewiſe to preuent the ſuffocation; being applied with a litle Cotton, and vſed in the ſecret parts. Applying it both outwardly & inwardly, it maketh Women fruitfull, whoſe barrennes is cauſed by coldneſſe. It profiteth greatly for paines in the heart and ſtomacke, occaſioned by windineſſe. Such as are afflicted with the Epilepſie, that is to ſay, the falling ſickneſſe, or diſeaſe of S. Iohn, if they vſe it as an ordinary ſmell, or receiue it as a perfume, it quite appeaſeth it, or cauſeth a mightie aſſwaging thereof, as hath beene many times crediblie experimented. In like maner, it is verie ſinguler good againſt the Palſie, if, beſide taking it inwardly, yee vſe it as an Oyntment to the necke and Chin-bone of the backe, mingled with ſome neruall Oyle.

Amber of 4. seuerall Colours, and to know the best sort.

There is Amber of foure seuerall colours: White, Gray, Red, and Blacke; which commeth according to the variety of places or Regions, where it is found out. The Gray, is preferred before al the other, and is knowne to be good, if when pricking it with pin, it deliuereth forth a moisture like Oyle. It hath bin tempered in Torches, Tapers, and Candles, for Emperors, Kinges, and Great Princes: as in the Court of Campson, the last Soldane of Egypt, Muleasses King of Thunis, and diuers others. It is mingled also amongst other Drugges, for making of Chaines and Bracelettes, worne vsually by Ladies, and Great Courtiers, without anie great offence or discommendation, the causes in our precedent Chapter alwaies remembred.

CHAP. XX.

Of Muske, and of Ciuit, howe they are ingendred; From whence they are broght, and how they are any way good.

NExt vnto Amber, methinks that Musk ought to haue his due ranke. The Barbarians call it Patt, and there are manie sorts or kinds thereof. The best of all, is that which commeth from a Countrey, that leaneth very much into the West, as farre as the Citty of Chorasa doth, and is yellowish, or of Gold colour. The best, next to it, is that which is brought from the Indiaes, and appeareth blacke, whereby it is not so good as the first. The worst of all, is that which they bring from the Land of Sini. All these kinds of Musk, are engendered in the Nauell of a certaine Beast, like vnto a wilde Goat, which hath only one horne, and is verie great of bodie. When this Beast is in paine, by a raging swelling in his Nauell, which filleth it selfe with a kind of grosse bloud, in manner of an impostume: he afterwarde voideth this bloude, halfe corrupted, and within a certaine while after, it becommeth of very sweet sauour.

Sundry varieties of Muske according to the countries.

How the Muskes are engendered.

Serapio (among the Arabes) hath written diligently and carefully concerning Muske, speaking in this manner: The Beasts that make Muske, and are like vnto wild Goats, are principally bred in the Countries of Tumbasco, & of Sini, which bee neere neighbouring to each other. The Muske of Tumbasco, is better then that of Sini, because the Goates which make the Muske, do feed on nothing but Spicknard, & other odorifferous plants, whereon only they liue. Which hapneth not so in the land of Sini, for, albeit the Musk-Goats do there liue also on sweet hearbs and plants: yet are they not to be compared in their Muske, neither to the Spickenard, nor to the other plantes of Tumbasco.

Serapio an Arabian writer.

The maner also of gathering the Musk, is some reason of the difference, for they of Tumbasco, do neuer take the Musk out of the thin skin or wrapper, to sophisticat it; neither will they gather it, but when the season is bright & clear. But the men of Sini, they vse to squeeze the skin of the swoln impostume, and mingle and sophisticate it, euen in the issuing foorth, not caring whither the time be foul or faire, and so they shut it vp in purposed boxes. That is the best Muske, which is the most odorant, and is very ripe when it cōmeth forth of the swoln bag. These goats which carry the Musk, are no way different, but onely in their teeth, for they haue teeth (there commonly cald Dogs teeth) very long, stāding out of their mouths, aboue a span-long, like to the wild Boare.

The maner of gathering the Musk in Tumbasco, & in Sini

Difference of the Muske-Goats only in their teeth.

Musk that is not mature & ripe, hath a most offensiue smell: but they which seek for the Musk, do shake the thin skins wherein it is not ripe; and hanging them in the open aire, there leaue them so, vntill they be ripe, and the foule sauour bee vtterly gone. It becommeth very odorant of it self, when it is perfectly baked in the aire: neuertheless, the best Muske is that, which naturaly receiueth his maturity, euen in the thinne wrappers of the Musk-Goat. The people of this country, do doe gather it among Stones & Trunkes of Trees; for the Beast, when he feeles his impostumation ready to ripen: hee takoth great delight, in rubbing his body against the Rockes and Trunkes of Trees, vntill the Bag be broken, and all the congealed matter bee voyded out. This Muske is better then all the other, as being that which is plainely ripened; both by the good temperature of Heauen, and perfect concoction of the sun. They then that seeke after it, so soone as they haue found and gathered it; they close it vp in the thin skinnes and Bladders, of such Beasts as haue bred Musk, and haue (formerly) bin slaine by them in hunting.

The best Muske, and how it is sould and vsed.

Of this Muske is it, that presents is made to Kinges and Princes, & whereof they make vse. It hath (almost) the equall properties to Amber, but herein it is much worse; for if a Man beare too great quantitie about him, or if he receiue ouer much inwardlie: it brings him to a palsie trembling, and raiseth great torments in the head, enforcing so vehement an attraction of blood to the Nose; as many haue suddenly dyed by bleeding. But in a small and moderate quantity, it is good against all paines in the head, comming of colde causes.

In what manner we finde Muske to be hurtfull.

I haue not found any Author, either Greeke, Arabe, or Moderne, but iumpeth with this Man in opinion, and in the gathering of Muske: except one Amatus, a Portugall Phisition, a Man of very great inconstancy, as diuers haue declared to mee, that had knowledge of him in Turky. Hee makes a mockerie, of that which hath beene deliuered by diuers good Authours, concerning Musk, and laboureth to assure vs, that in a certaine Countrey of India, there is a Beast as big as the Hares here among vs; which being taken, and beaten to death with rods; the bowels and inwardes is then taken forth, and the Flesh bruised or beaten in a Morter. Afterward, it passeth through a Searce, to the end that no bone may remaine vnbruised, and then the flesh is made into round Bals, and wrapped vp in pieces of the said Beasts skinne; stil to preserue them in a round forme, and because the Merchants, that buy them thus readily prepared; may make no doubt, but that the Muske is of the very same Muske-beast. But both Portugals, Arabes, and Iewes, who haue trauailed into those partes, and seene these matters thus gathered: are of Serapios mind, and hold the course which I haue formerly alleadged; and that our Muske commeth from a Beast like vnto the wilde Goat.

The errour of Amatus a Phisition of Portugall.

The opinion of Amatus strongly refused.

Marcus Paulus, a Venetian, in the first Booke of his Voyages, and the first Chapter, saith; That in the Prouince of Singuil in India, himselfe found the best Muske in all the world. For in that Countrey, they haue a Beast, of no strange kinde, but about the bignesse of a Cat, with haire like to a Hart, or red Deere, very great Clawes, and foure teeth only; to wit, two aboue, and two beneath. Neere, or about the nauell of this Beast, betweene the Fleth and the skin, there is a bladder full of blood, which is true Muske, yeelding the vertuall sent and sweete sauour. I would be loath to belye such an approued Authour: For it may very well be, that this Beast is of the same kind, as the Muske-Goat is, notwithstanding the smalnesse in body: because (heere among vs) we see Dogges, Horses, and other Beastes, of all shapes and formes. But yeelde agreeth with all the rest in this; that the Muske is found about the Nauell, as hath formerly bin said.

The report of Marcus Paulus a worthy Venetian trauailer.

The Authors censure with Marcus Paulus

Muske (by length of time) looseth his good smell, or beeing tainted with wind, or too closely kept. Therefore, to preserue him still in his goodnesse, he must be kept in Boxes of Lead, verie well stopped.

Of Muske loosing his sauour.

Platearius, a learned man, is of this opinion; That if Muske haue lost his vertue and good odour; it must be hanged in a Viall of Glasse, with the mouth open, in the midst of a Sink or house of Office, and so it wil recouer his former sauour. There is some sound composed of another fashion; but then it is sophisticated, and how that composition is made, Gesner enstructeth in his History of Beasts.

A receipt to re-accommodate tainted Muske.

Ouer and beside Muske, we haue yet another licquid matter, which is not onely odorant; but also pierceth all the sences and spirits at the first encounter. Perfumers make great vse thereof, in their compositions of sweete smelles, which which they tearme mixtures. It is engendred in the skinne of the Testicles of a Beast, much like vnto a Feyne, some calling them Cats. To speake more properly, Ciuet is as a sweate, passing betweene the Testicles of this Beast, being of a temperature hot and moyst. If it be put into the pits about the Nauel, or into the Wombe-pipe; it serueth maruailously against the suffocations of the Matrix. Many times, vpon vrgent extremity, the Husband vseth it to his owne secrets, and so conuayeth it vnto his Wife; whereby immediate remedy ensueth for the paine.

The vertue & power of Ciuet.

And as we haue already saide, that Muske being tainted, or ouer-aged, recouereth his strength and quickenesse by stinking ayre, as of a Sinke or Priuy, as by one contrary to correct another. Euen so, in those Countries where these Ciuet Creatures are bred, there is another Beast, equalling the Ciuet Cat in bigenesse, called Agobdilhat (which signifieth nothing else but foule sauor, and this beast is (indeede) the most stinking of all other) who continually is at Warre with the Ciuet Cat, his colour being very pleasing, & somewhat neere to a Sky-colour.

War'continually betweene the Agobdilhat and the Ciuet Cat.

A History of a Ciuet Cat in France.

I call to memory, that beeing (one day) in the House of the Constable of Fraunce, Anne de Montmorancye, a Cat (not being discharged of her Ciuet, according as her selfe sought meanes and place) emptied her burden vppon the Gowne of a young Gentlewoman, deliuering thereon such a great quantitie of Ciuet; that all the spacious roome was filled with the ouer-piercing sauor thereof. Whereupon, diuers were readie to fall into sownings, others felt grieuous paines in their heads, and (among the rest) the young Gentlewoman fell suddenly into a suffocation of the Matrixe; yea, and in such extreame manner, that she was reputed dead for the space of twelue houres, and was cured by stinking fumes and ill smels onely. The Gentlewoman gaue sufficient testimony, that she had neuer (before) beene subiect to that perplexitie: and yet notwithstanding, when Women are vexed with the anguish forenamed, if Ciuet be put into the Nauell pittes, they feele presently ease. But ye must vnderstand, that it ought to be applied in a very small quantity. For this cause is it, that Muske and Amber are wholesome for many cold diseases, being applied and taken in small quantitie. Here also the Reader may be aduertised, that there are people of such complexion, as do affect such sauours naturally: and others againe, who finde them very hurtfull, and therefore doe fly from them; of which sort there are many more, then of the other. Therefore, when any vse is to be made of them, let euerie one well vnderstand his owne naturall inclination, or take the aduise of some skilfull Phisition: for oftentimes, by vsing them indiscreetely, they haue beene the death of diuers people.

How Ciuet ought to be vsed and applied.

CHAP. XXI.

Of an Edict, made by Dionisius the elder, King of Scicily, against Women, Maids, and youngest Virgines; in hereby he purchased a double returne of Mony.

Tyrants alwaies raigned in Scicily.

WHosoeuer readeth the Grecian Histories, shall finde, that the Isle of Scicily hath anciently beene subiect, to be gouerned and commaunded by Tyrant Kings: among which Tyrants, it appeareth that Dionisius (whom they vsed to tearme the elder) surpassed all the rest in tyranny. For, after he had drawne all meanes from his people, by frequent, great and intollerable impositions: hee surcharged them againe with a new taxation, much more irkesome and burdenous, then any one, or all the other gone before. Which was an expresse payment, by poule, or head (as they call it) both for Men, Women, Maidens, children, great or little, young or old. And albeit the Collectours of these imposed Monies, made great and grieuous execution in the leuey, as well vpon Cattell, as seazing moueables and immoueables; yea, imprisoning the people (euen to the death of many) by cruell vsage, and bad handling: yet, notwithstanding all these extreamities, no Mony could be had, because the Tirant had drawn them dry, euen to the vttermost moſt penny. All the Mony of this rich Iſland, hee had imployed (in daily payments) for ten thouſand foot Souldiers, to guard his perſon, and ten thouſand Horſſe-men, beſide foure hundred Gallies, well armed and furniſhed. Beſide this, he payed great penſions to other Common-weales, and to ſtrange Princes; to the end, hee might haue their ayde when neede required; repoſing little (or no truſt at all) in his own Subiects. In breefe, he exerciſed all kindes of prodigalitie towards Straungers, at the coſt and expences of his owne people, for the more ſafe aſſurance of his Eſtate and dignitie.

Signes whereby to know the pouerty of the people.

He had aduertiſement, that there was no more Money to be raiſed, neyther by Wine or Corne, or any other Commodities: for there was great dearth of Victuals two whole yeares together. He knew it euidently, becauſe the people were growne careleſſe, and did nothing but laugh at his impoſitions; as knowing, that he could not bee paide, when they had nothing wherewithall to pay, which made them then raiſe that memorable Prouerbe: Where nothing is to bee had, the King looſeth his right.

The Sicilians affected braue and proud apparrell, both in the Men and Women.

But this old Tyrant Foxe, knew wel enough the Cuſtome of the Sicilians, which was, to be pompous, affecting brauerie in Apparrell, and (aboue all) to be richly decked with Iewels of gold and Siluer, embelliſhed with coſtly precious ſtones: neuer regarding their owne condition, as Husbandes and Wiues, nor good of their Families; but ſuffering all their prouiſions to be ſold, to feede the Kinges impoſitions, and ſerue other Negotiations, prouided, that they might ſtill enioy their Iewels and brauery. The Men (for Antiquity of this idle Cuſtome) did willinglie tollerate it, though they were to endure all the neceſſities in the World; yea, death it ſelfe. And this was all which remained, of the mightie riches of Sicilie: for the Iſland had abounded in plenty of Corne, which was the maine hope of all the Inhabitants, and (next to Ægipt) it was one of the beſt Garners in the whole World.

The mighty riches of the Iſle of Sicilie.

A Tyrant taketh aduantage on all occaſions.

Heereupon, he would inſtantly help himſelfe, according as the time fitted him with occaſion, which was (in regard that his tyranny, and the two precedent years, had greatly impoueriſhed the Kingdome) notwithſtanding al former oppreſſions: he would now haue the Iewels of the Women and Damſels, then which, they had nothing elſe remaining to them. And for his more cleanely conueyance heerein, he cauſed to be publiſhed by the Prieſtes and Sacrificers (whoſe Ceremonies hee gaue no faith to, nor any way beleeued) that the Goddeſſe Ceres was very greatly offended with the Iſlanders, becauſe there was no worſhippe giuen her, but in an old Temple, ruined, darke, and vtterlie vnpleaſing: wherefore, ſhe would haue a new one erected to her, built with faire ſhew, and ſumptuous coſt, elſe there ſhould no more happy daies bee ſeene in that Iſland. According to theſe remonſtrances, made by the Prieſtes and Sacrificers, with interpoſition of his owne anthoritie: it was credibly giuen forth, that the Goddeſſe her ſelfe had appeared to him, & this the Prieſts ſollemnely iuſtified, being well enſtructed in the treacherie. Vpon this vrgent occaſion, and pretending careſull reſpect of the Common-weale, as alſo to appeaſe the high diſfauour of Ceres, (ſhe being the Goddeſſe of Corne and Fruites of the Earth:) he had determined, to erect her a new and magnificent Temple. Now, becauſe he had no Mony, nor the people neither, who are called the Kinges Purſe: he willed and commanded, that all Women, Wiues, Widdowes, Maids, & Damſels, ſhould bring foorth their Iewels of Gold, Siluer, precious ſtones, and all other matter elſe whatſoeuer, to a certaine place, and at a time by him appointed; impoſing grieuous paines and penalties, on any that durſt vſe the leaſt contradiction. The female ſexe were in wonderful perplexitie, and durſt not hide any of their Iewels or brauery: becauſe they had ſo long openly worne them, and good note was taken of them from time to time, both of the riches and value, on feaſtiuall daies, at ſollemne ſacrifices, publique plaies, banquets, and marriages.

to be prepared, in an eminent place of the Citty Siracusa, not far off from the Fountaine Arethusa, where hee made some proiect, of present building a goodly Temple, by a forme or Modell shaped thereof. Farre off was his mind from any such intent, but day by day to get possession of the Womens Iewels, and hanested the leuey of them with all possible speed. He gaue notice heereof also, to the round neighbouring Isles and Countries, where he had no commaund: from whence he got almost a Million of Gold, where-with they willingly furnished him, onely that the Goddesse would be gracious to them. And thus he held the people in suspence the space of the three whole yeares. In his time, the Land began (naturally) to waxe fruitfull againe, yeilding as great plentie of Corne and all things, as formerly it had doone: by which good meanes, Corne, Wine, and Cattell, thriuing stil with them, the Inhabitants became rich and sufficiently stored.

Neighboring people also cheated by the Tyrant.

The women could not forget their pomp and pride.

When the women began to tast of this well-relishing fertility; they could not forget their former vanities, but faine would fall againe to their pride & rich brauery: Only their feare was, least the Tyrant should play the like tricke againe with them. To make an estimate, of the inestimable masse of Wealth, which they were cõpelled to lay down, for building this new Temple to the Goddesse Ceres; is a matter exceeding my capacity, and yet no Temple at all builded. The Tyrants ayme was only at wealth, and hauing compassed what he intended; by the aduise of some well-willers to the Women (pretending comiseration on their disfurnishment of Iewels) a counterfeit request was made vnto him, that he would be pleased to permit their wearing of Iewels againe. Standing (like a crafty Reinard) vppon some strangenes for a while, the suit at length was granted; with this Prouiso. That euery one of the Female sexe (of what degree or age soeuer) should perticularly present her offering to the Goddes Ceres, either in Gold or Siluer, according to the number and value of those Iewels, which shee purposed to weare: whereto they consented verie gladly, so foolishly fond were they of their curious adornments, which gaue way to the Tyrant, to make a double benefit of one and the same Edict. And to this very day, the Women of that Island do continue this proud humour, in beautifying themselues with Iewels, beyond any other Country that I haue read of. The riches that he compassed by this Edict, is not to be valued, for the Isle was (in those daies) much more peopled then now it is: And then the principall and royall Citty, was called Syracusa, which at this present is named Sarragossa. This Tyrant, hauing occasion then to vse men of Armes, beside such Strangers as he kept in pay: could leuy sixescore thousand foote, and twelue thousand Horsemen, beside foure hundred Ships and Gallies; whereas at this day, the Land will hardly yeeld fifteene hundred able fighting men. When it was surprized by the Romaines, for hauing taken part with the Carthagenians; there was found in one place (called the Magazine or Store-house for war) furniture to arme seauenty thousand men; and such large booty was found therein, that Carthage (which fought for the Empire) could hardly yeeld the like.

The Citty of Syracusa, now is called Sarragossa.

The greatnes and ableness of Syracusa in former times.

Another subtilty of an old Tyrant.

This Dionisius was an affronter and Deceiner, who knew better then any Man else in the World, how to finde meanes of non paiment, when reason & equity did require it. Among diuers other, he had entertained a young man, who was reputed to be very skilfull in playing on musicall Instruments, and tearmed the very best that those times afforded, to whom he promised liberall wages. The Musition hauing serued him a long while, requested to haue his due recompence; whereto Dionisius replied: That he ought him nothing; Because (quoth he) I haue giuen thee as much contentment, by hope and promise of great wages and enriching thee, as thou hast yeilded me, for I haue taken paine enough, to heare the idle sound of thy instrument.

Concerning Dionisius himselfe.

A History of a Musition.

In breefe, he cared not how he came by any thing whatsoeuer, prouided that it would yeild him profit, making spare, neither of Statues of the Goddes, or any other sacred thing, but made a meere mockerie of all, as I shall haue occasion to speake else-where. The Scicilians haue neede of such a King in these daies, to punnish that shamefull murder and massacre, which they committed mitted (on a day in the Euening time) vpon so many worthy French-men, called thither in their aide and succour, to deliuer them from the seruitude of an other Tyrant; and when they were at libertie, they did bloodily put them all to death.

CHAP. XXII.

Of the Word or Name Grammarian, and what it is truely and properly.

THose persons which the Latines properly called Grammaticos (which in all other Languages is tearmed Grammarians) were not any such men, as knew not how to speake congruately, or write Orthographically, with good obseruation of accents in their speech, as being vnskilfull in the Etimology of Dictions or Vocables, according as some (to this day) haue supposed. For well I know, that it hath beene a common matter, when one would point at a man slenderly learned, or little seene in the soundnesse of learning, as vnderstanding nothing but the very principles: they would tearme him a Grammarian, or a Grammer Schoole-Boy, for his greater scorne and open disgrace.

The name of a Grammarian very badly vnderstood.

But contrariwise, the ancient Latines, as in the time of Cicero, had no other vnderstanding of the word Grammarian: then of a learned Man, well skild in all the Sciences, and thought fit to be the Interpreter of our graueſt Authours. The Greekes called Grammarians, Critiques, of the Greeke Verbe κρίνω which signifieth to be iudged. For when learned men (were they Greekes or Latines) had any doubt about the interpretation of some Text, sentence, or saying, in any Science whatsoeuer: it was then wholely referred to a Grammarian.

The ancient Latines in Ciceroes time.

Grammarians cald Critiques.

Suetonius was of the same opinion, in his Booke of famous Grammarians, who were likewise called Learned, as for example, Messala. Coruinus and Macrobius write, that one Didimus, sufficiently learned in the Sciences; was esteemed to be a great Grammarian. Cicero made high account of one named Emiphon, whose Schoole continuallie he frequented, after his handling causes in the Senate. Nidigius Figulus, and the excellent Wise-man Varro, are said to be the learnedst Grammarians of all other: as also Marcus Valerius, Probus, and Palemon, the most audacious of thē that euer professed Letters, with many more beside. And among the Grecians, who triumphed more then Aristarchus, Aristotle, Theodotus, and diuers others? all which were esteemed admired Grammarians.

Grammarians were most wise and learned men, and acounted the best Schollers of those times

CHAP. XXIII.

A Paradoxe, maintaining by witty Arguments: That speedy death is much better to be desired, then a long & tedious date of life.

SO great is the disaster & miserie of worldly occasions; that long griefe, and ouer-burdenous cōpassion of them (without any other hope of speedy amendment) hath made the better sort of people to affirme and maintaine: That it is more expedient for a Man (who feareth GOD) to wish for death quickely; then long to endure in these labourſome trauailes. For albeit that death (the true Minister of Iustice, end of all vexations, and most assured way of our eternall health) performes no other good or fauour to Men; but takes them from the afflictions of this World, hindering them (thereby) from offending GOD most strangely, and deliuering them from seruile subiection, being in the hands of rauenous, cruell, and bloody Tyrants: yet for this one and onely reason, hee is most highly to be extolled and praised. For, without this happy helpe, wee should be miserably condemned to vnsufferable pains, and altogether pressed downe, or smothered, by vnresistable stormes. Our hope (without this) would be quite quenched. And, without this) what is the Sinner, be he neuer so great a Prince or Lorde, not knowing, fearing, and regarding God?

The lamentable condition of worldly affaires.

A definition of Death, and what good he performeth.

An especiall reason to be considered.

By

By death we liue eternally; and by death we are freed from the prison of all sorrowes and mishaps.

A memorable custome obserued in Thrace.

This was the reason, why the ancient custome of Thrace was so deuoutlie obserued, that at the birth of euery Infant, they vsed great sorrow and lamentation. Contrariwise, when any (eyther aged in yeares, or of what time soeuer) died: They would make much ioy, triumph, and feasting, and (according to the parties Dignity) celebrated the Funerall, with sportes, plaies, and other varietie of pleasures. If such a barbarous Nation as this was (depriued of all vse of Philosophy, and good Letters) could doe so great an honour to death: Is it not a shame for vs, that call our selues Christians, and know, that our very best benefit came by his death, to whom we pretend both Faith and seruice: to be so wretchedly amorous of life, which is nothing else (according to the learned Poets opinion.)

Pindarus.

But an obscure Prison, enthralling the best ennobled Spirits.

Foolish men doe couet long life.

Blessed Saint Paule, The Vessell of election, did not he desire to dye, That hee might liue with his Lord and Maister? Yet we (onely to compasse leysure, for committing ten thousand horrible excesses) make life our great God; adding daily one paine vpon another, and augmenting the Register of our numberlesse offences. Are not we so obstinately affected to this short and dangerous pleasure (if that may be called pleasure, which is the plaine high-way to euerlasting death) that for it onely: wee care not to loose the life celestiall, diuine, & (then which) the like can no way be so much as dreampt on? Ezechiel wished for speedy death; That hee might ioy in the beauties and excellencies of Heauen. But we couet long life, the more to entangle our selues in the filthes of this World. Simeon, that good, iust, and holy old man, Desired death with all his heart: But we (blinded, or depriued, euen of naturall discourse) hate Death, and speake all the euill we can imagine against it.

Ezechels desire of death.

Old Simeon desired death.

Wherefore (thinke ye) was it, that death was (by our Elders) called Thanatos? But onely in this respect: That (in the end) it makes vs all ioyfull, and wel pleased with that, which we ought most of all to desire. Are we then so ignorant and senceleſſe, as not to acknowledge the aboundance of benefits; which we gaine by beeing taken out of this so hatefull a Labyrinth? Do we not plainly perceiue, that he which escapeth longest, and tarrieth the longest while in this world; beholdeth (euery day) more troubles and discontentments, then reall ioyes, or true recreations?

Why death was called Thanatos.

If ye alleage vnto me, the nobleness of Age and length of life, for great experience in things past, as seruing to discouer and approue them which follow after. Let me then aske ye, of how much happinesse may we boast, in prooving our vnhappinesse? Considering, that (whether we be well or ill-pleased) wee must patiently endure those thinges, which we cannot tell how to shun: hearing that which our eares hateth, and seeing things, wherewith our eyes are most strangely offended.

An Allegation for old Age or length of life.

But what is that which we call olde Age; if not a continual dolour, and languishing disease? what other sir-names can we giue to aged men; but mouing Anatomies, or liuing Mortuaries? Filling them with so many distillations, & falling humors; as leaues them not one good houre, during the remainder of al their poore life time. If then, the verie memory of death, and hourely cogitation of our departure, makes such a certaine aduantage for vs, and assures vs infallibly, that we are (thereby) permitted immunity from sin: how much more then would deaths reall presence preuaile with vs?

What old age is.

Remembrace of Death.

Who they bee that are most fearefull of death.

Who are more fearefull of death, then such, as neither know, nor vnderstand the faire straite passages thereof? which indeede are such, as all the art in Man cannot corrupt or blemish; except (like a Monster, and no sensible Creature) he would deface al Histories both sacred and prophane. What had the famous Romaine people bin, if the valiant Horatius Cocles had feared death? If Quintus Curtius had bin fearfull and timorous, and had not preferred glorious death, before the irkesome life of the world: had not (but for him) the goodly Citty of Rome, bin subiect to the most daungerous Hell, as can be deuised to name vpon earth? VVhat shall I say of them, Horatius Cocles and Quintus Curtius, two famous Romanes.

Cheerefull going to death.

them, who (for the freedome of their country) went cheerfully to death, with striking vp the drum, and the very highest sounds of the Trumpet, euen as if they had been bidden to some triumph? Did ye euer know a man (that feared death) worthy of so great an honour?

The Custome of some barbarous Nations.

For this cause was it, that ancient Historians so highly praised & applauded, the Custome of some barbarous Nations, who, with like promptitude and alacrity ranne to their death: as if they were to be presented in some publique triumphe, or other great pleasures and Iouiall spectacles. Why are the Germaines entred into such credit with vs,

Of the Germaines.

if it were not onely for this; that they are knowne to be a Nation, meerelie prodigall of their liues, and couetous of most precious death?

Hee that gaue the first enstruction, for entermedling Musick with the harsh battery of warre; as Drummes, Phifes, Trumpets, Clarions, and Harps (albeit the vse of the Harpe is now altogether left) did it for no other occasion, but for a sound assurance to Souldiers: that to dye, was, as if a man were going to the Fountaine of all consolation; yea, euen to the perpetuall iouisance, of eternall and immortall Treasures with the highest. Conclude we then, that it much better auaileth to dye quickely, then long time to languish in this wretched world. Let vs also maintaine, that death is more noble and excellent, then life: Because his power extendeth ouer all, without any limit or exception; and in regard likewise, that he is the Maister Controler of this life. As, not without iust cause and good reason, a Philosopher (being demaunded what Death was) readily answered: An accident and passage inevitable, from which, neyther by teares, entreats, sighes, or the sweetest Kisses, we can be deliuered.

The Musicke vsed in warre. The Authours Conclusion.

A Philosophers answere concerning death.

CHAP. XXIIII.

The saying of Plato familiarly interpreted, That Kings should be Philosophers, or Philosophers raigne.

THere are very many, who in reading good Authors, doe take thinges litterally, without any further rumination: which makes mee the more desirous, to interpret the saying of Plato, so often spoken of within these last two thousand yeares, by many learned and excellent Men. His words are these; Those Common-weales shall be most happy, where Kinges be Philosophers, or Philosophers are found in the places of gouernment. And because that diuers Men (especially such as are not conuersant in State affaires, doe wish for a King, who might altogether bee giuen to learning, and not to the pollicies fitting his Kingdome) greatlie abuse their iudgement heerein, for this would bee the totall ruine of his Monarchy: therefore I will set down some obseruation, what Philosophy it is that Plato meaneth, wherein a King ought to apply his studies, and wherby, there cannot but redound extraordinary good and profit to all his people.

Vpon occasion, that kings were addicted to vnprofitable readings.

This Diuine Man Plato, vnderstood not by a King Philosopher, a Prince so addicted and bent to studie, that if hee should chance to be deposed from his Dignitie; he might thereof make a benefit of liuing afterward. This humous appeared in Dyonisius, the younger (King of Sarragossa, and the greater part of the Isle of Scicily) Sonne to the affronter, and imposer of Nouell subsidies; for he beeing offended with his Subiects, and doubting least his estate would haue no long durance: fell to learne good Letters, to the end, that if he happened to be expulsed his Royalty; he might become a Schoole-Maister, for the better support of his life, as indeede (afterward) such fortune befell him. This his study of Philosophy, (which is as much to say, as the loue of wisedome) while he raigned King, proceeded but from a bad intention in him: for he had done much better, in effecting some worthy pollicies in his kingdome, then frequent vse of vices, and exercising tyranny, thereby to haue preuented the office of a Pedant, and liuing in such an abiect manner.

The ayme and intent of Dyonisius the yonger, in giuing himselfe to study.

Nero was enstructed (from his youth) in the three partes of Philosophy, and Nero learned in Philosophy and Poesie.

beeing created Emperor, was skilfull in Poesie, much addicted to Musique, and to play on the Harpe: yet would hee say, that he could liue well, if he were deposed from the Empire. We find recorded, that many Princes were giuen to learning, as Tiberius and Adrian; who found good companions of Ouids loue-Bookes, and Martiall his Epigrams. But this is no part of Philosophizing, neyther labour of minde, how a Prince should liue after his falling.

Tiberius and Adrian, read Ouids Art of Loue.

For a King to bee a Philosopher, it consisteth in establishing his Throne so assuredly; that he may neuer sit tottering in it, or be shaken out of it. In rendring himselfe necessary to the cõmonwealth, as well by his vertues, as generous disposition; he sits safe from all deiection: carrying himselfe in such sort, like one that is a Tutor ouer many inferiours, as well in charge, as in correction, and (as he) when time respiteth his Office; then to take delight and recreation. Princes that read plenty of Books, doe it (oftentimes) for pleasure, rather then to deriue any obseruations thence, for profit of their people. And when they cherish learned men about them; it is onely in hypocrisie, and to let their Subiects vnderstand, that they are gouerned by their aduise, and by Men of knowledge. So dealt the fore-named Dyonisius the elder, as himselfe would often reueale, to such as were his familiar and intimate friends.

How a Prince ought to be a Philosopher.

Disimulation in som Princes

The Emperor Commodus made but bad benefit of his Philosophy.

The Emperour Commodus (Sonne to Marcus Antoninus, and Emperour likewise) sir-named the Philosopher; was learned, and read ouer diuers Books of Philosophy: And yet notwithstanding, he could not refraine, from beeing the most detestable Emperour, which had beene before, or came after him. Contrariwise, his Successour, who had imployed all his life time, in exercising Marchandize about the sale of Wood or Billets: is numbred among the most bemoaned Emperors; and Traiane likewise (who scarcely could write his own name) was esteemed a very vertuous Prince and Emperor.

Princes are not to be repured Philosophers, if they can reade lasciuious Bookes of Loue, or compose in in poetry; as Thibaulte, Earle of Brie & Champaigne, and Raymond, Counte of Tolosa, whose Poems are yet (at this day) to be seene, and they accounted rather ignorant, then learned Philosophers. This is no such Philosophy as ought to bee exercised: but that of true and especiall import, I will come now breefely to relate. It is to be vnderstood, that Philosophy is deuided into three distinct parts, to wit: into Phisicke, Logicke, and Morall Philosophy, according as Cicero saith in his Oratour. The first, aymeth onelie at an intire search into the obscuritie of Natures secrets. Logicke diueth into the subtilty of disputations and discourse. Morall Philosophy, speakes of Life and ciuill manners; & this is that which Kings ought to seeke after. The best exercising whereof, is neyther read or studyed in the Bookes of the Romaines Lawes, called Ciuill Law: For, how euer it produceth some honourable effectes, yet (questionlesse) it is the onely Motiue, whereby we enter into a Labyrinth of suits. Because, in not beeing built vpon one only piece, but running into diuersity of scantlings; ech man makes a cloak thereof after his owne fashion. Therefore, let Princes neuer meddle with such intricate matter, but referre the study thereof, to men destined for so troublesome a profession.

Ciccro. in Orat. The three parts of Philosophy

Which part of Philosophy is best in a King.

The first lesse for a Prince.

The first Lecture that a Prince ought to take, is out of sacred & vnreprouable writ; because (thereby) he shall learne knowledge both of God, & of himselfe; and that the beginning of true Philosophy, is the fear of God. Next, he ought (aboue all things else) to bring his people in obedience of the Magistrate, and the Magistrate of the Law, without any infringing or violation. We read of the Æthiopians, that at the receipt of their Lawes, they protested; that they would be subiect to those laws, & passe no other letters contrary to them. The people of France. when they place their K. in the seat of Iustice; they deliuer him a staffe in his right hand, on the toppe whereof is the figure of a hand: Giuing therby to vnderstand, that the K. should lend a strong hand to Iustice; and then they giue him a scepter in the left hand.

People ought to be subiect to the Magistrate, and the Magistrate to the Law.

Poetry is not reckoned to be Philosophy

He must study to quench ciuill warres in his Kingdome, if there be any, and preuent such as may ensue, vppon the least presumption or apparance; euermore more keeping promise with his Subiects, for otherwise it may fall out, that delay and length of time, will bring his life and the State into great daunger. The death of Henrie the third, King of France, happened thorow euill counsell giuen him, and also to his Predecessour; as the Histories of Fraunce and Flanders (written according to truth) doe credibly declare: without crediting, what detestable Machiauell hath written on that Article. By the last ciuill warres in Allemaigne, the French brought their Frontiers into the Cities of Mentz, Toula, and Verdune, which are three goodly Imperiall Cities, and held by them to this day. They that are called the States of the Low Countries, and of Flanders, hardned by long Warres against their naturall Prince, vpon refusall of some serious requests: are become Cantonned; so that in cõmon opinion, the whole Countries haue suffered grieuously: all which had bin well eased, if no Machiauelist had medled among them.

A king to keep his word with his subiects.

Wicked counsell of Machiauel.

O Flanders & the Low Countries.

As for strange warres, which a King may haue with other Princes; he must bee mindfull of Faith therein, for they are euer the least hurtfull. Prouided, that he do it in such sort, that being fortefied with alliance and Confederats, strength, and meanes; hee may haue peace when himselfe pleaseth. Euermore remẽbring, that he do not imitate Mithridates, King of Pontus, who couetting to make himselfe great, lost both his State and life together. And Frances the first, King of Fraunce, in seeking to ioyne Millaine and Italy to his Crown, was fondly taken Prisoner.

How a Prince ought to begin warre.

He must not likewise lend eareto some kinde of Courtiers, who commonly are prating, that a generous King should neuer be without war: For in time of their continuance, hee may impose great taxes and subsidies on his people, which the saide people, taking then to be a matter extraordinary; doe finde them (soone after) to hold on as ordinary. These meanes (indeede) may encrease his reuenewes; but somtimes they reach to troublesome rebellions, wherein the Prince looseth both his land and subiects. The leagued Countries of Germany, had neuer come vnder their Lords obedience; but for the like causes.

Taxations for warre ought not to be continued.

In like maner, he ought to make no Forts or Cittadels, except in case of very vrgent necessitie; for it doth but declare contempt and distrust, conceiued in the Prince against his people, procuring (oftentimes) a reuolt in the subiects, with desire to seeke a new Maister. As the like was imagined to haue happened at the good Cittie of Lyons, which hath euermore beene very obedient to her kings, and lent them strong aide in their necessities, when they haue beene thereto required. Neuertheless, through some bad counsell, and vppon small occasion, the Kings of France did build a Cittadell there, a meere retreate for all scelerates: who, by the cautels of diuers loose Captaines, too much diminishing the reuenewes of the Dezane, and the Souldiers committed many insolencies in the Citty, viciating diuers Virgins, & making pillage of al things. Which was the cause, that the men of Lyons arose to ruinate this Cittadell, that serued for nothing else but wicked purposes. And albeit they were sollicited to take a new party, yet would they not yeild thereto; but kept themselues in obedience to their King, being contented with the demolition of the Cittadell, how euer the king otherwise mistrusted them. Such Cittadels ought not to be erected, but in countries newly conquered, and not in ancient and obedient Cities, whence Princes can receiue nothing, but commodity & pleasure. Nor ought he to exercise prodigality, or giue immense gifts, especially to such people as haue no merit: for wee know very well, that it is the blood and labour of the people, which is so prodigally wasted. And for offending in such manner, some Kings haue been deiected from their Thrones; as hapned to Edw. King of England, second of that name, in the yeare 1325. who affected nothing but the Family of the Spencers, giuing them all great confiscations, and the Mony of his subsidies. These extreame and vnsufferable courses, raised his Queene, Sonne and people against him, who were punished with death, & the King (at length) strangled.

The election of Cittadels do but cause hatred in the people.

* The name of the custome-house at Lyons.

Lyons impacientely endured the Cittadell.

Prodigality is very odious in a Prince, when he giueth immeasurably to vnworthy men.

Adde we hereto, that it is a great blemish and deformity in any King, not to bee liberall: for a couetous Prince is contemned of euery one, and hath few Couetousnesse discommendable in a King.

A Prince should inquire what is reported of him.

Friends. He should informe himselfe, what is reported of him, to vnderstand who are malecontent, and who pleased, prouiding for both in good discretion. As (very wisely) did Phillip, King of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great, who was informed, that an auncient Knight (following his Court) did nothing but speak badly of him, and raised diuers enemies against him. The King comming couertly to know the cause of this obloquy; heard the old Knight complaine, that he had imployed both his youth, age, and vttermost meanes in the Kings seruice, whereby he was not onely growne poore, but also vnregarded. The K. well noting so foule a fault in himselfe, prouided for the Knight in such gracious manner: that he had not (formerly) so greatly reproued him, but now he did much more exalt him. Whē the King heard thereof, he said to euery one about him; I was the sole cause of the Knights iust complaint, but hence-forward I will take order, that others shall not haue the like aduantage against me.

A gracious & worthy mind in a King.

The bad and dangerous counsell of Machiauell.

He must be careful to constitute some bad man in great authority, and to haue rule in his Kingdome, euen as his Lieutenant: to the end, that he may bear all the blame, and if the people fall into commotion, they may rest contented with killing him, and so the K. shall remaine safe. This is the Philosophy of Maister Machiauell, a matter verie dangerous; for hereby, both the one & other may well loose their liues. As we may read in the History of England, that King Richard accusing his Earle Marshal to the people, to be the onely cause of Subsidies, and robbing them of their Monies, seeming willing to content the people; he banished him the Land. Which man, could finde no place of safety, either in Fraunce, Flanders, Allemaigne, nor thorow all Europe, where to make his abiding. After this bad man, the king committed the gouernment of his kingdom to four other Men, against whom, the people conceiued as great hatred, as before they had done against the Earle Marshall. Which caused the saide Richard to be imprisoned; where those foure men were beheaded before his prison window, and he himselfe (afterward) lost his life.

The cause why Richard King of England was cruelly murdred.

He shold study, not to be ouer dreadfull to his Subiectes, nor too familiar; for the one begetteth hatred, and the other contempt. He should punish the wrongs of other men, and be sparing in his owne. As did good King Lewes of France, the 12. who in the time when he was but Duke of Orleance, hauing some enmity with King Charles the eight, and seeking to seaze the Citty of Orleance, for security of his own person, least the King should further labour to disquiet him: the Citizens made fast their gates against him. It happened, notwithstanding many trauerses and misfortunes; this Duke came to the Crowne, after decease of the said King: And then the people of Orleance came to entreat him, not to remember precedent accidents, but graciously to grant them pardon. The King made answere, that he had forgotten all iniuries doone him: but wished them afterward to be carefull, how they offended another man. After that Hanball with-drew himselfe from Italie, the Romaines found no better meanes of raigning in quiet for the time to come: then by forgetting those iniuries, which they had receiued by the Common-weales of Italy, that had ioyned with Hanball in making the warre.

Not to be ouer terrible, nor too familiar to his subiects.

A History of the Duke of Orleance.

An answere iust & right by Royall.

In quarrels among great men hee ought not to entermedle, to support one side more then the other: but cause them to lay downe their Armes, by his absolute authority, and seek best means to reconcile them. For, in formalizing himselfe, more for the one then the other, it hath many times occasioned intestine war, and sometimes the losse of Royal dignity, as hath too often happened both in France and England.

How he ought to behaue himselfe in other mens quarels

He should not be addicted to wine, but shun drunkennesse as poyson. For a King being drunke, is like a Lion, or any other furious beast, that bites and teares the first he meets withall. It causeth beside, that the K (hauing his spirits fiered and troubled with wine) may kil some one man in that fury, or otherwise so offend him: as may afterward endaunger both his Royall person and the State. He must moderate choller, so much as in him possible lieth, without vsing either a Sword or Staffe. Imitating heerein the Bees, whose King hath no sting at all: For choller and fury are the chiefe hinderers, that the soule cannot

A king should shun drunkennesse.

Anger and choller very dangerous.

not forme her functions according to reason.

Whoredome and incontinency abhominable in a King.

Incontinency, whoredome, and obscenity, should be detestible to him, and for his better support, he must frequent no luxurious company, nor haue any such person about him, whose ordinary talk is euermore thereto enclining; but such, whose speech is alwaies vertuous. Luxury makes a man dull, neglect, and effeminate, and a King (giuen to that vice) should rather carry a distaffe, then a Scepter. Sardanapalus, King of Assiria, lost his life, by being ouer-greedily giuen to this sin. So did Nero, Emperor of Rome. King Frances, first of that name, became very vnhealthfull in his aged daies, by being too much addicted to this vice; and yet otherwise, he was vertuous, and a louer of learning.

Examples of vnchast life.

Where the treasure Royall most consisteth.

Being affected of his Subiects, for his good life, his treasury is the purse of his people, who will succour him liberally when he shall haue any needfull occasion. Which, in our memory, and not long since, Elizabeth, that famous Q. of Eng. found to be true. For in al her time, she neuer oppressed her people, but declared her selfe to be the liuely Mirrour of true Maiesty. And therefore, when there came a very potent Army (verie strongly bent against her and her Kingdomes) such as (in humaine iudgment) was likely to preuaile: yet her subiects Bounty & Loue (next to heauens blessing) stood so strongly to her, that when her enimies supposed her ruine neerest, they were shamefully foyled, and she gloriously triumphed. Cyrus and Alexander, two great Monarches, made themselues mighty, not by their Money (for they had none at all, or at least very little, at their first aduenturing) but were only assisted by friends, and the purse of their people. Whereas on the contrary, Darius and Croesus, two Kings that had aboundance of treasure, and no loue of their people; were brought into most miserable condition.

Examples of loue & bounty in Subiects to their Princes.

War enterprised farre off, cannot be but full of Euills.

Let him not be easily led, to beleeue some Courtiers, men affected in the search of nouelties, vsing perswasion, to attempt Conquests and far off voyages; as crossing the Seas, either to Barbarie, Asia, and the foure quarters of the world, 500. a thousand, or two thousand leagues distant from his own kingdome, and ther to make war: such warrs doe (oftentimes) beget the totall ruine of his owne estate. As hapned to King Lewes of France, ninth of that name, who lost a goodly Army of Noble-men and braue Souldiers in Syria, himselfe also beeing there taken Prisoner, to the no litle cost of his owne Kingdome. After his returne home, he would needes be gone thither againe: but he died before the Citty of Thunis, and lost the verie greatest part of his Army.

Diuers true & well knowne Histories tending to this purpose.

By perswasion of the Genewaies, Charls King of France, the sixt, sent an Armie into Barbarie, against the chiefe Cittie of Affrica: but one part of the French dyed there thorow Famine, and by inclemency of the aire, and the rest returned home, not hauing performed any one act of honour. Iohn of Bourgongne, Counte of Neuers, was sent with a worthy French army into Epire, against Baiazeth, Emperour of the Turkes, in assistance of the Hungarians: but there hee was surprized, and kept as Prisoner, with the Constable of France, and diuers others, and the whole French Armie quite defeated. Lewes of France the twelfth, sent an army against the Turks, that besiedged Mitylene, a Cittie in the Isle of Lesbos: but vtterly in vaine, for he lost (well neere) all his people. Notwithstanding, if a King make a league against any Infidell Prince, and that all Christian Princes (or the more part of them) are thereto likewise mooued and sollicited, vpon good reason: the King ought to contribute both Men and Money, but not to goe in person, except hee haue an assured peace with all his Neighbour Princes. Now, albeit a King had conquered a farre-off Country, yet scarcely knowes he how to keepe it for any long time: because the manners of strangers will hardly agree with theirs of that Countrey, and then the building of Cittadels is to be talkt on, but yet he must Philosophize how to maintaine them. It much better for any King, to sustaine himselfe vpon the forces of his men of armes, and fidelity of his Subiects; then on the strongest wals he can build. Which the Lacedemonians practised, by the aduise of Lycurgus. But after they had engirt the Cittie of Sparta with Walles, and gaue themselues wholely to the fortifying Exceptions in this case to be obserued.

No trust to be reposed in strong wals, but in the faith and power of men.

fying of places: thence forward, their Common-weale grew to bee iust nothing. The Turke practiseth the verie same yet to this day. The first Cantons of the Suitzers, had neuer any wals, and were no other then great Villages; for they relyed more vppon their strength, then any trust in wals.

What profit a Prince should make of reading.

But it may be alleaged vnto me, that it is good for a King to read, to the end, he may learne something, as other men doe, and as other Kings haue formerlie done. This I approoue, and do no way mislike, at such times as he is not to bee more seriously imployed: For, a King that will well discharge his duty, shall find very little time of respit or leisure. Bookes that discourse on matter of good manners, should then be most familiar with him: becaus, in them hee shall learne such lessons, as no man else dare be so bold as to teach him.

Concerning Bookes of Histories.

As for Bookes of Histories, he must haue choise and plenty of them, becaus in reading such as are another mans Collections, that neuer saw, or came where they were acted: they cannot alwaies talke of truth, in regard, that hee giueth credit but to what he finds in another mans Papers, and Writers, will (vsually) speak fauourably of their owne occasions. If they be Histories, concercerning the time when the Authour liued: he wil be sure to fauor the Prince, and the party which hee best affected, or to whom he was Pentioner. As may be noted in Paulus Iouius, the Italian, and Sleydan, the Germaine Historian, who haue written well enough: except whē they fall into some particular matters, as of Religion, or such like; there they are euidently perceiued to wander, in speaking partially, or out of priuate affection. Likewise, he should not iudge of good and lawfull enterprises, according to the bad successe they haue had, or so to condemne them: neither, whē affaires haue bin ill grounded, & worse mannaged, to repute them good, becaus they haue passed with fortunate euents. Therefore it behoooueth any Prince, to read Histories, with good and deliberate iudgement.

Bookes of Histories are to be read with good deliberation and iudgement.

Concerning the reading of some Princes.

Alexander Seuerus (at an houre of leisure) would read Platoes Commonwealth, the Offices of Cicero, and sententious Horace. Wise Scipio, when occasion serued, would read the Institutions of Cyrus, proposed by Xenophon. Charles the fift, Emperour, neuer reade any Authour, but Phillip de Commines, who wrote the life of King Lewes the eleauenth. I would not be mistaken herein, as (seeking by these allegations) to restraine a Prince from reading, or limit him none other, but these Books onely. But I say, that the principall Bookes, and those which bee most necessary for him: are such, as do discourse on the affaires of State, and of matter belonging to the Common-wealth.

To make a Bridge of mony into the enemies countrey.

Many times, it fals out, to bee more expedient for a Prince, to buy a Town by intelligence, or giuing Mony to the Enemy: then to take it by force of armes, though it cost him not so much; so is the Land sure to be no way ruinated.

Alwaies to be prouided of men for warre

To conclude, let a King stand vppon his Guards, and haue assured and trusty people about him; euermore ready, least occasion should present it selfe, & he be suddenly surprized: such as were the Legionaries, or those trained Souldiers, instituted by King Frances, first of that name.

Humility availeth more thē glory.

And for conclusion to his Philosophy, he should be little, or of least reckoning in his owne eye, how great or potent soeuer hee appeareth to other. As it happened to Alexander, who had no sooner ended his Conquests in the East, but (standing vpon his own pride) he was cast downe, and poysoned by his owne Followers. Baiazeth, the verie greatest Emperor of all the Turkes that were before him: was vanquished, chained, and carried about in a Cage of Iron, by Tamberlaine, King of the Tartares, who was but a Neat-heard, by his first profession.

The Authours conclusion of Kings Philosophy.

Behold (in sumine) what Philosophy Princes ought to learne, which is not so much comprized in Bookes; as it is the braine (prouided of good and solid iudgement) the feare of God beeing alwaies principally preferred. So shall the saying of Plato be truely found in them: That Kinges ought to be Philosophers, or Philosophers raigne.

Chap. I.

Of the Kingdome of Persia; Nature of the Country and People; Condition of their Court, Lawes, and Commonwealth affaires, &c.

PErsia hath caried the same name, from the beginning to this day, containing it in these seueral Regions, Lar and Requelmall. The principall Citty thereof is called Siras, in elder times tearmed Persepolis; which is gouerned by the Sophy, Great Lord of all Persia and Azimia, called (by our Elders) Assyria; and the Kingdom of Dearbech, sometime named Mesopotamia; and Seroan, that was Media; and Parthia, now called Iex; with Hircania, now tearmed Coraxan; And Sarmania, now Dulcendana; and Asia, at this instant called Hetti. All these Regions, with the greater Armenia (which is a part also of them) are gouerned by the Great Sophy, and the greatest or largest Citty vnder his command, is named Tauris, being built in the midst of the Mountaine Taurus, foure Dayes iourney off from the Caspian Sea. Next vnto Tauris, there are other Cities beside; as Soltania, Concassan, Saphan, Corazan, Lera, Mora, Sarmachand, Gesti, Far, Siras, and Ormuz, a City in the Persicke Sea, which at this day, is called Mare Misindia. In this Citty, is great Commerce of Merchants, made with the Portugals, and there they Fish for great abundance of Pearles. There are also other Cities, as Cureh, Iex, Casmine, and Coy, with infinite Castles. On the west-side of the Cittie Tauris, are the Caspian Mountaines, which bee now called the Mountaines of Ararat: And on the Bacchan Sea (aunciently named the Caspian Sea) are these Cities; Summachia, Derbent, Baechan, and Mamutaga. All these Prouinces, and their Regions, are very barren, because they haue small store of Riuers: the greatest whereof, is cald Bindarin, but (in former times) they entitled it Bragada. The people of these Regions, are warlicke, ciuil, and very valiant men: ther is not so much ciuility found in al Asia, as in these people, but they are al Mahumetists.

These Prouinces do produce the best Horses that are to be found in the world. And there they make the best steele Armors, that is in any Lande, which are made at a place called Azimina, where there is great abundance of Silke. As concerning the Gouernment heere obserued, Zenophon (speaking of those elder dayes) saith; That they haue a certaine cheefe-place, called by them, Freedome; wherein standeth the Kings Pallace, and all the houses of the cheefest men Neere vnto this, ther is such another void place made fit for Merchants, and things to be sold by Mercenary Artificers, seuered farre off one from another, to the end, that such as are addicted to vertue and Liberall Arts, may not be molested with fooles, Foure Courts for foure degrees of people.

The Market-place of Freedom or Liberty, is deuided into foure parts or habitations, and are tearmed Courts. In one, dwelleth young Children: In the second, Youths without Beards: in the third, men of mature yeares: and in the fourth, such as (by Age) are no more able or bound to follow the warres. Each of these (by Law) hath his place and exercise: the Children and men do assemble together daily, in their seuerall quarters; but the Olde men not so often, but only vpon some appointed dayes. The young men, with such Armes as they are allowed to exercise, doe tend about the the Princes dwelling in the Night time; except they be such as haue wiues, who, not being subiect to such commaund, is fauoured for the Night-seruice. But they account it not honest but rather a shame and disgrace, to be ouer-soone married.

12. Præfects allowed to each Court, & their seuerall officers

Each Court hath twelue Præfects, acording to the number of the Persian tribes. To the Children, are old graue men appointed, apt for their better continuance in good manners: and such men likewise to the youthes, as (by their Vertue) can yeild them best example of immitation. For, the men of riper yeares, there are Gouernors elected, that by conformitie of their passed liues, and regular sway of authority, may holde good disposition with them, not anie way to swerue from the wil and direction of their Prince, but doe containe them in verie facile obedidience.

The exercises of each age and degree (to the end that euerie man may knowe, with what care and industry he must become a good Oittizen) are these. The Children of Persia (like to ours) doe attaine to Learning in Schooles, and there they are taught to vnderstand, what it is to liue according to Iustice and honesty. Such as are their Gouernors there, doe spend the most part of the day, in iudging and giuing sentence on such Delictes, as are reported one of another. Such as are accused of Theft, Rapine, Violence, Deceit, Dishonest Language, and such like offences, being found innocent in these Crimes, the false accusers, are presently punished. Aboue all other Vices, Ingratitude is most seuearely chastised, as being the occasion of infinite shames among men. And he that is found negligent, in returning like thankfulnesse for a benefit receiued, they sticke not publickly to maintaine, that out of this Vice, issueth contempt of the immortall Gods, their Countrey, Parents, and Friends: & finally, that it is the head and manifest originall of all other euils whatsoeuer. Beside this, they learne to liue temperately, and for inducement thereto, they repute example of the most ancient, to bee best auaileable, and the beholding of their temperate behauiour.

Ingratitude is seuerely punished.

Of liuing temperately.

In like manner, with no great difficultie, they are incited to continencie, with abilitie to endure both hunger and thirst: by seeing men of such graue yeares, not part away thence to eating or drinking, without license obtained of the Præfects. They eate not in the Mothers company, but alwayes with their Maisters: for their diet is brought to the School, whiche is Breade and Herbes, commonlie called * Nasturtium. Little need of drink haue they, because they vse nothing but Water, vntill the age of sixteene yeares. They haue Bowes and Arrowes, wherewith they practise shooting, and afterward are sent to dwell among the * Ephebi, who are young youths, that likewise haue, and do still lead the same kinde of life.

Children eate not in their mothers sight.

The exercises of each age & degree.

The Children are instructed in Schooles.

Their attendance and sleepe time, is as we haue already said, about the Princes Lodgings, and as well for a Watch or guard to the Citty, as also to preuent such Luxuries, which commonly do ouer-abound in these young years, except they be holpen by diligent solicitude, & verie stirring exercises. In the day time, they waite vpon their Præfects, to the end that they may bee alwaies in readinesse. When the King rides on hunting (which happens diuers times in the month) one part of them do go along with him, carrying each man his Bow, and Quiuer of Arrowes, his Axe or Long Sworde, his Shield, and two Dartes: one readie to draw, and the other to hold in his hand, as well to defend as offende with them. The King, as in a Vision of a King, euen so in Hunting, he is the Captaine, pursuing the chase with greatest dilligence, and commanding all the rest what is necessary to be done. So that this exercise, appeareth peareth like vnto warre, by carefull foresight, to keepe a good houre of rising in the morning, to endure both colde and heate, to run after Wild-Beasts; and (by the sharpenesse of a sauage Countrey) to make the body able to euery labor. They are likewise (manie times) enforced, to awaite the wilde Beasts comming against them, respecting alwayes, that if hee be more powerful then he was reputed, they may all stirre presently, exercising still that small respit of time, euen as if they were in the Campe for battaile.

Euerie man carries his own food with him; and yet they eate not before the houre of supper time, except they haue leysure to stand still awhile, in expectation of some wilde Beastes comming, or haue giuen better order for the Chase. When they haue supt, the next day following they pursue still the Game, vntill the same houre of Supper againe, euermore without feeding, making two daies together but one, in respect of eating: which habitude is also most profitable in Warre, respecting times, which often do enforce a great scarsitie of Victuals. If there bee any dearth, then they vse to temper their bread, with the aforesaide Nasturtium, for no man there will eate, till vrgent hunger compell him. Farre differing from them, that care not what excesse they feede Gluttony withal, who can neuer iudge truly, how little woulde serue, or be really delightfull to Nature: like to him that can please appetite with simple Bread, or a poore small Cake, & seekes not to slake thirst with Wine, but harmelesse water.

Euerie man beares his own prouision.

In the time of dearth or Famine.

They that remaine at home in their houses, for safegard of the Cittie, haue publick places appointed, for like exercises in them. They haue a care of all occasions, euen from verie Childe-hood, to see them vse their Bowes, hurle their Darts, and exercise Armes. They that are most vertuous, wise, learned, and actiue of person, doe carry greatest Commendation, and are honoured of the people; not onely the Præfects, but euen such also, as haue bin any occasion (by their diligence) of their education from Child-hood, they carry worthie Commendation, and are contained in highest fauour.

Concerning such as remain in the Cittie.

Who are most commended and honored.

If any lewd Offender should be sought for, any Theefe apprehended, or speedy succour sent to some needefull place, in dealing with these occurrences, vvhich require hast and strength of bodye; the Gouernors make vse of none but young lusty men, who (hauing bin trained ten yeares in such Disciplines) are ranked among the number of men, that (to the age of fiue and twenty) haue hadde the Gouernment of them, as the Præfectes had of their Childe-hood, euer to make them ready for seruice of the Commonwealth. When they go in battell order, they vse neither Bowes, Darts, or Weapons, to offend a farre off: but ech mans breast is armed with a Cuirace, his shield vpon his arme, and so he confrontes his Enemy, either with his Axe, or with his Sword. The Heads or Commanders, are all Præfectes, yet none of them abide in the Citty, hauing care of the yong Children and youth.

In causes of vrgent necessity, who are employed.

When they go to battaile.

When they haue past this time, and attained to the age of fiftie yeares, they are placed among the old men, sent forth no more to warre: but rest in their countrey, where they elect Præfects, ordaine Iudges for publicke and priuate causes, and likewise (as Iurors) do passe vpon the liues of men, that sentence may be giuen vpon euery delict, acording as the crime appeareth by due euidence, in which cases, euerie man offended, hath free liberty to accuse. He that stands condemned in the whole course of his life, is reputed most infamous. The whole Common-Wealth of the Persians, containeth in it an hundered and twentie thousande men.

What they do at the age of fifty yeares.

There is no prohibition, of being instructed in the publicke Schooles, where Iustice is truely taught, neither is it forbidden by any Lawe, but that a man (by his Vertues) may attaine to dignitie and honor, no exception is made, but onely want of Vertue. Yet let me tell ye, most choise is made of Rich mens sonnes for the Schooles, not because their Parents haue least need, but that themselues are sooneste infected with Vices. And poore mens sonnes (for necessity of common maintenance) are sent to Shoppes, to learne Mercenarie exercises, whereby to liue.

None are denied instruction in the publicke Schools.

Difference betweene rich & poore mens sonnes.

The Children that haue been instructed in the Disciplines fore-named, may conuerse with the Ephebi, but not the others. The Ephebi, that haue liued according ding to the Lawes, may likewise abide among the men, and attaine to Honours and Magistracie. And these men, after they haue liued according to the Persian Discipline, may go amongst the Oldest Men, who hauing liued (all their time) with greatest Iustice, are most woorthie and excellent Citizens in the Commonwealth.

The Persians temperate life, is a great blemish to ours.

An expresse note of abstinence in the Persians, is, that they can endure labour enough, yet liue moderately. But among vs, there is little or no respect at all, albeit they hold it for the greatest infamy, to spet in company, or make clean the nose, and to voide Vrine publickely, or do any such Offices in open sight. All which, we might easily shun, if wee would eate but little, and the grosse natural humors of the bodie, would consume themselues by labour and exercise of the body.

The Persians order of warre in these dayes

In these daies, all things in the world being altred, the Persians make their wars with most vnindifferent course, and (for ought I can perceiue) bad conditions, because as they haue a wonderful Cauallerie, so they haue no certaine power of Infanterie or Footmen, either ordinarie or aged. By which part of strength, the Turke (euen in our times) hauing gotten many notable victories, and being neuer foyled in any place; hath brought verie great and important warres to end. It is a matter also verie vnbeneficial to the Persians, that they vse no Shotte, neither abounde in any Artillerie on Carriages; with which terrible helpe, euery attempt is soonest concluded. As was too wel exampled, by the vnhappy proofe of Vsan-Cassanus, and of Ismaell, whose Cauallery were then honourably victorious. Lately also, in the Caldean Fields, and (in memory of our Fathers) at Harsenga and Euphrates, where they could not endure the great and vn-accustomed noise of their Horsses, in that most cruel & bloodie Tempest. Wherefore, in no place may the armed man of Persia, compare with the Turke, if he were disarmed. Because the Persian is (of all parts) couered with a scalie Cuirace; his Panciere or Belly-peece, of Iron; his buffied Helmet strongly creasted, and hung thicke with Feathers, his Shield or Target rounde, and curiously embellished with Golde. But the Turke of Europe, as vtterly vnarmed, is scarsly halfe couerd with a round bended Target, after the manner of the Asian Shieldes, inter-wouen with Reeds, subtilly sweetned with Cinnamon, and embroidered with Silke of sundrie Colours. The Persian likewise couereth his arme and right hand, with a false sleeue and Gauntlet of Steele, galloping with a Launce of Ash, which hath two points; and being met in the middest, (after the Moores fashion) oftentimes beares off the blowe on high, for easier passage of the men and Horse disarmed. But, the Turke (according to the Grecian vse) placing his Launces butt-end in his flanke, and stouping it vnto his horses eare (like them that are made of light and brittle Firre) runnes swiftly vppon the spurre, breakes it at the first blow, and so passing on to the enemies Armie, is constrained to lay hand to his Semitar, or to his iron Mace, as vnable to gouerne the Persians furie. For, they are mounted on great & verte strong horses, that haue their foreheads armed with Iron, and their bodies couered with sodden Leather hides (after the manner of the Italians Cappariſons) plaited together in narrowe foldes, and stuffed with Bumbast or Silke, to beare off euery blow falling thereon. In which regard, no one of them (except ouer-audaciously) will compare the best Persian, either with the Archer on Horse-backe, or foote-Soldier of the Turk. For he being armed with a big strong Bowe, full of manie knotted Nerues; drawes an Arrowe of good roundnesse, after the Tartars manner, and his fall is almost deadly.

The Persian Lances varying from the Turkes.

The Persians Caparisons for their great horses.

The Bowes vsed by the Turkes.

All these thinges being equally compared together, the armie of the Sophie, euen bounde and deuoted to the King, (by an opinion of a high and Diuine minde, and by a certaine Religious Sacramentall reason) not being fearefull of death in any place, although it bee inferiour to the Turkes in number, might seeme inuincible, if it were not oppressed by Treacherous and vnworthie men of valour, furie of Artillerie, and vnusual multitudes of men.

The Sophies army seemeth inuincible.

I finde, that the principall occasion, why Ismael brought so many Prouinces (by glorious Armes) vnder one sole Emperie, yet with lesse number of Soldiers then others would beleeue (especially against Ottoman, who ouer-ran the countrey so farre as Armenia, and wasted all things:)

The reason of Ismaels great successe in war things) was onely this: Hee releafed all Tributes, and tooke away euery taxation (onely to purchafe fame by liberality) euen vpon his very entrance. And it much imported this new King then, fo to doe, becauſe (by force of Armes) he expulſed the lawfull heires, from the State and Empire, after Vſan-Caſſanus the Grandfire, and Iacoppo their Father. In which reſpect, hee was euer needie of Money; and therefore, when any warre aroſe, he brought forth no Armies, combined by their ſtrong and iuſt Nerues, albeit the countries of the Eaſt (abounding in manie things) beſide ſuch diuerſitie of rich Kingdomes) benignlie and largely would haue affoorded ſupply of pay, for all neceſſaries belonging to life and warfare. Quite contrary to Solymans caſe, who cõtinually was ſerued with Infanterie and Horſemen, Maiſters of the Artillerie, Captaines of the Army, and all ſuch beſide, as were either Officers for the field, or attended in his Pallace, who were daily and monthly paid by the treaſurer, that deliuered forth monies. Nor in this caſe is there any want of Treaſuries, becauſe that in Conſtantinople there are ſeuen Towers or Caſtles, which containe in them ineſtimable mountains of mony, both of gold and Siluer, with perpetual entrance yearely, of ſo many tributes and taxations, as do exceed all expences whatſoeuer, by the fourth part.

Iſmael alwayes very needie of mony.

Solyman was in much better condition.

Seauen Towers ful of mony.

Among the Perſians there are 3. ſorts of Soldiers, to wit, of the Guard; of men vnder commaund; and of voluntarie aſſiſtants. Thoſe of the Guard, are at a certain pay, and are dieted at the Kings coſt, and he likewiſe (according to an auncient Cuſtome) and at certaine times of the year, obſerued in writing, as an ouerplus of bounty; giues them Armor, horſes, Garments, Pauillions or Tents for the field, and victuals. At theſe times, being attended with a goodly companie of Lords, as alſo the Soldiers at commaund, and braueſt voluntaries: hee maintaines the reputation of a frequent Court, and Progracing vnto places of beſt maintenance, proceedeth on to viſit the moſt Noble Cities of the Prouinces. When ther is no wars, the Dinaſti, Lords, Detrarchi, and Feudataries of ancient Nobility (who enioy the Signories of the Caſtles and Countries, giuen by their elders, do find all the prouiſion in Prograce; or if it be giuen them by the King, it is collected againe by Edict. They do alſo whatſoeuer elſe is commaunded them, according to the ſame reaſon, or equality in condition; as (vniuerſally) al the Nobilitie in Spaine, Fraunce, and Italy, doe vſe to ſerue their Lord and King withall.

Three kinds of Soldiers in Perſia.

Liberality to the Kinges Guard.

In times when there is no warre.

The number of the Soldiers is great, and when they are in Armes, they reſort to their Enſignes: but if a diligent inquiry be made, they neuer amount to 20000. Horſe. Nor doe the third part of them, (furniſhed in ſuch rich manner, as wee haue before declared) go ſo to battel; for all the reſt are contented with their Helmets, Mantles (of hard and thick-woüen ſtuffe) wrapped about them, and couered with ſundry ſhields; their fight is onelie with the Lance and Bow. For they haue now learned to helpe thoſe former kinde of Armes, and according as place & occaſion requireth, do hurl the ſhield ouer the ſhoulder, to receiue the Launce of a purſuing enemy, and ſtands vpon his defence before, with his Bow and Arrows. Thoſe Shields which are truely ſaide to come from Perſia, and from the Royall City of Sciros (where Armor is made of moſt excellent temper, and verie wormanſhip) are reputed to be of cheefeſt eſtimation.

The Persians are altered frõ their firſt armes.

Next vnto theſe, are the neighboring Aſſyrians, by authority of name: & therefore the Kingdoms of the Medes & Parthians, do affoord the verie beſt and valianteſt Archers, beyond all other, except the Tartars. But the Armenians, do couet moſt of all to fight on foot, & write themſelues of the Infanterie. For they plant (vpon the ground) a long preparation of Shields, great and plaine, euen as if they had a Rampier before them, and ſo defend themſelues againſt the furie of the Horſemen, fighting with Pikes, and very ſhort Axes, as alſo Bowes and arrowes; yea, many times they fight both neer and far off, with Slings that haue ſhort handles. People that come to helpe them, as voluntaries, are ſent out of Iberia and Albania, who are their confederate Kinges, and neighbor vpon Media and Armenia, beeing (for the moſt part) halfe Chriſtians, and therefore do maintaine equall hatred againſt the Ottomans, and warre againſt them.

CHAP. II.

Against Iulius Cæsar, because in his Commentaries of the Warres in Gaule, he oftentimes calleth the Gaules (at this day French-men) Barbarians.

The especiall occasion of this Chapter.

THat which I haue purposed to handle in this Chapter, proceedeth not either from affection, or ouer-great animosity: but rather to defend (against the Spaniard, Italian, or Greeke) the famous Kingdome of France. For, when they are growne discontented with the French, or be chafed, and ouer-come by them in warre; they spightfully terme them Barbarians, Inciuill, and Saluages, and say, they learned it of Iulius Cæsar. Now, to discusse whether it bee true, or no, that the whole Ciuility of the world was amongst the Romaines, and that the Gaules hadde not as much or more then they; it remaineth vpon sufficient proofe and triall. Although that Iulius Cæsar was a great Captaine, hauing all those good partes in him, which are required in an Emperour yet notwithstanding, it may plainly bee noted, that beeing vnable to effectuate his Conquestes in Gaule, hee therefore calles it a light Nation, inconstant and barbarous.

All Ciuility among the Romaines.

Iulius Cæsar was an excellent Captaine.

The first reason was (as I thinke) beecause they vsed humaine Oblations in their Sacrifices, sacrifising sometimes their Children, other-whiles their slaues, and verie often themselues, vppon some Vow or solemne Oath taken: for vanquishing their enemies in Warre, or for som other speciall matter. Which I must needs confesse to be a great cruelty, and farre from all humanity: albeit that in those times, in al parts of the world, they vsed the same manner of sacrificing. And yet the Romaines did much worse heerein, then all other Nations whatsoeuer: For, from all Antiquity, in the Country of the Latines (where Rome is built) they threw manie men off a bridge, into the Riuer of Tiber, hauing their Feete and hands fast bound, to honour their sacrifices of Saturne. Nor would they otherwise massacre or dispatch them, in regard of an ancient Oracle (as Varro saith) the last Verse, whereof contayneth thus much: Send the cheefest to Hell, and the light to Father Saturne, that is to say, the Liues of men.

The Gauls and Romaines were both cruell in their sacrifices

Titus Liuius, a Romain Historian, who was from the time of Iulius Cæsar, hath left Written; That the said Romains had a Custome, when they behelde themselues in any great perill, to vow and promise solemnly, that they woulde immolate to Iupiter, all creatures that receiued life in the next Spring time, calling the Spring time Holy. In these vowes, were comprized al the Infants liues that shold be born during this season. But at length, they conuerted this sacrificing of infants, by sending them into exile: which likewise seemed verie cruell, to banish poore and innocent Infants.

Varroes words concerning the Oracle.

Verie cruell vowes of the Romaines.

For ought I knowe, there is not anie people or Nation, that can say of themselues, they haue stood cleare from these horrible Sacrifices. For, in Chios, a Grecian Island, thy vsed the same. In Ægypt, in Heliopolis, where euery day they massacred three men, to offer them to the Goddesse Iuno. The Lacedemonians Sacrificed to God Mars. The Phœnitians did as much to Saturne, when they were vexed with Pestilence, or persecuted with great warres. Histreus, an auncient Author, saieth; that the * Curetes, a people of Creete, vsed to appease Saturne, by offering young Infants in sacrifice vnto him. In Laodicea, a Cittie of Cœlo-Syria, they did the like, to make the Goddesse Pallas placable. The Iewes do stiffely denie, that they did not immolat their Infants to God Moloch. The Thracians, Carthagenians, Scythians, and (wel-neere) all the Grecians, did exercise such detestable Sacrifices. And it was common euerie where, vntill the time of the Emperor Claudius, who made an Edicte to the contrary. And yet at this day, throw all the Great Prouinces of India, otherwise called the New-world, not only do they still saerifice men, but also feed on humaine flesh.

Who haue bin immolaters of humaine Sacrifices.

If Iulius Cæsar reputed the Gauls to be barbarous, because (hauing promised & made vowes to their Gods) if they might win battailes against their enemies, they offered such Sacrifices to them: I should rather iudge it great Piety and Religion in them, towards their Gods and Country,

These offrings reputed pietie and religion in the Gaules.

trey, becauſe they made no ſpare of them ſelues, but Sacrificed alſo (with them) all that which they had conquered in warre, of what great value and eſtimation ſoeuer it were. For it is eſpecially to bee noted, that whereſoeuer Religion & Iuſtice is, there can bee accounted no barbariſme. Contrariwiſe, after victory obtained in ſome battraile, the Romaines ſacrificed common Creatures, and made particular profit of the very greateſt Riches conquered by them: as of Captiues, Gold, Siluer, Horſes, and ſuch like, offering to their God Iupiter Pheretrus, mooueables of ſmall value; as ſome Armours, price-leſſe Rings, and Garments. Moreouer, ſuch was the vertue and magnanimity of the Gaules, as to endure ſo many tribulatiõs, which time could lay vppon them while they liued. But the Romaines, to free themſelues from all perils; would commonly kill themſelues; if they were detained in priſon, or otherwiſe, which is the act of men downe-falne in hart.

Oblations of the ſpoyles of the Gaules & Romaines compared together.

The Gaules neuer ſlew themſelues but in aduerſity.

If he hold them for barbarous, becauſe they haue eaten humaine fleſh, as it is very true: he muſt vnderſtand, that it happened vpon an extreame neceſſity, when himſelfe came downe vpon them with three hundred thouſand Cymbrians, Teutons, or Allemaignes into Gallia Sequana, and beſiedged the Citty of Sens. For victuals failing them, by reaſon that all the Countrey was ſpoiled about them, and the Enemy kept a long and ſtrict ſiedge vpon them: this poore diſtreſſed people (vnable to defend the Citty otherwiſe) conſiſting of aged perſons, women and children, very young in yeares; did voluntarily expoſe their liues, to feede their bowels that defended their Countrey, and for preſeruation of the Gaules Commonwealth. But this was not ordinarily done, nor vpon any wanton or lickeriſh appetite; likewiſe, neuer was it euer heard to bee done, either before that time or after. Contrariwiſe, much more barbarouſly, and without any neceſſity at all; the Romaines made it a Iouial vſe, to feed on mens fleſh in their feaſts and banquets, as Galen aſſures vs, that himſelfe hath ſeene, in the time of the Emperor Commodus. Some Spaniards (euen in our times) haue done as much in the Indiaes, for, hauing no other victuals; they would eate their owne companions, and Indians, that died on diſeaſes, or famine.

Once (throw extreame neceſſitie) the Gaules did feed on humaine fleſh.

Galen. lib. de facult. de Aliment.

Spaniards haue fed on humain fleſh.

Iulius Cæſar alſo makes a mockery, becauſe there were certaine people, tearmed waged or mercenary Souldiers among the Gaules, who made a free gift of themſelues to people of wealth, to do all ſuch ſeruices as they would imploy them in; receiuing their whole nouriſhment and maintenance (from them) while they liued. But looke of what death ſoeuer their Maiſters dyed; they would gladly and willingly follow them therein, to keepe them company, and do ſeruice to their Lords ſoules, in another world, becauſe this was an Article of their Religion. But the Romaines had an inuiolable law, which was, that if a maiſter had few or many ſlaues, and he hapned to be ſlaine (albeit that ſome other had kild their Maiſter) yet all the Slaues muſt be ſlaine. Nay, they had worſe cuſtomes, for if a Captaine were offended with his Soldiers, or ſome idle toy tooke him in the head: hee would haue euery tenth man in his Army culd out, and cauſe them to be hewen in pieces before him, by the other Souldiers of the ſame company. More, the great number of Gladiatores or Fencers, that they cauſed to kill one another (either in their open Theaters, or other publique places ſtrewed with Sand) with very keene edged and ſharpe pointed Swordes, before all the people, without any pitty or compaſſion, ſaying: Thus did the Romaine people, and more cruelly in war. Nor might theſe Fencers giue ouer the fight, what hurts or woundes ſoeuer they had receiued; except the people were ſo pleaſed. They would make their Captiues alſo fight with cruell Beaſtes; as Lyons, Beares, Tygers, and others, not in any ſmall number; but by thouſandes at a time: only for a paſtime to the people, and to win themſelues credit, that when they ſought after any office, they might bee aſſured of their voyces.

Gladiatores and Slaues ſlaine, or deuoured by cruell beaſts.

Perhaps he called them barbarous; becauſe that the Gaules (in his time) had no other food for their ordinary prouiſion, but Swines Fleſh. I aunſwere him, that it is one of the beſt and wholeſomeſt meate, which can bee vſed for any nouriſhment: for it verie easily conuerteth into the substaunce of man, as being almost of the same temperature. The Athletes and Wrastlers of Greece, to make themselus, sturdy, strong, and of the best habitude, would feed on no other Victuals, but bread and Porke. But the Romaines of Cæsars time, inriched and made fat with the spoils of the world; were become Gourmandes, dissolute, and prodigall, as the like could not bee found in any other Nation. One may serue for an example of the rest, who termed himselfe a great friend vnto Cæsar, named Lucullus, that spent vppon one meale, twentie thousand Crownes. But by this kinde of badde life, multitude and varietie of Dishes, and extreame Gluttonie vsed amongst them: the Romaines grew to be verie vnhealthfull, according as Cornelius Celsus writeth. And no man is so ignoraunt, but knoweth verie well; that leading such a life, doth rather truly sauour of Beasts liues and barbarisme, then of the least part or iotte of Ciuilitie.

The Romains full of Gluttony and Luxury.

Cornelius Celsus in Vit. Rom.

Hee should not call them barbarous, because when they were at rest in their houses, they slept not vpon soft featherbeddes, but ordinarily vppon the harde ground; which the Romaines (in those times) could not doe. Most certaine it is, that it is rather a Vertue to sleepe in such manner, then otherwise, for more easie support of such discommodities, as commonly doe attend on men of warre: who (as it should seeme) are sent of heauen, for defence of their Countrey, to subdue inciuill people for their sinnes. Nor, for wearing of short Garmentes, could he call them barbarous, because it is the nature of a Warlicke people, rather to bee clad in Garments which are short, then such as be long and troublesome.

The Gaules (at all times) vsed to lie vp. on the harde ground.

The Gaules vsed to weare short garmēts

Besides the Title of Barbarous, he accounts them to bee a light-headed people, verie mutable in opinion and counsell. Hee speaketh these thinges, as a sworne enemie vnto them. For, when he had sowne diuisions and Quarrelles among them, hee would feigne to bee on one side, and quite against the other. But they perceiuing his subtilty, disclaymed from his kindnesse, and brake the agreements which they hadde made with him.

Cæsar termed the Gaules to be a light-braind people

He neither surmounted or went beyond them in open and faire warre, for indeed he could not: but only by trecheries, because his intent was, to possesse himselfe of Gaule, and be King thereof, if he had vanquished Pompey. Now, because they discerned his deuises, & knew the Dominion of the Romans to be more insupportable, then that of the Allemaignes, whom the Gaules of Sequana had called to their aide, against them of Aruni, and so leagued themselues together very gladly: therefore he cals them light and inconstant. I leaue to further consideration, whether hee had sufficient subiect to hold them for such.

Cæsars ambition apparantly noted.

If he conceited them (then) not to be Lettered, hee was much deceiued; for from all antiquity, the Gaules had knowledge in that part of Phylosophy, which we tearme Naturall, and of the Ethique or Morrall too, instructing pollicie and good manners, which ought to support a Common-wealth. Nor went they among the Greekes to seeke instruction, as manie haue immagined. For, whereas Cæsar saith in his Commentaries, That they vsed Greek Carracters in their writinges; hee meaneth not, that they spake the Greeke Language. But three hundred yeares (or thereabout) before that Rome was taken and sackt by the Gaules, it was (as their owne Historians haue recorded) both without Law and Iustice. True it is, that they were good Warriours, and that tenne men were sent from them into Greece, to seeke lawes, whereby to pollicie their Common-Wealth. The Gaules on the contrarie, woulde neuer vse the Lawes of any other; but contented themselues with those, which they hadde receiued from eldest antiquitie, as manie people vsed by their example; yea, euen the Romaines themselues, immitated them in Articles (enow) of their Religion, hauing withdrawne some of their Phylosophers and Priestes, who coulde not followe those other Gaules, when as they departed from Italy to goe into Greece, by reason of the Dearth of Victualles.

In what Phylosophie the Gaules were skilfull.

The first Romaines begd their Lawes in Greece.

The Reader, by conferring both maners and fashions in behauior of the one and other; will finde as much, or rather more Barbarisme in the Romaines, then in the Gaules. And although they haue changed their Name, for that braue nation of Warriors in Franconia, who are mingled mingled among them: yet doo they carrie (to this day) the Fame and Renowne, to be the Gallant, Ciuill, and moſt courteous Nation of the World, and where Learned men abound, more then in any other Prouince. But the Romaines and Italians, haue had this Vice for long time; to make eſtimation of none but themſelues. For, it is plainely ſeene in all their Hiſtories, that they make themſelues to be euermore Conquerors, without attributing anie thing to others. As may be euidently noted in the very commentaries of this Cæſar: but if it were ſo wel knowne by other Hiſtorians of their owne Nation, how often the Gaules did beat, vanquiſh and put him to his flight, ouer-throwing the Palliſadoes of his Campe, by their cunning Mines made Vnder-ground, wherein they were verie skilfull Maiſters: the Gaules (as I haue ſaide elſewhere) neede care for no other Written Hiſtories; knowing that (for the moſt part) they are either Flatterers or Lyers.

A long continued vice in the Romains.

Scaliger, borne at Verona, in his fourth Booke againſt Cardanus, ſayeth; That there is not any Nation, which hath a more liuely ſpirit, in doing whatſoeuer themſelues would, then were the French, be it in Armes, Learning, Merchandize, or Well-ſpeaking; but, aboue all the reſt, they haue (ſaieth hee) a moſt Generous and innocent heart, keeping Faith moſt conſtantly, with anie people whatſoeuer. Beholde the Iudgement of a man, reputed the cheefeſt of his qualitie, againſt the opinion of the ſaid Cæſar, Tacitus, Trebellius, & Pollio.

CHAP. III.

¶ How long time it is, ſince the Switzers were Cantonned: and vppon vvhat occaſion their Countrey was called, the Land of Leagues.

BEfore we ſpeake anie thing of the Switzers, I ſhould deſcribe the ſcituation, Groundeplotte, and confrontation of the country, which was giuen them; to bee Mountainous and ſtrong (the onely benefit of begetting Liberty) to the end that the Reader may the better comprehend the Hiſtory, purpoſely intended for his inſtruction, in knowing, why the people were Cantonned. To ſhew yee then, what the Country is, which is cald of the Switzers, or the Lande of Cantons, or of Leagues; ye muſt vnderſtand, it is that which was called by the Romaines, Helvetia. It beginneth in the verie higheſt Alpes, and endeth (on the Eaſt ſide) at Rheine, deſcending towardes the North, ſo farre as Waltzhut and Lanſenbourge; and from thence it turneth towardes the Weſt, as in a direct tracte, by the Mountaine Iura, euen to the Lake of Geneua: and afterwards, remounteth vppon the Alpes againe.

An aduertiſement to the Reader.

The length & breadth of the Countrey of Leagues.

The Country ſeemeth to be ſtraight and narrow; as appearing, that the verie largeſt place, ſhould not extend it ſelfe aboue forty Leagues, and (in ſome places) much leſſe: the length alſo to conſiſt of about an hundered and ten Leagues. It is verie Mountainy, populous, and yet more then other Countries, cannot nouriſh or maintaine men. They are a warlicke people, able to endure all trauailes in warre. Manie of them (at this day) doe liue vppon ſuch Wages, as they receiue of ſtrange Princes that will imploy them: not that they take part with ſuch as will giue them moſt Wages (as ſome think) but in willingneſſe to ſerue whom moſt they loue.

A briefe Deſcription of the Country.

Switzers take wages, not in regard of the mony.

In this Countrey, there are manie goodly Cities and Townes, as alſo verie great Villages, and very well pollicied; whereof we meane to ſpeake hereafter.

The reaſon & cauſe of Cantonning the Countrey. Blondus lib. 9.

The occaſion then, wherefore this Country was and is reduced into Cantons, and to become leagued, againſt thoſe that oppreſſed them; was thus, according as Blondus maketh faithfull relation thereof. About the yeare 1305. the Emperours and Kinges of the Romaines, during the Schiſmes of the Empire, did place Gouernours good ſtore in the Switzers Countrey, as to recompence ſuch as had taken part with them, not hauing where-withall (otherwiſe) to reward them. They gaue them leaue to do whatſoeuer ſeemed good in their owne opinion, being as many of them there, as there were Cities, Townes, and Villages, or few wanting: who moleſted the people with ſubſidies and borrowings, extorting all thinges elſe whatſoeuer from them, according as it came into their fantaſie. And yet notwithſtanding, a great many of the Cities, Townes, and Comminalties, had long continued their immunity & franchiſe; eyther by eſpeciall grace of the Emperours, or by buying ſuch priuiledges with their Money, for which they had good & ſufficient Patents to ſhew. Neuertheleſſe, theſe Harpie Gouernours, by perſwaſion of ſome Noblemen of the Countrey; did manifold wrongs and iniuries to this people.

Exaction by the Romaines vpon the Switzers.

It happened, that the Gouernour of three Vales, wherein are three great Townes; to wit, Vri, Suuitz, and Vnderualden (that were free of long time) ſent ſundry of his Catch-poles or Sergeants to demand three couple of Oxen, which belonged to a man of Vnderualden, & to bring them away perforce: vſing no other reaſon, but: that Country men ſhould labour with their hands, and not with the help of ſtaule-fed Oxen. The Sonne to the man, from whom the Oxen were taken, impatient at his Fathers oppreſſion; laying hand on his Sword, chanced to cut off a Finger of one of the Sergeants. The poore youth was afterward apprehended, and the Tyrant (beeing extreamely enraged) commaunded his eyes to bee pulled out.

Of the Gouernour of three Vales, concerning three yoak of Oxen.

Another Gouernour of the ſaid Vnderualden, ſent for an honeſt Woman, that ſhould prepare a bath for him in his owne Houſe; which ſhe did accordingly, as not daring to diſobey the Tirant. No ſooner had ſhe made ready his Bath, and purpoſing to part thence againe: but the Villaine rauiſhed her, for which ſhee was ſlaine by her Huſband, with the helpe of his Friends.

Cruell tyrannies and oppreſſions in the Gouernors.

There was another Gouernour of Vri, who, beſide his exacting on many meanes of the people, entred into ſuch folly and preſumption, that he erected (in a faire ſpacious place of the ſaide Vri) an high pearch or poule; on the top whereof was faſtned a Hat or Bonnet, which he himſelfe had ſometime worne, commaunding the like to bee done in the Villedge of Suuitz. Afterward, hee gaue charge, that the Countrey people ſhould performe as much reuerence to the Bonnet, as if himſelfe were there in perſon. There was a man of very generous Spirit, and borne in that Countrey, named Guillaume Tell, who refuſed to doe this friuolous reuerence. Whereupon hee was apprehended, brought before this proud and inſupportable Gouernour, and ſentenced with death: except hee could ſalue his diſobedience, by taking a young Sonne of his owne (about fiue yeares old) and ſtanding fifty paces off from the Childe; cleaue an Apple vpon his bare head, with an Arrow deliuered from a Croſſe-bow, without any harme done to the Childe. The man was both famed, and knowne to bee an expert Croſſe-bow-man, and being heereto thus rigorouſly conſtrained: he performed the deede, without any hurt to his Child; but it was more by the grace of God, then his owne induſtry.

A notorious idle folly in a Gouernour.

Reuerence of the Hat or Bonnet.

A cruel impoſition vpon a Father.

The Gouernour beeing offended that the man had ſped ſo well, and perceiuing that hee had another Arrow left vnder his Girdle; demaunded, for what purpoſe hee had that other Arrow, when he was enioyned to ſhoote but one? Guillaume Tell anſwered. If I had ſlaine my Son; this other Arrow ſhould haue had thy life. In regard of theſe words, he was taken, bound faſt with Cords, and put into a Boate, to be conueyed to priſon. Now, it fortuned, that they were to paſſe a Lake in rowing thither, vpon which Lake hee eſcaped very ſtrangely from them. For, hauing (by meere ſtrength) broken ken his bonds, he threw himselfe suddenly into the Lake, and recouering certaine Mountaines not farre off, lyued there verie couertly, and awayting for the Gouernour (one day) in a verie narrow passage, there slew him with the forsaid Arrow.

The cruell Gouernour slaine.

Another Gouernor, caused the eares of foure Countrey-men of Switz to bee cut off; then commanding them to bee roasted, he compelled them to eat them. The people of the Countrey, beeing not a little mooued with these extreame iniuries, and manie other out-rages in the Gouernours: expelled them quite out of those three Vales, & (from thenceforward) entering into Confederacies, beganne to Cantone or quarter themselues, swearing a solemne League, with absolute promise to succor one another, if they should heereafter be molested by any whosoeuer.

Foure Switzers enforced to eate their owne eares.

Within short time after, a rich Abbot, entitled of the Hermits, saide; That hee had right and Title, to leauie some Prouision of Corne, and of Mony also, vppon the Village of Switz, and summoned them to make payment thereof. They answered, that they neuer hearde before of any thing due vnto the sayde Abbot, nor did anie such right (to their knowledge) appertaine vnto him: and therefore, they would pay him nothing. Hee growing verie angrie at this aunswere, and beeing descended of a Great and Noble house: leauied an Armie, accompanied with Leopolde, the Duke of Austriche, who had great Landes both within, and vppon the Frontiers of the Switzers. Besides, manie Barons and other Gentlemen of the Country, came vnto him (Voluntarily) from all partes, hauing alreadie gone on, and vsed those places where they were to passe, more then Hostily.

The rich Abbot of the Hermits, claimeth an interest in Switz.

The Armie of the three Vales, which coulde not amount vnto thirteene hundered men, charged with humble heads, (yet vnconquerable spirits and assurance) the Armie of the Duke and Abbotte; and hauing put them to flight, slewe verie manie of them, and a great number likewise were taken Prisoners, besides; the Dukes best safetie of his life, was speedie flight. This Victorie of these simple, but verie Warlicke people, encouraged them to attempt and put in practise much greater matters, and to stand vpon their best defence, in all ensuing occasions.

The first victorie of the Switzers, against the D. and Abbot.

These leagued Vallies, within little while after, to wit; vppon the sixteenth day of Nouember, according as Munster declareth, in the yeare one thousand three hundered and fifteene; ouercame another Army of twentie thousand men, which the Emperour Fredericke of Austriche, and Duke Leopolde his Brother had prepared, to ruinate those three Villages, because they woulde not take the Oath of allegeance to the saide Emperour, at his newe creation; and yet they had formerly doone it to Lewes of Bauaria, who called himselfe also Emperour, and lawfully elected.

The second victory of the Switzers, against the emperor & duke.

Ouer and aboue this reason, he was vrged on, and thereto vehemently perswaded, by a great number of Noblemen and potent Lordes, who had made great spoyles both of Castels & Towns. But, the Confederated Switzers, being aduertised of FREDERICKS intention, closely ambushed themselues (to the number of fifteene hundered men) vppon the craggie hie Mountaines, and narrowe passages, full of great Rockes and Quarries of stone, whereof they chose the biggest, & rowled them downe vppon the Armie, as it came vppe from the Mountaines foote, and went along the strait waies.

The occasion of this second warre.

A politicke stratagem, of the Leagued Switzers.

For, from the bottome of the Mountaine, the one side of the Rocke seemed like an vpright Wall on the one side; and on the other, were greate Lakes of Deepe Water, not easie to bee waded: and the huge stones tumbling downe so fast vppon them; drowned no meane number of them in those Lakes, or did beate out their braines, and the rest beeing disfronted, Duke Leopolde was glad and faigne to shift for his life the second time.

Duke Leopolde saueth his life the second time.

Notwithstanding these two sustained foyles and losses, Duke LEOPOLDE lost not a iotte of his Courage and Valour, but made againe vppon them with fresh Forces; perswading himselfe; that hee should get the Maistry of these Boores, Peazants, and Shepheardes, for so hee tearmed these Confederates. Calling the Men of Strasbourge vnto his ayde and assistaunce, with diuers other Townes, that tooke parte with the Em-

Emperour Fredericke, and manie other great Princes: he entered againe into the Confederates Country, by the Valley of Vnderualden amōg the Mountains. Now was he the third time well beaten and repulsed, by eight or nine hundred people, & yet his army consisted of aboue 1200. men.

The third victory of the Switzers.

Some Write, that the Duke himself, was not there in person; but the Count of Hasbourge, who went as his Lieutenant. From this time forwards, these three Cantons tooke hart and boldnesse of spirit vppon them, seizing (by waie of Warre) the Castles, Townes, Forts, and Signeuries, of such Gentlemen as had assisted the Duke, quite ruinating the saide Forts and Castles, or appropriating them to their owne reuennues. For, before these fortunate successes, they had not any thing in proper, but onely their Townes and Villages: but now adayes, they haue reduced those lands into Bayliwickes, whereunto they depute Gouernors, which either they change yearly, or continue to further time; according as it is aduised by the Senate, belonging to each Village of the confederats, and some others, that haue (since then) Cantonned themselues, and entred into alliance with them.

The Switzers successe, vpon these obtained victories.

Duke Leopolde, and the Emperor his Brother, died within fewe yeares after these losses, without any Children, and their succeeding heires suffred these confederates to liue peaceably, till the yeare, 1390. Neuertheless, they were molested by other great Lordes, whom still they manfully withstood, and stil got the better hand of all in their attemptes. At last, there came one, named Leopolde also, descended of the same family of Austriche, an audacious Prince, ouer-light in beleefe, and scarsely aged xx. yeares. He was prouoked by those Noble and Gentlemen, who either were expulsed from their houses, or else had voluntarily forsaken them, and albeit there hadde past some transaction and truce between them: yet now they would breake their faith and promise made to these Confederates. All the pretence that this young Prince had for warre, was, because Lucerna, which was a goodly Towne, had leagued and cantonned it selfe with the fore-named Villages, and many subiects of Duke Leopoldes, in regard of his often molestations, were now (by this means) become Bourgesses, and quietly enioyed the benefits of their Country. These matters, intermedled with the Princes rash furie, made him so violent in spleen against them: that so manie as hee could cause to be taken of Lucerna, or those other subiects that had the office of Bourgesses, they were forthwith hangde and strangled in the open fields.

Violence done to the Confederates.

The leagued Inhabitants, not a little displeased at these cruelties, broght their armed troupes into the fielde, and (by a sudden assault made vpon this yong Du. Leopolde) tooke the strong Castle of Ptephicon, and put vnto death all that were found therein. At the very same time also, they tooke two Townes of Duke Leopoldes, to wit; Detlsbouch and Sampach, that gladly yeilded themselues into the protection of the Confederates, and Bourgeship of Lucerna. The Duke beeing highly heerewith displeased, hauing an Armie readie of ten thousande men; entered into the Countrey of the Cantones. But notwithstanding all his heate and hast, by the aduise of some: peace was made betweene them, vnder certain conditions, so that no battel was fought, or Towne taken.

The Switzers honourably reuenged, vpon young Duke Leopolde.

A peace made of small continuance.

The yong Duke being returned home to his Court, with intent to sport and recreate himselfe, was perswaded by many Noblemen, that he had greatly dishonored himselfe in making anie contract of peace with his subiects, and that al Lords were dispensed withall, for anie oath taken in that nature. Moreouer, they obiected, that this might prooue a principall cause, to hinder him from succesion in the Empire, whereto his predecessours had formerly attained. Being ouercome by their foolish perswasions, he emploied a great part of the Empires forces; and most of the Nobilitie, beeing numbered twentie thousand men, both horse and foote, all verie expert and wel tried Soldiers, the greater part Noblemen, pretending interest in the cause, and accompanied with manie Princes of power. Thus came they vnto the field, with all kinds of munition, to besiedge Sampach: where the Armie also of the confederats met them, who were (in all) but a thousand and six hundred men. But they being possessed of the most aduantageable place in the field, and where the Horsemen men could do no good for themselues, or preiudice to the Suitzers: the Noble men were feigne to dismount, and battaile being giuen, the honor of the daie remained to the Cantons. It was such an extreame hot day, that the Noblemen were not able to endure any part of the paines (which the poore Rusticks were not so much enforced vnto, but could ably out-stand farre greater toyle) but were glad to flye. Albeit, young Leopolde stood firme and courragious, vntill he was slaine, with manie other worthy men; as Otho, Marquesse of Hoch, Iohn, Earle of Fustembourge, and diuers others: for very few escaped, but they were eyther taken Prisoners, or slaine. Two yeares after, some of the Gentle-men, which had then escaped, returned thither againe with sixe thousand fighting men: but two hundred men of Glaronna stood against the, and slew two thousand and foure hundred of them, compelling the rest to saue their liues by flight, according as I finde it recorded in the Books of Crantzius and Munster.

Now, these Noblemen and Gouernors, did not onely molest these three Vallies and Lucerna; but likewise all them inhabiting about Bearne, pillaging all the goods in the fieldes of Bearne. Yet notwithstanding, by continuall waging War with them, the Cantons defeated all their purposes, ruinated their Castels, and appropriated all vnto their owne Dominions; except it were of such, as contracted amity and alliance with them. I forbeare heere to set downe, the potent war which they had against the Abbot of S. Gal, especially those of Appenzell, because they vrged a right vnto their corne and other fruites: but they could get nothing of them but blowes, albeit, their Armies were verie great. Glaris; in short while after, being troubled by the Noblemen and cruell Gouernours, which they of Austriche had set ouer them: entred into league with the men of Bearne, and other of the foure Cantons.

The Castels ruined about Bearne, and he Noblemen expelled.

The Army of the Abbot of S Gal, vanquished.

Zurick, a great and worthy Citty, seated vpon the Riuer of Indmat, had beene vexed aboue fiftie yeares by the Nobility, and a puissant Prince, who was the valiant Counte of Haspourge, and extream in hatred to them, because he was taken in Zurick (beeing entered thereinto in the night time) by meanes of the treacherous Inhabitants, with foure hundred men, he being made Prisoner, and all his men slaine. Yet, with in some few yeares, he was set at liberty, at the solicitation made by his Cozin Albert the Emperour, and thence forward, Zurick came into the number of the leagued Confederats. This Citty called it selfe Tygurum, and is the most rich and powerfull Cantone, aboue all the rest, next vnto Bearne, and holdeth precedence beyond all the other: because all Ambassadours resort thither, and the assemblies are most of all there made. Whereby plainely appeareth, that the Cantons doe not hold place of precedency, according as they were receiued into the league; and I confesse mine owne ignorance, not knowing how these degrees haue passed among them.

The great and goodly Citie of Zurick, wher the Earle of Haspurge was taken prisoner Zurick Cantonned and vpon what cause.

It is presupposed, that because there was (then) no Iustice for the people; but that all the Noble-men (almost) in these quarters of the Heluettians, were (as we vse to say) cut out of one cloath, that is to say; had sworne the ruine of the third estate: Therefore, Zoug, Basile, Fribourg, Soleurre, and Shaffonze, (by laps of time) confederated themselues with the seauen before named. All which together, beeing in number thirteene, had many warres against the Emperors, and other great Lords, and were euermore Conquerours. It is therefore to be presumed, that they got not their libertie, nor the goodly lands which the more part of the do now possesse, in a day: but before they could haue peace with their Neighbors, they passed ouer (well neere) sixscore yeares.

Almost all the Nobility of the Switzers were lately minded.

This Countrey of the Leagues or Cantones, neither knew how to gaine their freedome, or conquer so many Countries as they haue done; if the Emperours had not beene busied in ciuill warres; whereof the Popes (for the most part) were the sole occasion, or Germany had beene vnited, as sometime it was. But the Nobilitie being become insolent by Ciuill wars, acknowledging no Superiours nor Gouernours, that knew well enough how to fish in troubled Waters: enforced (by their tyranny) the people of the Heluetians, tians, to shake off the yoake of their superiors also, and to expell them thence. At this present, and since the time of King Frances the first, they haue made confederation with the Crowne of Fraunce, receiuing both presents and pensions.

The Authors purpose in this breefe relation of the Switzers.

Mine intent was not (in this breefe discourse) to shew my selfe any Historian, neither to set downe all the gestes and warres, which this warlike Nation haue made, since they began to seeke their liberty; for, to performe that labour, it would require three or foure great volumes. Beside, I haue spoken but of three or foure, the most notable and chiefest in the Countrey, thereby to let the Reader vnderstand; wherefore the Region of the Switzers, is called the Country of Leagues, or of the Cantons. Wherein I haue followed the best Writers; as Blondus, Crantzius and Munster. By this discourse, I would gladly giue aduise to Princes and Noble-men, to deale better with their subiects, then these Lords did in the Switzers Countrey; least (by successe of time) Heauen frowne vpon them, and they be throwne into the like disaster.

A aduise to Princes and Noblemen.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the excellency and deserued commendation of Trauaile; And what great daungers are begotten, and doe ensue of idlenesse.

Trauaile first commaunded by God.

WE are enioined by the law and commaundement of God, that wee must trauaile and labour in this world: For the very first Man that euer was, hauing broken Gods commaundement, was throwne out of Terrestriall Paradise, and the Earth was giuen him to enioy; but yet with this condition, to labour therein with continuall Trauaile, without any limitation of time, but euen so long as he liued. And yet this was not imposed vpon the first man onely; but it came as an iniunction also, to all his posteritie. Now, notwithstanding holy Scripture tels vs, that Trauaile was laid on Man as a matter of repentance: yet it appeareth likewise, to be a proper medicine, whereby to recouer and help some passed euils. For a man attaineth by Trauaile, to regaine that which he lost by feeding. And though this came as a castigation, yet God commaunding nothing, but what is good in it selfe; hath (in that nature) giuen man time to enioy the Land by labour, according as Iob saith; Man is borne to trauaile.

Trauaile is a Phisicall medicine for passed offences.

Iob 5.7.

Looke vpon our Sauiour and Redeemer Iesus Christ, our Soueraigne Maister, who, as an example to vs all; trauailed continually in painefull exercises, euen till his death. And beside, in his parables, he blamed and reproued the sleepy Virgines, that were neglect and slothfull: euermore fauouring and commending such as trauailed, saying, in an especiall place of note; Come vnto me all ye that Trauaile and are heauy laden, and I will ease ye. If we would sit downe to read, we should finde, that the auncient Saints, imployed all their time in continual exercises and labours. Moreouer, Trauaile is not onely healthfull for the Soule, but it is likewise as beneficiall to the body; for it causeth agility, strength, and quick disposition; it cheareth and encreaseth good Spirits, and consumeth all bad and offensiue humors. And concerning the Soule, it cleanseth it from all occasions of euill doing, and conuerteth bad thoughts into better endeuours. Most certaine is it, that (without paine and trauaile) neuer did matter of any great consequence sort to good effect; but the paines seemed the sweeter, because no slothfull ease was interposed in the action. He that trauailes and takes paines, takes quiet repose and rest also, because to a weary man, all thinges are sweete and acceptable: his meate is sauoury to him, sleepe easie, and all pleasures are to him in trueste contentment.

The life of our blessed Sauiour.

Math. 25, 34.

Trauaile is beneficiall both for soule and body.

Paineful men doe best take their rest.

But returning to the benefits of the body, trauaile maketh a man discreete, vigilant, well aduised, wise, & all goodnesse else proceedeth thence. It is trauaile that apparelleth and beautifieth a Man: it maketh lodgings for him to rest in; waies to walke in; Ships to saile in; Armes to defend him; in breefe, innumerable are the blessings thereby abounding. By trauaile, barren Landes are are made fresh, teeming, and fruitfull: to such as are dry, it giueth water, by opening the earths Wombe, to let forth her owne moysture. It exalteth humble Vallies, where neede requireth, and throwes down high Mountaines, whose steepe passage offendeth. It turneth foorth-right Flouds and Riuers, to take their more needfull course by dry landes without waters, helping (thereby) to adorne and pollish Nature, compelling her sometimes, to engender such things, as in her own proper wil she would not. It tameth the wildest beasts, and maketh them familiar. It maketh mens Spirits prompt and subtile, hauing the like power in all the other sences of man: and he that makes due tryall, findes the vnualuable riches which is got by Trauaile.

Trauaile is a help to nature

The way to Heauen is by paine and trauaile.

God would not haue his owne chosen Vessels to come to Heauen, but by the rugged pathes of paine and trauaile. If sumptuous buildings, goodly Pallaces, and populous Cities doe seeme mightie thinges: then know, that all those were performed by the labour, sweate, and trauaile of thy Predecessors. If likewise, Arts and Sciences doe highly content thee: why then remember, that they were the spirituall Trauaile of learned Men in times past. If thou looke vpon faire fields, beautiful Gardens, and plenteous yeelding Vines: say to thy selfe, all these proceeded from the workes of Trauaile; because idlenesse dooth not any thing, but rather destroyeth whatsoeuer is already done. By Trauaile, men attained to very great and famous renowne. It was that which made wise Plato, Aristotle, Pythagoras, and the rest of those learned men, neuer cease to trauaile their bodies and studious Spirits; both in writing, enstructing, & disputing, without any care at all for sleeping, feeding, or cloathing their bodies: and yet, at such times as Nature compeld them to these necessities; they seemed much more sweete and pleasing to them, then they can doe to idle and sloathfull Gluttons.

Matter of especiall obseruation in this case.

Plato, Aristotle, Pythagoras, &c.

What was it that made Hercules so famous and farre honoured; but onelie his twelue labourious Trauailes? What was it that gaue such splendour to the Names of Alexander the Great, Iulius Cæsar, with all those excellent Kings and Captaines; but painefull exercise, and industrious Trauaile? Whereas on the contrary, Sardanapalus, and other such like idle and lasciuious Princes, both ruined and oppressed their Countries, and themselues dyed very shamefull deathes. Whereby may easily be gathered, that if the World were depriued of Trauaile; all would turne to nothing. Offices in humanity, would fall into Decadence; Mechanicall Artes, Letters, Studies, Goods, Remembrances, Iustice, Lawes and Peace, no one of all these could continue without Trauaile. All the vertues are supported, only by meanes thereof, and (without it) they could no way be exercised: because, he that will minister Iustice, ought to trauaile and take paines. To conclude, no vertue can bee set on worke, without Trauaile, and therefore Hesiodus said: By sweat and painefull Trauaile, Vertue is to be wun.

The iniuries ensuing by lacke of Trauaile.

The vertues maintained by Trauaile.

If wee would well and exactly contemplate all the things which God hath created; we shall find, that by how much the more they are perfected in a certaine meanes, by so much the more may we truly say, that hee hath giuen to them great Trauaile. Let vs behold his superior handy-workes; the Sunne mooueth it selfe continually; the Moone neuer standeth still; the Heauens and the Plannets haue beene, are, and shall be daily in continuall motion. The fire cannot containe it selfe, without some operation; the Ayre goes alwaies to some place or other. In the inferiour bodies, the Water, Fountaines and Riuers flow incessantly, and the Sea mooueth without cessation. For the Earth it selfe, albeit it were immoueable (for it ought so to be, & vpon necessity, both that men may Trauaile whether they would thereon, and afterward take their rest) yet notwithstanding, it neuer enioyeth any repose: but continually bringeth foorth Hearbs, Trees, and Plants, euen like a diligent and painefull Mother, that counts her selfe obliged, to maintaine and nourish both men and Beasts. And therefore, if we would bring all these thinges to due consideration, we should then finde, that Nature is intentiue to no other thing; but onely to continuall labour and trauaile: in creating, forming, making, vnmaking, producing, corrupting, altering, or gazing and toiling, without the least respite of rest or repose, in any kind whatsoeuer.

Contemplation of the workes of God, & how they labour and trauaile in their seuerall kindes.

needes be true, the wiſe Philoſophers (in times paſt) ſignified by their daily labours, that they were neuer weary in commending the trauaile & exerciſe of the body. Virgill ſaith, That continuall labour ſurmounteth all things. Horace, the Lyricke and Satiricall Poet, ſaith in his workes: That God gaue nothing to Man, but with paine and labour. Euripides ſaith: Trauaile is the Father of Fame: God helpeth him that trauaileth: without Trauaile, there is no true renowne, praiſe, nor happie aduenture. The Poet Menander wrote very wiſely; a heauyfull man idle, is in worſe condition then he that hath an Ague. The ſaying of Democritus pleaſeth me highly, where he ſaith: Paines taken voluntarily, are neuer diſtaſtefull when they bee enforced. When Hermicon was demaunded, of whom he learned thoſe deepe Sciences which he profeſſed; he anſwered: Of Trauaile and Experience. It was the ſaying of great Pythagoras; That a Man ought to make choiſe of a good life, and to let it appeare, by paine and Trauaile, which brings it to a ſweete and eaſie cuſtome. Salomon ſaith; The ſlothfull man ſhould learne example of the Ant.

I ſhould neuer end, if I were to name heere, the plenty of teſtimonies to bee alleadged in this kinde. It ſhall ſuffice then, for me to ſay, that neuer was any man famous for Armes, Learning, example of good life, or any of the Arts; without great Trauaile. And, to ſpeak truly, neuer were any idle people great, or knowne, but if it happened that a Man being borne great, liued neglectly or idle: moſt certaine it is, that (by ſlothfulneſſe) his eſtate was ruined, or elſe hee loſt his renowne, quiet or life, the loſſe being the true fruit of ſloathes Tree, whereby all vices are multiplied, as the wiſe man wel witneſſeth, ſaying; Idleneſſe enſtrũſteth many miſchiefes. Ouid could affirme, that, Without idleneſſe, Cupid hath no power, and hee ſpake truely: For in idleneſſe, wickedneſſe is dreampt on, treaſons inuented, and foule ſinnes acted. Ezechiell numbreth idleneſſe among thoſe ſins, which were the cauſe that Sodome was deſtroyed.

To ſpeak mine one owne iudgement in this caſe, I neuer knew any thing, wherein idleneſſe got entrance, but it came to vtter ruine. We ſee the fire, if it be not maintained, it quickly quencheth of it ſelfe. The Aire likewiſe, it muſt be continually mooued; for if it bee with-held and reſtrained, it will breake forth of it ſelfe. Water, compelled to any limitted place, and where it may not haue his courſe and free paſſage; it putrifieth, corrupteth, and ſtincketh. If the earth be not opened and laboured; it will produce nothing but Brambles, Bryers, Thiſtles, and other vnprofitable Hearbs. It is euident to our eies, that Gold, if it be not much laboured and purified, it will neuer appeare in his perfect beauty. Iron likewiſe, and other Mettals, will meerely ruſt and canker of themſelues; except they bee wrought to ſome kinde of ſeruice. Prouinces and Countries, if they be not inhabited and laboured; they will proue barren & ſubiect to peſtilence. Houſes and dwellings, let them ſtand voyd and empty; they forthwith fal to ruine and decay. Common high-waies, let them not be trauailed and frequented; they will ſhut vp themſelues into impoſſibility of paſſage, ſo that all knowledge of them will be vtterly loſt. All things whatſoeuer, if they be not imployed, and made vſe of by labor; they periſh, impaire of themſelues. Yea, euen the very vitall Spirits of Men or Women, if they be not quickned and viuified by daily exerciſes; they will become lazy and ſlothfull; ſo that the hart and ſoule will conſume themſelues, the powers of the body be ſo waſted and weakned, that no vſe or motion can be made with them.

I haue already (in this Chapter) told ye, that trauaile makes a man agile, and chearefully diſpoſed: and now (on the contrary) I am alſo to informe ye, that ſloath and idleneſſe ſpoyleth the complexion, corrupteth all good humours in mans body, and giues Dominion to them that are bad and naught. Galen ſaith: It is impoſſible for a man, to keepe himſelfe healthfull, except he trauaile and labour. And Auicenne is of the ſame mind, with Cornelius Celſus, and other very excellent Phiſitions. Horſes, and ſuch kind of Beaſts, if they be kept idle; they become vnprofitable. Beſide, I finde it faithfully recorded, that Hannibals idleneſſe at Capua, was the onely cauſe of the Romaines victorie againſt him. The ſloathfull man hath no other Leſſon; but that all imployment is painefull to him. He that marcheth beſt in Warre, fights alwaies in greateſt ſecurity: but hee that abideth ſtill in one place, is apt to all inconueniences, and the Sunne burnes him with the more aduantage. We do ordinarily behold, and finde it true in common experience, that both voices and inſtruments, not being imploied; they loſe their vertue, ſound hoarſly and diſcordant: whereas on the contrary, vſe refineth, concordeth, and makes them moſt pleaſing. There are ſome kindes of Wines, that muſt bee rackt and roughly mannaged, to preſerue them in yeilding the better reliſh. Pretious ſtones, if they bee not polliſhed and purely cleanſed, they cannot appeare in their perfect luſter: but by painefull labour and trauaile, they are diſcerned in their higheſt excellencie. Rude Iron it ſelfe, the more it is vſed, the clearer it ſhineth. Among brute beaſts, they that take the greateſt pains, are moſt eſteemed of men. To ſupport this cauſe, I could alleadge ſo many authorities of Philoſophers and Poets, al blaming and rebuking idleneſſe: as would ſerue to compleat whatſoeuer is wanting, for full confirmation of this needfull diſcourſe. Saints haue curſſed it; Philoſophers condemned it; Ouid, Plato, Horace, Claudian, Virgill, and all other Poets haue ſung againſt it. All Hiſtories are full of the euils deriued from it. Plato and Ariſtotle, condemning idleneſſe, doe highly exalt the Art that was called Gymnaſtia, whereby, all neceſſary occaſions and matters for war were enſtructed.

Of the Emperour Adrian & Turbo.

The Emperor Adrian had long time educated, fauoured, and (at laſt) exalted a man, named Turbo, who was a moſt diligent and labourious follower of his affaires, and the Emperor, noting him one day, that (in his opinion) hee was too earneſt in his buſineſſe, he ſaid vnto him. Turbo, doe not kill thy ſelfe, but be more carefull of thy health: whereto Turbo replyed. My Lord, the Man that hath beene nouriſhed, fauoured and aduanced by an Emperour, as I haue beene, ought to dye in Trauaile at his foote. Quintus Curtius declareth, that the diſeaſes of idleneſſe ſhould be cured by Trauaile. The Romaines had a cuſtome, to begin the day at midnight, to the end, that at the riſing and apparition of the Sunne; they might all fall to labour together: for they were perſwaded, that (already) a moity of the day was paſt, and yet no good Act performed by them. A Roman ſought to perſwade the Senate, that Carthage could not be deſtroyed; leaſt the Romans boaſting of ſecurity, by want of imployment there, ſhould become idle. Vpon which occaſion, Scipio Naſica, perceiuing that ſome held Rome to be in ſafety, after that Carthage was made deſolate, and Greece waſted; gaue them this anſwere. I am of a contrary opinion, and doe thinke our ſelues now to be in much greater perill, becauſe we now ſtand in feare of no body. Whereby this worthy man inferred, that idleneſſe was the cauſe of more dreadfull daunger, then either warre or neighbouring enemies; becauſe feare yeeldes more aduantage of ſafetie, then when we ſtand free from all doubtfull conſideration. And therefore the French haue a prety Prouerbe: Make Holidaie when the times giue leyſure.

ueth some consideration, to note in what account trauaile was among the Gentiles; in regard, that they had three Idols: the first was named Strenna, that is; dexterity, or agility: the second, Agenoria, which signified virility, or manlines: and the third, Stimula, which is as much to say, as a spurre and pricke to honour and vertue; and trauaile was (with them) in such precious reckoning, that they erected these Ideaes to eternity.

The holy Scripture bindeth vs to trauaile.

But not to stay our selues (ouer long) on the Gentiles opinion, let vs come to the sacred Scriptures; where we are no lesse bound to trauaile, then restrained and prohibited from prophane thinges. Salomon in his Prouerbs, among those other places, where he so deepely condemneth idlenesse, saith: That the sluggard or slouthfull person, which forbeareth to worke in Winter, shall be a Beggar. Saint Paule, the Doctour of the Gentiles, taketh glory in nothing more, then in not beeing idle, commending labour and trauaile aboue all things. And writing to the Thessalonians, hee tels them, that they knew wel enough how to imitate him, for he was neuer idle among them, but it was foode to him both night and day, in that he had gained them; not by any indirect meanes or charge to them, but in giuing them good example. Saing moreouer, that hee that would not labour, ought not to eat. The like did he to the Corinthians, recounting his Trauailes taken for their example; and so in many other places beside. Let vs then (hence-forward) imploy our time in good and honest exercises, shunning sloth and idlenesse, that neuer can performe any act of estimation.

In what manner trauaile is commanded.

And yet wee are not commaunded, to follow labour and trauaile, with such extreamity or rigour; as to leaue our meate, drinke, sleep, or honestly taking our rest and quiet: for decent recreations, and honest repose is sometimes lawfull. In which regard, Cicero exalted and commaunded Scipio, who said: That he was neuer lesse at rest, then when he was at rest. Which Cicero maintaineth to be a notable saying: Because (quoth he) he declared thereby, that in his idlenesse, he thought on his businesse, and so in solitude, he could take councell with himselfe. Moral Seneca alleaged; That idle time, without Letters or study, is death and buriall to a Man, and onely they that are exercised in knowledge, know best what sloath and idlenesse is. Plutarch would haue a man to make some dispensation of his time, in exercising the difference betweene knowledge and experience. O that men (then) would but duely consider, how their time is to bee imployed; which glides away so swiftly, and remember withall, that they must render an account for euery word spoken vainely & idly. Cato, although he was a Pagan, yet he could say: That great and worthy Men did stand as much bound to yeilde an account, for their time lost or neglected; as they that could best deliuer reason for their honest imployment.

To conclude, we should make such good expence of our time, in honest, lawdable, and blamelesse exercises: that the fruites thereof may be aduantageable to vs, and we esteemed as hyred Seruants for heauen; which is prouided for none, but such, as are called to trauaile in the Lords Vine-yard, and shall haue their Wages according to their worke. And Saint Iohn the Diuine saith. The dead which dye in the Lord, are fully blessed, for they rest from their labours, and their workes and trauailes follow them. This authority doth well approue, that trauaile is the merchandise of this World; heere bought and sold; but rewarded in Heauen. For so Saint Paule testifieth, saying: Euery one shall receiue his wages and payment, according as he hath trauailed here beneath.

The reason, why the Palme was giuen as an attribute to Conquerours; and Lawrell obserued as a signe of victory.

MOst certaine is it, that (in elder times) the Romaines gaue the Palme to Conquerours, in signe of Triumph; and it is so true, that by writing in Latine the word Palma, it is meerely vnderstood for victory. Plutarch also affirmeth, that for each kind of victory, there was a seuerall Crowne Seuerall Crowns vsed among the Romanes for Conquerors.

Crowne designed, where-with their heads were circkled, that had obtained such honor in field. One was made of Oliue branches; another of Laurell; a third of Oaken Leaues, and others, of other trees: but among them all, the Palme was the general signe of victory. Those ancients do likewise say, that the cause why this signification (more then any other) was attributed to them: proceeded from an admirable propriety in the Tree it selfe, which (without any other proofe to confirme it) is allowed to be most certaine, by authority of the that haue written theron; as Pliny, Aristotle, Theophrastus, Aulus Gellius, and Plutarch. All which learned Writers do maintain, that the more the Palme-tree (or one of his branches) is charged with any heauy weight or burden; the more it resists and withstandeth the oppression. And whereas all other Trees doe yeelde vnder such lading, and are surmounted by the burden; the Palme only resisteth, and cannot be ouer-awed; because the greater the weight is, the more doth it still out-stand it. In this respect, both Plutarch and Aulus Gellius say: That he which goes with an intent to Conquer another, must not suffer himselfe to be surmounted by feare of the perrill, nor waxe weake in the attempt: but rather trauaile on with height of courage, and (with resolute resistance) pursue victorie, as being a man, meete to carry comparison with that Tree, which hath the same naturall quality, both in resisting and ouercomming any weighty oppression, and therefore it is giuen as a signe of victory.

Plin. Lib. 6. Arist. in Probl. Theophra. lib. 5. Aul. Gel. lib. 2. Plutar. in Simp

The words of Plutarch and Aulus Gellius.

Others say, that this honour was practised by the Gentiles, because the Palme was consecrated to Phœbus, long before the Laurell was, and was held to be a most auncient signe of victory. Pliny and Theophrastus, doe write of many other properties in this Tree, whereof we neede not speake, to auoide expence of time. And yet notwithstanding, I am very loath, to conceale that which is affirmed by so many; to wit, that as the Palme hath contrary effects to all other Trees: so is there of them both Masle and Female, and the Females are they which bring forth dates; the Masles onelie flourish, and when they happen to yeelde any fruite, they are verie small, without good taste, and no profit is made of them. It is also to be obserued, that in what place soeuer the Females grow, if the Masles be not neere vnto them, they will not beare any fruit: but if it chance, that the Masle-tree bee cut or disbranched; the Female (like a Widdowe) thence-forward, will neuer yeelde any more fruit.

The Palme was consecrated to Phœbus, before the Laurell.

Palme-trees that are both male and female.

But ceasing further speech of the Palme, we are heere to remember, that in the Triumphes at Rome, the Triumphers vsed to bee Crowned with Laurell, and the Captaine that triumphed, carried a braunch thereof in his hand. So is the Triumphe described of Scipio Affricanus, by Appianus Alexandrinus, and many others, whereof Pliny yeeldeth some reason, and saith. The Laurell was consecrated to Apollo or Phœbus, because that on the Mount of Pernassus, there grew great store of them; And hee beleeueth, that for this reason, the Triumphers Crowned themselues with Laurell.

Wreathes or Crownes of Laurell were in the Romane Triumphes.

Plin. Lib. 6.

He deliuereth another reason, concerning a wonderfull propertie in the Laurell, to wit; that (naturally) it is an enemy to Fire, and Thunder; and Lightening (be it neuer so violent) hath not the power to touch it. Hereupon was it, that so often as the Emperour Tiberius heard any Thunder, and beheld the lightning flashes; hee tooke a Leafe of Laurell or Bayes, and layde it on his bare head, iudging himselfe (by that meanes) to bee free from the Thunder and Lightnings daunger. The Priestes of Diuination in Rome, vsed also to Crowne themselues with Laurel, and afterward burning them; would diuine (by the noise it made) of that which was to ensue: and therfore Claudian called this Tree, The Diuiner of things to come.

A strange property of the Laurell.

The Diuinatours wore Laurell Crowues.

Pliny and Suetonius, in the beginning of the Emperour Galbaes life, doe declare a matter very strange, saying; that Liuia Drusilla (who afterward was named Augusta, because she was married to Octauianus Augustus) going from Rome, to a place out of the Cittie, called Veietana; she chanced to sit downe vnder a Laurell Tree, and very soone after, an Eagle flying ouer her her head in the Ayre(through the branches of the Bay-tree) did let fall into her lap, a Hen as white as Snow, that carried a branch of greene Bayes fast in her Bill. Liuia beeing somewhat amazed thereat, caused the Henne to bee well kept, and of it came many more beside; wherefore, the name of the Graundge where shee kept the Henne, was euer after called Gallina. She commaunded also, that the braunch (found in the Hennes Bill) should be planted, which grew so faire, and prospered in such plenty; as it was wonderfull to behold, what aboundance of Trees came of that one Plant. So that, from that time forward, both Octauianus and his Successours, (in a kinde of Custome, or superstitious Religion) when they triumphed: would cut braunches of those Baytrees, and beare them in their handes; but when the Triumphe was ended, they would plant them againe by those Trees, from whence they had beene cut, and they prospered as well as the other did. This History is (in this manner) related by these two credible Authors. Suetonius, whose authority is of great reputation, addeth yet another matter, whereat I doe not a little maruaile. He saith, that at such times as any Emperour dyed; the Plant of Laurell likewise withered, and all the branches cut from those boughs, which had bin planted at the time of his triumph. And when Nero died, who was the last of the Cæsars Linage, all the Bay-trees dryed vp and withered, that had grown cheerefully before, and came of that one braunch, which the Hen brought in her beake, and had bin planted by Liuia. Beside, all the thriuing store of the white Hennes brood, dyed, not one remaining, and in the Imperiall Pallace fell such Lightnings and Thunder: as smote off the heads of the Emperours statues, erected there in their remembrance, and the Scepter which Augustus Cæsar helde in his hand, was also smitten downe to the ground. Continually they placed Crownes of Laurell vpon euery Cornish of the Emperours houses. Ouid, among many other things in his Metamorphosis, saith; That the Romaines reputed the Laurell, to bee a very sacred Tree, and would make no vse therof, about things that were vile, vncleane, or prophane: but euer accounted it as a signe of peace, and therfore tearmed it the Peacefull Laurell. Plinie saith, that the Laurell hath a vertuous property against the Pestilence, & against all venemous Serpents. Ouid declareth, that the faire & chast Nimph Daphne, was conuerted into this Tree, and in regard thereof, it was consecrated to Phœbus, who (among other vanities) was adored by the ancient Romains as a God.

CHAP. VI.

Of the abhominable and most detested vice of Cruelty; How horrid it is to humane Nature: With many excellent examples depending on this Argument.

AMong all vicious pollutions, which are most repugnant, euen to common humanity, and make men to become abhominable; me thinks, that cruelty is the supreame and Soueraign of all other. For, man is a most Noble Creature, made in the Image and similitude of God; yea, borne to exercise nothing but mildenesse: but being seruile to cruelty; he becommeth a brute Beast, terrible, furious, wicked, and an vtter enemy to God, who is the Prince of clemency, and would not haue one man to be bitter, or tyrrannous to another. Aristotle saith, that fierceneſſe, cruelty, and inhumanity, belongeth only to wild and furious beasts. Seneca, in his second Book of Clemency, termeth it Fellony against the Soule, and from thence concludeth; that it is opposite and contrary to the vertue of Clemency. Cruelty is the greatest enemy to Iustice and reason, and is a more detestable sin then Pride or Anger. For it seemeth, that anger proceedeth from som conceiued displeasure, to behold any euill offered to another: but in a cruell disposition, there is found far other maleuolent matter, because in smiles (and without any disdaine, but only in meere mallice) mercilesse torments are inflicted on men; yea, euen to the depriuation of life. Therfore it is capitall enemie to Iustice, which honorably defendeth, and will permit no man to receiue any domage or harme; without some fault com-committed, and yet taketh order also, that offenders shal haue milde and temperate correction. Seneca, in his Booke of manners, saith; If we call them Hangmen, that vse no measure in the correction of vices: what then may wee tearme them, that cruelly oppresse and murder Innocents?

Senec in Lib. de Morib.

Examples of cruell men are infinite, among whom was Herod, King of the Iewes, who raigned at the time, as our Lord & Sauior Iesus Christ was born. For, after the slaughter of so many Innocents (purposely performed, in hope to haue slaine him among them, that came into the world for our Redemption) he would yet make further shew of his cruelty, not only while he liued, but euen at the instant of his death. And because he well perceiued his end approaching, he called all the chiefe persons of Ierusalem, who being come before him: he caused them to be seazed on, and fast lockt vp in a place neere to himselfe, giuing strict charge to his Sister: that at the point of his Soules surrender, shee should see them euery one put to death; wherein she failed, in regard that God appointed the contrary. And what was his reason for his bloody intent? Onely this, as himselfe confessed a little before his death. He knew very wel, that al the people of Ierusalem would be very ioyful for his departure, because other matters had happened to the people, then they expected; and therefore (mooued onely by cruelty) to make this the saddest day that euer they endured, he concluded this bloody slaughter and horrible murder. The cruelties of Abimelech, the Son to great Gedeon, were as wonderfull, for, that himselfe might enioy the Kingdome alone, he put to death threescore of his owne Bretheren: one onely escaping, named Ionathas, who fled (by the will of God) that the Traytour might liue in continuall suspition. Now, I know not whether this cruelty, or the other following, may be counted the greatest, acted by the same man, against the Sichimites, and in reuenge, because they had expulsed him out of their Citty. But he getting entrance againe by power, and in the night time: slew all that were therein, Men, Women, Children, great and small. And because some were fled into the Temples; hee caused them to bee round engirt with wood, & putting fire thereto; the heat and smoak was so great, that there they were all smothered. Then destroying the Citty, he caused the ground to bee ploughed, and gaue commaund, that it should be sowen with Salt.

Herods reason for his bloody intent.

The cruelties of Abimelech, the Sonne of Gedeon, vpon his owne Brethren, and the Sichimites.

Very great also, was the cruelty of the Carthagenians, executed on Atilius Regulus, who being taken Prisoner by thē, they sent him (vpon his owne word) to the Romaines, to worke the meanes of peace by the permuptation of Prisoners and Captiues. But he, not regarding his owne life, but preferring the honour of his Country before all other respects: returned againe to Carthage, where (for conseruation of his faith) he willingly yeilded himselfe. They, in extreamity of cruelty, made him vp fast in a Tun of wood, which was stuck thick with sharp pointed Nailes of Iron, not affoording the least place, where any member of him might be free from torture: and so, rowling him vp and down their streetes, did put him to death in that miserable manner.

Of Atilius Regulus, the famous Romaine Captaine against the Carthagenians.

All Tyrants haue a custome, to be cruell by nature, but aboue all the rest, the execrable and bloody Tyrant Phalaris of Sicily, carrieth the chiefest place of eminence. He slew infinite men, without any offence commited against him, and (if it were well considered) he was much more cruell in affection, then in action. For he had a Bull of Brasse, which Perillus (a cunning workman) had made for him, wherein the party was enclosed, whom he would haue to bee put to death. Then kindling an hot Fire round about it, the voyce of the poore pacient (suffering this torture within) seemed to the Tirant, as if it had bin the bellowing of a true Bull. And this he did, to the end, that the cries of an humane voyce, in such extreamity, might not moone him to the least iot of compassion. Yet one thing is much commended in him, that Perillus, the inuentor and maker of this terrible punnishment; was the first (by the Tirants commaund) that made proofe thereof.

Of cruel Phalaris the bloody Tyrant of Sicily, and his Bull of Brasse made by Perillus.

Iustice executed by a Tyrant.

Nor can I well aduise my selfe, with what kinde of cruelty, to compare that of Tullia, daughter to Tarquine, king of Rome, who caused her father to be slain, because she might inherit the kingdom; which himselfe had willingly giuen her, she would but haue stayed a little longer. And that which is much more note worthy in her cruelty, was; that her father lying dead vpon the ground, & she being mounted in his Chariot; would needes ride ouer the dead body. And wheras the Horses that drew the Chariot, being fearefull at sight of the dead body, refused to goe on; as also the Coach man that guided them (moued with compassion of his murdred Maister) would haue turned them another way, to the end, that the Kinges body might not be dismembred: yet took she pleasure in her cruell affection, & what the dumb beasts (in pitty) denied to do; she (in meere cruelty) would execute, compelling the Horses to obey hir wil, and trample vppon the body of her Father.

Tullia slew his owne Father, to enioy his Kingdome.

Extraordinary cruelty in a Daughter.

The horrible cruelty of the Scythians to liuing men.

The Scythians, a people very furious & valiant in warre, are likewise recorded, (by Historians) to be exceeding cruell: but among their other cruelties (which gaue much matter of maruaile) this one is especially remebred. They wold that their greatest beasts, as Horses & Buls, and such men as they would haue to be tormented, must be bound fast within the opened bodies of the slaughtered Beasts, so that they could not possiblie stirre any way. There would they giue them food to eate, that while they thus liued: the Flesh of the dead beastes might putrifie and stincke, and the Wormes issuing forth of the putrifaction, should feede on the liuing men, and they dye in this cruell torment.

The cruelty of Maximinus and Maxentius

We reade that Maximinus, Emperour of Rome, did as much, hauing deuised the most horrible cruelty, that euer entred into the heart of Man: hee caused liuing men to bee fast bound to the bodies of dead men, and left them in that manner, till the noysome smell of the dead had kild the liuing.

Virgill affirmeth the like of Maxentius. As strange horrid cruelties doe we read of, done by Alexander Pheræus, who commaunded liuing men to bee buried, being bound face to face one against another. Others, he caused to bee cloathed in the skinnes of Beares, and other wilde beasts, and then threw them forth into the open fields, among Wolues and Mastiues, that they might bee torne in peeces and deuoured of them.

The cruelty of Alexander Pheræus.

The History of Astiages & Harpagus.

I know not, whether the cruelty done by Astiages (King of the Medes) to Arpalus, or Harpagus (one of the cheefest and deerest Friendes of his Kingdome) may be reported; without amazement and dreadfull astonishment. This Astiages appointed a young Sonne of his owne to bee slaine (in regard of a troublesome dreame, concerning the said Child) and gaue the charge of this bloody execution to Harpagus. But he, mooued to compassion, by the moanes and teares of the young Infant (which was afterward called Cyrus the Great) and standing in feare also of the Childs Mother, she being daughter to Astiages: would not kill the Infant, but with all care and diligence, tooke order for the safety and education therof. Long time after, Astiages was aduertised, that the Child was not dead, which smothering inwardly to himselfe, with a countenance declaring no discontentment: he closely practised, how he might repay the pitty of Harpagus, in breaking his commaund, and preseruing the life of young Cyrus. Harpagus hauing a young Sonne, Astiages (by secret meanes) got possession of him, and hauing inuited Harpagus to dine with him the next day, among the other viands serued in at the Table; the Father fed vpon the flesh of his owne Childe, with exceeding appetite and good liking, because the Kings cruelty was vnknowne to him. Astiages not satisfied with the bloody deceipt, did another most cruell deede: for, among the fruites and delicates to finish this dinner, vpon seuerall plates and dishes; the head, feet, and hands of the Infant was set vpon the table, and presented so apparantly before the father, that he could not auoyde the knowledge of his wofull dinner.

An extreame cruelty in a King.

Betweene the two Warlicke Captaines, Marius and Silla, being Capitall Enemies to each other, were so many tyrannies exercised; as it seemed, they listned to nothing else, but contended which should exceede in the greatest Cruelrie. Silla caused foure Legions of Souldiers to bee slaine in one day. The crueltie of the Emperor Tiberius.

Could the World yeelde an equall to the Emperour Tiberius, the Succeffour of Octauius? Hee, after a feigned clemency, at the beginning of his raign, fuffered no day to paffe him, without fhedding the blood of poor Innocents. Moreouer, he deuifed a kind of cruelty, the like whereof (in mine opinion) was neuer heard: For he prohibited (on pain of death) that no one fhould be fo bold as to weepe, or make any fhew of forrow, for them whom he had innocently put to death. Truely, this was a verie ftrange cruelty, for I am of the minde, that there can be no greater paine, then that which hindereth an afflicted heart, from eafing his ouer-weighty burthen of woe, by fighes and teares, the pooreft remedy that oppreffion can haue.

An incomparable cruelty.

That which he afterward did to young Maides and Virgines, deferueth no repetion, but onely to his endleffe fhame. For, before their death, he would haue them violated and deflouted by Ruffians and Hang-men, to the ende, that (with death) they might loſe their chiefeft honour and palme of victory. And fuch was his delight in putting people to death, that when newes was brought him, that one (whom he had condemned to death) had flain himfelfe; he cryed out, faying. Oh how could this Cornelius (for fo was the condemned perfons name) eſcape me? Hee fhould haue vnderſtood, I vſe to torment patients in ſuch ſort before they dye, that death it ſelfe is the greateſt grace I can doe them. There then liued not any man, but he was amazed at his variety of inuentions, wherby he tormented and put men to death. Whē he was difpofed to fee fome men dye, he would haue them firft to drinke exceffiuely, and when they were able to drinke no more; then fhould their cunduit paffage for Vrine bee fo ſtrictlie bound, that the leaſt droppe of Vrine could not be voyded, and in this mercileffe Agony muſt they be left, vntill they dyed with extreamity of anguifh. Befide, onelie for his pleafure, man muſt bee throwne head-long from an high Rocke (named Capraria, neere Naples) into the Sea, and becauſe he imagined, that (thus dying in the Water) was too eaſie a death: hee would haue armed men to ſtand beneath, to receiue the bound bodies on their Pikes and Halbardes, ſo to mangle and cut thē in pieces, before they were thrown into the Sea.

An aduentitious torment.

After the death of this Tiberius euen ſuch a death as hee worthily deſerued; Caius Caligula ſucceeded in the Empire, and in the violent affection of his Predeceſſours. He wiſhed, that all the people in Rome had but one head; that (at one ſtroke) himſelfe might ſmite it off. He thought himſelfe vnfortunate; & complained of the felicitie in his time; becauſe that (while he gouerned) there was no Famine, vniuerſall Peſtilence, Deluges, Ruines, and ſubuerſions of Countries, for vter deſolation of the whole World together. A man was brought before him, that formerly had beene baniſhed by Tiberius, of whom hee demaunded; what he did all the time of his banniſhment? The man made anſwer (in meere adulation) that he praied to God, without intermiſſion, for the death of Tiberius, & that his Maieſty might ſucceede in the Empire. Which when Caligula heard, he remembred himſelfe, how many thouſands of men had bin baniſhed; & thruſt into exile by him, who (doubtleſſe) might make the like Prayer for him: he forthwith gaue command, that they ſhould be all repealed, and euerie man of them put to death. Such as (by him) were ſentenced to die, hee would haue the manner of their dying prolonged by little and little, and inflict (at firſt) but ſmall woundes on them, that their paine might laſt the longer. For he vſed to ſay to his Tormentours; Deale with them ſo, that they may feele themſelues die. He obſerued alſo a ſaying of his predeceſſor: People wiſh me ill, becauſe they feare me After this Caligula, Nero ſucceeded in the gouernment, & in no leſſe fiercenes and cruelty; becauſe he was a Man, in whom (if poſſible it might be) all the others cruelties were encloſed, and all elſe that could (by Men) be imagined. CHAP. VIII.

The strange fortune, which happened to the Sonne of Crœsus, King of Lydia, and likewise to the Sonne of another King. In regard wherof, it is discoursed whither speech bee a thing natural to man or no: and whether man only speaketh, & no creature else.

Herodotus and Aulus Gellius.

HErodotus writeth, a meruelous accident happening to the sonne of Crœsus, K. of Lydia: and in the same manner, is it reported by Aulus Gellius. This Crœsus was a Rich King, and the same that was vanquished by Cyrus, as many good Historiographers haue declared. During the time that this King liued prosperously in his Countrey, he had by one of his Lawful Wiues, a goodly Sonne, healthfull and compleate in all his parts and vnderstanding. The Child hauing attained conuenient yeares, to forme speech, & make vse thereof, was (notwithstanding) by the meanes of some vnknowne string, or other hinderance in the tongue, debarred from speaking for long time after. Yet grew he to good stature, and aptly disposed to diuers enterprizes, which caused him to bee much pitied, & this restraint of his speech, made euerie one to repute him dumbe, albeit hee had good knowledge, and heard verie perfectly, which is against the order of Nature, for neuer was any man knowne to bee Naturallie dumbe, but he was deafe likewise.

The son of K. Crœsus bereste of speech.

Dumbe men are also deafe by Nature.

It fortuned, that Crœsus was vanquished, and the City wherein hee was, taken by the enemies, so that the forwarde Soldiers pressed on to the Pallace wherin the King and his dumbe Sonne were hidden together. But being found by a Soldier, who had perfect knowledge of them both: and lifting vp his sword, with full intent to kill Crœsus: his Son was so affrighted at the bloody proffer, and passion had such a powerful working in him that he stroue for speech extraordinarily. And pressing the extreame Dominion, which the soule hath of the body, immediately the corporall Organes yeelded to the strong determination of the will, and breaking the strings that had so long restraind his liberty of speech, he spake out alowd, saying; Oh do not kil him, consider that hee is King Crœsus, and my father. When the Soldier heard these wordes, he with-held his stroke, and woulde not smite the King: so he escaped death, and from thence-forward his sonne continued in perfect speaking, euen as if hee had spoken all his life time till then. Surelie, this was a matter verie maruellous, and I cannot immagine, what naturall reason may be sufficiently giuen for it.

The strange extasy of a son, seeing his Father readie to be slaine.

A wonderfull recouerie of speech.

Aristotle saith, that men are born commonly dumbe and deafe, because they are not formed with such disposition of these two apprehensions, neither in such perfection as is required. Afterwards, in further growing on, they dispose them selues, and striue first of all, to begin with hearing; and after they haue hearde (for many daies together) then they labour how to speake. Pliny saith also, hee that is borne and continueth deafe, is compeld likewise to bee dumbe. For, most certaine it is, that if a deafe man hearde, he would easily learne to speake, and speech is impossible to be taught him that is entirely deafe.

The Allegation of Aristotle concerning men borne dumb & deaf.

The saying of Plini, Lib.

Aristotle also saieth: It may well happen, that a Childe may pronounce some words before ordinary time, and yet notwithstanding, he will begin to lose those words againe, vntill such time as Natures allowed houre (for Infants to speake) be come, and when (by her appointment) they commonly vse to speake. To this purpose, Pliny speaketh of this sonne to King Crœsus (whose History we haue in briefe briefe related) and ſaith; That at the age of fiue moneths, hee pronounced ſome words, which were reputed as Prognoſticaters of his Fathers ruine: and ſo it ſeemed, that ſuch effect proceeded from that fore-telling, for he neuer ſpake afterwardes, vntill the memorable accident which we haue already declared.

Another Hiſtorie of the like nature.

I call to minde another aduenture in the like caſe, recited by Hulsben Ragel, in his Iudiciare, wher he ſpeaketh, as an eie-witneſſe; and being preſent in a Kinges Court, who had a Son borne, that within foure and twenty hours after his birth, began to ſpeake perfectly, and ſtirred his hands, whereat al the Beholders maruelled not a little, for with a ſtrong voice, he deliuered theſe words; I am borne vnhappily, becauſe I come to fore-tel that the King my Father ſhal looſe his Scepter, & that his Kingdome muſt be deſtroyed. At the ending of which words, the Childes life ended alſo. This accident (vndoubtedly) was verie dreadfull; and yet it ſeemeth to mee, rather as an Aduertiſement ſent from God, then any wonderfull woorke of Nature. Aſtrologers do tell vs, that the Child whoſe birth ſhal happen when Mercury is Lord of the Aſcendent and Orientall; hee will ſpeake much ſooner then anie other, who ſpeake not, but according vnto the ordinary courſe of Nature.

The ſtraunge wordes of a yong infant.

The opinion of aſtrologers

I remember likewiſe another matter, conformable to the caſe now in hand, to wit; that ſome haue helde opinion, That ſpeech is not a thing naturall to man, but is learned and gotten, as other Artes and Sciences are. Others hold directly, that our ſpeaking Naturally, is not a matter proper and peculiar to man only. The firſt, who are of the minde, that ſpeech is not a thing naturall, do labour to prooue it, in ſaying: That that ſtrength, which is naturally conuenient to one kind, ſhould be, and is as meet to all of the ſame kind. As wee may perceiue by barking in all Dogges, by Lowing or bellowing in all Bulles, Oxen, &c. and ſo (in like caſe) to al other kinds of Beaſts. And yet notwithſtanding, wee behold in men, that ſome ſpeake in one manner, and others quite contrary, ſo that they do not vnderſtand themſelues naturally; and therefore it ſeemeth, that ſpeech proceedeth rather from Art, then Nature.

Whither ſpeech be naturall to man, or no.

Againe, according to Pliny, there are ſome people that ſpeake not all, but their ſpeaking appeareth to be rather a kinde or forme of bellowing, then anie ſetled ſpeech; which neuer could ſo happen, if all men did ſpeake by the guift of nature, for, if it were ſo, then all men wold ſpeak in one and the ſame manner.

Plin. Lib. 6.

Now, as concerning the other opinion, in ſuch as ſay, that ſpeech is not perticulerly proper to man, they ground their iudgement on the Words of Lactantius Firmianus, who tels vs: That wee haue ſome parts, which ſeeme to vs, proper to men onely; and yet neuertheleſſe, the verie ſame are found to bee in other Creatures; as diuerſitie of voice in Birds, by the ſeuerall tunes wee heere diſcerne in one another; whereby we plainly perceiue, that they do vnderſtad each other, ſo that it can bee no otherwiſe, but as a meere forme of Language among them. Moreouer, they maintaine their argument vpon this ground, in that manie Parrats, Pies, Popingayes, and ſuch like Birds, are heard to ſpeake plainly.

That ſpeech is not proper to man onely

Birds do naturally vnderſtand one another.

But the truth of this matter is (albeit their opinions haue ſome apparance of veritie) that ſpeech is the guift of GOD only to man, not that he purchaſeth it by Art: but is proper and peculiar to him, and not to any other creature. True it is, that other Creatures haue voice, and yet notwithſtanding, they haue no Speech: and ſuch is the opinion of Quintilian, & likewiſe of Ariſtotle.

Speech, the guift of God, only to man.

Quintillian. Ariſtotle.

In like manner, wee haue good aunſweres to theſe contraty reaſons: As, to the firſt Argument we may well anſwere, That a thing may be Natural vniuerſally, but in perticuler, it may be exerciſed according to the will. It is naturallie euill done, and he deſerueth punithment for it, that killeth another man, or robbeth him of any of his goodes; and yet neuertheleſſe, to inflict one kind of correction or other (vpon him) for the offence, proceedeth from the will of the Iudge. Therfore, although that men do ſpeake diuers tongues, yet is it not to bee ſaid, that this their ſpeaking commeth from Nature. And ſo much the ſtronger is the Argument, that ſuch diuerſitie and confuſion of tongues, was for the punnithment of their pride, that laboured to builde the Tower of Babel: for, as we haue alreadie ſaid, there was then but one language in the world, which could be ſaid to be naturall.

Anſweres to the former argements.

Speech is not cauſed by nature.

And

The language of the Troglodytes.

And as for the Troglodites, who are are ſaid not to ſpeake at all, it is reputed, that this infirmity proceedeth, by reaſon that their tongue is ouermuch barbarous and imperfect, and they feele nothing, as it were, of humanity; and yet notwithſtanding, it is a kind of Language among them, whereby they ſeeme to vnderſtand one another. And whereas it is further ſaid, that there be diuers Birds that ſpeak,

Of Birds that ſpeake, a Parrat that could ſpeake all the Creed.

as the Parrat, whereof Lodouicus Cælius maketh mention, that belonged to Cardinall Aſcanius, which Parrat (in his preſence) pronounced (word by worde) all the Creed in Latine, without fayling in any one ſillable: We may lawfully anſwere, that this is no ſpeaking, for they knowe not what they ſay; but it is a certaine cuſtom taught them for many daies together, whereby to forme ſuch a voyce; but a true worde is conceyued in the ſoule, before it is pronounced, whereof Birdes haue no ſuch Capacitie.

The diuerſity of Voyces amongeſt all creatures.

And to that Argument, which implyeth, that wee knowe all creatures by the diuerſitie of their Voices, that they vnderſtand each other, and call one another amongſt themſelues: wee may not heereby inferre, that ſuch a Voyce is a word formed. For as Ariſtotle ſaith, the Voyce looſeth it ſelfe, and ſo can wee, (without any formed word) ſignifie and giue to be vnderſtoode, either ioy or diſcontent, and all vniuerſall paſsions: as wee ſee by the Voice, when it thus expreſſeth it ſelfe in laughter, & with pleaſure, or by ſighes and laments, in deepe ſorrow and anguiſh.

Obſeruations among beaſts and birds.

And for the reſpect of brute beaſtes, that haue difference either in their ſong or voice, and may be knowne when they are diſpleaſed or contented: and the like in Birds, either by motion of their winges, loftie flying, or ſome ſuch other ſign according to the effect: theſe are matters not incident to the caſe in queſtion. For to ſpeake and vtter wordes, whereby may perticulerly be expreſſed, profit, neceſsitie, harme, Mallice, Iuſtice, Iniuſtice, honeſtie, goodneſſe, and whereby alſo paſſed actions are deliuered, and forſight of them to come, by ſolide reaſons and words, in declaring themſelues, and other things are done, anſwerable to the benefit enſuing by ſpeech: this is a bleſſing beſtowed onely vpon man, euen as Hereditarie to him by Nature, & whereof no other Creature whatſoeuer, can any way be ſaide to ſtand in neede, or is ſo meete to merrite ſo gracious a benefite.

Man onely hath the benefit of ſpeaking.

CHAP. IX.

Of a Woman that was married manie times, And of a Man that had manie Wiues, and hapned at length to ioyne in marriage with that woman.

I Haue many times noted that the honor of Widdowes, vnder-went cõmon and publicke taxation, if they had beene married three or foure times. Now, albeit it ſeemeth exteriourly, that men had good reaſon for this detection; yet notwithſtanding, no man ought to iudge of another bodies ſecret Conſcience.

Widdowes often married, ſubiect to taxation.

Marriage, was firſt inſtituted in Paradiſe, and is allowed by the Church to be Sacred and Lawful; in which reſpect no man ſhould or ought vſe any reprehenſion againſt it. And yet wee muſt not denie, but that a Chaſt life, without ſubiection to marriage, is the more perfect eſtate, and is to bee elected as the better. Neuertheleſſe, the bounty of heauen diminiſheth no iot of eithers goodnes; but both eſtates are godly and commendable. If then a Widdow do marie, ſhe offendeth not God therein; and beſides, as concerning the World, it may very well be anſwered, that it is the ſmalleſt faulte ſhe can commit. And becauſe I would no way be miſtaken by the Reader, I will produce (vnto this purpoſe) what I haue read concerning a Widdow, and it is recorded by Saint Hierome: of whoſe Authoritie (I thinke) no one will make ſcruple, in regard of his Religion and great holineſſe.

A chaſt life is moſt cõmendable.

He ſaith, that in the time of Damaſus, he both ſaw and knew in Rome a woman, that had lawfully beene married to two and twenty ſeuerall men, and remaining a Widdowe, after the deceaſe of the two and twentith Husbande: there was a man came thither, that likewiſe hadde beene

A Widdow in Rome that had bin maried to 22 men.

A man that had bin married to twenty Wiues.

bin married to twenty Wiues, and was then a Widdower of the laſt, and both of them at freedome and libertie: which being vnderſtood to either, no difference in their degrees, but both of equal mean condition: they contracted Marriage together, which was a thing verie notable, and raiſed a generall deſire in the people of Rome, to ſee which of this ſtrange maried couple ſhould firſt die.

A Victorie of no mean moment.

It fortuned that the Woman firſt deceaſed, to whoſe obſequies, all the Roman people mainly flocked, to congratulate the Husbands happineſſe, as beeing victorious in no ſimple Conqueſt: ſetting a Crowne of Laurell vpon his heade, and placing him firſt in following the bodye of his Wife, bearing a branch of Palme in his hand, in ſigne of his victorie, and numberleſſe people accompanying him in his triumph.

Another Hiſtory reported by S. Ioome

The ſame holy Father, recounteth another matter very notable, which he ſetteth downe for truth, becauſe it was deliuered to him by ſuch as deſerued credit. The caſe concerneth a woman alſo, who to ſhewe her ſelfe ſome-what charitable, tooke a young Boy from verie poore parents, that had no releef but frō the Hoſpitall, intending to nouriſh the childe as if it were hir owne, feeding it at hir owne Table, and nightly lodging it in her bed. When the child had attained to x. yeares of age, the woman grew to be ſo incontinent, that ſhe woulds needes haue carnall knowledge of the Ladde, and that in ſuch manner, as at the terme of ſixe moneths, ſhe became quicke with Childe by him, contrary to the rule and order of nature, which neuer doth permit any ſuch conception at ten yeares of age. But, it rather ſeemeth that this happened by the permiſsion of God, to the end, that ſuch turpitude and diſhoneſty in a Woman, (vailed vnder pretence of charity) ſhould be apparantly diſcouered to the worlde. So that, although the other woman had married three and twenty ſeuerall times, yet are not we to iudge or conceite, that therein ſhe ſinned. For, I am perſwaded, that in being ſo oftentimes lawfully married, in publicke confirmation of the Church, and without any iuſt cauſe of contradiction: ſhe did much better then this other luſtfull lewd Woman, in committing ſuch a foule and inordinat ſinne; for which, no colour or excuſe can anie way be made: whereas, on the other ſide the ſaying of bleſſed Saint Paule ſtandeth in force: That it is better to marrie then to burne.

A ſtrange kind of conceiuing with childe.

CHAP. X.

The ſtrange fortune which happened to two Princes of Caſtile.

Sudden conceits very powerfull on the life of man.

THE power of ſodain conceite, or immediate apprehenſion of ſome inward diſlike, is knowne to bee of ſuch ſtrong impreſsiō; that it is able to be the death of man or Woman, and vnto this purpoſe tendeth our preſent diſcourſe. Don Alphonſo, eleauenth of that name, who was Father to Don Peter, hauing finiſhed his raigne in Caſtile, left his Sonne Don Peter, a verie young King: In which regard, the kingdome was gouerned by two Princes of the Countrey (who were Vnckles to the King, the one named Don Peter, and the other Don Iohn) and likewiſe by Queene Mary, that was his Grand-mother.

Don Peter, and Don Iohn, Vnckles to the yong King.

In the yeare one thouſand three hundred and ſixteen, theſe two Princes, who were Vnkle and Nephew, hauing manie times (like valiant and worthy men) made warre vppon the Moores, for exaltation of the Chriſtian Faith, and returned with famous Victories, as well approued and vndaunted Captaines: concluded togither to make Warre on the kingdome of Granado, with purpoſed ſpoyles & dammages on the Countreyes belonging to the Moores; hauing ioyned with the Alcantara and Galatrana, Great Maiſters of Saint Iames in Galicia, and the Arch-byſhop of Toledo.

Warre made vppon the Kingdome of Granado againſt the Moores.

The buſineſſe being growne to full effect, and great numbers both of horſſe and foot aſſembled, they began to inuade the Country, and ſped ſo well in the aduenture: that (with very ſucceſſefull fortune) they came before Granado, where they fought valiantly, and ſurprized diuers Caſtels, among which, was that named Iliora.

When fitting time for retirement cam, they returned backe againe by the Chriſtians Countrey, and marching in good order, order; Don Peter was in the Vant-garde, and the Lord Don Iohn in the Rereward, wher he was suddenly charged by a huge multitude of Moores, that had assembled themselues frō all parts, and their assault was so furious, as he was constrained to send to Don Peter, to leaue his leading, & to come to his assistance in the Arriere. Don Peter verie gladly yeelded thereto, and marching back with admirable courage: founde his men to bee so daunted and weakened with dismay, as by no meanes possible, could he cause them to returne with him. By meanes whereof, he entered into such a sudden alteration and conceiued displeasure, that albeit he contended woorthily to essay a fresh march vppon the enemie, inciting both his horse and foot thereto, and by no reason could preuaile; hee drew foorth his sword, and smote some, thereby to terrifie the rest, and that terror might make them become obedient. But all prouing in vaine, his trouble in minde was so excessiue, that perceiuing he could no way helpe his Vnkle, he was no longer able to manage his sworde, but speech presently forsooke him, & vnderstanding likewise, so that he fell downe from his horse dead to the ground, without either stirring or speaking one word.

Don Peter, and Don Iohn, wer sharply assilted by the Moores, in their returning backe.

Don Peters soldiers wonderfully danted.

The strange and sodaine death of Don Peter.

This wofull accident, was (by some) too speedily reported vnto Prince Iohn, who fought manfully against the Moors, and had (in a manner) quite vanquished them. When he vnderstood the occasion of his Nephews sudden death; as suddenly likewise entred he into an extream passion, and gaue outward testimonie of such a violent inward alteration, that he fell also from his horse, losing the strēgth and vigor of all his members, and neuer after could vtter one word, so that he was taken vp by his people, and kept (in that strange maner) from midday to the Euening. In which time, the Moores being ignorant of these seuerall mishaps, were put to flight by the Christians: who marching onward in forme of battaile, at the instant, as the body of Don Peter was laid vppon an horse, Prince Iohn gaue vp his latest gaspe. These accidents were verie remarkeable, and the like very seldome heard of: whereby plainely appeareth, that sudden conceit may cause the death of a man.

The violent apprehension in Prince Iohn of his Nephewes death

¶ The strange and variable complexions of two Philosophers: the one of them weeping, and the other laughing, at the gouernment & condition of the world.

IN the recitall made by Diogenes Laertius, concerning the liues & diuersity of Philosphers: he speaketh perticulerly of two; the one being named Heraclitus, and the other Democritus, because each of them was in Nature and Complexion verie strange. Heraclitus obserued (as a common Custome) that alwayes as hee walked along the streetes and publicke passages, hee would weepe and shedde abundance of teares, in regard of the compasion hee had on humaine Nature. For, hee was absolutely perswaded, that all our life time, consisted in nothing but miserie, & that all the trauailes, labours, and endeauers of men, seemed worthy both of pittie and compasion, both in their paines and afflictions, as also for the sins by thē daily committed. This is much better, and more amply described, in a letter sent by this Philosopher to King Darius, according as our fore-named Diogenes Laertius reporteth, and in these very words. All men that walke vpon the earth, are verie farre off from Iustice: for they serue Auarice and Vaine glory, with too much affection and losse of time. As for my selfe, I neuer thought any euill thing; and to the end that I might shunne the paine, which I feele by beholding and knowing these thinges: I haue euermore beene desirous, that I might containe my selfe in some such place, where I might neuer looke on men, because I can sufficiently content my selfe with that which is onely necessary for me. We read of this Philosopher, that (in all things) he was conformable to this perswasion. For he liued the very greatest part of his time in solitude, and in the fields, contenting himselfe with hearbs and food of slender substance. All the while he was yong, he said he knew nothing; and when hee attained to greater growth, he saide, hee knew all things, and that nothing els had bin beene his enstructer, but contemplation onely.

The strange Nature of Democritus.

The Complexion of Democritus was no lesse strange then this mans. For, although he would leaue his lodging, and frequent mens companies, yet would he laugh immeasurably at al the actions and behauiours of men, tearming the life of man to bee vanity and folly, and that all appetites and desires, were foolish, true subiects to such Masters, and meere matter of laughter. And such was the immagination of this Phylosopher, that it was only enough for him, to go laughing along the streets, as the other went weeping: and considering the paines and trauails of men, it seemeth that ech of them had reason sufficient to do as they did.

Senec. in lib. de Tranq. Vit.

Seneca in his Booke of the Tranquility of life, speaketh of these two Philosophers, approuing rather the Opinion of laughing Democritus, and adoising to immitate his merrie humour, rather then that of weeping Heraclitus. And it apeareth, that Iuvenal was of the same mind, when speaking of them both, hee sayeth,

The words of Iuvenal.

That he was amazed, whence and how Heraclitus could receiue so great quantitie of moisture, as satisfied his liberall expence of teares.

And to speake truly of both these follies (for I hold these two complexions to be no otherwise) that of Democritus is allowed for the better, because wee read that he was a man taking no dislike at any thing whatsoeuer, and liued an 109 yeares. I find of him, that he vsed verie often to feed on Hony, and beeing on a time, demanded whither it were good to preserue the health of man or no, he answered; These are only fittest for mans Health, Hony taken inwardly, and Oyle outwardlie, giuing thereby to vnderstand, that Hony was good for feeding, and Oyle for annointing.

Concerning Hony & oile.

Laertius reporteth many thinges of him, whereby is euidently discernd, how great his knowledge was in naturall thinges. He saith that one day among others, a messe of milke was brought him, & after he had looked on the Milke, he saide; This Milke is of a Goat that hath had young ones, & this is the first time of her Kidding, and indeed it was so. Another time, hee met a yong maid vpon the way, and with doing reuerence to hir, he said; God blesse ye Maid. Meeting her againe on the next day following, he made no reuerence to hir, but said; Farewell Woman. Such as had heard these seueral salutations, greatly merualled thereat, and gathered thereby, that thee had companed that night with a man, which Democritus knewe to be true, onely by the Womans countenance. Tertullian likewise telleth vs, that this Democritus did put out both his eies, because he would not bee tempted with carnall concupiscences, which ordinarily are occasioned by the sight of weomen. But Aulus Gellius saith, that he did it only the better to addict himselfe to the contemplation of natural thinges, for which, this Phylosopher was very highly commended by the learned.

The great iudgement of Democritus, in natural thinges.

Tertul. in Apol. Cap. vlt. Aulus Gellius.

Cicero writeth the like of him, so doth Pliny, and many others. Pliny reporteth in diuers places, that hee was a great Astrologer, and a Magitian, and that to learne al the Arts, and practise them among the skilfull; he trauailed through all Asia, Arabia, Egypt, and many other Prouinces. And Solinus maketh mention of his disputations against Magitians. Concerning mine owne opinion of this man, I will conclude further speech of him, with a matter merualous, and not to be omitted, to wit; that by the means of naturall light only, he sought for and beleeued the immortality of the soule, and the resurrection of all the dead, in which contemplation, and many other of like quality, he spent the length of life before remembered.

Neuertheless, he wrote Books of great Learning, but so difficult and obscure, as few attained truly to vnderstande them: which is a fault wherein many great persons haue sinned, only thorow presumption and arroganey.

CHAP. XII.

Of ſome perticuler notable occaſions, which haue happened in one and the ſame maner, and rather in one place more then in another.

THoſe things whereof wee haue ſpoken in our precedent Chapter, may vvell cauſe great meruaile in the conſideration of men, whoſe Conditions and Opinions haue beene ſo extreamely eſtraunged from one another; that the verie ſame thing, which hath made one man to weepe inceſſantly, hath cauſed another to Laugh without any intermiſsion. It is likewiſe a matter well woorthy of Contemplation, to obſerue, that in ſuch rarietie of humaine occaſions: and amongeſt ſo many of diuers difference, ſom are found that do ſeeme as if they were meerly conſtrained, and that it ought vppon neceſsity, that (in ſome places) aduentures ſhold perticulerly happen, as we ſhall diſcerne by our enſuing diſcourſe.

Extreamitie in both kinds.

Variety of humaine accidents.

First of all, it was a matter very admirable (as wee haue alreadie ſaide) concerning the Cittie of Conſtantinople, to witte; That the firſt Emperour which builded it, and made his abiding there, ſhould bee named Conſtantine, and his Mother Helena. In like manner afterwarde, that the laſt Emperor there raigning, and during whoſe time the Cittie was loſt, ſhoulde bee called Conſtantine, and his Mother alſo named Helena.

Concerning the Citty of Conſtantinople.

It deſerueth likewiſe due conſideration, that there ſhould be two ſuch moſt Valiaunt men, as were Hercules & Sampſon, and that both of them began their great deedes of Armes, with each mans encountering of a Lyon, and both of them deceyued and vndoone by Weomen, euen as if the one were obliged to the others Fortune. It is yet a matter more notable, that in Arabia, ſur-named Happie, Cham the Sonne of Noah, and his Succeſſours, ſhould forſake the Adoration of the true GOD, to vndergo the Idolatrie of Men. And that in the ſame Prouince alſo, after ſo great and long reuolutions of yeares, ſhoulde bee bred and borne Mahomet, the perſecuter of the true Faith and Doctrine giuen by our Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt, God and Man.

Of Sampſon and Hercules.

Of Cham and Mahomet.

The Cittie of Carthage, a moſt powerfull Common-Wealth, had ſo manie ſeuerall forces in Armes, that no King or Captaine could reſiſt againſt it. And yet notwithſtanding, it was two ſeuerall times vanquiſhed by two Romaine Captaines, both bearing one name, and called Scipios; ſo that it ſeemed, in that verie name conſiſted the power of Conqueſt.

Of the Cittie of Carthage.

It is likewiſe verie remarkeable, in the Hiſtorie of the Byſhops of Rome, that al the Popes which bare the name of Alexander, were all Anti-popes, and that (in their times) grew the Sciſmes in the Church, as in the time of Alexander the ſecond, third, fift, ſixt, &c. Another meruailous matter was noted in Spaine, that commonly all the Kings which were named Ferdinands or Alphonſus, were very good and excellent Kinges. Cæſar and Pompey were two Captains of Rome, very famous and moſt puiſant, great enemies and competitors one againſt another: yet it happened, that they both died on their very Birth-dayes, yea violent kindes of death, and by weapons. As worthy warriors likewiſe were Hannibal of Carthage, King Phillip, Father to Alexander, King Antigonus, Father to Demetrius, Sertorius the Romaine, Viriatus the Spaniard, and in our time, Fredericke Duke of Vrbine, and diuers others beſide, reſembling one another in behauiour and Regiment of Warre; but in one thing, they were all truly equal, to wit, they halted euery one vpon one and the ſame leg, and each man loſt his left eye by misfortune. The Emperour Charles the fift, was borne on the day of S. Mathias the Apoſtle, on which day alſo (in courſe of his life) vvas King Fraunces taken by him in battaile, and the victory likewiſe woonne at Biccoque: Hee was alſo elected and Crowned Emperour on the ſame day, and many other great Fortunes befell him ſtill vpon that day.

actions, do obserue perticuler dayes and names, wherein to beginne or vndertake their purposed businesse: neuertheless, seeing that such things haue formerly bin considered and read of, I make the lesse account of their humour. It hath beene noted, that not onely the French, but som others Nations beside, do holde diuerse dayes to be vnfortunate, and that no respect in the world whatsoeuer, can cause them then to vndertake any fight or combate, because vpon those daies) commonly some great mis-fortunes haue befalne them. And yet they esteeme some other dayes, to haue a kinde of happinesse attending on them, because that on them no losse or euill mischaunce hath happened to them. All these things may wel vrge amazement, in regard that the causes are vnknowne to vs, albeit neuer so good a rule or reason may therto induce vs: such secrets are only known to God, and such hath beene, and is his appointment. Of Accidents that haue hapned, and actions of notable successe (ensuing by one and the same meanes) both vnto the Romaines and Graecians, Plutarch hath Written a Treatise called his Paralelle, wherein hee alledgeth manie excellent examples, which the curious Searchers of Nouelties, may there reade more at large.

A wonderfull secret in Nature.

Occasion doth heere freelie offer it selfe, to make mention of some perticuler persons, that haue (in figure & gesture) beene alike and semblable each to other. And indeed, it is one of the greatest secrets and wonders in Nature, to behold such an infinit number of men, the varietie of their gestures, and all hauing one kind of forme: ye t notwithstanding, it seemeth a matter of much more meruaile, when (in such a variable multitude) scarsly but two men can be culd out, that do truly resemble in all parts each other. Of which two seuerall matters, wee will relate the causes natural, after we haue first produced example of some, that haue held true and perfect resemblance vnto apparant Iudgement.

Plin. l. b. 4. Solinus in Polihist. Valerius Maximus.

First of all then, we will speake of one named Arthemius, who liued in the court of Antiochus King of Syria, being (according to Pliny and Solinus) but of meane condition, albeit Valerius Maximus affirmeth, that hee was Kinsman vnto the King, and resembled him so truelie, that the Queen (hauing murtherd Antiochus) concealed her Wicked Act by the meanes of this Arthemius, whom the had acquainted with hir purpose diuerse dayes before: Arthemius, was laide in the Kings bed, as if he had beene the Queens sickly Husband, for so shee then called him, and so was he reputed to bee, being visited by all the Princes of the kingdom, euen as if it had beene the King himselfe. Thus vnder shew and supposition of the King, hee made a Will, and named (as heire to the Kingdom) such an one as the Queene had determined: wherein hee was obeyed, for euerie one tooke him to be the true King indeed, which was a verie straunge and admirable deceipt. But (to this purpose, the aduenture of Queen Semiramis is much more notorious, of whom so many commendable Authors haue Written memorable actions. Iustine, and diuers others say, that hir sonne Ninus resembled her so perfectly, both in speech, gesture and disposition of body, that after the death of the King her husband, she cloathed her selfe in the habite of a man, and representing the person of her Sonne, held and gouerned the kingdome for the space of forty yeares, with absolute beleefe generally, that shee was her sonne Ninus, whom she so neere resembled, that in this maner was the State abused. In the time of Pompey, there were two men in Rome, the one named Biblius, and the other Publicius, who wer both so like to Pompey, as if there had bin no other difference, then in the plain figure, it was very difficult (as Pliny reporteth) to know which of them was Pompey or no, and euery man supposed, that this resemblance cam from the father to the son by succession. In the time of Pompeyes father, there was in Rome a Cooke, called Menogenes, that so liuely resembled him, as (for that very cause) the people imposed the name of the one vpon the other; and this is assured for trueth, both by Pliny and Solinus.

Two infant Slaues broght to Rome, and bought of Turannius by Marke Anthony.

There was one likewise, named Turannius, that brought two Infant Slaues to Rome, of equality in age, and they both (in gesture and all other thinges) were of such resemblaunce, that people went to see them as a matter of meruell. Turannus also saide, That they were Twin-brethren by birth, but it was false; for the one was of Asia, and the other of Allemaigne. In regard of their so neere likenesse to each other, Marke Anthonie, Cozen vnto the great Octauius, bought them. But after hee had intelligence of the Deceite, and that they were not Naturall borne-Brethren: hee sent for the seller of them, and tolde him, that hee must restore the monie backe (which was a great summe) because hee had beguiled him, in making him beleeue that the Slaues were Twin-borne Brethren. But Turannius (very cunningly) auoyded repayment of the Money, in replying, that (in this respect) hee ought to haue a farre greater summe paide him; considering, that it was a matter of more meruaile, that the two Infants (being borne in diuers Nations) shoulde haue such a perfect resemblance, as if they had beene borne vpon one selfe-same day, and of one Mother. Which defence, was well accepted by Marke Anthony, the reason appearing to be sound and good, and therfore he held himselfe well contented.

The cunning answere of Turannius.

A pleasant accident happening to the Emperour Octauius.

Concerning this case of so meere resemblance, a matter of pretty merriment happened vnto the Emperour Octauius. There chanced a young Ladde to come and dwell in Rome, who had the feature of his face and bodie; so absolute in likenesse vnto the Emperour Octauius, that no man in Rome could discerne anie difference. This being brought vnto the Emperours knowledge, hee foorthwith sent for the youth, and then the portrait of each other was more apparantly discouered. Which when the Emperour hadde well noted, hee being a man verie affable, pleasantly disposed, and mooued (with the least occasion) to mirth, he saide to the young man, Tell me Brother, did thy Mother vse at anie time to come to Rome? As inferring thereby, that then his Father might haue knowledge of hir. The youth perceiuing the facetious and pleasant humour of the Emperour, replyed to him in as merrie a Disposition, with these Wordes: My LORDE, concerning my Mother, shee neuer came vnto Rome, but my Father resorted hither many times.

A witty and merry answer made to the Emperour.

Plin Lib. 17. Of Surras the Proconsull, and a Fisherman.

Pliny writeth of a man, named Surras, Pro-Consull to Sylla, and borne in Sicily, to whom, there was a Fisherman of verie neere likenesse, both in speeche and behauiour, for they both stammered in equall manner, and fashioned all their actions in one forme: so that when they were cloathed alike, it was impossible to make any distinction, neither could anie man directly say, this is the Pro-consull, and this the Fisherman; which was no meane meruell to the people. And yet Albertus Magnus, in his booke of beasts, declareth a much stranger matter. Hee saith, that he both knewe and behelde in Allemaigne, two Infant Twinnes, who resembled each other so truly, that when they were seperated assunder, the one could not bee discerned from the other. Moreouer, beside their iesture and actions, they had such a conformitie in all things els, as the one could not liue without the other. So that when they were sometimes for triall sundered, they indured verie straunge Agonies. They spake both alike in sounde of voice, and when the one was sicke, so was the other likewise: whereby plainly appeard that they were two bodies formed of one Nature and complexion. For my iudgement in this case, I say, that this likenes must needs proceed, that they were both begotten in one instant, of one and the same matter strongly disposed: by reason whereof, all parts were equally and perfectly conditioned. S. Augustine, in his Booke of the Cittie of GOD, reporteth the verie like Story. And although these thinges doth seeme verie maruellous, yet may we not scornfully seeke to discredit them, in regard of Natures powerfull working, and vndoubted Authority of such as confirm them. For, we could speake of matters more lately happening, yea, euen in our times; as of the Lord Count Iohn Giron, who so absolutely resembled his brother, the Great Maister of Calatraua, that was slaine by the Moores, that by their owne rents and houshold seruants, they were equally taken the one for the other. I remember that I haue read in the Historie of the Dukes of Millaine, that Fraunces Sforza (of whom somwhat hath bin saide already) had among his warlicke troops, a Gentleman belonging to the company of his Light-horse-men, that was of such perfect resemblance vnto the Duke himselfe; as he was verie often both taken for him, and called by the name of Duke. I could alledge many other examples, which I am forced to forbeare, because I would not willingly offend anie Reader: wherefore, I will speake of the occasion of such neere resemblance, wherof I find three principall, that (according to their degrees and places) shall speak for themselues.

Of Francis Sforza Duke of Millaine.

Three occasions of neere resemblance.

The first is, that nature euermore trauaileth and striueth, to make the best Workemanship that possibly shee can; and this reason is helde by all Naturall Philosophers. Hence it proceedeth, that she essayeth to make the Male childe, rather then the female, and to fashion him more like the Father, then the Mother; in imitation of the Painter, that portraiteth one thing (according to Nature) by another. Now, if Nature be noted sometime to faile heerein, wholly, or in part, it is alwaies by defect and debilitie in the matter: For, when a man hath not sufficient perfection in him to procreat, then is he said to forme a female childe. Likewise, concerning the gesture and figure, when that Vertue which makes the form (which the Philosophers call the Vertue informatiue) is most strong and powerfull in the partes of man: the childe doth then more resemble the Father, then the Mother. But when (in this Vertue) there happeneth some indisposition and defailance in strength, and that the Vertue and power of the Woman prooueth to be the stronger, the Child dooth then resemble the Mother. There are some other causes beside, whereof wee shall speake heereafter; and principally (in this case) the good or euill disposition in the matter of the parties generatiue, is much auaileable.

The first reason of natures working, in male or female.

Concerning gesture and figure.

Of the parties patient and agent in their seuerall vertues.

In the first place, it behoooueth, that the Woman should be as the partie patient or suffering, and the man as the Agent which maketh the worke, because that (according to the disposition) nature busieth hir selfe in the similitude, and frameth not only the vertue of the Paternall or Maternall party, in the likenesse of gesture, and of the members: but likewise in the complexion, disposition, strength, and (beside) in some passions, diseases, & other things. As wee may and do manie times obserue, that the Sonnes of Baldeheaded men, doe likewise become balde themselues, & deaf mens sons, are deaf also.

Very often (in like manner) as Galen affirmeth, the Sonnes do becom heires to their diseases, as to the Gout, the dropsy, Palsie, falling sicknes, &c. Aurcen addeth Leprosie, Tisicke, and Melancholy also. And that which is yet much more admirable, Nature, in meer deceiuing hir self, doth giue sometimes to Children, such hurts and woundes, as their fathers haue formerly receiued; which is plainly to declare, that shee continually laboureth to make true likenes. Columella maintaineth the same argument, and so doth Pliny the yonger likewise, in an Epistle which hee wrote; where speaking of the wife to Cornelius, he saith; That she died of the gout, which was the disease of hir father, & of all his linage. This Author further saith, that infirmities discend from the father to the son, and oftentimes from children to children: as it happed to Nicetus the Poet, borne in Constantinople, of whō Pliny writeth, that his Father & Mother being white, yet he was borne blacke, because that his Grandfather (by the mothers side) was black. These accidents we daily behold by proofe, in horses & other creatures, that doe resemble their Sires most of al, not only in colour, but also in greatnes and disposition. This is the reason of Aristotle, and of Empedocles, as also of Albertus Magnus. In this maner is formed the variety of gestures in men, the disposition and shape of their members, according to them of father and mother, euen then in the generatiue action.

Sonnes do grow as Heires to their Fathers infirmities.

Natures endeauour in forming likenesse.

Aristotle. Empedocles. Albertus Magnus.

The second reason, is likewise deriued from Aristotle and Plinie, and they say, That it is the immagination of the Father, euen in the instant, and likewise the present affection or passion then wworking in the soule. For, sight, or present immagination, is greatly auayling in this case, and is a most strong occasion, being ioyned to the former; because the Father or the mother then thinking on som beauty, it is a great ocasio of begetting a beautiful

Childe, and forming it anſwerable to the immagined ſubiect. And becauſe it many times hapneth, that Fathers haue diuers immaginations; they do likewiſe engender diuerſitie and difference of geſtures, ſo that the Infant will reſemble diuers perſons. And this matter is reputed of ſuch importance, that Empedocles ſaieth, Some Women haue beene noted, that they haue conceiued, and beene deliuered of Children, that haue reſembled Statues, Figures, and Pictures, that hung in the chambers, at the time of their conception. That this hath hapned in Beaſtes, is ſufficiently probable in the Hiſtory of Iacob, who layed the pilled rods (being White and Blacke) in thoſe places where the flockes conceyued, by meanes whereof, partie coloured Lambes were alſo engendered. And it is further to bee obſerued, that not onely this immagination hath power on the Corporall Members; but likewiſe on the Soules of Children. In regarde whereof, Naturall Phyloſophers haue aduiſed, that when a man is angry, or Melancholy, or Drunke, he ſhoulde not companie with his Wife: Becauſe (commonly) Children are of the ſame Complexion, wherein the Father was, at the generatiue action. And yet, it hath oftentimes come to paſſe, that a merrie-hearted Father, and deliberate of Nature, hath gotten a Melancholly Childe.

Aduiſe of naturall Phyloſophers.

To this purpoſe, Alexander Aphrodiſeus declareth a verie notable thing; that (manie times) Baſtard Children, begotten in Adulterie, are wicked and vicious, in regard of the bad immagination, and fearefull terrour, wherein their Fathers were at the time of their begetting. From the verie ſame reaſon, may an anſwere be framed to the caſe following. For, if it bee demanded, whence commeth it, that among men onely, there is ſo great diuerſitie in figure? Ariſtotle replyeth, it is, becauſe that Beaſtes haue no Cares, Thoughtes, or Immaginations, but onely in their preſent Action: whereas (on the contrarie) men haue their thoughts in many places, and on diuerſitie of thinges; whereby enſueth, that manie children are borne, which neither reſemble the father or mother.

Alexan. Aphroſ. concerning Baſtard children.

Ariſtotle giueth (almoſt) the ſame anſwere vnto the Queſtion propounded: Wherefore are fooliſh Children begotten by Wiſe Fathers? Hee ſaith, That men which know little (as wee haue formerly ſpoken of Beaſtes) are very intentiue in the generatiue acte: by meanes whereof, the matter being diſpoſed, and without any alteration, children are then borne perfect, becauſe nature (in the verie ſame inſtant) was buſied about no other occaſions. But in wiſe and learned men, it doth not alwayes ſo fall out: becauſe they (commonly) hauing their ſpirits more ſubtle and penetratiue, haue alſo their thoughts otherwiſe buſied moſt part of the time, which is a great hinderance, when the power is not wholy imployed in the action. From whence it proceedeth, that the matter being not perfectly diſpoſed; Nature coulde not perfectly perfourme her Workemanſhip.

Ariſtotles anſwer why wiſe Fathers doe beget fooliſh Children.

The third reaſon, rendered for aunſwere to this doubt, is from Aſtrologye cauſed by influence of the Stars, according vnto the opinion deliuered by Ptolomie. For, by the diſpoſition of heauen, and the ſigne or Image aſcendant, & the Aſpects which the Planets haue, both in the Conception and Birth of man: the manners and Naturall diſpoſition are infuſed, rendering themſelues ſemblable or different to the Father, according to the proportion and conformitie of the Father, or of the Childe, at the time of Generation. Wee might heere rehearſe the Influences of theſe Plannets, by their ſeuerall proprieties, but it would require too long a time: Beſides, Ptolomie hath ſpoken thereof ſufficiently; ſo hath Iulius Firmicus, Haly ben Raſel, Guy, Bonatus, and others: And the reaſon is ſo ſtrong, as it cannot bee denied; Conſidering and perceyuing the Influxion and power, which the Superiour Bodies haue ouer the Inferiour, with their Effects.

The 3. reaſon deriued from Aſtrology.

Now, in regard that this enſueth by motion or agitation, which is the cauſe of generation and corruption, and is that which firſt diſpoſeth the matter, and afterwardes formeth it: it followeth, that as the motion of time dooth neuer ceaſe, and that there are diuers times, and diuers Motions. And beſides (as wee haue alreadie ſayde, that they haue diuers Natures; euen ſo, the matter diſpoſeth it ſelfe diuerſly: and cauſeth variable actions and diſpoſitions in the creatures, ſome-ſometimes reſembling one another, according to the conformity that was in Heauen, and in the one time, and in the other. Likewiſe, ſometimes theſe cauſes and occaſions are occurrent all together. Sometimes, one, or two: And (very often) the one proueth contrary to the other, from whence enſueth ſuch diuers effectes, which daily offer themſelues to our view. By the very ſame occaſions, wee may eaſily diſcerne, whence it commeth, that goodly Children are begotten by deformed and vgly Fathers, and likewiſe the contrary: wherein there can nothing elſe bee alleadged, but the good or bad diſpoſition of the matter, and the imagination of the parties agent and ſuffrant, with the Celeſtiall influence at the inſtant, all which we haue deliuered to be doubtfull, according as other things are of the like nature.

Of a very ſtrange and memorable fortune, which happened in one kinde, though at ſundry times, to two Knights of Rome.

THe chiefe men in the conſpiracy for the death of Iulius Cæſar (according as Plutarch and others haue declared) were Brutus and Caſſius, who afterward (with their Adherents) were proſecuted, and proclaimed open Enemies to the people of Rome, by Octauius, Lepidus, and Marke Anthonie, that had gotten poſſeſſion of the Citty. Among the complices of Brutus and Caſſius, Marcus Varro was a principall man, who (beeing preſent in the battaile, which Octauius and Marke Anthonie had againſt the conſpiratours, and when Octauius was the Conquerour) for ſafegard of his life, and eſcape of apprehenſion, chaunged his habite with a poore Souldier, and appearing as one of the common Priſoners, was rancked among them, and ſold (in confuſed manner) as the reſt were. It was his happe to be bought by a Romaine Knight, named Barbulas, who (within ſome while after) ſeeing his faire demeanor, and honeſt carriage of life, began to ſuſpect, that he was a Romaine borne; albeit, he conectured the ſame by no other relation. To be reſolued in this doubt, he tooke him (one daie) aſide, and inſtantly entreated him, to tell him of whence, and what he was, promiſing him withall, to purſue his pardon to Octauius and Marke Anthonie. But Marcus Varro, diſſembling ſtill his aduerſe fortune, by no meanes would diſcloſe himſelfe: ſo that Barbulas altered his former opinion, and perſwaded himſelfe, that he was no Roman, according as his iudgement had before imagined. Soone after, Octauius and Marke Anthony returned to Rome, and Barbulas alſo with his Slaue, who (perhaps) was a better man then himſelfe.

Marcus Varro not to be diſcouered.

It fortuned afterward, that Marcus Varro being at the Senate-doore, attending for his Maiſter, that ſtayed within vpon ſome vrgent buſines: was known by a Romaine, that preſently aduertiſed Barbulas thereof. Barbulas, not ſeeming to know any ſuch matter, and vſing no further ſpeech thereof; ſo labored with Octauius (who gouerned then in Rome) that he obtained his pardon, by meanes whereof, Varro enioyed his liberty, and being brought to Octauius, hee was honourable entertained, and thenceforward reſpected in the number of his friends.

Marcus diſcouered by a Romaine, and ſet at liberty.

Within a while after, Octauius and Marke Anthony fell at diſcord and variance, & Barbulas taking part with Mark Anthonie (who was vanquiſhed in the triall of fight) grew to bee doubtfull of Octauius, and made his recourſe to the ſame remedy, as formerly Marcus Varro was forced to vndergoe, by changing his habite, and feigning himſelfe to bee another. Marcus Varro not knowing him, by ſome length of time ſince laſt he ſaw him, but eſpecially by the pouerty of his habite; bought him in like manner as himſelfe had been. But comming afterward to knowledge of him, he wrought ſo with Octauius, that his offence was pardoned, and hee ſet at libertie. So that, in ſatisfying what he ſtood bound to doe, and repaying the kindneſſe which he had formerly receiued: hee left a liuely example to vs; of the inconſtancy of our liues beſt condition, with a rule and inſtruction to all men,

CHAP. XV.

The Ages of Man seuerally distinguished, according the enstructions of Astrologers.

BY common deuision of Astrologers, Arabians, Chaldeans, Greekes, and Latines, and perticularly by Proclus, a Greek Authour, Ptolomie and Haly ben Razell; the life time of man is diuided into seauen Ages, ouer each one of which Ages, one of the seauen Planets is said to rule and gouerne. The first Age is called Infancy, containing the space of foure yeares, during which time, the neereſt Planet to the Earth hath Dominion, that is the Moone, becauſe the qualities of Infancy hath vrged men to say; that the influence of this Planet is wholelie conformable to this Age, wherein the body is humide, tender, weake, moueable, and altogether like vnto the Moone. For the very leaſt matter causeth alteration, his members (by the ſmalleſt Trauaile) is weakned, and the body (in little time) encreaſeth, euen plainely to bee diſcerned by the eye. Theſe thinges doe happen generally in all perſons, by reaſon of the Moones gouernment, neuertheleſſe, more in ſome then in others, and not equally alike; in regard, that other particular qualities, which hold no ſubſiſtance of the Moone, doe receiue their originall, in manner as the Childe commeth into the World, according to the eſtate and diſpoſition of other Plannets.

Mans life time deuided into ſeauen Ages.

Infancy the firſt Age.

The Moone gouerneth the firſt Age of Infancy.

The ſecond Age continueth tenne yeares, vntill he attaine to the yeares of foureteene: this Age is called by the Latines Pueritia, or Child-hood, which giueth a ceſſation to Infancy, and proceedeth on toward adoloſencie. In this Age raigneth another Planet, named Mercury, ſeated in the ſecond Heauen. This is a Celeſtiall body, apt and eaſie to change, being good with the good, and bad by the aſpect of euill. During this time, nature compoſeth it ſelfe, according to the quality of this Planet. For then doe young Children declare ſome principles, whereby to make relation of their Spirits: bee it in reading, writing, or ſinging, then are they docible and tractable, and yet notwithſtanding, light in their ſpeeches, inconſtant and mutable.

The ſecond Age, is called Child-hood.

Mercury gouerneth the ſecond Age.

The third Age, conſiſteth of eyght yeares, being named by our Auncients Adoleſcencie, or Youth-hood, and it laſteth from foureteene, till two and twenty yeares be fully compleate: during which time, the third Planet, called Venus ruleth. For a man then beginneth to be prompt by Nature, powerfull, and able for procreation: as enclining to loue, to Women, and addicted to Muſicke, ſports, pleaſures, bankets, and other worldly delights. This is to be vnderſtood, of naturall prouocations in Man to any of theſe; for, hauing loſt the benefit of his own free will and election, hee leaueth or taketh ſuch inclinations by influences. And yet wee are to know, that neither the force of the Planets, nor power of the Starres, hath priuiledge on the liberty of the Soule; although they incline the ſenſitiue appetite, the members and Organs in the body of man.

The third age is cald youth-hood.

Venus gouerneth the third Age.

Naturall prouocations in man.

The fourth Age paceth on, vntill a Man haue accompliſhed two and fortie yeares, & is tearmed young man-hood, the courſe whereof continueth nineteene yeares; and hath Soll the Sunne for Gouernour and Commaunder, which is in the fourth Heauen, called by moſt ancient Aſtrologians, the fountaine of light, the principall eye of the whole World, King of the Planets, and hart of the wide vniuerſe. In like manner, this Age is Prince of all other, and the floure of life, during which time, the faculties and powers of the body & of the Spirit, doe acquire and attaine to their ſtrength, and man beeing then apprehenſiue, bold, and hardy; knoweth how to order and diſpoſe of his owne affaires. He then deſireth and purchaſeth Treaſures, he coueteth to be excellent, and well famed, and is ſtill enclined enclined to well doing. Briefely, in all thinges generall, he delareth apparantly, that the Sunne raigneth ouer him.

The fift Age is ripe manhood.

The fift Age, named Mature Manhood, hath (according to the said Authours) fifteene yeares of continuance, and therefore makes his Prograce so farre as six and fifty yeares, being subiect to the Planet Mars, which (of it selfe) is euill, dangerous, and hot, enclining men to Auarice, and making them chollericke, sickly; yet temperate in eating and drinking, and constant in their actions.

Mars gouerneth the fift Age.

The sixt Age is Old Age.

Afterward, in adding twelue to fiftie sixe, you shall make vp sixty eight years, which reach to the end of the sixt Age, and is called Old Age, whereof Iupiter is the great Gouernour. This is a Noble Planet, the signifier of Equity, Religion, Piety, Temperance, and Chastitie; prouoking men to finish al pains and hazzards, and seeke quiet repose. In this time, men addict themselues to holy works, affecting Temperance and Charitie, desiring honour, accompanied with due praise; they are honest, fearefull of shame, disgrace, and reproach.

Iupiter ruleth the sixt Age.

The seauenth Age is decrepite Age.

The seauenth and last of these seuen Ages, is limitted from sixty eight years, so farre as fourescore and eight, and few there are that attaine thereto. It giueth a true and apt name to it selfe, being called, weake, declining, and decrepite Age, in regard whereof, Saturn commaundeth ouer it, as the most tardy and yet the very highest Planet, and which enuironeth all the other before named. His Complexion is cold, dry, and melancholly, wearisome, and troublesome. By this meanes, he cloatheth aged men with sollitude, choller, meagerneſſe, disdaine, and anger. He enfeebleth their memory and their strength, then doth he ouercharge their bodies with griefes, long sadneſſe, languishing diseases, endleſſe thoughtes, and with an earnest desire to enterprise secret & concealed matters; and, which is more, they will be alwaies Maisters, Superiours, and wholly obeyed. If any man chance to goe beyond this Age, which is more admired, then noted in many: you shall euidently perceiue, that hee will returne to his first condition of infancy againe, and haue a part of the Moone to bee his Gouernour, which was his first Planet (as I haue already declared) in his first Age of all. In regard whereof, they are then vsuallie dealt withall, euen as we doe to young Infants, according to their conditions and daily inclinations.

Saturn gouerneth the last Age.

Saturnes greatest kindneſſe to decrepite Age.

Old men become childrē againe.

The deuision of these seuerall Ages, in manner as formerly hath beene discourſed, was the inuention of Astrologers, whereto euery man may giue credit, as himselfe best pleaseth. Let vs now come to the deuision made by Philosophers, Phisitions, and Poets, who were of diuers opinions: yet because in this Argument there are some notable things, we wil enter into some part of their report, that young Spirits may exercise themselues a little. The great Philosopher Pythagoras, how long soeuer the life of man was; made but foure partes thereof, comparing it to the foure seasons or quarters of the yeare. He said, Infancy is the Spring-time, when al things are in their floure, beginning to encreaſe and augment themselues. Youth-hood, he compared to Summer, by the Ardour and strength that men haue in that Age. Manly Age is Autumne, because (in this time) a man hath experience, is ripe and apt for good counsell, with certaine knowledge of all thinges. Old Age he figured in winter, being a fruitleſſe time, cumberſome, and hauing no benefit of any blessings, but what haue proceeded from the former seasons.

Marcus Varro, a learned man among the Romaines, deuided the life of man into fiue partes, attributing the space of fifteene years to each one of them. The first fifteene he named Puerttia, Childehood, as being but an entrance into further growing. The second was Adoleſcentia; the springall or stripling estate of a youth, which hee tearmed the encreasing time, for then the body goeth on by encreasing. The third fifteene yeares, mounting vp to forty fiue years, he called Iuuentus, as comming of the Latine word Iuuare, to signifie the time of helping; becauſe men doe then serue as helpers to their Countrey, eyther in warlike occasions, or other affaires fit for the Common-wealth, and this Age is held for the stability or firmeneſſe of life.

life. After forty fiue, euen to threeſcore, the Age of man is called Maturitas, maturity, full of ripeneſſe, becauſe (in Latine) ſuch men are named Seniores, that is to ſay; Ancient men, or graue aged men, in reſpect of the precedent conditions. Alſo, in theſe times men doe begin to decline, and walke on toward Old Age, which accompliſheth the laſt fifteene yeares, after threeſcore, and containeth the reſt of mans life time. Behold how Varro deuided the life of man, according as Cenſorinus hath declared.

Maturitas.

Senectus.

Hippocrates the Philoſopher, he deuided it alſo into ſeauen Ages, the two firſt ſeauens, riſing to foureteene; The third, aſcending from foureteene, to eight and twenty. The ſeauens that make vp the fourth and fift, doe riſe to forty two: The ſixt, from forty two, to fifty ſixe; And the reſt of mans life, he attributeth to the ſeauenth Age. Solon the Philoſopher, as the ſame Cenſorinus relareth, brought theſe ſeauen parts into ſixe, deuiding the third, the ſixt and the ſeauenth in the midſt, ſo that each of the ſixe parts ſhould laſt ſeuen yeares; And the like deſcription is made by the other Philoſophers. But Iſidore hath diſtinguiſhed it into ſixe Ages, agreeing in the two firſt with Hippocrates, making euery one ſeauen; naming the firſt Infancy; the ſecond childhood. Afterward, from foureteene to eight and twenty, he tearmeth Adoleſcentie, or the encreaſing age. From twenty eight, to forty, he nameth it Iuuentus, or the helping time, which is the 4. in order. The fift, which he calleth declination, or the beginning of Olde-age he maketh to conſiſt of 20. yeares, and amount (in all) to ſixty. The remainder of life, he attributeth to Olde Age, and nameth it the ſixt Age.

Hippocrat. in L. de Diet. Nat. And his deuiſion.

The deuiſion made by Solon

Iſidor. lib. 11. de Etymol. And his deuiſion.

Horace, the excellent Poet, hath likewiſe made deuiſion of mans Ages; but it is into foure partes onely, according as Pythagoras did, to wit; Child-hood, Youth hood, Man-hood, and Old age: all which he hath elegantly deſcribed in his Art of Poeſie, with thoſe conditions belonging to men, in all thoſe ſeuerall times. Neuertheleſſe, according to the rule of naturall Philoſophy, the life time of man ſhould not be deuided, but into three Ages: The firſt, the encreaſing Age; The ſecond, the continuing Age, or, while a man remaineth in one eſtate; And the third, the Age of Diminution: For, according to Ariſtotle; All thinges that doe procreate or engender, haue augmentation, retention of Eſſence, and diminution: ſo, in like manner, three Ages ought to be aſſigned to Man. The Phiſitions of Arabia haue beene of the ſame opinion, and yet notwithſtanding, Auicenne, a very learned man, diſtinguiſheth our life into foure Ages, or principall partes. The firſt, which laſteth thirty yeares, hee calleth Adoleſcenete, becauſe, during this time, all things go on by encreaſing. The ſecond, from thirty, ſo farre as forty fiue, he calleth the ſtayed and ſetled Age, or of beauty and comelineſſe; for at this time, a man is in his beſt perfection. From thence onward, and ſo farre as to threeſcore yeares; he tearmeth, ſecret diminution, and the way to Old Age. The reſt that a man liueth afterward, as being his fourth and laſt eſtate; he nameth it, clearely diſcouered Old-Age, or falling, and downe-ſtooping Age. Now, notwithſtanding this opinion of his, it is to be noted, that albeit he haue made this principall deuiſion: yet hee forgetteth not, to deuide the firſt of theſe foure (which containeth thirtie yeares) and maketh three parts thereof. Whereby wee may well ſay, that hee conſenteth with ſuch, as deuided it into ſixe.

The firſt age deuided by Auicenne into three parts.

Now, after wee haue conſidered all theſe variable opinions, I cannot tell to which I ſhould betake my ſelfe, as beeing the trueſt; and, to ſpeake vprightly, no man knoweth how to giue an aſſured rule, or any certaine ayme; as well in regard of the diuers complexions & diſpoſitions of men, as alſo their dwelling in ſundry Landes and Prouinces, and their nouriſhing by good or bad foods, by meanes whereof, men arriue ſooner or later at the ſtate of Old Age. For which cauſe, Galen would haue no man to giue any limitted times to our ages: which being well conſidered, it maketh all theſe diſcordances of ſo many Authors, need no matter of ſtrange maruaile, conſidering that each man had a ſeuerall conſideration. According as Seruius Tullius, King of Rome had, who (according to Aulus Gellius) had no respect but to common benefit, when he deuided the people of Rome into fiue estates. And yet he distinguished the life of men, but into three parts, calling the first age (which he assigned to be seauenteene yeares) Childhood. From that estate to forty sixe; he declared them to bee men, able for the Warres, and so caused them to be set downe in writing. Lastly, from fortie sixe onward; he called them, ripe and mellow men, fit for graue imployment and counsell.

This deuision doth not contrary any of the other, because it is vniuersall, and includeth the meanest particulars in it, and it seemeth, that he grew conformable to the common deuisions, when it was vsually obserued, to separate (in diuers kinds) the Greene Age, Ripe-age, and Old-age. The Greene-age, from the time of our birth, euen to the ending of our youth, which goeth so farre as forty fiue yeares, little more, or little lesse; according as Virgill saith, Viridisque iuuentus, that is to say; Green-youth. The Ripe and Mellow Age, proceedeth on to threescore yeares, which time was attributed by Seruius Tullius, to men of Wisedome, meete for graue counsels and consultations. The rest is tearmed to be decrepite Old-age. These three parts, may likewise be deuided into other proportions; and (by that meanes) be answerable to the varietie, which appeareth to haue beene (by diuersitie of coniecture) among so many good Writers.

This deuision not contrarying the former.

CHAP. XVI.

That there be certaine yeares in the life of Man, which our Ancients haue iudged to be more dangerous, then any other; And for what cause.

ANcient Philosophers & Astrologers haue obserued, that there are certaine yeares in out course of life, of much more perill and danger, then others be; which they named Climacterical, by reason of the Greeke word Clima, that is to say; a Ladder or forme of degrees, signifying thereby, that such yeares are limited, in the fashion of degrees or steps, but hard to passe, during the race of this mortall life. For, like as they maintaine in daies, that the seauenth, ninth, and fourteenth, are dangerous during mens sicknesses and infirmities: In like case, they haue especiall respect, that such a numberd limitation, taketh place also in the course and yeares of our fraile life; in regard of the members strength, whereof great account hath beene made by Pythagoras, Themistius, Batus, Auerroes, and many others. Also, in regard of the influences and domination of euill Planets; as I may alleadge of Saturne, who reigneth in diuersity of seasons, and sundry Ages. Whereby they gather iudicially (according as Marsilius Ficinus, Censorinus, & Aulus Gellius doe testifie) that all the Septenary yeares, or those comprised of seauens; doe portend great alterations, changes; & impossible (as it were) that such tearmes can bee passed, without mighty hazzard, alteration of life, estate, health, or complexion. Vpon this occasion, the yeare seauenth, fourteenth, twenty one, twenty eight, thirty fiue, forty two, forty nine, and so for euery seauenth yeare, is to bee feared.

Yeares called Climacterical, dangerous to mans life.

Daies maintained to be dangerous.

Pythagoras. Themistius. Batus. Auerroes.

Marsilius Ficinus. Censorinus. Aulus Gellius.

And because they defend the number Tenarie, or of three, to be likewise of great efficacy; they say, that three times seauen (which maketh one and twenty) is of maine importance. The like speech doe they make of the yeare forty nine, because it is composed of seauen times seuen. But the yeare (most of all other) to be feared, is that of sixty three. For, like as the number of one and twenty, ariseth out of three times seauen: so, likewise the number of sixty three, begetteth it selfe of three times one and twenty, or of nine times seauen, or of seauen times nine; which compleateth the number celebrated & recommended by the very wisest. When a man therefore commeth to the age, of entring into the yeare threescore and three; he ought to be carefull of his health and life, waiting (daie by day) for some change therein, or whatsoeuer else may happen vnto him; according

The Letter of Octauius to Cassius.

To this purpoſe, Aulus Gellius maketh mention of the Emperor Octauius his Letter, whereby he ſignified to his Nephew Caſſius (hauing eſcaped this yeare of ſo much danger) how carefull he ought to be of the yeare ſixty foure, becauſe he had preuented the yeare ſixty three; ſo that he declared a good intention, to celebrate his ſecond Natiuity. For theſe reaſons, our Elders made doubt of this yeare threeſcore and three, perceiuing many worthy men to die, euen at the arriuall thereof: for in the ſame yeare dyed Ariſtotle, and diuers other notable perſonages. And, as I haue formerly ſaid, the number of nine was alſo feared, becauſe they ſaid, that he which eſcaped the yeare ſixetie three, could not paſſe the boundes of foureſcore and one; in regard that this age was compoſed of nine times nine: at which age died diuine Plato, the great Geographer Eratoſthenes, Zenocrates, the Platonicall Prince of the auncient Academie, Diogenes the Cinick, and other famous perſons.

Gentlemen, I was willing to make ſome obſeruation of theſe matters, more for curioſitie and exerciſe, then for any credence giuen to them: albeit they are not vtterly impertinent, nor voide of naturall reaſon. For, as wee may behold, that ſome ſickneſſes and humours doe end in a man, and, that in other Creatures, the change of teeth, encreaſe of Beard, the voyce augmenting, and nature worketh other effectes and notable changings, on ſuch complexions as are knowne by the tearmes of yeares: wherefore ſhould not wee credite, that (by the ſame meanes) limited times doe make other alterations and impreſſions? Why ſhould we not beleeue, that our humaine body hath communication with the Celeſtiall influences, as with humours; by ſome eſpeciall meanes, which is hidden from vs? Becauſe, man is ſubiect to the will and gouernment of God. And God, although he hath formed all things miraculouſly, and ſuper naturally: yet notwithſtanding, he will haue his works to be naturall; onely ſuch excepted, as were created by him againſt the Lawes of Nature, and according to his owne ſecret and inſcrutable iudgement.

That Orpheus, Homer, Pythagoras, Plato, and other of the ancient Philoſophers and Poets, did read the Books of Moyſes, and haue taken many particuler points out of them.

IT is not to bee found, that any man (before Moyſes) hath left any thing written; except it were Abraham and Enoch, whoſe learning, Moyſes (as their lawfull Inheritor) hath comprehended in his Bookes, adding thereunto, thoſe things which he heard from the mouth of the liuing God, by Oracles daily receiued from him. At ſuch time as Pythagoras and Plato learned the Sciences in Ægypt; they would (firſt of all) ſtudy the Doctrine of Moyſes, whoſe name (in thoſe times) was in great admiration through all Ægipt, & out of his Bookes they conceiued the reaſon of God; to wit, of the firſt cauſe. After whom, Numenius the Pythagorian, wrote down in his Bookes, many thinges concerning Moyſaicall Doctrine, as Baſile the great witneſſeth; and the ſame Numenius ſaith, that Plato was no other then Moyſes, ſpeaking in the Greeke Language. Clemens Alexandrinus, and Euſebius, doe both ſay, that the Gentiles receiued their very greateſt Myſteries from the Iewes, wrapping & enfolding them in their Fables. That of Deucalion, was taken from the Hiſtorie of the Deluge: The fixion of Phaeton, from the retrogradation and going back of the Sunne, which was in the time of Ezechias.

The Poet Ouid, borne in Sulmo, tooke that which hee singeth, of the beginning and Creation of the World (like as Homer, Hesiodus, and Linus, borrowed their Songs, of sanctifying the seauenth day) from none else but Moyses. Many haue sung the golden Age and raigne of Saturne, hauing gathered it from the most happy estate, wherein Adam was before hee sinned. Many more before them; as Orpheus, who learned diuers things from the doctrine of Moyses, especially in the Book which he made of the sacred word; he confesseth, that he took out of the Moysaicall Tables, that which hee singeth concerning God, knowne to the onely Chaldean Moyses, by these Verses, which Frances George, in his Hermony of the world, hath reduced into Latine.

CHAP. XVIII.

A Mysticall signification, concerning the body of Eliseus, and of the dead man raised to life in the Prophets Graue.

IT is written in the * second Booke of the Kinges, and the thirteenth Chapter, that as they were burying a Man, they espyed the Souldiours of the Moabites: wherefore, they threw the dead man into the Graue of Eliseus, and the man beeing downe, and hauing touched the bones of Eliseus; he reuiued, and stood vppe on his feete. This History containeth in it, the figure of our Lord Iesus Christ, and vnder the superficies thereof, is hidden a very great Mysterie. Dead Eliseus, is mysticallie vnderstood to be Iesus Christ, who died for vs; and the Souldiers or Theeues of Moab, doe represent wicked spirits, and the sinnes of the world.

*It is the fourth booke, in the vulgar edition.

The mysticall application of this History.

The Men that espied the Moabites, and threwe the dead bodie into the Graue of Eliseus; doe signifie the Apostles, who prouided for the peoples sauing health, against the mallice of wicked Demons, and against the burthen of sinnes: and therefore plunged mankinde (being dead) into the Sepulcher of Christ, that is to say, into the Water of Baptisme, because the Water of Baptisme is Christes Graue or Sepulcher, wherein wee are sanctified three times in the name of the blessed Trinitie, in regard that Iesus Christ continued three dayes and nights in the Sepulcher. Whereupon, Saint Paule saide to the Romaines: We are buried with him in his death by Baptisme. Concerning the dead man, that hauing touched the bones of Eliseus, reuiued, and rose vpon his feete: read but the same Apostle, in his second Chapter to the Colossians, and there you shall finde him perfectlie described.

The Interpretation, of the Dreame of the great King Nabuchodonosor.

NAbuzadnezzar, otherwise called Nabuchodonosor, King of Babylon, beheld beheld (in a Dream) a very great Image or ſtatue, the glory whereof was high, and it had a terrible regard. His head was of fine Gold; his Breaſt and armes of Siluer, his belley and Thighes of Braſſe; his Legges of Iron; and his Feete were partly of Iron, and partlie of Earth. He ſaw afterward, that a little ſtone (came of it ſelfe) out of a Mountaine, and deſcended from ſuch an height; as by the very blow of his fall, the Image was broken in all parts, and beaten into Powder. Daniell Interpreted this ſtatue, and gaue the ſignification thereof in the Kinges preſence, as is contained in the ſecond Chapter of his Booke: but heere it is more amply interpreted, and in a larger manner.

Dan. 2.

Nabuchodonosors Image.

The ſignification of the Image, which Nabuchodonoſor ſaw in his Dreame.

The Image or Statue, denoted the Monarchies of the World; the head of Gold was the Kingdome of the Aſſirians; the Breaſt and Armes of Siluer, the Empire of the Perſians; the Belly & Thighes of Braſſe, the Monarchy of the Grecians; the reſt remaining (conſiſting of Iron and Earth) the State and Dominion of the Romaines. The ſtone is Ieſus Chriſt, who deſcending from the Celeſtiall Mountaine, hath humbled al theſe Kingdoms, & brought them to nothing. By this it appeareth, that we are in the laſt age, and that ſmal time of paſſing hence remaineth: becauſe, this world muſt be ouerthrowne and ruined, all the Kingdomes hauing already paſſed, and all Propheſies fullie accompliſhed. All which, if we were not able to coniecture; yet might wee eaſily comprehend by good reaſons.

Good reaſons to perſwade that we liue in the lateſt age.

In the firſt place, wee cannot deny, but that vertue is at her chiefeſt height, and all Vices at their pitch of extreamity. In the ſecond place, who euer beheld Diuinity and Learning more exalted, then it is at this day? Philoſophy, Muſicke, Armes, Caruing, Painting, and Eloquence more common, then now they are? very children neuer grew ſo ſoone to be perfect. We daily behold, that men do not now reach to the yeares of an hundred, or if they do, it is very ſildome; as in former times they did. And we may perceiue withal, that at the age of 18. yeares, a young Springall ſhewes himſelfe of as good ſhape, and prouided of as able ſtrength; as a young man at the age of thirty in elder daies. I cannot deliuer any reaſon, why men doe liue in this World ſo ſhort a while; except it be thorough their bad gouernment, and that diſſolutions and vices are the maine cauſe thereof; or rather, that God being willing to haſten the end of the World, would haue all theſe predictions, to be as warning pieces of his neere approach. We can deliuer another Allegory, or Expoſition of King Nabuchodonoſors Dreame. The Statue or Image, is this World, wherein we are Inhabitants, and where the more part of Mortall Men, are called Rich, Noble, and Mighty, vnder which Titles, we compriſe the head of Gold. The cleare ſhining Siluer, and of very good ſound; is the Learning of Men, tearmed wiſe, religious, and vertuous. By the Brazen part, wee vnderſtand inuented Artes, by which enſue the benefits of life and maintenance. As for the feete of Earth and Iron, wee may well admit them to be our bad actions, the very beſt whereof, will ſcarſe allow any boaſting: becauſe they are full of filthineſſe, ſoyled with hatreds, enmities, and rancours, that (too ſoone) get poſſeſſion of our harts. Our ſtupidity and vnaptneſſe to good workes, and our iniquity of life, which is all made of Earth; both gouerneth and ſupporteth this huge maſſe, this vaine corruption, deſpoiled of all this, euen by it ſelfe, by this ouer-burdening and loading it ſelfe. But our Lord will deſcend from Heauen, the little Stone, euen that (I ſay) which became ſo great; and at his ſecond comming, he ſhal caſt downe to the ground, all humaine Eſtates, and ſhall iudge (in the laſt day) the Gold, the Siluer, and all the reſt of the actions of our life.

thousand yeares, to wit; two thousand without the Law; two thousand with the Law; and another two thousand after the first comming of the Sonne of God. This was not the Prophesie of Helie the Thesbite, but rather the inuention of another Helie, a Rabbie of the Iewes, vppon the Talmud; in the tract Sanedrin, Chapter Helee; in the tract of Idolatry, Chapter Libne; and in the Tract of the Sabbath. The coniectures of whom, are reported by Rabbi Isaac, vpon the first Chapter of Genesis, the principall whereof are these that follow.

Genebrad in Chron.

The coniectures deliuered by Rabbi Isaac.

The first Versicle of Genesis, containeth the Summary of the workes of God, expressing six times the Letter N. Now, Aleph signifieth a thousand. Moreouer, God perfected the World in sixe daies, the seauenth hee ceassed from his works, and sanctified the Sabboth: And, a thousand yeares are with God, euen as yesterday which is past, so saith the Psalmist. Finally, the sixe first Fathers, Adam, Seth, Enos, Caynam, Malaleel, Iared, are dead; the seauenth, to wit; Enoch, was transported aline vp into Heauen. After sixe thousand yeares then, during which time, trauailes, and death wil be in their vigour: shal begin the seauenth thousand of repose, and of the life immortall.

The coniectures of Nicholas de Cusa, Cardinall.

Nicholas de Cusa, a very wise Cardinall, gaue many other coniectures of the last times, which I wil relate here at large. If wee desire (saith he) to haue knowledge of the time (how little soeuer it be) concerning the ending of the world, and the last daies: wee haue iust cause then to meditate on the trauailes, which our Sauior Iesus Christ endured in this World. For, as himselfe hath taught vs, if we will liue as Christians, we ought to follow, and learne of him. Learne of me (saith he) for I am humble & meeke of heart. In like manner, himselfe hath giuen vs example; to doe as hee did, if wee desire to bee his followers. Moreouer, hee assureth vs, that all the faithfull are his members, when hee saith; that which is done to the least of his, he reputeth it as done to himselfe. The Church then is his mysticall body, and shee, in her totall perigrination in this World; imitateth her head Iesus Christ, who opened Heauen by his ascension. He hath gone before, as her rule and example; his Church followeth after, as his Image and resemblance. Moyses beheld the truth, in the flaming Mountaine Sinay, by vision of the verity, and after the Vision was vanished, hee did according to the example which he had seene. Iesus Christ entred into this World, in the forme of a young Infant, he encreased in age and Wisedome, became a man, enstructing the truth, and walking in it; vntill such time, as (to bee a Testimonie thereof) he was taken from this world, by the mallice of the Iewes, who made him to suffer death vppon the Crosse. Neuertheless, hee hath left his seede, which is his Church, in whom he abideth, as Adam in Eue, his Wife formed of his Flesh, and brought forth of his side: to the ende, that his Spouse the Church (full of his Seede) should afterward be nourished in the House of his heauenly Father, by her glorious assumption vp into Heauen. The Church was regenerated from hir Infancy, euen like an Infant; shee hath encreased in yeares and diuine wisedome, and (by litle and little) she shall accomplish and finish the time of her Trauailes in this World.

The Church the mysticall body of christ

The time of Christs being on earth, figured by the militant Church

Now, if we would haue a liuely example, we may say by coniecture, that the time which Iesus Christ liued vpon the Earth; is represented and declared by his Militant Church. We know, that hee is called the Sonne of Man, and the Lord of the Sabbath. Likewise, in him was accomplished, that which was prophesied by Esay, to wit; The yeare of the Lord, which yeare of the Lorde, is the yeare of Iubilie and freedome. (For Iobell in Hebrew, is as much to say, as the fiftith yeare, at which time of Iubily in Israell, euery seller might (by right) recouer againe the things which he had sold, without restoring the price receiued.) All this time is reuolued by the septenary number, to wit; from seauen dayes, from seauen yeares, and from seauen times seauen yeares, which are fortie nine yeares. After which, the fiftith yeare following this laborious reuolution, is the yeare Iubilie, free and full of liberty, in which all seruitude ceasing, liberty returneth freely againe. And it is to be noted, that fifty yeares of common account by the Catholique Church, do make one yeare of Iubily of the Lord our God. And the Church, who (as his owne Image) followeth her Lord and Patrone; doth both demonstrate and explicate by the number of fiftie, onely one of the yeares of Iubily of her Spouse. So that, the reuolution of one yeare of the Lord, made in peregrination of his Church, is answerable to one sunny reuolution of Iesus Christ, the true Sun of righteousnesse. By which reasons, wee make coniecture, that the Church cannot trauaile in this World, aboue fifty Iubilies, which are 2500. whereof already we haue had 29. *which are past; considering, that since the ascention of our Sauiour, euen to this present, 1452. yeares haue runne their course. This is the alotted space, and very greatest continuance of the Church, after her Bridegroome, whereof there is much to be abridged.

The yeare of Iubilie.

* This is out of Cusa, who liued & spake this, in the yeare 1464. made Cardinall vnder Pope Pius the second. So that, in perfect account, the instant yeare, is the 31. Iubily, since Iesus Christ.

Now if we will consider further, the things which our Lord & Sauior hath done, and those which he suffered after the twenty ninth yeare of his age, vntill the day that he arose, triumphing ouer Sin, Death, and Hell, and then, if wee extend those yeares into Iubilies: wee may (by coniectures) foretell what shal happen to the Church. So that, in the foure and thirtith Iubily, after the resurrection of the Redeemer of al mankind; she may well hope (by the goodnesse of God) to be raised vp into the glorie, to the ruine of Antichrist. And this is thought, that it will happen, after the birth of our Lord Iesus Christ into the World, 1700. and before the yeare 1734. And as in the time of Noah, the consummation of sin came by the Deluge, the 34. Iubily after the first Adam, according as wise Philo the Iew hath written: we may also fore-tell by coniectures, that in the 34. Iubily after the second Adam, both sin and the World shall be consumed by the fire of the holy spirit. And then shall the Church be transferred out of this corruptible world, into the glory of the liuing, by the comming of her Spouse to Iudgemen. And yet the houre of his second comming will be vncertaine, for come he will, & when least doubt is made of him; like as a Thiefe commeth in the night, and as the deluge came vpon the earth. Philo the Iew declareth, that Moyses (at the houre of his death) desired God to reueale vnto him; how much of the time was passed, and how much (as then) remained: whereto God aunswered, that two had already passed, & two wer as yet to come. And so Moyses being full of vnderstanding, yeilded vp his Soule. Heerein then (saith he) God reuealed four times to Moyses, two past, and two to come: of which, from Adam to the Deluge or Floud, passed the first time. The second, after the floud, vntil Moyses. The third, from Moyses to Iesus Christ. And the fourth, from Iesus Christ, to the end and consummation of the world. Now, the last time took beginning at the Resurrection of the Son of God, and continueth to the ending of the world, vpon which good reason, the Saints (oftentimes) called them the latter daies, and the ends of the world.

Philo the Iew, of a reuelatiō made to Moyses, concerning the times.

Now, notwithstanding that these supputations of yeares are very diuers, according to the truth of the Iewes, according to the 70. Greeke Interpreters, as also according to Iosephus & Philo: I am of the minde (neuertheless) it is much more true, that there hath passed so many Iubilies from the death of Moyses to Iesus Christ; as from Adam to the time of Noah, and as many from the floud vnder Noah, vnto the death of Moyses. In like manner, as many Iubilies haue and shall run their course, from the resurrection of our Sauiour, to the end of the last times, and of 34. Iubilies. Moyses died (according to that diuine reuelation) in the midst of these 4. times, whereof two were finished, & two were then to come. * There are many other coniectures of the latter daies, which are found written, and yet are so diuers; as no one agreeth with another. And to speak truly, the ending of the world, and the generall iudgement is vncertaine to any creature: for it is onely in the hand and power of God, whose secrets are concealed to himselfe, and he being God reserued them to his owne peculiar knowledge. So that, if those auncient men would needs vndertake to write thereof som perticularities; yet they al deceiud themselues by abusing coniectures, far off from all verity. We then of these daies, who haue much lesse learning & iudgeiudgement then they had, without any comparison, and enioy not a sparke of the like sanctity; ought to cease and desist, frō ouer-curious search into things to come, especially daies, houres, and moments, which God hath so restraind to his owne power, that the Angels in heauen do not know them. For so himselfe saith; Of that day and houre, no Man knoweth, no not the Angels of Heauen, but my Father onely. But sure and certain are we, that the world shall perish by an vniuersall flame, and shall bee renewed: which the Spirit of God deliuered by Moyses, in his Song in Deutronomy: Fire is kindled in my wrath, and shal burne vnto the bottome of Hell, and shall consume the earth with her encrease, and set on fire the foundations of the Mountaines.

Sophocles related by Iohn de Maulmont.

Sophocles the Pagan Poet, seemed to touch with his finger (as it were) the ending of the World, in diuers verses, translated by Iohn de Maulment, the meaning whereof briefely folowes thus. The Age shall come that will bring vs riches from the high Heauens, when they shall be filled, and round engirt with fire. All places on the earth the flames shall enclose, and burne all things, as well in the water, as in the Ayre. Not any thing in this world, vnder earth, or in the deepest Sea, shall scape from burning. When then, by so cruell a flames fury, all things shall be consumed: the springes of all waters shall be without course, like a bottomles gulfe. No fields shal produce any more fruits, nor the earth be inhabited: No ships shall floate vpon the Sea: No Birds fly in the Ayre. But a cruell tempest of fierie thunder, shall hurle Heauen and Earth into eternall ruine; burning the Earth and all things into Cinders. Then shall her great backe re-assume no other essence, or yeelde any nourishment, for all is brought into putrifaction.

Saint Peter writeth; That Heauen and Earth which is at this instant, are reserued for Fire at the day of Iudgement, and the Elments shall resolue themselues into fire.

Augustin. in Lib. 20. de Ciuit. Dei.

Saint Augustine aunswered a demaund which might be made, as thus. When after the Iudgement is ended, this World shall bee burnt, before (instead thereof) a new Heauen be created, and a new Earth: in what place shall the Saints be, when this burning is performed? Considering, it followeth necessarily, that they should be in some corporeall place, because they all haue bodies. They shall be (saith he) in high places, whereunto the flames can neuer mount, as likewise the Waters of the Deluge could not. For they shall then haue such bodies, as they may bee where they will be, without fearing the Fire of burning, beeing made immortall and incorruptible: as the corruptible and Mortall bodies of the three Men, Sidrach, Misaack, and Abednago liued, without being offended in the fiery furnace.

Dan. 3, 24.

Now, if we will be Christians, wee ought to beleeue, that the Resurrection of the dead, is in Flesh, and that it will bee done in a moment, or in the twinckling of an eye, saith the Apostle: but our Faith heerein is not vnprofitable, although our vnderstanding doe not perfectly comprehend, howe, and in what manner it shal be done. Let vs leaue then to God, the causes and reasons whereby this is to bee done, and let not vs enquire (ouer busily) after his admirable secrets I could continue on this discourse, with diuers other Chapters, and handle in them this Resurrection, setting downe the solution and aunswers of Doctors in Diuinity, touching those high questions and demaunds, which may be made in this matter. CHAP. XXI.

The Conquest of the Kingdome of Naples, by Charles the eight, King of France.

Phillip de Comines in Carolo 8.

Phillip de Comines, a worthy learned Gentleman, who was Counsellour to King Charles, and serued him in the action: giueth notable testimony thereof, and therefore I think it not amisse, to vse his own words, in regard of his grauity and authority. He relateth first, the cruelty & tyranny of Ferdinando, King of Naples, and of his Son Alphonso, in causing 24.

Noble-men (their Subiects) to be moſt cruelly murdered in Priſon: then, diſcourſing of their vices and wickednes, he afterward ſpeaketh of Gods iudgements vpon them, proceeding in this manner.

The Iudgement of Phillip de Comines, of the Conqueſt of Naples, for the ſinnes of the Kings thereof

No man (ſaith hee) was euer more cruell, more wicked, more vicious, nor a greater Glutton, then Alphonſo, though his Father Ferdinando was more daungerous then he: for, in making men faire weather (as we tearme it) and good cheare; he commonly betrayed them. As he dealt by Count Iaques, whom he murthered villainouſly, though hee were Ambaſſadour with him for Frances Sforza, Duke of Millaine, and ſo he dealt likewiſe with many other, neuer vſing mercy to any, no, not ſo much as to his owne Kinſ-man. Beſides, he neuer had any pitty or compaſſion on his poore people, for hee made a very merchandize of his Kingdome, inſomuch; that hee forced his Subiects to feede and fat his Hogges, and pay for them if they chanced to die. He bought vp all the Oyle and Graine in the Countrey, before it was ripe, and ſold it afterward extreamely deare, compelling them to take it at his price, and, while he ſold, no man elſe might ſell any. If any Noble-man or Gentleman were richer then the reſt; hee forced him to lend him great ſummes of Money. He tooke from his Nobility their races of horſes, or elſe made them keepe them for him, whereby he had many thouſands of Horſes, Mares, and Coltes. Both the Father and the Son tooke many Women by force. They neuer had reuerence or reſpect to the holy Church; but ſold Byſhoppricks, as for example, that of Taranto, which Ferdinando the Father ſold for 12000. Ducates, to a Iew for his Son, who (he ſaid) was a Chriſtian. He gaue Abbaies to Faulconers, with charge, to keepe him a certaine number of Haukes at their expences. Alphonſo the Sonne neuer kept any Lent, nor made ſo much as any ſhew to keepe it. He neuer made conſcience of any committed ſinne, nor euer communicated: and, to conclude, it is not poſſible to doe worſe, then they both did.

The tyranny, cruelte, and vicious life of the Kings of Naples.

Biſhoppricks and Abbaies ſold for mony

Thus ſaith this Authour, of the liues and manners of theſe two Kinges, and then hee further addeth, concerning Gods Iudgements vpon them. It may (ſaith he) ſeeme to the Readers, that I haue ſpoken this on ſome particular paſſion, or hatred towardes them. But (in good faith) I haue not ſaid it to any other end, then to continue the courſe of my Hiſtory, and that it may appeare, that this voyage to King Charles to Naples, proceeded onely of the will of Almighty GOD, who ordained, that ſo young a King, deſtitute of Councell, Mony, and all ſufficient meanes for ſuch an enterpriſe: ſhould be his Comiſſary (as it were) to chaſtice theſe Kinges, who were wiſe, potent, and rich, and had many wiſe Counſellours and graue perſonages about them; yea, many ſubiects, friends, and allies, abroad in Italy, whom it imported to conſerue and defend that Kingdome. And yet neuertheleſſe, though they fore-ſaw the ſtorm long before: they could not find meanes to auoid it, nor make reſiſtance any where. For, excepting onely the Caſtle of Naples, there was not any place, Town, or Fort, that ſtayed King Charles at one whole day. Inſomuch, that Pope Alexander ſaid very wel; That the French-men came with Chalke in their hands, like Harbingers to make and take vp their lodgings wher they pleaſed: For they had not occaſion, ſo much as to put on their Armour, in all the Voyage.

The admirable facility of the Conqueſt of Naples.

Therefore I conclude, according to the opinion of very many good and religious men, and other ſorts of people (& the voyce of the people is the voice of God) that GOD did punniſh theſe Kings viſibly, and in ſuch euident manner; that it might ſerue for an example and admonition to all Kinges, to liue well, according to the commandement of God. For theſe Kinges whereof I haue ſpoken, loſt their Honours and Realme, great riches, and mooueables of al ſorts; yea, and their owne perſons in the ende, three of them in the ſpace of one yeare, or little more. And, as I haue vnderſtood of ſome (that were very neere them) they found (in pulling downe an olde Chappell) a Booke, whereof the Title was; The Truth, with her ſecret counſell; in which Booke, was contained all that had happened after vnto them: And when they three (onely) had read it, they burnt it.

The euident puniſhment of God vpon the Kings of Naples.

A Propheſie of the Conqueſt of Naples.

Thus

Thus much I thought good to ſet down in the words of this wiſe and graue Authour, to the end, that not only the bad liues of theſe Kinges, but alſo his iudgement may appeare concerning Gods Iuſtice ſhewed vpon them and their whole Kingdome for the ſame. And this may alſo bee confirmed by other perticulers, which Guicciardine recounteth of them, and of the ſucceſſe of that warre, ſignifying, that Ferdinando the Father being verie wiſe, and vnderſtanding of that intention of King Charles, to come and inuade his Kingdome; he feared ſo greatlie the ſucceſſe (in reſpect of his owne bad life and his ſonnes) that hee laboured by all meanes poſſible, by Ambaſſadours and Friends to diuert him from his purpoſe, offering to pay him yearely Tribute, of 100000. Ducates, and to holde his Kingdom of him, by fealty and homage. And when hee ſaw that nothing woulde preuaile, hee fell ſicke with ſorrow, and died before King Charles entred into Italy.

Guic. lib. 1. hiſt.

King Ferdinando of Naples, died for ſorrow.

And Alphonſo his Sonne (who then ſucceeded him in the Kingdome) though he bragd long before that he woulde go ſo farre as to the Mountaines, to meete King Charles if he came forwards (which he ſaid, he would neuer beleeue he durſt do) yet afterward, when the French were in Italy, and came ſo farre as Rome, hee tooke ſuch a fright, that he cried out euery night, he heard the French-men comming, and that the verie trees and ſtones cried France. And, as Guicciardine affirmeth (who was not a man either eaſily to beleeue, or raſhly to Write Fables) it was credibly and conſtantly reported, that the ſpirit of Ferdinando his father, appeared to one that had beene his Phyſition, and bad him tell his ſonne Alphonſo from him, that he ſhould not bee able to reſiſt the Frenchmen. For God hadde ordained, that his progeny ſhould (after many great afflictions) bee depriued of their Kingdome, for the multitude and great enormity of their ſinnes. And eſpecially, for that which he had done (by the perſwaſion of Alphonſo) himſelfe, in the Church of S. Leander, in Chaia neere to Naples, whereof he told not the perticulers.

Furthermore, the ſame Authour ſignifieth, that Alphonſo was exagitated with ſuſpitions and feares, whiles he was waking, and in his ſleepe, with the repreſentation of the Noblemen, whom hee had cauſed to be ſecretly murdered in priſon, (as I haue declared before) and that being in this miſerable perplexitie, he reſigned his Crowne vnto his ſonne (that was called Ferdinando, after his grand-fathers name) and ranne away into Sicily, in ſuch haſt, that his Mother in law (with whom only he communicated his intention) being deſirous to flie with him, coulde not perſwade him to ſtay for her ſo much as three dayes, which ſhe earneſtly deſired, to the end, ſhe might haue that comfort at leaſt, to be Queen of Naples a ful year. But he told her, that if ſhe would not go preſently with him, he would leaue her: proteſting (as Phillip de Comines teſtifieth) that if any ſought to ſtay him by force, hee would caſt himſelfe out at the Windowes. Asking hir further, if ſhe heard not euery one crie France, France. Thus being tormented with the horrour of his owne Conſcience, and the terrour of Gods Iudgements alreadie falne vppon him: he fled into Sicily, taking with him diuers ſortes of delicate Wines (which he had alwayes loued ouer-well) and ſom Garden ſeeds to ſowe, and a few Iewels, and a little mony, without taking any order in the Worlde, for his goodes and Moueables, which he left in great quantitie and aboundance, in the Caſtle of Naples.

K Alphonſo being ſtrangely tormented with the horror of his own conſcience, fled into Sicily

But being arriued in Sicily, and touched with Gods grace, he fell into the account of his bad life paſt, and of Gods iuſtice executed vpon him, he becam verie penitent, gaue great almes, and entered into Religion, in which eſtate, hee dyed ſoone after of the ſtone, with the extreameſt torments that could be immagined, as ſome of the Religious, with whom he liued, tolde after to Philip de Comines, as himſelfe writeth. And to conclude the Tragicall Hiſtory of the Kings, his ſonne Ferdinando, to whome hee reſigned his Crowne, hauing aſſembled al his forces, durſt make no reſiſtance any where vnto the French, but fledde before them from place to place, vntill at length, almoſt all his ſubiectes forſooke him, and rebelled againſt him; whereupon, he fled alſo into Sicily, and within awhile dyed there. Loe heere the miſerable calamity which (for the ſinnes of theſe Kings) fell not only vpon them, but alſo vpon their whole Kingdome, ſerning for many yeares after,

CHAP. XXII.

Of a Courtier; And what manner of man he ought to be.

Popular opinion concerning a Courtier.

THe reaſon inducing mee to write of a Courtier, is to take away a falſe perſwaſion, imprinted in common and popular Iudgement, in thinking; that a Courtier is none other, thē an afronter of Merchants, a Diſſembler, a Flatterer, Inciuil, a Lyer, a ruffian, a Swaggerer, a troubleſome fellow: In briefe, a man made vp of all Vices, becauſe that in the Kings times, the Sonnes to late King Henry the ſecond, raigning in young yeares, many then were ſuch, which being well obſerued by that worthie and great man, the Lord de Pybrack, in his Poeſie of Quatraines, hee ſung thus:

Le Sieur de Pybrac in ſon Quatrains.

Go not to Reuelles, if thou loue no dancing,
Nor venter on the Sea, if thou feare danger:
Go not to Bankets if thou canſt not eate,
Nor to the Court, if thou ſpeake what thou thinkeſt.

The Authors determinate Propoſition.

Now at this preſent, liuing in ſuch a time, when wee haue a King of a conſiſtant age, of a ripe vnderſtanding, and Princes and Princeſſes, that will haue none in their Courts, but people of vertue; I purpoſe to propound, what manner of man a Courtier ought to bee, and his ends. To qualify this errour of the people, wherein they haue beene led ſul manie yeares. Moreouer, ſuch as would or elſe pretend themſelues to be Courtiers, may heerein marke and learne, by what meanes, and with what great facility, they ſ all attaine thereto.

A Courtier ought to be Noble by race

Firſt of all, he that deſireth to followe the Courts of Emperors, Kings, Queens, Dukes, Dutcheſſes, Marqueſſes, and Earles, or other illuſtrious perſons, ought to be a Gentleman by birth, and of a noble houſe of Antiquity: becauſe it is leſſe reproachfull for a Yeoman, to fail in the exerciſe of Vertuous actions, then for him that is Noble borne; who erring from thoſe ſteppes which his predeceſſors walkt in, ſoyleth the name & honor of his houſe and race. Before hee go to Court, he muſt be paſt the age of Adoleſcencie, which is about twentie or fiue and twenty yeares of his age: for beeing much older, he will not finde it to his liking. Hee muſt bee well featured and formed, both of his bodye and countenance, leaſt he be miſprized and ſcorned. He muſt bee of an indifferent ſtature, to wit; neither extreamly high nor low: for men of ſuch ſort, are lookt on like things of monſtrous ſhape. Beſide, men of ſo great ſtature, ouer and aboue their common addiction, to dull vnderſtanding are verie vnapt to all exerciſes of agility, matters verie commendable in a Courtier.

Of what yeares.

Of what forme

Of what ſtature.

He muſt be expert in all kind of arms, to helpe himſelfe, as neede ſhall require, both at all times, and in all places. He muſt be a good Horſeman, and actiue in managing him; that he may bee knowne (among others) to be hardie and valiant. He muſt be loyall and faithfull vnto him whom he ſerueth, and addicted to acord quarrels and contentions, his own honor ſafely kept, and his for whom hee maketh the agreement. Beſides, as hee ought to be skilfull in Wraſtling, Leaping, dancing, and playing on ſome or manie Inſtruments of Muſicke, ſo ſhould he likewiſe readily ſing any Poet or Hiſtorian. He muſt be exquiſite in ſpeaking diuers Languages: if he be French, Engliſh, or what elſe, he ought to ſpeake Latine, Italian, Spaniſh, yea the Germaine tongue tongue alſo, if it be poſsible. And for his better attaining thereto, before hee practiſe any of them, he muſt haue viſited the Countries where the Languages are naturally ſpoken. For, to learne them by Bookes, he ſhall neuer pronounce them truly. I meane the like of other Nations, in regard that the Frenchmen, Italians, Spaniards, and Germaines, do ordinarily conuerſe together.

being crosse and troublesome, like Flies or Waspes, and make it their profession, to gainsay euery man despightfully, without any respect at all. He must bee no prater, Vaine-glorious Boaster, Lyer, Flatterer, or Knaue; but moderate and peaceable, vsing euermore (especially in publicke) reuerence and respect towards his Lorde, which is most commendable in a seruant. Fame and renowne do follow all good parts, if they appeare in action, both in due time and place, and he canot faile in these things, but to his own great dishonor. He must make no vants of himselfe, except he be truly valiant, & haue acted some great enterprizes, or done some memorable Stratagems. Neither must he vse any iests, that may offend his Prince, or others: except hee order his iests, and so sauor them, as the Prince may speake their woorth for wit and discretion, and not reproue them with want of Iudgement; but, insted of displeasure, thinke them to deserue both respect and recompence.

To this purpose, wee may alledge the Historie of a Marshal of France, tearmed of S. Andrew, who knowing that King Henry, second of that name, could hardly finde an Architect to his liking, to forme him a model for two bodies of lodgings, which he purposed to build at Fontainebleau, brought him a man of Lymosine, a Mason by his trade, yet ignorant. But hauing fitted him with sufficient habite, he made the King beleeue, that hee was a great Architect, verie deepely experienced in that Art, & that it was the same man, who had proiected al the buildings which Charles the fift, Emperor and king of Spaine, had caused to bee made. And indeed, this poore man had bin in Spaine, in his yonger years, to gaine some knowledge by Trauaile, for his best practise could not maintain him in his own countrey. And hauing gotten in Spaine (in the compasse of sixe or seauen yeares) some fiftie *Reals of siluer; thinking himselfe to be the richest man in his Countrey, hee returned home againe. Hauing spent a good part of his Money, he had married another Wife; for all Lymosines, or people of those parts, vsing Mechanical professions, when (for lucres sake) they trauaile into Spaine: they marrie there (for the most part) to weomen that doo but lend themselues (as it were) for that time, and comming into their owne Country, there they are at libertie againe to take other Wiues.

A kind of dealing scarse commendable.

This poore Mason came to dwell at Orleance, hauing spent well-neere all his Reals, and eaten vp his Wiues Dowrie beside, which might amount to twentie pounds; he heard there of som other Masons, that earned daily seauen or eight Sols* or Sous, and in his Countrey, they had no more but two Sols, or six *Blanks. The Lorde Marshall meeting with this Mason by chance, as hee walked one day abroad in the Fieldes, to passe awaie the time pleasantly: he fell into Conference with him, and found that he had a verie proude and ouer-weening presumption of his owne sufficiency. So much the rather, because hee was a workeman at the building of the new Conuent of Nostre Dame de Monserrat. Wherein indeed he holpe to supply the Masons with Morter, which made him of opinion, that he was the verie best Architect of his time: Albeit hee vnderstood little or nothing, scarsly knowing howe to order or lay a stone in a wall in his right place.

*The French shilling, ten whereof doe make one English. *Halfe a Sol is a Blanke.

Presumption neuer wanted folly.

The King crediting the Lord Marshals wordes, spake a long time together in good French to the Mason, and yet vnderstood nothing backe again from him: for he stoode with his Hat on, without vsing any reuerence to the King, or respecting him any more, then if he had beene his daily companion. Sometime, hee called his maiesty Mounsieur, or my Lord the King, speaking one while Limosine, then again thrusting forth a word or two of Spanish: the King perceiuing nothing all this while, but continued his speeches earnestly to the Mason, that hee might at full vnderstand his mind.

The foolish impudence of the Mason.

At length, the King beholding that all the standers by smiled, and aboue all, the Lord Marshall, desired to knowe the reason of their Laughter; which beeing disclosed to him, himselfe fell into a verie mirthfull humour and laughed heartily, because he had no better noted the Language, the Crispe countenance and ignorance of the poore Mason. Nor did the King any way take the iest offensiuely; but contrarywise, was well pleased, & much commended the Lorde Marshall for it. By foule and vnfitting actions, neuer ſeeke to compaſſe fauour, as ſeruing in murderous or Bawdy employments: but if ſuch occaſions be offered, let a diſſembled deafeneſſe excuſe it, or ſome other priuate matter, cauſe preſent retirement, which may returne anſwere, without any other reply.

Of reprehenſions.

For a Courtier that falles into ſuch imployments for his Prince, vpon ouer-much preſsing, may well declare the caſe to be diſhoneſt: and if hee ſtill perſiſt, let wiſedome giue direction to withdraw from his Court.

For, reprehenſions may not bee giuen to Princes publickely, but priuate and apart, albeit he exceed his Prince in yeares.

A Courtiers aime and end

For, a Courtiers aime only ſhould be, to teach his Prince.

Of Garments

A Courtiers Garmentes ought to be of blacke colour, or of ſuch darke decencie, as may rather expreſſe grauity, then giddineſſe or glory. Except it be in Armes, Maskes, or Triumphes, where gay and goodly colours are more fitting, and Imbroideries, Iewelles, and Magnificent pompe.

Election of friends.

Let him entertaine one only Vertuous friend, and not two (for two will carrie themſelus better together then three) conformable to himſelfe in life and manners.

Companie keeping, and behauiour.

Neuertheleſſe, hee muſt loue, honor, and reſpect all other friends, according to their worth and merit. He muſt alſo endeuour daily, to conſort himſelfe with men of eſteeme, Noble by Nature and birth, and ſuch as are truely knowne to be men of Honor and Honeſty, rather then Villaines, or people of no credite.

His care likewiſe muſt be, to be beloued and honoured of them, which he cannot faile of, if he be courteous, humaine, liberall, affable, and kind in company; ready to pleaſure any, diligent in ſeruice, & carefull of his friends honor, eyther abſent or preſent; ſupporting their naturall and tollerable defects, without breach of amity betweene them, for ſmall matters, correcting ſuch errors in himſelf, as ſhall be louingly ſhewne him, without eſteeming himſelfe aboue others, or affecting the higheſt and moſt honourable places.

Not too much eſteem of him ſelfe, or Vilipending others.

And he muſt not imitate ſome humours, that ſeeme to deſpiſe the world, & ſtriue (by a kinde of troubleſome auſteritie) to preſcribe Lawes or directions to others: ſo that, beſides their molleſtuous and quarrelling condition, euen for the leaſt Trifles in the world; they will reprehend where they ſhould not, and ſeeke all occaſions to complaine of their verie beſt Friends, which is an odious and bad behauiour.

Auſtere life vndecent.

Of the Duello or ſingle combate.

If it happen that he bee called or challenged to the Duello or ſingle fight (as oftentimes it fals out in the courts of Princes) and by indiſcretion or raſhneſſe, he muſt not ouer-violently and vnaduiſedly preſent himſelfe thereto, but with a cool and temperate carriage, euen as compelled or enforced to his aunſwere. And if the buſineſſe can fall out no otherwiſe, but he muſt needs proceede to the acte: for ſafety of his honor, he may boldly vndergo it.

Of ſports and Paſtimes.

It is alſo abſurde and vnſightlie in a Courtier, to carry himſelfe extreamelie or enragedly in any ſport or recreation: for then hee reſembleth rather a furious Madman, then one of ciuill and ſetled condition.

Violence in ſports.

His conuerſation muſt be ſober, and (aboue all things) hee muſt auoid drunkenneſſe, and beware of thoſe trickes, which are too ordniarily vſed in Courtes, in ſtriuing who ſhall ſooneſt make a man drunke, onely to ſhame and diſgrace him.

Of Drunkenneſſe.

In being a man of ſuch behauiour, euery one will bee ſure to note and ſcorne him; and the Prince himſelfe will ſtande doubtfull of his honeſtye: or, how he ſhould truſt him with any caſe of Conſequence, for Drunkardes are vnapt per-persons for State affaires.

Playing with the Prince.

If he bee inuited by his Prince to anie play or pastime; he may safely yeild thereto, not in hope to make gaine of him, but only to yeild him contentment. And let him be careful, that he be not too opinitiue in any accident against him: but giue way to him in all, and by al meanes, in regard of so great inconueniences that thereby do daily happen.

Too much delight in play or sport.

Likewise, let him not immitate some, who will spare no time (either daie or night) from playing, but thereby do lose many faire occasions, of performing som good Offices vnto their Prince, whence might be deriued great merit and fauors.

Extreamities to be auoided

Some haue beene noted so assiduate and earnest, that they would play away lands, houses, Garments, yea, their verie Horses and Armours: and afterwards, borrow (by importunitie of their Friendes) without any re-payment, whereuppon, haue ensued Contempts, Quarrels, and Bloud.

How to couer his ignorance and imperfection of bodie.

Let him not speak of any thing which he vnderstandeth not, wherein hee shall expresse more Wisedome to bee silent: for it is an honest shaddow and cloake to his ignorance. Likewise, if he haue anie imperfection in some part of his body, let him hide and conceale it by all possible meanes. As did Ferrand King of Naples, who would neuer plucke off his Gloues, because his hands were not white. Iulius Cæsar also did daily weare a Chaplet of Bayes, because he was bald.

Ferrand King of Naples.

Maintenance of credit.

He must keepe his credite with Merchants and others, not following the dealing of many, who are beholding to such as lend them: yet must be daily importuned to make repayment, euen vnto such enforcement, as their goodes and landes must be seazed on, yea, sometimes their bodies confined to prison. These behauiours, do rather relish of a man vtterly lost and forsaken, then of a Vertuous Courtier.

Report of nouelnes & lies.

In his talke and discoursing, hee must report no Myracles, that is to say, things that are not likely, nor neuer were. They that make profession of relating such nouelties, are euermore held for Lyers; and euery man that is a lyar, will cary the like credit of beleefe, when he speaketh truth. Laughter likewise, except it light vppon good ground, is no way commendable: For any man, that is subiect vnto long laughter, and without some founde subiect, deliuers no better vnderstanding of himselfe, then of a meere Foole.

Now, because no Court appeareth to be compleat, except it be accompanied with Ladies; let vs admit the case, that our instant described Courtier, bee in such a Court so worthily furnished, and where he may bee become an amorous seruant to some beauty, and to an honest end: for (otherwise) he will find his own perill. He must not immediatelie make knowne his passions by parlaunce, with furious gestures and obstinations, as many vnaduised Courtiers haue done. But the best bewrayer of his affections, are continence, a sigh, respect, fear, & humble meekenesse, which auaile more then a thousand fond words can do; and hee may so order his carriage, that his eyes may serue as his best messengers, & beare the true Embassie of his heart, to his dearest esteemed.

Particular in case of Ladies and loue.

The best Ornaments in an amorous Courtier.

Afterward, by equall degrees, he may attaine to speak with his Goddesse, when a touch, or kisse of the hand, and such like honest fauours, may ciuilly be deriued from any Ladie of respect, honourablie affected. Wherefore, hee that hath not lost the restraint of reason, will Gouerne himselfe wisely, obserue fit times and place; and (when neede requireth) will containe due regard verie diligently, although it bee in neuer so sweete a pasture, because publick and apparant loue, is a matter of great difficulty to order.

The respect of good Gouernement.

The ends then of a perfect Courtier, such an one as I cannot heere sufficiently describe; is (in mine Opinion) to win by the meanes of those qualities which I haue set downe to him, the fauour and affection of his Prince in such sort: that his seruice may bee alwaies commendable, and to tell him the truth in all things that are conuenient for him; to wit, without feare or danger of displeasing him, & so to order himselfe, that when he knowes his mind enclined to matters inconuenient for him, to bee so hardie as to gainsay them. Seruing him in gentle maner, and gaining fauour by the good parts in him; to the end, that he may preuent all bad intentions in him, and conduct him the pathes of Vertue. And so, our Courtier hauing nothing but goodnesse in him, accompanied with promptitude of spirit, chearefulnes, prouidence, wisewiſedome, knowledge, in learning, and all other vertuous qualities: hee ſhall (in all occaſions) woorthily make apparaunt to his Prince, what profite and honour commeth to him and his, by meanes of Iuſtice, Liberality, Magnanimity, Affability, Familiarity, and all other Vertues which are conuenable for a good prince. And contrariwiſe, what infamy and loſſe proceedeth from thoſe Vices, which are ſworne enemies to theſe Vertues. And for a full concluſion, as manie times it happeneth, that a Vertuous Courtier maketh the Prince good; ſo a vicious Courtier maketh his Prince wicked and deteſtable. Of this mind were all ſuch, as haue medled in Writing of a Courtier; and among others, Balthazar the Caſtillannois.

A Vertuous Courtier maketh a good Prince.

CHAP. XXIII.

How a man may giue praiſe and commendation to himſelfe, without impeache or preiudice to others.

Cicero, in the third Booke of his Oratour ſaieth; That no man can honeſtly commende himſelfe, but others will conceiue enuie thereat, and reproue him for it. Concerning this ſaying, albeit it hath beene allowed by many; yet it is not generally receyued and warranted. For, a man may lawfullie commend himſelfe, without attraction of enuie vpon him: eſpecially, if hee be a worthy Soldier, or a man of ſuch merit, as can ſpeake of generous actions, or valiant employments, if they beene perfor-by him, and their Carracter apparant. Iulius Cæſar may ſerue for an example, who hath ſpoken great matters of himſelfe, and yet (for al that) no way diſcommendable therein. His Commentaries which diſcourſe of nothing, but his braue and generous exploits in the Gauliſh warres, were ſeene and read of all men in his time, yet no way blamed or deſpiſed, ſo farre as we know: but on the contrarie, were highly praiſed, both in regard of his eloquence, as alſo his ſingular expeditions.

The ſaying of Cicero, in lib. 3. de Orat.

An exceptiõ againſt the ſaying of Cicero.

Of Cæſars Cõmentaries.

But, if he had attributed to himſelfe, or made vaunt of more then was performed by him: hee could not haue ſtoode cleare from mallice, yea, in great men, who durſt and would haue boldly tolde him, that hee lyed. And all ſuch perſons as doe make vaunt of ſmall matters, or of any thing done by the meanes and helpe of others, attributing ſuch actions ſoly to themſelues: they cannot doe it, but with great ſhame and infamy.

Shamegotten in Coueting praiſe.

In men of good and worthy reſpecte, it hath beene, and is permitted (euen for the benefit of others) to ſpeake deſeruedly of themſelues, and to their owne aduantage. As, if in procuring to bee credited, we render a reaſon of an honeſt integritie, by ſome effects of our owne paſt before; to the end, that hauing the meanes to continue our Vertuous actions, for the profit of manie: we may imbrace their praiſe, in deſpight of their owne ſpleene (as we tearme it) and conſtraine them to receiue both profite and pleaſure from vs, euen ſuch as would elſe ſhun all like occaſions.

Of perſonnes permitted to praiſe and commende themſelues.

Themiſtocles vſe theſe wordes in the Counſell of the Athenians, euen when he ſawe them fully glutted with his good deedes. O poore people (quoth hee) why doe you ſuffer your ſelus to receiue ſo manie benefits from one and the ſame perſon? At another time hee vſed theſe Wotds to them. In time of Raine and Tempeſtes, you make your recourſe to me, as vnder the ſpreading armes of a Tree. And when faire vveather comes againe, you teare downe each branch as you paſſe by.

Themiſtocles to the Athenians in his own behalfe.

Homer maketh Neſtor to ſpeake his owne Valiant deedes, to encourage Patroclus, and nine other Knightes, in attempting the Combate (bodie to bodie) againſt Hector. In like maner, the words of exhortation, action of the hande, and example with the Spurre of æmulation; is liuely, and pierceth meruailouſly; yea, it bringeth (with courage and affection) hope to attaine vnto the heighth of anie thing, which otherwiſe woulde appeare impoſsible.

Homer of Neſtor.

him his fault, in forgetting former benefits receiued. A straunger, to gaine the good opinion of Inhabitants, amongest whom he is newly arriued; may attribute some honourable Title vnto his present condition, and speake well of himselfe. As it is to bee noted in Virgil, that Æneas did, after the Destruction of Troy his natiue Countrey, wandering by Sea and Lande, to seeke a newe dwelling, vsing these Wordes (when Enquirie was made of him) Sum pius Eneas, that is to say; I am Eneas the Troyan, full of Pietie and Religion, shewing the Goddes his aged feeble Father, and his verie young sonne, whom (with great perrill) he had saued from the ruine and destruction of his Countrey; and this was not vnfitting in him.

A straunger may commēd himselfe, and the reason for it.

I haue many times beene amazed at Cicero, who Writes (as I haue sayde in the beginning of this Chapter) that a man in praising himselfe, dooth but attract Malice and Enuie on his own head. And yet notwithstanding, there is an Epistle of his owne, which (in verie vehement affection) he wrote to an Historiographer; wherein hee entreats him, not to bee vnmindfull of inserting in his Histories of memorable actions, what hee hadde written perticulerlie of himselfe. In mine opinion, there was neither manners nor Modesty, but excesse beyond al reason.

Cicero approued to be forgetful of himselfe.

There is nothing more vaine, or further off from equity, then for men to pursue the Quest of their owne praise & renowne. Chrisippus and Diogenes vvere the first Authors, and firmest of al other, in the contempt of glory; for they saide, That among al desires, there is none more daungerous, or with greater care to be auoided, then that which commeth to vs from the approbation of others. And all the glorie of the world, is of no such merrit, as, that a man of vnderstanding, should so much as stretch foorth his finger, onely to gaine it. There are manie men in these dayes, that will neuer aduenture in the perrilles of Warre, or where their duty most commandeth them: if they thought that they should not be seene, or it should not bee publickely reported, that they haue performed some perticuler deed of praise, beyonde the honour they pretended to enioy, only because they are couetous of glory and reputation.

Men shoulde not couet their owne praise.

Chrisippus and Diogenes.

The vanity of such as seeke after praise.

If this might be allowd for good, then men needed not to bee vertuous, but in publicke; and the operations of the soule (where is the true seate of Vertue) should serue vs to no other end, but to vse them as a rule and order, without any endeuor to attain the knowledge of them in other persons: Vertue then should bee a verie vaine and friuolous thing, if shee deriued her commendation from Glorie. For, what is more casuall and accidentall then reputation? To cause that our Actions should be seene and knowne, belongeth to the Handie-worke of Fortune. Oftentimes, the reputation of an action wel performed, continueth (it may bee) but three or foure dayes: Other-whiles, so long as hee and his liueth; and yet soone after, no more memorie remaineth of either.

The powerfull operations of the soule.

Not to be noted, is to do well continually.

Some there are, that will rashlie and willingly fall into daunger, to purchase false Honor; and dying so, he is neuer after so much as talkt of: whereby, both he and his renowne dooth perish together. It hath been meere hazard, that is reported of some Captaines, Grecians, Romaines, Persians, French, Germaines, and others; as also of an hundered thousand men, that are dead, in execution of worthy enterprizes, or hindering of them, yet none spoken of, because all depended on Fortune. Wee reade, that Cæsar was neuer wounded; yet was he present in more then fiftie battailes, and at infinite Cities surprizing. Whereas others, vpon much lesse occasions, haue beene maimed and slaine: and what can be said of Cæsar heerein, but that it was his good Fortune?

False honour soone gotten.

Fortune much auaileth in purchasing commendation.

It hath beene, and yet is an ordinary Vice, that we are more desirous of great then of good Reputation: And it appeareth to be sufficient, that our names run thorowe other mens mouthes, as receyuing there both life and lasting, and must bee there kept, out of our owne possession. But Wise men do propose vnto themselues a more iust and certain end, in any important enterprizes, to wit; actions of Vertues, which are so Noble of themselus; as there needs no other praise or recompence to be sought for, but cuē their owne worth & value, and Namely, not to seeke for their esteeme, in the vanitie of humaine iudgements. And yet notwithstanding, this false opinion serueth to containe men in their deuoire, that it may bee executed with a certaine caution and modeſty. In this manner, Women of what degree ſoeuer, may be aduertiſed, when they are ſought after by laſciuious men; not to make refuſall, by ſaying, they holde their Honour in account: but rather to tell them, that it is their dutie to goueme themſelues chaſtly.

Of Lyſander the famous Lacedemonian Soldier.

Lyſander, the great Lacedemonian captaine, anſwered a certaine odde Fellow, who told him; That he would commend him euerie where, and counter-checke all his Diſpraiſers. I haue two Oxen (quoth he) in the fielde that cannot ſpeake, and yet neuertheleſſe, I know that which is good for labour, from the other that is not. Heereby he gaue to vnderſtand, that vertue ſtood in no neede of mens Commendations, conſidering ſhee carrieth with her ſelfe good renowne and honor: but ſuch men as do not performe any Vertuous acte, they (indeed) haue need of popular praiſes.

Of Antiſthenes the Athenian.

Antiſthenes the Athenian, made a mockerie of ſuch, as by ſumptuous buildings, Statues, Trophies, and compoſition of Books, promiſed vnto themſelues an immortall reputation: for he taught them, that the true and only means of compaſſing praiſe, was to liue iuſtly and Religiouſly. It was alſo one day told him, that certaine ſcelerous and bad perſons commended him: whereto he replyed, If ſuch men praiſe me, I feare that I haue committed ſome foule offence: perſwading himſelfe, that ſuch kind of people can neuer giue any good reputation.

Of Erethrion the Sophiſter.

Erethrion the Sophiſter, hearing that he was ordinarily commended by Alexinus, anſwered; That is a great meruail, for I do nothing but detract and ſpeake euill of him in all places where I come. Declaring by this anſwere, that he would not haue his renowne to be wronged and baffeld by ſuch an one as was worthy of nothing but reprehenſion. And to ſpeake the truth, this Alexinus was a man of no reckoning, or deſerued to haue anie good ſpeeches vſed of him. For, vpon a time, as hee was verie vehemently depraying Stilpo the Megarian, reputed in thoſe times for a great Phyloſopher, one ſuddenly told him, that it was not long ſince that Stilpo had ſpoken verie well of him, and with great reſpect, giuing him extraordinarie Commendations: By Iupiter (anſwered Alexinus) I ſay at this preſent, that Stilpo is a very braue & excellent man. Thus yee may diſcerne, what vanity and inconſtancy was (in an inſtant) apparantly diſcouered in Alexinus.

The praiſes of bad & wicked perſons, are worth nothing.

The Reader may gather by this Diſcourſe, that hee ſhould neuer giue anie praiſe of himſelfe, except hee haue done ſomething that commendeth it ſelfe, and may thereby incite others to Vertue, although thorough want of Modeſtie, he ſhall otherwiſe bee blameable. In like manner, not to deferre or keepe himſelfe from dooing well and Vertuouſly, when any occaſion ſhall aptly offer it ſelfe, and where his owne perticuler dutie both bindeth and commandeth him, albeit no Witneſſes, Beholders, or Scriueners ſtand by, to Regiſter or ſet downe his actions in Writing. So baniſhing from vs all ſuch vanity, wee ſhall well content our ſelues with that recompence, which Vertue draweth after her continually; becauſe it is immortall, and ſubiect vnto no perriſhing, as that Renowne is, which dependeth wholy on mens iudgements.

The Authors Concluſion on this Argument.

CHAP. XXIIII.

By what varietie of meanes, Frances Sforza, and Nicholas Pichiniue wonne the renowne, of being the moſt skilful men in the Art Military, that liued in their dayes.

IT appeareth, according to Naturall Reaſon, that he who hath attained to any degree, in anie Art or Faculty whatſoeuer it bee, ought whollie to accomodate himſelfe thereto, following his beginning, thereby to purchaſe his Fame and Reputation. Neuertheleſſe, we do daily ſee, that (by diuers meanes) men reach to one & the ſame end, wherof we haue infinite examples: Among which, it likes me to nominate Fraunces Sforza, who afterward was Duke of Millaine, Purſute of Fame and reputation.

laine, and Nicholas Pichinine the Italian, men verie singuler and expert in Armes: who were in the time of King Alphonsus, of Arragon and Naples, and of Lewes Maria, Duke of Millaine. These two Captaines were very contrarie and enuious against each other, because they seuerally pretended, to beare chiefe honour in Armes aboue his competitor. In which respect, they both declared such courage and dexteritie of spirit; as for a long while it was vehemently doubted, whether of them merited most to be preferred. This equall contention so long continued; till after expence of many yeares, and sundry well fought battailes on both sides; Pichinine was Conquered: by meanes whereof, Sforza hauing the right apparantly on his part, got the glorie, was made Duke of Millaine, and was the sole Maister, or (at least) the more fortunate man.

long contention concluded at last.

The reason of Pichinine name.

These two Contenders, attained (by diuers meanes) to great esteeme and reputation. Nicholas Pichinine, was so litle of bodie, as for that cause only he was called Pichinine. But albeit he was of so litle stature, he was contrarie thereto, in greatnesse of heart, and vndantable resolution. He was a man of few Wordes, and them he vttred but badly too; yet he comprehended in them many great matters. With his Soldiers he was of a chear full and recreatiue spirit, and bountiful to his friends; but sharpe and furious to his enemies. In warre, he was euermore desirous to come to the point, and alwayes (as occasion gaue way) hee would giue present battaile, wherein he wanted neither wit or counsell, and was prouident in exposing himselfe to perils: euermore hating ease, and of such a prompt dispoposition, as many times he would take his enemies vnprouided. Hee much delighted in Watch-Towers, Beacons, and Ambuscadoes, affecting more to vse the seruice of Horsse, rather then Foote, in warre; coueting still to haue his followers Valiant, sharpe of Nature, & dreadfull. This Captaine was of so great spirit, that he could no way be daunted, or declare any signe of feare, albeit his enemies were neuer so many in number. He had a singuler grace and dexteritie, in causing his men to march faire, and guiding them safely: and to conclude, hee won so many excellent Victories in diuers parts of Italy, that he was renowned for a singuler good Captaine.

The description of Pichinine.

His martiall courage and disposition.

His maner of seruice.

His fortune & succession in warre.

Now, as concerning his Competitor, Frances Sforza, his qualities and dispositions were quite contrary to those of Pichinine. He was bigge of body, well proportioned, and strongly limbd of gentle countenance, a quicke stirring eye, bald-headed, a good presence, copious in discourse, and well ordered, a liuely spirite, and well aduised, desirous to reach high enterprises, and patient in aduersities. He alwayes auoided the meanes of breaking Warre, labouring more to vanquish by besiedging, or temporizing, then present fight. He would neuer giue battaile, except he were enforced thereto, or that he saw himselfe vpon a great aduenture. He would haue his men march in good Order; and by the best meanes to be valiant, and yet gracious: making more account of his Infanterie, then his Compleatest Horssemen, continually preferring them to the greatest stratagems, because hee placed best trust in them. He was firme and constant in all his enterprizes, quick and wise in beguiling his enemie, and discouering his Fallacies in all Brauadoes made vppon him. In Nouell inuentions, he would stand vpon his guard; being a man of readye counsell, and aptest spirit in all occasions.

Of these two men, so deseruedly famous, manie Moderne Historians haue largely written: especiallie Æneas Syluius, Pope, in his Cosmographie, and Anthonius Sabellicus, in his Eneades, wher such Readers, as are desirous to bee further informed, concerning these men, may read more amply their liues and actions; for in this place (according to our method in all obseruations, which barres vs from ful report, and bindes vs to breuitie) we are perswaded, that we haue spoken well and sufficiently.

CHAP. XXV.

That the Lyon naturally feareth the Cocke: with many other notable matters concerning the Lyon.

GOD hath not made any creature in this Worlde so strong and powerfull, but there abideth in him some cause of feare or terror, and something is ordained to offend him. In like maner, there is nothing in this world firme and assured, for one thing is destroyed by another; and the same also afterward, ruined by some other thing: so that we know not what may bee warranted, or which thing can bee kept from corrupting.

Nothing in this World of assurance.

Hence it ensueth, that oftentimes we shunne such thinges as are likely to hurt vs, and fall (some other way) into perils, which we least suspect or imagine. Moreouer, among Beastes and other thinges created, there is a kind of naturall Loue or Hatred, by a secret and conceald propriety; by meanes whereof, some seeke and pursue, and others shun and auoyde each other. What Beast is more strong then the Lyon, the Prince of Beasts? Not any, and therefore beares he that name, because (according to som Iudgements) the worde Lyon in Greeke, signifyeth a (King): Or, according to others (Sight) & that in regard of his perfection in seeing, he is so named. But bee it howsoeuer, this powerfull Beast which euerie one feareth, so soon as he espieth a Cock, he fearfully gets him gone: and that by a secret propertie in Nature, euen as the Hare shuns the Hound: and not onelie doth the sight of the Cocke cause this auoydance, but the verie smell, if he feele it far off; or hearing him Crow, it makes him maruailously affraid. Nor doth hee shun this creature only, but also the noise of a Charriot or Waggon running on the way: and by no meanes can hee bee compelled to stay, if he see a man bearing any light in his hand. Which seemeth to bee an incredible matter, that a Beast so furious, should stand in awe or dreade of so small a thing: and yet notwithstanding, it hath been noted by experience: Besides, that which is Written by Plutarch, in his Booke of the difference betweene Hate and Enuie: Pliny, Saint Ambrose, and Albertus Magnus, who sayeth and maintaineth, that if the Cock be of a White Colour, hee maketh the Lyon stande much more in feare of him. Nor can there any assured Reason bee yeelded in this case, but euen (as I formerly saide) that it commeth by a secret proppertie in Nature. And yet Lucretius, the Auncient Poet, sayth; That the Cocke and his Feathers haue a certaine propertie or qualitie, which the Lyon seeing, hee receiueth great terror thereby, and is not able by anie meanes to endure it.

Naturall loue or hatred among al creatures.

The Lyon dreadeth the sight, smel, or noise of a Cock, or any light in a mans hand.

Plut. in lib. de differen. Inuid. & c. Plin. lib. 8. S. Ambr. lib. 9. de Examer. Alb. Mag. in lib Animal.

Lucretius the old Poet.

Some others do attribute the cause of this feare, vnto the supreame and celestiall Influences, and not vnto the Beastes Sight, Smell, or the matter it selfe. For, (say they) these two Creatures are subiect vnto the Sunne, the Vertue whereof toucheth the Cocke more then the Lyon: and thence it ensueth, that the Inferiour and lesse Vertuous in this kinde (albeit the bigger and greater in strength) feareth and obeyeth his superiour. And they say moreouer, that in regarde the Cocke is of the Sunnes Nature, hee reioyceth and singeth in the morning at the comming and rising of the Sunne. But be it howsoeuer, we know that the Lyon is more strong, and of greater spirit then all other Beasts; also, extreame in fury & crueltie, against all other of the like Nature. Neuertheless, wee haue infinite plain and manifest examples, of his great Mildenesse and Clemencie, whereof it shall not bee amisse to alledge some, according as I finde them crediblie recorded.

The opinion of others in this case, concerning the Celestiall influences.

Appion the Greeke writeth (according as Aul. Gellius declareth, of a matter seen by himselfe, & the same is likewise affirmd by Ælianus in his Book of Beasts) that in certaine feastes, solemnly obserued in the Citie of Rome, it was vsed as a custome in the great Theater (where diuers kinds of Saluage and cruell beastes were kept, as Lyons, Leopards, and others) men condemned to death were brought and put in, to the end that either they might bee deuourd of them, or to deserue life by valiant Men exposed to wild beasts in the Theater of Rome.

The history of Androdus & his Lyon.

liant defence of themselues, a Spectacle (indeede) verie cruell and inhumaine. It happened vpon a day, that among other offenders thus brought thither, a man named Androdus, Seruant to a Romaine Senator, was to take his Fortune, and amongst the other Beasts in the Theater there was a Lyon of insigne power and greatnesse, as also verie cruel, which had bin brought lately out of Affrica, and the eyes of all the Beholders were fixed on this Lyon. The Beast walking Maiestically about the place, beganne to looke aduisedly vpon Androdus; and seeming to consider, or take some acknowledgement of him; went steppe by step toward him verie gently, albeit, in opinion of all the By-standers, to rent and teare him in peeces. But their expectation was deceiued, for the Lyon bowing downe his head, came curteously to Androdus, who (trembling) awaited nothing else but immediat death; and walking along very louingly by him, stroked his bodie on the legges and thighes of Androdus, kissing and licking his hands and feete, Leaping famiarly & gently on him, euen as yong Whelpes, and other waiting Dogs are wont to doe, when they haue not seene their Maisters in a long time.

A wonderfull vertue in a Lyon to a mã in misery.

Androdus perceiuing the particular affability of the Lyon vnto himselfe, without any shew of the least kind to any of the other condemned persons: cheared his dismayed Spirits, and made much of the Lyon, smoothed his head & hayre with his hand, and looking aduisedly on him, came to former knowledge of him, deliuering manifest signes of ioy and gladnesse, conceyued by this notice taken. Whereat the people were not a litle amazed, & stricken with great astonishment, giuing forth straunge and variable speeches, according as each fancie made coniecture. By meanes whereof, the Emperor caused Androdus to be sent for thence, and beeing brought instantly before him; desired to vnderstand som reason for this priuate and familiar acquaintance, and where hee had formerly seene that Lyon. Whereto he answered, that hauing beene in Affrica, at such time as his Lord was Lieutenant Generall, and great Gouernour there and of that Prouince: in regard of some wrongs & outrages done to him by his saide Lord, hee was enforced to become a fugitiue, and hauing no other place of shelter or safetie, went secretly into a great Forrest, where he tooke vp his lodging in a Caue or Den. Not long had he staid there, but this Lyon entered in vpon him, and not only abstained from doing any harm but lying downe before him, shewed him one of his pawes, which was wounded and bleeding, euen as if hee would haue desired helpe and remedie of him for his griefe. Androdus dreading no danger by this milde behauiour, tooke vp the Lions legge, and looking vppon the bleeding wound, found a great sharpe Thorn sticking in the foot; which plucking forth so gently as possibly he could, hee stenched the blood, so that the paine appeared to be indifferently appeased. This beeing done, the Lyon laying his head in the lap of Androdus, slept verie soundly; & from thence-forwardes, the Lyon walking abroad daily, would bring the best preyes he could get (by his hunting) to Androdus, who drest his food in the Mid-dayes Sun, because hee had no other fire, and was well contented with such prouision.

The first meeting of Androdus and the Lyon, and the curtesy done by him to the Lyon.

After hee had liued thus continually with the Lyon, for more then the space of three yeares; he grew to bee wearie of this kind of life. Wherefore vpon a day, when the Lyon was gone abroad about his wonted game; Androdus departed thence, to take such fortune as might befall him. Not farre had he trauailed from the Forrest, but he was met by some, that knew him to be a fugitiue seruaunt: and therefore brought him home to Rome to his Maister, who iudging him worthie of death, as others in the like case were vsually sentenced, sent him with the other offenders, to the publicke Theater, there to be torne in peeces by the wilde Beasts, and there the Lyon tooke knowledge of him, as formerly hath bin related. When the Emperour had heard this admyrable History, in his owne gracious Nature, & at the peoples importunity: Androdus was deliuered and set at liberty, so was the Lyon likewise, because he had extended such fauor to him. Thenceforward, and a long time after, the Lyon daily walked thorow the streetes of Rome, in the company of Androdus onely, without dooing harme to any body, which was the cause, that manie Romaine Cittizens affected Androdus greatly, and bestowed diuers liberall gifts on him, tearming him the Androdus is brought to his Master, and sent to death.

Androdus and his Lyon, are both set at liberty.

Lyons Phyſition, and the Lyon the hoſt to Androdus. Thus the Lyons misfortune, to bee wounded in the foote by a Thorne: inſtinct of Nature taught him, to make his recourſe to man for helpe. And this appeareth to be verie true, becauſe we haue manie more examples to the ſame effect, aledged by Authors worthy of credit.

The Lyon wounded, comes to man for remedie.

Plin. lib 8. Of Mutor the Syracuſane, that holp another wounded Lyon.

Plinv, in his Booke fore-named, ſpeaketh of a Syracuſane named Mutor, who being in Syria, mette with a Lyon, that preſented himſelfe gently before him, & couching downe on the grounde, made ſignes (as it were of entreaties) to him; but the Syracuſane beeing fearefull of his life, fled away from him, with all the haſt he could vſe. The Lyon ſtill followed, and got againe before him, fawning on him, and licking him verie kindely, till at length the Syracuſan perceiued the Lyon to bee wounded in the foote: which the Lyon lifting vp vnto him, euen as if hee deſired to be eaſed; Mutor tooke foorth a ſharpe ſplinter of Woode, which (by treading thereon) was runne farre into the Fleſh, and ſo the Lyon was releaſed. This Hiſtorie, being painted in a goodly Table by the ſame Mutor in Syracuſa, continued there long after, as a true Teſtimonie thereof.

Plin. lib. 9. Elpis of Samos, who cured another Lion wounded.

The ſame Authour ſpeaketh alſo of another man, named Elpis, borne in Samos, who being diſimbarqued in Affrica; eſpyed ſomewhat neere vnto the Hauen, a Lyon roaring, making towardes him, moaning and complaining verie greeuouſly. The man beeing fearefull, for ſafetie of his life got vppe into a Tree, at the foote whereof, lay the Lyon flat vpon his backe, deliuering manie cries and moanes, lifting vp and ſhewing his paw all bloody, euen as to mooue the man to commiſſeration.

Elpis looking more aduiſedly, with better courage deſcended from the Tree, and drew a great Thorne out of the Lyons foote. In acknowledgement of which good turne done vnto him, ſo long as the Shippe remained in that Hauen: the Lyon brought him and his men dayly, great ſtore of Fleſh, which hee hadde kild in hunting, in a neere neighbouring Forreſt, wherewith they were long time releeued.

These Hiſtories, are the better to be credited, by that which (in like manner) happened vnto Saint Hierome, who healed a Lyon, that hadde receiued the like hurt; in recompence whereof, the Lyon kept companie with Saint Hieromes Aſſe, that was Laden with Wood, euen till he brought him home vnto his Hermitage.

S. Hierom cured another wounded Lyon.

Wee read moreouer, that Godfrey of Bullen, after hee had Conquered the Holy Land, rode vppon a day on hunting in Iudea, where hee found a Lyon fighting with a Serpent: which Serpent had ſo writhed and knit his taile and body about the Lyon, that he was in verie great danger of death. But the Serpent beeing ſlaine by Godfrey, the Lyon in remuneration of this benefite, followed and accompanied him daily, without departing from his guard: and euer when he went on Hunting, the Lyon ſerued in ſtead of his Grey-hound.

The Hiſtorie of Godfrey of Bullen, and a Lyon ſuccoured by him.

It chaunced afterwardes, that Godfrey ſayling vpon the Sea, the Lyon was lefte behinde him, and his Maiſter returned not, to take him with him in the Shippe: yet ſuch was the Loue of the Lyon vnto his Maiſter, that he would needes ſwim after him in the Water, and was drowned before he could be ſuccored. Concerning thoſe Lyons of Babylon, that did no harme vnto the Prophet Daniell, and diuers other beſides, that (in the times of Diocleſian and Numerian, Emperours of Rome) not ſo much as touched thoſe Chriſtians, which were naked ly throwne vnto them, for foode and ſuſtenaunce: I ſet not them downe as examples of the Naturall loue or qualitie in Lyons, becauſe God had a woorking power in ſo high a buſineſſe; and thoſe bleſſed Fauours proceeded only from his appointment.

The ſtraunge loue of a Lion to his Maiſter

Amongeſt other notable thinges of Nobleneſſe in this Beaſt, one Writeth; That he will neuer do anie hurt to man, except hee be thereto conſtrained thorough great neceſsitie and Hunger. If hee then chaunce to meete a man and a Woman together, hee addreſſeth himſelfe rather vnto the Man, then vnto the Woman; and neuer (or verie ſeldome) doth he anie hurt to Children. It appeareth, that the Lyon (in immitation of man) hath ſome Audacitie in thinges that concerne honour, with a kinde of feare to derogate from it. For, if hee finde himſelfe to bee purſued, and knowe

Of noble nature in the Lyon.

knowes that he is seene: he goes with a slow and tardy pace, to declare no want of courage in his flight. But if he know himselfe to bee in the thickest Woodes, and where no eye can catch hold of him: his flight is then to his vttermost power. It is further saide, that when hee flyeth in this manner, he neuer looketh behinde him, to declare thereby, how much hee contemneth them that follow.

Wonderfull knowledge in the Lyon by instinct of nature.

The Lyon, by meere instinct or motion of nature, is of such great and perfect knowledge, that if any man wound him with a Lance, or any other kind of Weapon: let him bee in the company of neuer so many men, yet length of time is no hindrance to him, but hee will select him out among them all, and be reuenged on him, if he can. To this purpose, Ælianus declareth the History of a young Infant, nourished and brought vp by Iuba, King of Mauritania, who growing further in years, and riding on hunting with the King; wounded a Lyon with his Launce. But the Lyon recouering his hurt, within some long while after, the King passed by the same Mountaine where the Lyon was wounded, accompanied with the same young Gentleman that did the deede, and a great many more in the same assembly. The Lyon knowing him that formerly had hurt him, came with great fury and animosity, and entring into the thickest of them; vsed his sight and sauour in such sort, as, if the young Gallant had not beene stronglie defended, the Lyon had torne him ther in pieces.

Aelianus in lib. de Animal.

A strange story of a wounded Lyon.

Of a Lion and his Lyonnesse

The same Authour, and sundry others beside doe assureys, of matter (in my mind) very marualous, to wit; that if a Lyonesse haue companied with another Lyon: her Male doth take knowledge of it by her smell, and then will beate and punnish her very grieuously. Likewise, when the Lyon waxeth so old, as he can fight no longer, neyther chase any other Beastes: his young Lyons, that are more strong and able, doe helpe to prouide for him, and killing their seuerall preyes, they bring it to him where he is, to feede thereon. The Authours to approue al these thinges; are Pliny, Aristotle, Albertus Magnus, and Iulius Solinus; who doe write many other matters, which now I speake not off. Onely I thought it good to set downe these examples, for to confound cruell and vnthankfull men; in shewing them, that among brute and sauage Beasts, clemency is not only found, but also acknowledgement of good turnes receiued.

CHAP. XXVI.

Who was the first Man that tamed the Lyon; And of Lysimachus, a Captaine to great Alexander, what hapned between him and a Lyon.

THe powerfull Beast, whereof we haue discoursed in our precedent Chapter, although he is so cruell & furious; yet notwithstanding, he hath beene tamed and made gentle, by diligence and dexterity in Man. The first that euer vndertook that labour, was a Carthagenian by birth, and named Hanno; but the reward he receiued therefore, was banishment from his Countrey. For they said, that this act of taming the Lyon, was a prefaging of such a Spirit in him; that hee would make himselfe Lord of the countrey. But Plinie saith, that the reason why the Carthagenians banished Hanno, was; because he hauing thus qualified the fierce Lyon; he might the more easily perswade the Cittizens, and worke with them what himselfe pleased. He maketh report also of Marke Anthonie, Cozin to Octauius, who caused Lyons in such sort to be tamed, and brought to gentleneesse: as hee would put their neckes into yokes, and make them draw his Chariot where soeuer he rode. We finde that the like was done by Heliogabalus, of whose prodigalities and lubricities, we shall finde fitter place to discourse. King Iohn of Castile, second of that name, had a Lyon so domestick and familiar; that at all times when he sate in his State, the Lyon would lye downe close at his feete. Messire Iaques of Dessa, Arch-bishop of Senule, had the like. Lodouicus Cœlius writeth, that hee read in a good and approued Authour,

The Hiſtory of Lyſimachus, and Caliſthenes the Philoſopher.

I remember also, I haue read that Lyſimachus, one of the Captaines to Alexander the great, slew a Lyon in this manner following. Alexander had then in his company Caliſthenes the Philosopher, who was a man free, learned, and wise; and (according to the true quality of such a man) would oftentimes giue him good enstructions, and reprehensions also, when hee did not as became a King. Whereupon, Alexander growing into displeasure against him; caused him to bee put into a Cage among his Dogs. This was such a shame and ignominy, as so free and vertuous a Spirit as Caliſthenes had, was no way able to endure: but rather would voluntarily haue embraced death, and wherein he was holpen by his Scholler Lyſimachus, who grieued not a little, to see his Maister so dishonorably dealt withall. When Alexander was aduertised thereof, in a great rage; he caused him to be throwne before a Lyon, that the Beast furiously might deuour him. But Lyſimachus, beeing a Man of excellent courage, secretly armed his right arme and hand, afterward, when hee was exposed to the Lyon, and saw him come running (greedily gaping) to deuoure him with a bold and vndaunted Spirit: hee thrust his Arme into his throat, and held him by the root of the tongue so strongely, that albeit the Lyon did him much harm with his pawes, (whereof he was afterward in daunger of death) yet would he not let goe his hold, vntill the Lyon seemed as quite choaked and strangled, by keeping his Arme so long in his throat. Alexander hauing intelligence thereof, desisted from all further anger and rage against him, and commaunded him to be carefully recouered: holding him (thenceforward) for one of his very chiefest fauourites, yea, and in such account, as (after the death of Alexander) hee was one in the number of his Successors, & a most powerfull King. The Authours that doe auouch the truth heereof, are Iuſtine, and Plutarch in the life of Demetrius.

CHAP. XXVII.

That the most and greatest part of people in the world, spake at the first but one language onely, which was giuen them by the will of God: And after the destruction of Babell, then it was changed.

PORphyrius, Iulian the Apostat Emperour, and other enimies to sacred letters, do confesse with the learned, that from the beginning of the Worldes Creation, as there was but one Man and one Woman: euen so there was likewise but one Language onely, which continued to all the people on Earth, vntill the Deluge; yea, till the destruction of Babell, for seruice of the people which made their abiding thereabout, and (by presumption) had made a Tower, or rather a high mounted causey, to warrant and defend themselues from another flood, if so be there should any other happen. But me-thinks, that the people of those times were very grossely conceited, in seeking to fortefie themselues by such cunning: becaus it had beene much better to hinder, then to whet on the anger of God.

One language proceeding from one man and one woman.

Grossenesse in men of the first Age.

There was neuer any man found, or heard of, how great an enemy soeuer he was to the holy Scriptures, that could euer render any reason of the variety of Languages, which are spoken in so many Nations: but onely that which Moyses alleadged; to wit, that it was done by the will of God, to the end, that the Earth might be wholly inhabited, as it was before the flood, and the great race of Noah (finding themselues dissemblable in tongues) might therefore disperse themselues abroad. For men deuided not the tongues, but the deuision of tongues deuided Men, neither was it any intention of men, vsed then, sufficiently by necessary knowledge of Nature, and by the inuention of Arres and Sciences; but a punishment of God inflicted on mankinde. It is a case very cleare and euident, that Languages are not profitable, but in their diuersity, and

Variety of languages the work of God.

The deuision of tongues deuided men.

and if there were but one onely vſed in the World, it would bee meere vanity to know many: for all the first tongues had diuers originals, and depending (in any thing) one vpon another.

Conquerours do giue language to the conquered.

Neuertheleſſe, after that Warres began to be moued through the world, the people that were brought into ſubiection, receiued the Language of the Conquerours. And it is a true marke of Soueraignty, to conſtraine the ſubdued to change their Language; which the Romains much better executed, then any Prince or people whatſoeuer: whereby they ſeeme (as yet) to commaund in the moſt part of Europe. Likewiſe, the laſt King of the Hetrurians, beeing vanquiſhed, did all that the Romaines pleaſed, but yet he would neuer receiue the Latine toong. And by the like reaſons, the Gaules, who ſpake as the Heluetians (as Glareanus and many other Authours thinke) in the time of Cæſar, as by coniecture may bee gathered in the Commentaries of the ſaide Cæſar: did afterward learne the Latine Tongue, becauſe they wereconquered by the Romaines. After that againe, they ſpake the language of the Franconians, a people of Allemaigne, who were mingled among them, by their victories gotten ouer the Romaines. In following time, the Gothes, Vandals, Hunnes, and other people, that ranged thorow the world; left them alſo their tongues. In briefe, of all theſe ſeuerall languages, the Gauls (at this inſtant called the French) builded and framed one perticuler tongue, euen that which to this day they enioy. So that all the fore-ſaid tongues, haue had their variant changes, in leſſe then fifteene hundred yeares, very neere three times each ſeuerall tongue: for at this day, and ſo hence-forward, it will bee impoſſible to vnderſtand the language, that hath beene ſpoken for the ſpace of foure hundred yeares in France.

Glareanus concerning the Gaules and Heluetians.

Whence the language of France had originall.

This hath happened in the very ſame manner at Rome, and in Italy, ſince the time of Cicero and before, for he ſaith; that no man can vnderſtand thoſe Hymnes, which the Prieſts called Salij, or Saliens ſung in their proceſſions, which were compoſed in Latine, that Language-being then there ſpoken; and very ſoone after the foundation of Rome: As alſo the Sibyls Verſes, and many other ancient bookes of thoſe times, that contained very ſacred things. But being fearefull to offend the Gods, or to induce any nouelty in Religion, a matter which draweth after it daily too many calamities: the Senate would haue no other Hymnes to be made, nor that any one ſhould mingle other matter among them, or comment or correct thoſe Bookes of the Sibylles.

Italy, hath alſo changed her language.

Salij, the Prieſts of Mars.

It is generally knowne, that the auncient Language which Rome vſed firſt of all, was pure, delicate, and moſt eloquent Latine: and now at this day, there is hardly any one word thereof truely retained. The Italian tongue now ſpoken, declareth in plaine apparance, to haue taken originall and encreaſing from Strangers, vpon the Empires declination; eſpecially from ſuch as did moſt harme to Italy it ſelfe; to wit, the Gaules, Prouincials, Gothes, Hunnes, Vandals, and other barbarous people, all voyde of humanity; who inſtead of Trophees, haue left them nothing but words and names, euen the moſt excellent that they had. It is not vnknowne to vs alſo, that the Arabians had planted their Language throughout Aſia and Affrica; and yet within few yeares, Philip King of Spaine, hath conſtrained the Moores of Granada, to change both their habite and Language. Peru, commonly tearmed the golden Caſtile, a very great Prouince, now ſpeaketh no more her naturall Language: for the Spaniard hauing conquered it, hath there planted his Language, although it bee diſtance thence the ſpace of a thouſand and fiue hundred leagues; euen as hee hath done the like, in all his other conquered Countries, in thoſe Prouinces tearmed the new World.

By what people the Latine tongue became to be changed.

The new conquered Indians haue changed their language.

In the Iſle of Malta, they were wont to ſpeak the Punick tongue; to wit, that vſed by the Carthagemans, when they would needes hold ſuperiority ouer the Romaines: and now at this day, the Greek tongue is ſpoken there, but very corruptly, mingled alſo with Sicilian. That they had no other Language but the Punick, is eaſie to be prooued, becauſe it is not aboue thirty yeares, ſince there was found engrauen in olde Marble, this which followeth, written in Greek Letters, and yet notwithſtanding, the Language ſeemeth for to bee Hebrew.

Also, as the Foundation of Castle Angelo was laying, there was found vpon an olde Stone of Marble-Iasper, these words engrauen; IEHIEW IEPHDAIA, and others, which (by the iniury of time) were quite defaced. And these latter wordes, were written (for the more part) in Hebrew Letters, and hardly was there found any one, were he Arabe or Iew (who doe surpasse all other Nations in the vnderstanding of Languages) that could deliuer the interpretation thereof.

The language of Egypt changed.

Ægypt, from the time of Mercurius Trismegistus (Author of that worthy booke tituled Pimander,) that was before Abraham and Moyses, had a perticular Language: a thing yet to this day to be seene, by Bookes written in the Ægyptian hand, and in many places of Palestine, in the tongue vsed in those dayes, which (I say) was in the time of the first Kinges that were named Pharaohs, wherein nothing is to be comprehended, neither reade, albeit the Letters are very visible, and not defaced.

The Arabian tongue a perfect language

Neuertheless, at this day they doe not speake that Language, but the Arabian Tongue, without retaining any one word of her auncient tongue: which is saide to bee graue, briefe, accompanied with goodly tearmes, and proper to comprehend all Sciences, as all the Easterne partes (well neere) are, and apt to discourse of Diuine matters; much more then the Greeke, full of ostentation and vanity. Which being well perceiued by that worthy Æsculapius, the fore-named Trismegistus: he desired of GOD and the King, that his Bookes and Writings might not passe through the Grecians handes, neyther bee translated or commented by them.

Sellio 11. de vit. Lib. The request of Mercurius Trismegistus

Heere we are to note, that if (at this day) wee haue any Bookes of the ancient Ægyptians; they came from the Greekes and Iewes, who traduced them into their Language, when they kept their Schooles, where they taught all Sciences: witnesse Socrates, Plato, Democritus, Xenophon, Philostratus, Iamblicus, Apollonius, and diuers other great personages, who went purposely thither, to be instructed in good Sciences, whereof great account was made in those times. And let vs not forget Moses, the great Law-giuer, who was learned in all the wisedome of the Ægyptians: as we may gather by the words of Saint Stephen, in the seuenth Chapter of the Actes of the Apostles.

Moses was learned in the Egyptians sciences Acts 7. 21.

In Palestine, and in Ierusalem, they were wont to speake the Syriake toong now a dayes they speake the Arabian. Belonius, in his second booke of Singularities, hath noted, that at this day there are spoken twelue seueral toongs in Ierusalem; and yet notwithstanding, as I haue formerly saide, the Arabian tongue is the most common. Greece hath lost her auncient Language, for in the Cities and Townes, the Primitiue tongue is now not spoken: but a new kinde of Language, which the Turkes (since they began to bee Gouernours there) brought thither with them. And yet neuertheless, in some perticuler places, they speake Greeke verie vsuallie. But by little and little, as the naturall borne Greekes, by reason of their Princes tyranny, became Vagabonds, and went to seeke out other Countries: euen so they (for the more part) hoping there to meet with better entertainement, made themselues Mahumetists, that is to say; they forsooke Christian Religion, and (by the same meanes also) left their Mother tongue, enclining wholly to the Turkish and Arabian; and therfore, before an hundred years can be expired, they wil not speak any more Greeke.

Palestine and Ierusalem haue changed their language. Belon. in lib. 2. Singular. cap. 84.

The alteratiō of Greece, and vpon what occasion.

In the Kingdome of Tremissem, otherwise called Telesin, seated on the Coast of Barbarie, in the Mediterranean Sea, they were wont to speake the Phœnician tongue: now-adaies they doe not retaine any one word thereof, but speake the Morisco Language, because they had beene formerly subdued by the great King Mansor. The cause why this people spake the Phœnician tongue (although they were distant from the Countrey of Phœnicia, verie neere foure hundred Leagues) I will briefely declare, according as Procopius setteth it downe in the Historie of the Vandales, leauing a verie notable marke thereof, in these wordes. All this Countrey (saith he) which reacheth from Sidon,

The reason why the kingdome of Telesin changed her language.

Procopius in Hist. Vandal. The scituatiō of Phœnicia.

Sidon, so farre as Ægypt, was heretofore cald Phœnicia, and such as haue written the History of the Phœnicians, do declare; that sometime one King onely raigned there. In these Countries dwelt the Gergesites, Iebusites, and others, who when they beheld Iosuahs great Army comming against them: they passed into Ægipt, but soone after, that Countrey being not able to support thē, they went thence into Affrica, wher they builded many Townes and Villages, and peopled the Countrey, euen so farre as the Pillars of Hercules, and their language was Phœnician. In Numidia likewise they builded, and (among other Citties) that most strong and firmely seated Citty of Tingitana, where two Collomnes of white stone are to bee seene, neere the great Fountaine, whereon (in the Phœnician tongue) are engrauen these wordes. We are they, who were before that great Brigande Iosuah, the Son of Nun. Such (saith he) was the originall of these people, who are (at this day) called Mauruſians, or Mauritanians. Their Languages then became wholly changed, by the comming in of other people.

The ancient strong Cittie of Tingitana in Numidia.

England was wont to haue a particular Language by her selfe, according as Cæsar testifieth: but beeing afterward conquered by the Saxons, a people of Germany, they long time kept the Saxon tongue. In following time also, growing frequent with the French, hoping to ouer-rule them: they well neere quite changed the Saxon tongue, begetting one Language, consisting partly of French, Danish, Saxon, and Pictish. So that out of all these tongues, they forged one intirely new, and that little aboue three hundred years since. Which hath ...ene well obserued by venerable Bede, a great Diuine, and Sir Thomas Moore, sometime Lord Chancellour, and a very learned Gentleman, and both these Men of the English Nation.

The Polanders, Vandales, Bulgarians, Seruians, Dalmatians, Croatians, Bosnians, Russians, Valachians, Bohemians, Lituanians, Moscouites, &c. spake the Germaine or Tentonicke tongue: but at this day, they speak the Sclauonian language, that is to say, Illyrian, witnesse Ladislaus King of Lituania, who about the yeare 1599. hauing espoused a Virgine, named Anne, the Heire of Poland, that could speak no other Language but the Allemaigne, as then in those times it was spoken in Poland: would neuer leaue her company, vntill she had learned the Lithuanian tongue, which shee easily attained vnto in eight months space. The Allemaignes also say, that the language which by them is now vsed, is not their auncient tongue; but is very diuers, and hath borrowed great store of wordes, from people by whom they haue hitherto beene foyled, or ranaged, or by beeing imployed in Warres, as among the Gaules in Italy, Spain, Greece, and the Easterne Countries. Neuer should I growe to any conclusion, if I were to set downe those seuerall people, that haue changed their Language since the Deluge: or proone, that there is not any Nation at this day, which speaketh the Language of our first Father Adam and Noah. All haue changed, and yet will change, so long as the World endureth; for such is the Nature of vicissitude, in thinges of this world.

Great nations speake the Illyrian tongue.

The Allemaign language changed.

The Authors conclusion.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of Graning or Caruing, and of Painting: which of them is most ancient and excellent.

IN these times I haue heard of very many different opinions, concerning these two Arts of Statuary or Stone-cutting, and Painting; to wit, which of them is most commendable, and best worthy of praise. Very pertinent reasons are alleadged both for the one and other, for in the Statue or Sculpture, there is discerned an artificiall imitation of Nature, representing therein the members wholly, round, well formed, and fully measured, euen as if Nature her selfe had shaped them, and much better imitated then in a Table; where we but behold the superficies and colours, which beguile the eye. For the substance is much neerer to truth, then the resemblance. Beside, Sculpture or engraning, is more difficult, because if a fault be therin committed, very hardly can bee amended: in regard, that the Marble or other matter is not to bee pieced or patched, but another figure must of necessity be made. Which falleth not out so in painting, for it may be altered a thousand times, adding thereto, or diminishing, by daily amending. Statues were (in elder times, & yet are to this day) esteemed sacred things, to beautifie Temples or publike places, for the commemoration of famous persons, and such actions of theirs as were heroycall: especially such as we see in the Porches of Temples, and diuers within; which are placed to no other end, but for a remembrance of holy Men or women, that performed many pious deedes, and stood for plantation of the Faith. And for the great respect then made of them, it was permitted (by Emperiall Edictes) to Offenders, and Slaues badly vsed by their Maisters; to haue their enfranchisement, and ease from further persecutions, by holding fast vpon some of those Statues, till audience might bee graunted to their oppressions.

Statues esteemed in ancient times, and for good occasions.

An ancient custome for offenders and Bond-slaues.

Such as do hold Painting to be more excellent, make their allegations; that thereby is imitated much more truely, the very Nature of the thing so represented, then it can be by the Statue. And that it must needes be so, they produce (for example) that which is written by Plinie, concerning one Xenxis, a Painter of Heraclea, who presented a Table, wherein hee had painted bunches of Grapes so naturally: that Sparrowes flying by it, stroue to rest on them, and pecked at them, as taking them to bee true Grapes indeede, so that his workemanship was reputed to bee both famous and singuler. At another time, the same Zeuxis painted a young Man in a Table, carrying like bunches of Raisine Grapes in a Dish, which were so liuely made: as the Birds were thereby againe deceiued, the Birds likewise descending from the ayre, to peck at them as if they had beene very Raizins, without any feare at all of the young man.

Histories concerning Painting.

They say moreouer, that Parrhasius, a Painter likewise, and an emulatour of the foresaid Zeuxis, painting a Partridge vpon a Collomne in Rhodes, drew it so naturally according to life: that (in the iudgment of euery beholder) it seemed to be aliue indeed. Nay more, the perfection of painting this Foule was such, and so compleate, that bringing other Partridges before it (such as now adaies are kept in Cages:) they would call vnto it, flutter their Winges before it, and vse their kinde of singing, taking it for a liuely Bird indeede. They yet goe further, saying, that Apelles painted a Horse according to life, and other Painters making proofe in their skill of the like; would needes vrge tryall of the most ablest workmanship. Whereupon, it was thought fit to bring liuing Horses before him, for better approbation of the experiment, and beeing brought before those figures painted by the other Painters; they stood still, without any shew of account or motion. But when that which Apelles drewe was presented before them; they began to stirre, tread, and whinnow, which they did not at the sight of any of the other: whereby, the greatest honour and aduantage in Art, was adiudged to Apelles, and he reputed to bee the most excellent Painter.

Parrhasius a cunning painter of Ephesus.

Apelles a famous Painter of the Isle Coos

Now to speake mine opinion heerein, I say, that (for all these Fables, lesse seeming true, then Pliny writes them) Painting cannot be accounted to be the more excellent Art: For all Creatures that fly in the Ayre, or feede on the earth, or liue in the Water, do nourish themselues, and are more mooued by the sence of smelling, then by sight. To approoue the truth hereof, let any man paint a Rat, and draw it neuer so artificially according to life: then let it bee presented before a Cat, to try if she wil stirre, or offer to take it. Let any man also set a Table before Fowles, with painted Capons, Hennes, Cockes, Pigeons, or such like; let there be likewise painted in the Table, Barly, Oates, or any other Corne fit for them to feede on; and try if they moone or come to touch it. Let any Painter portraite a Ginne or Snare, with either a Goose, Lambe, or any other prey surprised in the Snare, counterfeited by Art most naturally; and then make triall, if a Wolfe or Foxe will offer to lay holde on it, which indeede they would doe, if they had life.

The Authors refutation of the former Histories.

In like manner, let there be painted in a Table a goodly Mare, formed with all all features neereſt to life, then bring a Stallion before it, and try if he will offer to couer her. Let there be alſo in the ſame Table a goodly fieide, with diuers Horſes feeding at paſture; and try if he will beare them company. Shew to any Horſe painted Prouender, and try if he will whinnow to haue it: which naturally he will do, if he be in his Stable, although there be none at all offered to his ſight. By theſe Allegations I would plainly ſhew, that Creatures (of theſe kinds) do not ſo much moue themſelues by ſight, as by ſence of ſmelling; and that all which Pliny hath ſaide of theſe Paintings, are meere fables, for theſe Creatures haue no knowledge of Paintings.

Painters of ancient times did not ſurpaſſe the men of theſe daies

It ſerueth to no purpoſe, to ſay, that the Painters of theſe daies, are not ſo ſufficiēt, neither do make ſuch exquiſite workes, as thoſe in former times did. I anſwer, that there are men as excellent euery way, & that wil not giue ground in any iot, to the very beſt before them. For, there are yet to bee ſeene in theſe daies, both Paintings and Statues of ancient Grecians, Romaines, Ægyptians, and other Leuantines; which come nothing neere (by much) in perfection, to things done by Painters and Statuaries of our time. I dare make them my Iudges, who, being curious in the ſight of ſuch thinges, and trauailing thorow lower Germany; haue viſited the Chambers and cabinets of many famous houſes, as alſo in France and Italy, and what elſe is to be ſeene in Churches.

Another Hiſtory of Parrhaſius and Zeuxis.

There is another Hiſtory alleadged, borrowed likewiſe out of the ſame Plinies ſhop, that Parrhaſius deceiued Zeuxis by a Table, whereon nothing elſe was painted but a Curtaine, and it beeing preſented to Zeuxis, to yeeld his iudgement of the workmanſhip; he offered to draw the Curtaine, to behold what was figured vnder it. The Authors anſwer by apt comparisons. I anſwer, that this Hiſtory, how true ſoeuer it be, & whether it ſo hapned or no, may make painting to bee much more commendable, then all the other Fables formerly deliuered from Plinie. For as man is the leaſt of all creatures, in exquiſite perfection of ſenſe, and that often deceiueth himſelfe, in the ſenſes of ſight, touching, taſt, and ſmell; yea, euen in iudgement, eſpecially when he is detained by a precipitation, or paſſion of Spirit, and then apprehendeth one thing for another: euen ſo might it then fall out with Zeuxis, in regard of the enuy he bare to Parrhaſius.

Hauing confuted theſe fables alleadged by Pliny, which ſerue onely for the praiſe of Painting: I will now ſet down ſome reaſons of mine owne, whereby I wil approue Painting, beyond Caruing or Grauing. In Statues or Carued Figures, there are many thinges defectiue, which cannot faile in Painting, and principally day light and ſhaddow; becauſe fleſh yeildeth a different light, from that which Marble or ſtone affordeth, and that the Painter imitateth, with clearneſſe or obſcurity, more or leſſe, according as the thing requireth, which the Image-maker cannot performe. And yet notwithſtanding, though painting doth not make the Figure round: yet it ſheweth the muſcles and members in rounded ſhape, ſo that they are diſcerned, as ioyned to thoſe parts which cannot be ſeene, & by ſuch apt meanes; as it is eaſily knowne, that the Painter vnderſtands and perfectlie knowes them. And heerein is required another artifice more great, in forming the members that lengthen or ſhorten, according to the proportion of ſight, by reaſon of perſpectiue; which by the power of lines and meaſure of colours, day-light and ſhaddowes, doe ſhew in their ſuperficies on a plaine wall, neere or farre off, more or leſſe, as himſelfe pleaſeth.

The Authors reaſons, why Painting precedeth Caruing.

For forming the true proportion of the members.

Nor is the true imitation of naturall colours, a matter of ſuch ſmal moment as ſome do imagine, in counterfeiting fleſh, ſhape of Garments, and all other thinges requiring colours. And yet the Caruer cannot doe this; much leſſe expreſſe and repreſent the gratious ſight of the eye, black, green, or otherwiſe, with the ſplendour of amourous beames, or in Colour full of reuenge. The Caruer alſo knowes not how to diſcouer the beames of the Sunne, Lightning, Thunders, and other ſuch like thinges; as faire Lockes of Haire, nor the goodly troopes of armed forces, nor a darkeſome night, nor a tempeſt on the Sea, nor a flaſh of Lightning, nor ſtormie Windes, nor the beſiedging of a Citty, nor the Suns riſing Admirable imitation in Painting.

in the morning, or Aurora her selfe, (bringing bright day) in her colours like Roses, disparkled with radiances of gold and purple. Briefely, he cannot represent Heauen, Earth, Seas, Mountaines, Forrests, Fields, Gardens, Riuers, Cities, nor Houses, all which the Painter can perfectly shew. It is also wel known, that if a Painter apply his colours vpon a carued statue, whatsoeuer it be; it wil appeare so much the more commendable. In this respect, me thinks that painting is a more Noble Science, and of much greater artifice, then Caruing or Grauing, and I think that our ancients held it in great reputation, & as highly as other things: albeit, both these Arts do seeme to issue out of one & the same fountaine, because that in both the one and other; Geometry is very requisite, for the vnderstanding of perspectiue. This Science appeares to me, not to be mechanicall, because it is very conuenable, & may well be vsed by any Gentleman. I remember I haue read, that our auncient predecessours, especially throughout all Greece, would haue Noble mens children enstructed in schools in the art of painting, as a Science most honest, and very necessary. It was admitted in the first degree of the liberall Arts, and soone after defended by publike Edict, that it should not be taught to Slaues or Seruants.

Painting a more Noble Science then Caruing.

Painting no mechanicall Science.

Noblemen vsed the Art of Painting.

Amrong the Romaines, Painting was held in great honor, and thence it deriued a most Noble sir-name, euen from the House of the Fabij; for the first Fabius was sir-named the Painter, because he was (indeede) a very excellent Painter. And so much was he addicted to painting, that hauing painted the wals of Templum Salutis; he placed there his owne name; as thinking, that although he was deriued of a noble house, honored with many Titles, Consulships, triumphes, and other dignities; albeit he he was learned, well read in the lawes, & numbred amongst the best Orators: yet he was of the mind, that hereby he might (neuertheless) encrease his renowne, by such an especiall splendour and ornament, and left it to memory, that he was a Painter.

Fabius a Noble man of Rome a skilfull Painter.

Moreouer, many other are recorded of noble houses, that haue bin famous in this art, in which, beside the Nobility & Dignity therof; many commodities are thence deriued. Especially in the time of wars, for designing and portraiing Countries, scituations of Riuers, Bridges, Castles, Fortes, and such like thinges: which thus may be described to others, euen as if they were exactlie imprinted in memory, which otherwise were a difficult thing to do. I conclude then by this discourse, that the Art of sculpture or caruing, is much inferiour to painting: yea, and it will be of much longer continuance, if it bee kept in a dry place, and wel sheltred from winds and raine, and the longer it lasteth, so much the more pleasing it is to behold.

Painting not onely Noble, but pleasing & profitable, especially for for warre.

CHAP. XXIX.

Against such aged persons, as think nothing to be well done, but what was performed by themselues in their youth; blaming extreamely the present times, and what is now done, in respect of the former; And what is the cause thereof.

HAuing many times considered, (and not without great admiration) whence such an error ensueth, which verily may be beleeued, to be proper and naturall to aged people; because it is commonly noted in them, that they doe wholly (as it were) commend times past, condemning the present, and blaming our maners, actions, & whatsoeuer else they themselues did not in their younger daies; Affirming also, that all good customes, behauior of life, all vertue, and all thinges grow worse and worse: Truely, it seemeth to me a matter farre off from reason; nay more, very maruailous, that mature and ripe age should wander so strangely. For long experience begetteth custome, & (in sollemne allowance) presumeth to iudge perfectly of men. And yet herein their iudgments were so much corrupted, as they neuer perceiued, how the world began daily to impaire, and that the Fathers were better then their children; a very long time remaining, to ariue at the vttermost degree of wickednes, times still declining from better to worse. And yet notwithstanding all this, we behold it daily, a vice proper and Aged people do oftentimes loose both reason and iudgement.

Our fore-fathers more happy then their children and peculiar to age, euen as it hath bin in former daies; so to continue still among vs liuing. Which hath beene knowne and made manifest, by the writings of many very ancient Authours, and especially by the Comicks, who (much better then any other) expressed the true Image of humaine life. Therefore I conceiue, that aged people hold this false opinion, because our yeares poasting away so swiftly, as they carry hence many other commodities; so (among others) they rob vs of our blood, and a great part of our vitall Spirits. In regard wherof, our complexion changeth it selfe, and the bodies Organes become feeble, that should exercise the vertues of the Soule.

A reason for the inconueniences before alleaged.

The cause of our generall instant discontentment.

And this is the cause, that in these our instant daies, the delicate and sweet floures of contentment doe fall from our heartes, as Leaues doe from the Trees in Autumne, and, in stead of clear and free thoughts; obscure, troubled, melancholly, and sad conceits get entrance, accompanied with a thousand calamities. So that, not onely the Body, but the Spirit also becommeth sick; which retaineth not any iot of our passed Spirits, except a long remembrance, and Image of that acceptable time of youth: which wee perswading our selues to finde againe, it appeareth then to vs, that Heauen, Earth, and all things else are glad therof, and do smile at them (verily) in our sight; resoluing our thoughts, that in them (as in a faire and goodly Garden) the sweet Spring time of ioyfulnesse still flourisheth. In which respect, perhaps it would proue profitable, when (already) in a cold and backward season, the Sunne of our life beginneth to decline towardes the West, in despoyling vs of our pleasures: that we would also (there-with) loose the remembrance of them, and finde (as Themistocles said) A Science enstructing how to forget them. Because the sences of our body are so fallacious; that oftentimes themselues do beguile the iudgement of the spirit.

The wise saying of Themistocles.

A similitude answerable to the argument of aged people.

And therefore it seemeth to me, that aged people are of their condition, who setting forth from any Port or Hauen, doe still fixe their eies vpon the Land: whereby they conceit, that the Shippe moueth not, but that the land & houses are in motion, which neuertheless is quite contrary. For the Hauen, as also the time, and former or present pleasures, continue still in their wonted estate, and we (with the Ship of mortality) saile away; we poast on one after another, thorow this impetuous Sea, that deuoureth all things. Nor are we euer permitted to take landing againe; but beeing continually tossed by contrary winds, our vessell runs and breaks it selfe against one Rocke or other.

The Spirit (then) of a man waxing old, a subiect contrary to all kind of pleasures; it cannot apprehend any taste of them. And, as all sorts of Wines, although they be neuer so good, seeme bitter to such as are troubled with a Feuer, in regard that the taste is changed, onely by the meanes of corrupted humors: euen so in aged people, by reason of their indisposition (albeit there is no defect in desire) all pleasures seeme vnsauory, cold, and far differing from such as they remember once to haue essaied; and yet those pleasures (in themselues) are the very same which they wer wont to be. And because they finde themselues to be depriued of those pleasures; they complaine and blame the pretime, as if it were naught, neuer considering, that this mutation proceedeth from themselues, and not from the time.

The Spirit growing aged, loatheth pleasures.

Another excellent comparison.

No defect in the time, but in our selues.

On the contrary, when they sit down, & call to memory their passed delights; they then likewise remember the time wherin they enioyed them; and (in that respect) repute them to bee good, because it appeared then, and so doth yet, that they brought a sweete rellish with them, which they (yet) remember to haue felt when they had them. For, in effect, our thoughts doe hatefully condemne all things, that haue bin companions with our displeasures; and loue al them that haue suted with their likings. In which regard, it happens sometime, that we see an amourous Fellow, take great delight to behold a Window, although it be shut against him: yet hee conceiueth a liking thereof, because (in former time) he had the fauour there to gaze on his Lady, or loues Mistris. In like manner, to see a Iewell, a Letter, a Garden, or any other thing whatsoeuer; that seemeth (as yet) to be a testimony, to former effected pleasures: where-

Pleasures appeare to be good, according as we tast them.

Comparisons not vnfitting the present purpose.

whereas on the contrary, a goodly, faire, and rich adorned Chamber, will appeare hatefull to him, that hath been imprisoned therein, or that there hath suffered any disliking.

Strange humors in some Men and women.

I haue knowne some, who (by no meanes) would drinke in a Cup that resembled some other Cup, wherein (being sick) they receiued a medicine. For, as the window, or the Ring, or the Letter, representeth to the one party, a sweete remembrance, which to him is the more acceptable, by how much it appeareth still a partaker of his former enioied pleasure: euen such is the other parties conceit, that the Chamber, or the Cup, are still fresh Ensignes of his imprisonment, or sickneſſe. I think, that for the very same reason men (in years)

The reason of aged peoples reprouing present times.

are mooued to commend passed times, and throw blamefull aspertions on the present. By means whereof, in speaking of Warres, Courts of Iustice, or those belonging to Princes, & such like, they affirme: that those in their time, and wherof they do yet bear remembrance; were much more excellent, and filled with more singuler men, then they are which at this instant they daily behold.

The prayses giuen by aged people to former times.

So soone as such cases doe come in question, they presently begin to exalt infinitely, the people that liued in their former times, and declare, that (in those elder daies) it could not bee found, but very rarely, that a man committed a murder; that then were any combats or fights, ambushes or treacheries: but an assured honesty and faithfulnes, an amiable and loyall iustneſſe among al Men. That in Courts (in those times) reigned so many good manners, & such a perfect honesty: that all Courtiers were then religious, and Saintes; that they would not take part with any man, who had offered a bad word to another, or had vsed any signe of dishonesty to a Woman of Honour.

The cõplaint of aged people on these instant times.

On the contrary, they say, that now in these daies, they behold all things to bee quite opposite to the former, and that not onely among Courtiers, men of warre, and young people, brotherly affection is lost, and al laudable manner of liuing: but also in Courts and Cities, now raigneth nothing but enuies, euill will, wicked manners, and a life most dissolute, abounding in all kindes of vices. That Women are lasciuious, haue lost all shame, and men (for the more part) are become effeminate. Moreouer, they blazon their garments to be dishoneſt, and ouer pompous. In breefe, they reprehend a number of things, among which (truely) there are some that weldeserue reprehension, because it cannot be denied; but that there are (among vs) many bad and wicked men, by whose meanes, this present world must needs be fuller of errours, then that which these good people so highly commend.

Some faults that merit reprehension.

It appeareth to me, that they doe ill discerne the cause of this difference, and declare themselues to be meere fooles; in that they would now haue the world to be wholly good, without any euill remaining in it, which is a matter vtterly impossible. For, euill being contrary to goodneſſe, and goodneſſe to euill: it appeareth euen necessary (as it were) that by a certaine kinde of repugnancie and contrariety; yea, by a manner of counterpoise; the one should sustaine and strengthen the other. In such sort, that the one failing, or encreasing; the other likewise should encrease, or run to ruine, because there is no contrarie, without another.

An answere made to these complaints.

No contrary, but it hath another.

Who doth not know, that no Iustice could be found in the world, if ther were not grieuances, iniuries, & oppressions? No magnanimity, if there were not pusillanimity? No continence, if there were not incontinency? No health, if sickneſſe had not his course? No truth, if ther were not lying & falshood? Nor any felicity or happineſſe, if there were not fals and misfortunes? For this cause Socrates said well with Plato; He meruailed very much, that Æsope had not made a Fable, feigning therein, why God did not vnite pleasure and greefe togethor, tying them to such extreamities, as the beginning of the one, might be the ending of the other. For we doe euidentlie behold, that no pleasure would at any time be acceptable, if sorrow had not gone before it.

A reason for the present annoyances.

The saying of Socrates and Plato.

What is he that could discerne, how precious quiet rest and repose is, if first he haue not felt the pain of trauaile and wearineſſe? Who could tell, what the benefit is of eating, drinking, and sleeping, if first he had not endured hunger, thirst, and watchings? Let mee tell yee then,

The goodnes of al things is approued by the harme of their contraries.

then, that paſſions and diſeaſes are giuen to men by nature, not principally to make them ſubiect thereto; for it would ſeeme very inconuenient, that ſhe who is the Mother of all, ſhould (by her counſell and wiſedome) ſend vs many harms; But nature hauing made health, pleaſure, and other good things: ſends after them ſickneſſe, diſpleaſure, and other annoyances. For all vertues being firſt graunted to the world, by the free gift and fauour of Nature: afterward immediatly, all vices, by a contrary concathenation or combination, follow as their companions or attendants. So that the one encreaſing, or decaying; ſhe is compelled to grant (in this manner) that the other alſo ſhall encreaſe, or grow to defaylance.

Vices doe alwaies attend the Vertues.

Wherefore, when old men do extol the paſſed times, affirming, that no men were then ſo vicious, as now they are in theſe daies: they may alſo alledge their ignorance, whether then ſuch vertuous men were to be found, as many are well approoued to bee at this day. Nor is there any matter of marualle heerein, becauſe there is no euill ſo great; as that which ſpringeth from the ſeede of corrupted goodnes. And for this cauſe, Nature producing now great ſtore of Spirits, of much better temper then before they were, as ſuch who of themſelues haue turned to goodneſſe: hath performed a better workmanſhip, then in thoſe times (ſhee did) whereof they talke ſo much, euen as they that turne to euill, doe ſo much the worſe. We may not then ſay, that ſuch as ceaſe to doe euill (becauſe they know it not) do in this caſe deſerue any praiſe: for although they haue ſildome committed any harme, yet (notwithſtanding) they would haue done much more if they could.

No euill ſo great, as that which groweth out of goodneſſe.

Former ſpirits inferior to the of theſe daies.

Now, that the Spirits of thoſe precedent times in generall, were much inferiour to them lately or now liuing: may ſufficiently be knowne, by all matters obſerued of them: as well in learning, as in Painting, Statues, Buildings, and in all other things. And yet Men of yeares, doe reproue and blame many thinges in vs, which are not (of themſelues) eyther good or euill, onely becauſe that they (in thoſe daies) did them not. They ſay, it is not fit for a young man, to ride on his Foot-cloath Nagge thorow the Cittie, but eſpecially not on a Mule; or to weare any skinnes of Furres in Winter; or a long Gown in the Spring time; or any bonnet, vnleſſe the Man haue attained to the age of eighteene yeares. And other ſuch like things, wherein (truely) they greatly diſcontent themſelues, becauſe that ſuch Cuſtomes (beſide the commodity and benefit they affoord) haue been brought in by vſe, and are as pleaſing now to euery one, as then men delighted to goe in Caſſockes or Iackets, with open ſhooes, and cloſe Breeches. And for a man to ſhew himſelfe a Gallant, he muſt carry a Hawke on his Fiſt all day to no purpoſe; daunce, without holding his Miſtreſſe by the hand, and vſe many other faſhions, which were then much eſteemed: but now doe appeare to bee groſſe and vnbefitting. Theſe are moſt of their ſoundeſt reaſons, why the cuſtomes of theſe times ſhould not bee obſerued, but remaine ſtill to the calumnies of aged folke, extolling themſelues, by ſaying: Twenty yeares and more were paſt with mee, and yet I ſlept with my Mother and Siſters, and knew not (in long time after) what a Woman was. But now, Boyes, almoſt as ſoone as they be borne, know more naughtineſſe, then the tauleſt Men could reach vnto in thoſe dayes. When they vtter theſe ſpeeches, they doe not perceiue, how ſtrongly they confirme, that the very Children of our time, haue much more ſpirit, then aged Men had in thoſe daies. And that was well noted by Horace the Poet, in his time, ſpeaking of our auncients, to this effect: They commend whatſoeuer themſelues did in their youth; And will haue young people to forme their liues by their Age. But I purpoſe to ſhew more perticularly in the following Chapter, the groſſeneſſe of people in thoſe forepaſſed times, and the ſubtilty of braue Spirits in young men of theſe daies.

The inuectiues of aged people againſt younger.

CHAP. XXX.

¶ A compariſon betweene the Buildings, Feaſtes, Garments of Men and Women, Armes, and manner of making warre, in the daies of our fore-fathers, and thoſe that are vſed in theſe our times.

Our predeceſſors forme of building, very groſſe & rude

WE will begin, without vſing any other preamble, with thoſe Buildinges, which were made in the daies of our fore-fathers; conſiſting of nothing but very thicke wals, bad Windows, continually beaten with winds and ſtormes; chambers ſubiected one to another; the vaults or houſes of Office, euermore in the moſt eminent places of the Houſe, which ought to be much further off, both from the noſe & eies: imitating nature, who hath placed thoſe partes in our bodyes, through which our vncleanneſſe is to be auoyded, farre enough off from the eyes and Noſe. Of this faſhion, and in ſuch manner of building, it is no long time ſince, that the more part of Maſons and Worke-men ſhaped Caſtles, being places of pleaſure, and Countrey houſes of pleaſure, in no other kinde of conſtructure. But within an hundred yeares, or there-about, a great part of them are demoliſhed: and (in ſtead of them) others erected, after our Moderne manner, much more commodious, and of leſſe coſt, in regard of the time.

The Feaſts & Banquets of our elders.

Some-what let vs ſay, concerning their Feaſts and Banquets, and obſerue in what manner they were ordered. The meate ſerued into the Table, was alwaies in great Chargers, filled with Peaſe and Bacon; Gammons of Bacon; huge Neats toongs ſalted; great pieces of Beefe, boyled Poultry, with pottage about them; boyled Mutton, Veale, & other groſſe food, common (almoſt) in euery ordinary family; and they gorged in theſe Victuals, ſo long as they could cram any more into their bellies. Afterward, they brought in other meats, anſwerable to the former, but roaſted and larded (oftentimes) with vnſauory lard, but it would ſerue for Pigs and Hares. After this ſecond ſeruice had ſtood awhile on the Table, well-neere to no effect: then came in more dainty meats of Foules; as Mallards, wilde Duckes, Ringdoues, young Pigeons, Partridges, woodcocks, Quailes, Pheaſants, woodhennes, Plouers, Turtles, and others of like kinde: which are carried away (like the ſecond ſeruice) almoſt neuer toucht, for they (good men) had filled their ſtomackes with the firſt courſe meates, feeding hungerly on them, and drinking ſower wines, ſuch as Summer marreth, ſo they left the beſt and daintieſt meats indeede, for their Varlets and baſe Seruants to feede on. Was not this a verie lourdery and blockiſhneſſe, to vſe their meates in this groſſe manner? The Maiſters eate nothing but the very heavieſt meates of all, and their Knaues did feede on the lighteſt, moſt exquiſite, and beſt for digeſtion. Let it then be helde no matter of maruaile, if thoſe men had groſſe and heauy Spirits, becauſe, according to the opinion of Plato: Our manners do follow the temperature and quality of the Chylus, or white iuyce, of the digeſted meates which we vſe to eate.

The firſt ſeruice.

The ſecond ſeruice.

The third and beſt ſeruice comes laſt of al, and ſerueth for none but baſe groomes to feede on.

The ſaying of Plato.

Feaſts vſed now adaies.

But in theſe daies, this manner of furniſhing the Table at Feaſtes and meetings, is no more vſed: for in well gouerned houſes, they ſerue in both boyld and roaſted meates, groſſe and delicate together, that each man may eat according to his appetite, or what he beſt liketh vpon the boord. For (vnder ſubmiſſion to better iudgement) I thinke it no way fitting, that the ſeruant ſhould feed on the fineſt, and his Maiſter on the courſeſt; the Knaue ſerued like a Lord, and his commaunder like a Buffone.

Bonnets vſed in auncient time, of very heauy weight

Proceed we now to mens garments. Firſt, the head, hauing buſh naturall (as they tearme it) a huge deale of haire on it; muſt haue as big a Bonnet to couer it, which (in thoſe daies) were cald Spaniſh Bonnets, hauing a turning vp behind, double fringed with red, and this turning vp contained halfe an Elle of woollen-cloath. I haue ſeene one of thē in Paris, that weighed foure pound and ſixe ounces. Another faſhion they had, more honeſt and lighter, tearmed the Croſſe-Bow-Cap; yet with ſeauen or eight Elles of Riband about it: This ponderous wearing (in my minde) did nothing nothing els but dull the braine.

Their wearing Doublets and the fashion of them.

Their Doublets (I meane for the better sort of men) were of leather or course Linnen Cloath behind; and before, of Woosted, or Serge of Arras, which serued halfe the Breast, and so on the armes likewise; yet some (from the Elbowe to the Wrist) vsed to weare Veluet or Sattin. This kinde of Doubtlet, the Frenchmen tearmed Nichil-au-dos, Nothing Behinde, and it was cut according vnto the fashion of Weomens Gownes nowe adayes, that shewes their Breastes naked.

Womens Collers.

The Weomen also in those dayes, had their plaited Collors, wrought with silk, either Blacke or Red, and they were fastened behinde the necke and Shoulders with Silke-Laces: so that they hidde and kept close that which was faireſt, & wold haue made them most gracefull.

Mens Hose or Breeches close to the body.

Mens Hose or Breeches, answered in length to their short skirted Doublets, being made close to their limbes, wherein they had no meanes for Pockets.

Hard meanes for Pockets.

But in stead thereof, they hadde a large and ample Cod-piece, which came vppe with two wings, and so were fastned to eyther side with two Pointes. In this wide roome, they had Linnen bagges, tied with like Points to the inside, betweene the Shirte and Cod-piece. This serued as the receipt for Purse, Hand-kerchers, Apples, Plummes, Peares, Orenges, and other fruits. But did it not seeme verie Inciuill, that sitting at the Table, hee should make a present of such, preserud (for some time) in so sweet a Closset, euen as now adaies, some (as mannerly) vse the like out of their Pockets? As for papers, Letters, and such like, which they ordinarilie receiued, they were to put them in their Hat-bandes, or weare them at their Girdles, like Gloues: wher hung also a great Pouch, made fast with a Ring and Locke of iron, waighing three or foure pound waight, and oftentimes no money at all in it. Surely, in my poore opinion, the fashion of Pockets made in the Doublet Sleene, or in the hose, is much more honest and commendable.

Wearing of Letters.

A great Leather Pouch.

Leauing their high and vnhandsom Shooes, let vs speake a little of weomens habits then vsed wherein I meane not to be tedious. The Attire on the Head, was of great broad Wollen Cloath, of Red or Violet colour, set out with stickes of Woode, and made in the forme of a Suger-loafe. Her Go-vne was verie large and plaited; and the Sleeues thereof so wide, that a Lambe might easilie leape into them. A Traine also was fastned to this Gowne, which com monly contain'd six paces in length. At assemblies and meetings of Weomen, as the rest, so did shee let fall her Traine, dragging it after her in Halles, Churches, perhaps ouer Dunghils, and other vnsauoury filthines. Preparing to Daunce, or some other delight, it was taken vp againe, thogh it serued to no purpose; and then made fast behind, either with a Tach-hooke of Siluer, or a Button of Golde, or of Iuorie. This Garment was not made without great charge, and was verie painfull also to her that did weare it. For, I haue heard aged Weomen (of very honorable houses, that liued in those times, and vsed the same habite) credibly report; that they haue knowne and seene some weomen, who were meerely stifled vnder such long traind Gownes.

What Garments women vsed to wear.

Long trained Gownes.

A painfull pride.

Furred Garments worne at all times.

Moreouer, were it Winter or Summer, in regard of honour, they also were furred with Ermins, Martines, or Sables. I forbeare to speake of their heauie Vardingales, worne vnder those long & waighty Gownes; the Fore-part whereof, was couered with Silke, or Cloth of gold or Siluer, & all the rest was course Buckram or Cantras. At Night, when they haue gone to bed, their bellies and thighs haue beene greeuously chafed and flaid, by reason of so heauie a waight, and extreamity of heate.

Great Vardingales.

As for the defensiue Armes then vsed, which was Harnesse; were they not (beyonde comparison) more massie and heauie, then those that now adayes wee warre withall? Neuertheleſſe, they were commonly pierced with Arrows, Darts, and Quarries of Crosse-bowes, which in those times were their best weapons. But in these daies, they are so well made and yet not (by three parts) so waighty, that they will resist a Musket shotte. The like is to be vnderstood of their Swords, and other Weapons of Defence: for, in one Sword of their vse, there was more stuffe, then now we haue in three; & yet they will performe as much, nay more, then theirs then did.

The Armour then vsed Harnesse and Cuiraſſes.

Swordes and weapons of defence.

It hapned manie times, that in their Sword-fight, the one man stepping aside for aduantage, the other smiting at him; the the verie waight of the Swords fall, hath ſmote it into the ground, ſo that he could not eaſily recouer it, but ſtoode vnto the mercy of his enemy. If we trauel yet thorow ſome partes, in auncient Caſtles or Fortreſſes, or Armories of long continued Cities; ſome of theſe vnwealdie weapons are daily to be ſeene.

Their time when they warred.

They neuer made Warre but foure moneths in the yeare, or ſixe at the moſt: after which time, both the one ſide and other withdrewe themſelues till Winter was paſt and gone. This courſe is quite contrarie vnto that which is to bee done in the time of Warre: For, in Winter is the fitteſt ſeaſon, and then doe our beſt warlicke ſpirits performe the beſt exploites of Warre. Then are ſurprizals apteſt, in regard of long Nights, when Riuers and Ditches (being filled with Waters) are ſtrongly frozen. Then dooth a good Captaine take occaſion, to make his attempt vppon ſome place, either to ſurprize it by ſcaling, or otherwiſe. For, then the Spies, Sentinelles, and Watch, are more ſubiect to ſleepe, then at other times. And ſo much the rather, becauſe (vſually) that mens Bellies are better fed in this ſeaſon; then other-whiles they are, in regard of the plentie of Victualls, which makes the bodie ſleepie and ſlothfull. Likewiſe, by the fauour of Long Nightes, a great deale of Ground is eaſily ridden, and the Enemie ſet vppon, when himſelfe leaſt ſurmizeth it, without much effuſion of Bloode, with leſſe Companie of Men, and weakeſt Charges.

Winter is the fitteſt time for warre, and ſome reaſons therefore alledged.

A fault to enforce the enimy to the fight, ſuch was the opinion of our fore-fathers.

In thoſe Elder dayes, they thought it a great offence and diſhonor, to ſurprize an Enemy vnprouided: but he muſt haue a day aſſigned him, when hee pleaſed to accept the Battaile: and this was the reaſon, why wars continued ſo long a time. But we ſee quite contrarie, that Warre now commeth ſooner to an end, by compelling the Enemy to come to fight, and prouiding polliticke Ambuſcadoes for him: in imitation of Hunters & Woodmen, when they chaſe wilde and vnruely Beaſts, that will neuer yeild, except they be enforced thereto. For if they eſcape, they wil continually returne to their firſt bad Nature.

The cuſtome of battailes in old time.

It was a Cuſtome helde in thoſe former Battailes, and verie often obſerued, that when men were wearie with Fighting (beeing oppreſſed with the heauie load of troubleſome Harneſſe, Goates of Maile and Brigandines, where-with their bodies were couered, beſides their maſsie and waightie Swords) they ſhould go repoſe themſelues to take breath, yea, (many times) to eate and drink, and then returne to the fight again. As the French men did on the day of battell, before the Citty of Alexandria, about the yeare one thouſand three hundred ninety one, whiche day they then loſt, with Count Iohn Iohn d'Armignac their chiefe.

Long continuing in fight no way beneficiall.

In thoſe times, battails continued the ſpace of a day; and if they were not then concluded, they went to it again the next morning, to know who then ſhould bee Superior. This was more for honor many times, then any profit enſuing therby, and to haue Songs afterwardes made of their ſloth and negligence. But in theſe dayes, within two or three houres (commonly) the battell is won or loſt, as I my ſelf haue obſerued in fiue fought battels, where I ſtood not as an ydle ſpectator: & the like haue I heard in other places, performed by the beſt and moſt approoued Captaines of theſe times.

Ancient ſingle fight or combate betweene man and man.

What ſhall wee ſay of their Duello, Combate, or ſingle fight, betweene man and man? It was commonly performed with Swordes, tearmed two-hand ſwordes, without ſtanding vppon anie warrantable Guard; but both parts meeting reſoluedly on foote; the one receyuing a ſtroake, while his Enemie ſtood waiting for another, without any couerture. For, euen like two Smiths beating vppon an Anuile, euen ſuch was their behauiour, ſmiting alternatiuely; vſing then nothing but cut and ſlaſh, without any foine or thruſt.

In our daies, this kinde of fight endureth but a moment of time, for nothing is vſed but Eſtoccadoes: ſo that within three or foure thruſts, the deadly combat is concluded. For Breuities ſake, I omit many other remarkeable thinges: as that they would eat no kind of fleſh, except it had ſome ſtrange ſauor, like Veniſon and wild beaſts. Now albeit theſe viands were dangerous to health, yet I refer it to all mens iudgments: for it is moſt certaine, that vſe of ſuch foode infecteth the heart, and is the cauſe of diſſenterie. Wherefore ſuch as entend to haue and keep an honeſt table, and to cloth or arm themthemselues respectiuely: must Learne much better directions, and imitate the worthy inuentions of these daies, leauing those grose absurdities (for the most part vnprofitable) of our Elders, which themselues approued and esteemed, but verie slenderly to any purpose.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the Antiquity of Fraternities, Brotherhoods, Fellowships, Societies, or Companies: And to what end they were at first instituted.

The reason of instituting the first fraternities.

THE first Princes and Law-makers, that had not as yet discouered the difficulties, how to maintain their subiects by iustice; permitted fraternities, Colledges, & Cõmunities, the end, that the partes and members of one body (in a Common-wealth) beeing at Vnity, the whole Common-wealth it selfe might be the more easily gouerned. As wee may perceiue Numa did, a King and Law-maker amongst the first, who estabiished Fraternities and Colledges, of all Trades and Occupations, and to each Brother-hood, he appointed certain Patrons, Priests, and perticular Sacrifices, after the Sabines name was abolished, that deuided it selfe somewhat from the Romaines.

Numa Pompilius the second King of Rome.

Lycurgus gaue both approbation and Institution.

Lycurgus also, not only gaue the same permission, but likewise strictly commanded the good entertainment of such Cõmunities, aswell generall as perticuler, & that all the Subiects should take their refection in those Colledges, from fifteene dayes, to fifteene dayes: and he cald such Assemblies in Greek, φιτια or φιδιτια, a Parsimonia, that is to say, of liuing Frugally, in regard of the amity they hadde sworne one to another, as also in all the Cities of Greece.

The Sodalitia in Italy.

There were likewise of the like Fraternities, which were called ἑταιρίας. As in Italy, the selfsame Colledges were called Sodalitia, for Vnion, Frequentation, and Amity, which they helde together, eating and drinking (in one Assembly) the most part of their time: and hauing no other Iudges but themselues. If there grew any difference among these Companions in Society: they knew that amity was the sole foundation of all Societies, and to be much more requisite amongst men, then Iustice. For, Iustice who is neuer pittifull, but holdes on her direct course oftentimes maketh friendes enemies, and Amity giuing way to her Seuerity, establisheth true naturall Iustice. Considering, that the sole aime of all lawes Diuine and Humain, is to maintain loue amongst men, and the loue of men towardes GOD, which could neuer be compassed, but by frequent and sociable Conuersation, and ordinary vnity.

Amity is much more worth then Iustice.

The verie same we may see in the law of God, the Feast of Easter to be recommended in the company of ten, to tenne persons; beside the Feast of Tabernacles and ordinary bankets of sacrifices, which God commanded to be solemnized with all ioy and gladnesse, which were entertained in the Primitiue Church of Christians, who oftentimes made such Feasts, which they called ἀγάπας, for the Kisses of Piety and Charitable embracements, which one gaue vnto another: besides the fraction, and ordinarie Communicating.

Con-fraternall Feasles commaunded in the law of God.

Brotherhoods in the Primitiue Church.

This Order is yet better kept in Swetia, then in any place of the world: For, in all Cities and Townes, Fraternities and Occupations haue their Common Houses, where they keepe their Feastes and Banquets; and there is no Village so little, but it hath a Common house only for this purpose, wher (continually) suits, Quarrels, and Contentions, are louingly concluded; and the sentence is Written downe with White Chalke, vppon the Table where they haue Banketted, in token of a white & pure ending of al strifes whatsouer. It were very necessary, that such an honest Custome should be euery where vsed: for it woulde prevent great expences and charges, bestowed in friuolous and idle pleadings, whereby infinite persons are vtterly vndone.

Kind Brotherhoods kept amongst the Switzers.

An honest deuise deserueth furtherance.

And euen in like manner as at Rome, according to the Institution of Numa, artificers, Merchants, Priests, Bythops, & all sorts of men had their Fraternities, and certaine Gods for their Patrons (as Mercury was assigned to the Merchantes, Apollo to Priests, and the like to others, after the example of Solon, who ordained by his Lawe, that all Communities and Brotherhoods should be permitted, with power to make such Statutes as they plesed.) Euen so in like maner, Phylosophers had Fraternities among them, especially the Pythagorians who assembled together ordinarily, and liued (for the most part) in common.

Brotherhoods of whippers.

Herodotus (who liued before Rome was builded) writeth, that there were certain Societies of men in Egypt, who woulde beate and whip themselues so long as the Sacrifice endured, when they immolated a Cowe to their God Apis. Romulus hauing entered into alliance with Tatius, K. of the Sabines, instituted a number of Priests, which were cald the Tatian Fraternity. The said Romulus made himselfe one of a Brother-hood, which was called Amaux, that is to say, belonging vnto the Fielde, whereof hee was the Twelfte man.

Cornel. Tacitus.

About the time of Romes first foundation, because manie VVolues liued then thereabout, which destroyed the Cattle, so that great losses were dayly receyued: the Romaines, who were onely but sillie warlicke Shepheards, instituted a fraternitie, and associated many men togither, electing God Pan to be the chief Patron, to the end, that vnanimately, and with one consent (when occasion required) they might oppose themselus against the VVolues; this was their first foundation. Not long after, neere vnto Mount Palatine, they founde a Litter of younge VVolues, which hauing destroyed: they afterward builded there a field Temple, dedicated to their God and Patron Pan, according as then their power and ability serued them. This Fraternity kept ther Celebration anually, and the Brothers went naked, running thorow the Cittie, holding long strappes of Goates skinnes in their handes, wherewith they vsed to lash their bodies. The women among them, such as were barren, would (in like manner) strike themselues on the palmes of their hands; and verily beleeued, that these superstitious Ceremonies woulde cause them to become fruitfull. As may be noted in Iuvenall, thus mocking a woman:

As, in regard of Augustus, the Fraternities were called Augustales, and Flauiales, after the Family of the Flauians. Aurelians and Anthonians, in respect of Aurelius and Anthonius, Emperors.

Plut. in vit. de Cæsar.

Tertullian, Byshop of Carthage, in the time of great persecutions and of Paganisme, beholding certain Brother-hoods to be made among the Pagans, carrying meats into the Temples, performing of Sacrifices, eating together, and giuing to the poore: hee admonished the Christians to doe the like, but not to meddle with any reuerence to the Gentiles gods, only they should continue firme in the Christian Faith. And it is verie likelie, that Popes, Byshoppes, and other holy men, haue perswaded the Christians to immitate those Assemblies and Fellowships: for continuance of praier to God, and censuring and separating one from another, when it should truly be known, that some one among them, had doone an acte vnbeseeming the name of a christian. Also, to conferre amiably amongst themselues, if any strifes or contentions had happened in the Company: then to accord such differences by their Pietie and Loue, rather then to plead those distastfull matters before Iudges; keeping purposely an Informer among them, only to accuse such delinquentes. They would conclude amongst themselues, to redeeme prisoners for debts, and pursue the deliueraunce of prisoners for their Faith; leuying a Collection of such sums of money, as should easily compasse this businesse. Also to giue aide and assistance to Christians, being in persecution, and forced from place to place: contributing for relieue of the poor, comforting helpless VViddowes and Orphanes, giuing them food, cloathing, and maintenance. To marry and lend helpe to poor maids, in some competent and reasonable dowries; prouiding for the Funerals of needy people, dying in necessity, or beeing martyred, not hauing any thing leste to burie burie them withall, but onely referred to their care and mercy.

Some Brother-hoods learned of those saide Pagan Ægyptians, to whippe themselues; and do practise yet to this day, yea euen to effusion of bloud, to subdue their bodies (as they say) enclined to voluptuousnesse; and this they do twice or thrice weekely: Others more rarely, according to their Deuotion. These Fraternities haue stiled themselues Niniuites, because they finde in the Sacred Scripture, that the Inhabitants of Niniuy, being warned by the Prophet Ionas, that they should be destroyed for their sinnes: heereon they became verie penitent, put on sackcloth and ashes, and chastised their bodies, to appease the wrath of God.

Christians learned of Pagans to whip themselues.

Where the first Fraternity of Christians was made

The first Society or Fraternitie made among Christians (so farre as my iudgement reacheth) was in Ierusalem, where the euer-blessed Virgin Marie, the Mother of Iesus, all the Apostles, and many other, as well weomen as men, Disciples of Iesus Christ, met together, and were in number about sixe score, after he was exalted vp into Heauen; where they receyued the Holy-Ghost, and afterwards, remaind long time in their Brotherhood and assembly.

Acts 1, 9.

The factions of the Guelphs and Gibelines.

I will not say, that both Holy and vertuous assemblies haue not beene abused, vnder pretence of Piety and religion, because it is long since, that it hath bin too well noted in Italy, when the factions of the Guelphes and Gibelines were vnder sail, labouring with one consent (vnder the pretence of fraternity) quite to exterminat one another. As much is found to be done in Germany, especialy in the Dioceses of Treues, Cologne, Liege, Mayence and elsewhere, during the troubles of their Countreyes.

The harms in Germany and France.

This miserie also made way into France, gathering vp Monopolies, in sted of congregating like louing Brethren; yea, bandying and elenating themselues against their King, and against the Catholicke Church, which succeeded to nothing els, but multiplicity of seditions, only to support the part they had taken. But such vnlawfull assemblies are reprooued by the Church, and no such Fraternities should be permitted in Communion of the Sacrament, prophaning holy things, & the peace of the Church. For, they ought not to intrude into such matters as appertaine only to the Prince, vnder colour of reforming, but they should bee taken as seditious, factious, and scelerates; yea, to be quite cut off from the bodie of the militant Church.

Vnlawful fraternities prohibited & accounted as no members of the Commonwealth.

Thus you see, what I thought good to discourse, concerning the Antiquity and Vtility of Fraternities or Brother-hoods. And that they were not instituted by the first Christians, for Sporting, Dancing, and Drinking, as many ignorant and detracting persons haue thought, and so laboured to perswade the simple people.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of Polybius the Romaine Ambassador, and his opinion of the Iewish Commonwealth, when hee was at Alexandria in Egypt.

Polybius the great Historian, a most elegant orator, and learned Philosopher, School-maister, or (as some will haue it) companion vnto Scipio the African, being sent by a Senat on an Embassie, to Alexandria in Egipt, hauing heard of the ciuill warres that then were in Iudea, made a mockery of the Iewes, and such as held opinion that the church and Doctrine of God, should bee constituted by the Iewish people. For then, all that Nation was full of troubles and intestine broiles, the great sacrificing Priest being violently dispossessed of his estate by another, and this man slain or murdered by another. Euen as Iason did, who expulsed his Brother Menelaus: & then, his Fellow afterward caused his Brother Onias to bee murthered. In briefe, by Ambition of the Sacrificers, who raised ciuill warres, they prophaned the bloud of their Fellow-Cittizens, the Dead bodies of their elders were scattered in the streets, yea, hurled into the Porch of the Temple.

Sedition in Ierusalem, who should be the Sacrificer.

During which time, Antiochus King of Syria, called thether by one of the factious, exercised cruell theeueries in euerie ry City. He placed his Garrison in the Temple, celebrated the Feast of Bacchus in the City; in which City only, stoode the Temple of the true God. Circumcision was interdicted, and because two Women had caused their Children to be circumcised, they were led naked thorough the City, bearing their strangled Infants at their Breasts; and (at length) themselues were throwne ouer the wals. Another, who had seauen Children, was flayed, dismembred, and fried in a burning Caldron, because shee would not eate Swines flesh, contrary to the Ordinance of the Law.

Cruelties vsed towardes women, and their Children.

Besides this, during these Calamities, there were risen three different Sects, of the Essees, Saduces, and Pharisees; who more tormented the Church, and her true Doctrine, then all the massacres cõmitted by the Iewes. In the end, Polybius to behold this so much deformed estate, thought then, that the Romain Senate (where there was a Scipio, a Lelius, a Scaeuola, a Cato, a Fannius, and others, that gouerned in the World wisely) was the place where God delighted most to be; & that he fauoured the Romans most. For, they prospered more in all their conquests, then all other Princes or people of the world did: and hee iudged the affaires and condition of the world, according as hee saw people in their good or bad estate.

Three contrary Sects in Ierusalem.

Happinesse of the Romans.

Now, albeit it was verie strange to see the Church in such a dissipation and deformity, yet notwithstanding, there were (euen then) some good members that cleaued fast to her: Such were Simeon, Zachary, and many others, both Maisters and Disciples in her Diuine School; and after them, the Asmonees or Machabees. I alledge these things for many Reasons: First, to the end, that we should hold this Consolation, that God hath euermore his Church truely permanent, especially in this mortall life: to the end, that alwayes some part of mankind should truly know God, call vpon him, and celebrate his name, and that part need not doubt, but that they are preserued, counter-garded, and heard of God.

The Church of God can neuer lose hir seate.

Gods church alwayes permanent in this life.

If Polybius had seen some hundreds of yeares afterward, when the Popes were expelled out of Rome, and persecuted, he would haue said as much of the Catholicke Church. As we read of Pope Alexander, third of that name, molested so many wayes by the most potent Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, finding no place in all Christendome for safety of his life: that (in the end) hee was constrained to retire himselfe to Venice, in the habite of a poor Priest, hiding himself in the church of La Charita, where he was receiued as a poore Chaplaine, and relieued for the loue of God. But at length, being known for the man he was indeed, hee found assistance, and was re-seated in his place. Pope Clement fift of that name, in regard of the factions in Italy, durst not abide at Rome, but was compelled to hold his See at Auignon, where (after him) it was continued by his successours, the space of threescore yeares and more. Likewise, because there happened about three and twenty Schismes in the Church, some whereof, lasted seauenteene yeares and more: sometimes three Popes were elected at one time, who made most cruell Warre one vpon another; One, defending Emperors; Others, som other Princes. I cannot expresse the Cruelties, Insolencies, Diforders, and Wickednesses, which (during these troubles) were committed in the Church. And yet neuertheless, in these hot times of Molestations, there were many good people, full of Piety, aswell women as men, among whom Gods true Church was stil preserued and manifested.

Pope Alexander the third banished out of Rome.

Pope Clement the fift forced to flie Rome.

Three Popes elected at one time.

For proofe whereof, while these three Popes were thus in contention, to wit; Symmachus, Laurentius, and Petrus Altinus; there flourished great store of worthy personages, that were of Holie and vertuous life, of whom I wil name some. Fulgentius Bishop of Hispalis, a Monke; Theodoret a Græcian Priest; Isidore, Bishop of Auuergne; Eusebius of Carthage; Dionisius the Abbot; Auitus Vniencis; Senerinus, Bishop of Trenes; Ægisippus the Diuine; S. Patrick of Ireland; Pommerius and Honoratus; Cassiodorus the Monke; Fridolin of Basile, and many others. If an hundred yeares after Polybius liued, he could haue seene the Romain Commonwealth wholly dissipated by the factions of Pompey, of Cæsar; then of the Triumuiri, all the World being filled with Ciuill Wars; to attribute that which those famous Romaines (in his time) had conquered, by so great prouidence and discreet preseruation, hee would then haue said,

A number of holy persons in the time of the Schismes.

The Common-wealth of Rome dissipated.

said, that God did not respect Rome more then he did any other nation. He should also then haue well noted the Pagans, among whom, Vertue, true Doctrine, and Honesty, was daily persecuted and despised: for then, if a man did but faigne to haue the truth, he was sure his Throate should be cut.

Polybius knew not God, but was a Pagan.

But Polybius is excuseable, for he had no knowledge of God, but was a Pagan. He could not comprehend, that the passage to the Kingdome of heauen, is thorow infinite Tribulations. He beleeued, that there was no other Paradise, but only to liue happily in this world. Hee was an Arcadian, borne in the Cittie of Megalopolis, a great Phylosopher and Historiographer, verie wel skilled in militarie Discipline. He wrote fortie Bookes in the Greeke tongue, containing the gests and pollicies of the Romains. Of all which Bookes, at this day, hardly is any more to be found, then fiue: the rest were lost and burnt by his Maid-seruant, being ignorant what they were. But a yong man, that sometime attended on him, knowing the merit of his writings, hindred the Maids follie, and preserued those which wee haue, from hurling them into the fire.

His Countrey and place of birth.

Polybius his Bookes lost & burned.

Titus Liuius hath beene much beholding to him, for it plainly appeareth, that he followed him (word by word) in many of his passages, without altering anie thing: and yet it was the space of an hundered years, or thereabout, between him and the saide Titus Liuius. He was not so superstitious as some other Historiographers, who mingled false miracles of their Gods among their woorkes: as apparitions of Gods, Goddesses speaking with Captaines, or heads of armies; that they rained downe Blood, Milke, Stones, and such like; that Beasts did speake, Riuers conuert their Naturall colour into Blood, and other thinges meerely incredible. Nor did he write the Orations of Ambassadors, Captaines, and Kinges, wholly at large, without forgetting any iot, as many other Historians (both before and after him) haue done, laboring to perswade their Readers, that those affaires whereof they discourse, passed according as they are set downe, which is not easily to be credited.

Titus Liuius beholding to Polybius.

Polybius was a true Historian, not subiect to the folly of some other writers

Now, as concerning the cause why he went into Egypt, it was not to learne there what God was, or any of his workes: as did Plato, Democritus, Chrisippies, Anaxagoras and others; for he had read what those Phylosophers had written, and many more beside. But the Romaine Senat well knowing him, although a stranger, and that he had done very much seruice to Scipio, in giuing him good aduise and Counsel, for his conduct in the wars of Affrica, and of Carthage; deputed him their Ambassador, to negotiate and accord some matter of peace, between Ptolomy Euergetes, King of Egipt; and Antiochus, King of Syria, and of manie other great Prouinces, who formerly had ranged ouer the Egyptian Territories, and Polybius accorded them verie worthilie. Hauing ended his Legation, he returned to Rome, where (it is said) he died, deeply charged with yeares.

The cause of Polybius his Embassie into Egypt.

He taught and instructed that Noble Scipio, in many Vertues, and among other precepts which he left him: that he should neuer remoone from the place, whereto occasion called him, vntill hee had won himselfe a friend there. In brief, euerie man of good iudgement, will not iudge rashly, of good or euill persons, by outward apparance, beholding them to be fortunate, rich, or poore, nor seeing them afflicted; but rather, by their good actions, vprightnes of life, and pureneſſe of Doctrine.

The death of Polybius.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of a strange conceit or opinion, in the Weemen of Moscouia, to wit; That if they be not beaten by their Husbands, they thinke that they are not loued of them.

IImagined (for a long time) that that which is reported of the Weomen of Moscouia, should bee a meere Fable, to wit; that if they were not very often beaten by their husbands, they presently supposed that they did not Loue them; although it is vsed as a common Prouerbe: Hee that loueth Few women I thinke) of this minde.

moſt, correcteth moſt. But ſuch as are ſubiect to Diſcipline, Correction, and Chaſtiſement, as are Slaues, Seruaunts, and Children of a Family, beeing vnder the power of Maiſters, Tutors, or Parents, they will hardly confeſſe themſelues, to be beloued more then any other, becauſe they are beaten more then other. Neuertheleſſe, the Weomen of Moſcouia doo hold this opinion quite contrary vnto all other elſe-where, that if they be not beaten, they are deſpiſed, and no way eſteemed.

Weomen in our countries hold this to be erroniour.

I am well aſſured, that no man can perſwade this for allowable, to the weomen of France, Italy, Spaine, England, no nor to the Germain weomen, or that they would accept, and let it paſſe for currant Doctrine: although, if it happen that they ſhould bee beaten, euen when they haue verie iuſtly deſerued it; yet notwithſtanding, they will ſtriue to cry firſt, yea, and to beate their Husbands too, if they could; or otherwiſe iniurie and abuſe them. And Weomen-Neighbours to impeach the entraunce of ſo bad a Cuſtome, would helpe ſuch women as complained, both in their maledictions and imprications, againſt ſuch as (deſeruedly) do ſtrike their Wiues, aledging Saint Paules ſaying; That no man ſhould hate his owne Fleſh. The Weomen of Moſcouia, do neuer go out of their owne Houſes, not ſo much as to the Churches, and do nothing elſe but ſpin. And to giue aſſurance of what I haue alreadie ſaid, I will declare three Hiſtories, which very good Authors haue left Written, and which I my ſelfe haue heard credibly auouched by men of worth, that haue bin in thoſe parts.

Weomen are eaſily moued to helpe one another in reuenge.

Laurentius Surius, a Religious Chartreux of Cologne in Germany, Writes in his Booke of memorable matters, aſwell Eccleſiaſticall as Secular: how it happened (in his time) that a Germaine trauailed into thoſe parts, and married with a Woman of that Countrey, and his wife made a great complaint to him, that hee did not loue her, neither bare her anie kinde of affection, becauſe he did not at any time beate her. The Germaine hearing this, made anſwere; that hee loued her entirely; and perſwaded himſelfe, that blowes could bee no true ſignes of Loue. Afterward, he vſed to beate her ſo extreamly, and ſo often, that he found (by good proofe) his Wife did loue him much better then ſhe did before. But his beating was ſuch, and ſo immeaſurably, as (at length) the Hangman brake both his legs and necke.

Laurent. Sur. in Lib. de Rab. Mem. tot. Eccleſ. qua Secular.

I was verie familiar with a Germaine of Lunebourg, whoſe father was Ambaſſador for Ferdinando, Emperour, firſt of that Name, not long ſince deceaſed, deputed to Baſilius, Duke and King of Moſcouia; and hee aſſured me, that this Opinion was a Cuſtome, and ſtill in vſe with the Weomen of that Country, & heard his Father faithfully report it. For he being lodged in the houſe of an honorable Burgeſſe in the City Moſchua, about the buſineſſe then referred to his truſt, ſawe his hoſte oftentimes beate his wife vpon no occaſion, and yet notwithſtanding, ſhee left not to loue him, and they ſpake ſtill kindly each to other, without the verie leaſt ſhew of diſcontent: and yet the ſaid woman was very often beaten, ſometimes with his dagger, or a ſtaffe, or kickt with his feete. He ſaid moreouer, that there a was Gold-Smith in the ſame Citie, with whō this Ambaſſador often frequented, becauſe he knew him before in the Towne of Lunebourg. This Woman ſent word by one of her young Children to her husband, that hee had not beaten his mother (ſo much as once) al that week time: but if he would not beate her, ſhe would neuer loue him, neither would ſhe prouide any more diet for him. The Goldſmith beeing very buſily imployed about his worke, regarded not his ſonnes words, neither remembred this cuſtome ſo generally in vſe, as thoſe (Naturally borne in the Country) had great reſpect vnto it for their owne quiet. For hee was a man humaine enough (for a Germaine) and allowed not this barbarous behauiour, to ſmite his deareſt friend and wife, or ſo much as to ſhew her any vnkinde countenance: yet afterward, vppon her importunity, and to diſcharge his dutie, hee gaue her halfe a dozen blowes with a Cudgell on the backe and ſhoulders, & puld off her Head-attire, wherewith ſhe was well contented, and called him preſently to an excellent prepared Dinner. Otherwiſe, if a whole week ſhould paſſe, and he not beate her, there could be no quietneſſe in the houſe, nor ſhould he get one good looke of her. This is an ordinary cuſtome among the VVeomen in the great great Prouince of Moscouia.

Whence this Barbarous custome grew

In briefe, this manner and custome of men beating their Wiues, could not arise but out of Sathans shoppe; for the Christian Church hath euermore condemned it. There are none in these parts, but Knaues, Fooles, Iealous Coxcombs, Drunkards, or men voide of vnderstanding, that will exercise such Barbarous behauiour on their Wiues: yet let mee not be mistaken, for I do not excuse som Weomen, that deserue to bee beaten for their vices and badnesse, and wil giue extraordinary occasion to be sharply handled by their Husbands. But my meaning is, of vertuous, discreet, and well aduised women, whose merits are not meanly to be cherrished, but highly respected by their Husbands.

Somd women do deserue beating.

CHAP. XXXIIII.

¶ That those things, which some Authors haue left written, concerning the Destruction and ruine of great Troy, performed by the Greekes, are true.

I Cannot choose but meruel very much, at the wilful pertinacity of some men, who rashly haue esteemed, that those things written by many good Authors, deseruing credite and faithfull opinion of the warre and ruine of Troy in Phrygia, should be meere Fables, and ydle vanities This error happeneth, because they haue not read some Bookes, Written by parties present at the Warre on either side, as well Greekes as Troyans: as Dictys of Creet, and Dares Phrygius, and others, who collected also their Writings out of sound Authority, liuing not long after the time when those things happened. As Herodotus and others, that heard them reported by Captaines & Commanders, who had charge in the said Warres: among whom, was Philistus the Greeke, and some others beside, that selected them out of verie auncient Authors, As namely, Quintus Septimius the Romain; Damascenus Sigierus; Æmilius Macer the Poet; Euclide the Megarian Phylosopher; and Homer, who was about eight score yeares after.

Authors that haue written of the warr of Troy.

Many Monarkes, Kinges, and other Princes, took the paines, comming from farre Countries, to see the City of Troy: as Alexander the Great, that found it ruined by the Persians, who likewise destroied all that part of Asia, wherein it was seated. But Penthylus, Nephew to Agamemnon, builded it againe, after that the Greekes had sacked it: raigning there, & his successors (as is affirmed) vntill such time as the Persians ouerthrew it. Alexander the Great, then hauing read manie Heroicall actions, performed at the besiedging of this Cittie, and finding it laid desert, caused it to be re-edified, & gaue great immunities and Priuiledges to the inhabitants, whom hee exempted from ordinary tributes; instituting there Free-Fayre, Martes, and Markets, for all such as would dwell there, or Negotiate with them: in regard whereof, it was named Alexandria. M. Aurelius, Diocletian, & Claudius, Romaine Emperours, potent and mighty, tooke paines to trauell thether from Rome, not without much cost and labour. And to leaue a memorie to posterity, of their beeing there, they caused a goodly Columbe to be erected, (which is yet (at this day) to be seene) of white Marble, very great, and placed in it being called Troy: but in regard of the great Antiquity thereof, it standeth not directly vpright, but leaneth some-what towards the Sea; and thereon is engrauen these words following.

Alexander and other Romaine Emperours went to see Troy.

The name of Troy changed and called Alexandria.

Imperator Cæsar. Mar. Antonius pius, Fœlix, Parthicus, Maximus, Trib. Pl. Imp. P. XV. Cons. III. Provinciam Asiam, per viam, & flumina, pontibus subiugauit.

Inscription vpon a Pillar in Troy.

And on the other side of the said Piller, was likewise written:

Imperator Cæsar Augustus, Diocletiano, P. Cos. II. regnante Tribunicia vicit potestate. M. F. T. et Claudius, C. VIII. P. R.

In the time of the Warre which the Romans had against Mithridates, this City was again destroyed to the verie foundation by a Roman Captain, named Fimbria, because Mithridates was possessed thereof, and had planted there his Garrison, which did much harme to the Romaines. Yet it was new builded againe, Another destruction of Troy.

(but I know not by whom) because in the time of Marcus Aurelius the Emperour, there was an excellent Vniuersitie in the same place, of all Sciences, and Galen the Physitian was then a Student there.

Galen a Student in Troy.

Likewise, Saint Luke testifieth, that Saint Paule passed thorough it, and that he raised vp there, a young man, named Eutichus, that fell downe deade out at a Window, from the third Loft of the house: Also, that he preached there, and celebrated the holy Communion, where there remained a great number of Iewes.

Acts 20, 12.

Troy again destroied by the Gothes.

Three hundered yeares after, or thereabout, this Cittie was once again destroied by the Gothes.

I thinke it was yet againe re-builded afterward, and that the Inhabitants were Christians, because (at this day) manie crosses may be seen Engrauen on stones, enclosed in the walles of diuers temples therein, that stand (as yet) most part of them, being not wholly destroyed.

The ruines of Troy which are at this day to be seene.

At this present, no person dwelleth there, nor within a Leagues compasse round about it; I know not whence this dissertion should proceed. The neere Neighboring Inhabitants do say, that before the Turkes got their enterance into Greece, it was then to be seen in the same condition. The six ancient Gates, are yet there (almost) intire, with their Posternes. The Towers about the walles in many places are yet standing vpright; and the height of the VValles are (verie neere) firmely standing; against which, are erected strong Piles and Spurres of two Fadomes breadth, to sustaine them vpright.

The greatnes and circuit of Troy.

The wals were builded of Free-stone, blacke like Iet; hard, but spungy; asking a large time to goe about them: and the Ditches are not (as yet) filled vp. There are two Castelles, verie ancient, within the circuite of the Cittie, builded vpon the pendant of a Mountaine: one of the which, being much higher then the Cittie, as hauing command thereof, and was called Ilion Castle. The other beeing much lower, had command of the Sea; both of them beeing builded of bright Marble; and so excellent in their construcsture, as it is impossible for anie man in the world, wholly to demolish them.

Ilion Castle.

Concerning matters within the City, there are yet to be discerned the marks and tracts of such goodly buildinges, as exceed my capacity to expresse. There are yet to be seene strong Conduits and Cesternes, without any water belonging to them. The streets are verie confused, by reason of the houses ouerthrow which (for the most part) was flat forward. Of Welles or Fountaines, there is no more but one now to be seene, and that is neer to the Sea side. Naturall Baths are there yet to be noted, holding their nature dry and hot, builded by excellent Art, and Artificially couered with fine Bricke. But be it howsoeuer, it must be much greater matter, then as yet I haue heard of, that shall or can cause mee to beleeue those things for Fables, that are written and reported of the greatnesse, wealth, and power of this Citty.

The markes of goodly buildings in Troy.

One onely Well as yet remaining.

Naturall Bathes yet to be seene.

There are yet many Sepulchres to be seen, both within and without the Citie, of Captains and Princes, aswell Troians as Greeks, that were slaine during the warre, made (in Anticke maner) of Marble, all in one peece, after the fashion of a Chest, the couers whereof are whole & sound. Halfe a League or a mile from Troy, is the Isle of Tenedos, where are the most part of the Greekes Sepulchers. As that of Achilles, who was the terror of the Troyans, yet slaine by Paris. He was so highly esteemed, that many of his blood were afterward carried thither, to lye by him in his Tombe, so much did they admire his memory.

Tombes and Sepulchers yet to be seen

The Isle of Tenedos.

The Tombe of Achilles, & many more, visited by Alexander.

This was the Tombe that Alexander went to visit, weeping ouer it, and much complaining, because he was not so happie, as to haue a man that could so well publish his praises, as Homer had doone those of Achilles; it remaineth yet entirely whole, with diuers Greeke Verses thereon engrauen. And about the yeare of Iesus Christ, 1379. when Baiazeth the son of Selim raigned ouer the Turkes, there was found in the saide Isle of Tenedos, the Sepulcher of an Amazon Queen, named Marpesia, who after many booties, being richly laden with spoiles, made hir return to this Island, verie sore hurt and wounded, and there ended her dayes. This Tombe is yet to be seene, betweene two hilles of indifferent height; and a litle before one of them, there is a Greeke Epitaph on the couer of the Marble Chest, and there her name is comprized in faire Carracters.

The Tombe of Marpesia, an Amazone Queene.

At

The Tombe of valiant Aiax.

At any time, with opening verie little ground, or passing not aboue a foote in depth, many other famous tombs might be easily discouered. As the Tombe of Aiax was, in that quarter where Achilles encamped his man. About this Isle of Tenedos, there are many other little Islands, of as good ground as that of Tenedos, but vn-inhabited, except by some poore Fisher-men, that make their retirement thither sometimes. And it hath beene immagined, to be hanted with spirites, which speake to men: in regard whereof, the men that resort thither, and abide there any time, do say, that the spirit of Homer wanders in those Islandes, where he did (in former dayes) Philosophize; and that he shewed himselfe to certaine Shepherds, as they passed that way to feed their Cattle. This you may heare the opinion of such as doo now dwell about Troy, and neere the Isle of Tenedos, touching visions and spirits that appeare in those Islands.

The Spirit of Homer said to walke yet in the Islands about Tenedos.

The Riuers of Simois and Xanthus.

As for the Riuers of Simois and Xanthus, so much renowned by many Poets which watered the fields of Troy, we can now say no otherwise of them, but that they are small Brookes or Gullets, scarse able to nourish a Loach or Minnow: for they are dried vp in Summer, and in the deepest of Winter, a Duck cannot swim there. But our Poets haue published so many Fables of these Riuers, as they should seeme to haue beene much greater, then now they are. Yet must we not (for all this) say, that the History is not true, because Painters and Poets are Licensed to embellish their woorkes with more then their instant subiect requireth; and we must likewise vnderstand, that vnder Poeticall Fables, there is vsually a morrall sense conuayed.

Thevets description is to be doubted.

As concerning the Scituation of this Citty, Theuet maketh a quite contrarie description thereof, and saith; That these two fore-named, are great Riuers: and that it is seated in a good soile. I would be loth to contradict such a person, but that which I write, I haue gathered from Bellonius a Physitian of Mans, in the second Booke of his Obseruations: and I my selfe haue heard him often report, being at Paris, at Postell, that foure years he frequented that Country. Afterward, a man of Rohan, named Albert le bon, declared that he had bin in those parts, and remained there a whole Winter, agreeing in all things which Belonius had written. I thinke verily, that Theuet was neuer there, but what hee hath recorded, was onely by heare-say.

Bellon. in Lib. 2 de Obseruat.

Matters that cause distrust of the destruction of Troy

That which hath giuen occasion to some, not to credite the destruction of Troy, is (as I haue heard) the iudgement of Paris, concerning the beautie of the three Goddesses Dares Phrygius writeth, that it was nothing but a Dreame which Paris had as he slept vnder a Tree, being wearied with Hunting in the Forrest of Ida: and Poets making vse of this dream, haue aduised young Princes, not to imitate the folly of Paris. For hee refused Riches, which Iuno presented him; and wisedome and vnderstanding in all things, offered him to Pallas, if to eyther of them he would haue giuen the Golden Ball. But suffering himselfe to be swayed by voluptuous desires, hee chose rather to giue it to Venus, the Goddesse of loose and mis-gouerned affections, that hee might liue (alwaies after) in such licentious liberty. And, as an especiall note of his skilfull progression, hee made a Rape of faire Helena, wife to Menelaus, King of Lacedemon, that entertained him in his Court as a kind friend. A matter, which caused the ruine of all his family, and of all the Troyan Kingdome beside.

The iudgement of Paris, concerning the three Goddesses.

Secondly, they alledge also as a fable, that Priam commaunded his son Paris to be slaine, because Hecuba (his Queen) being great with childe, had a dreame that she should be deliuered of a Fire-brand. And hauing conferred with interpreters of dreames, the King was informed, that the infant then in her womb, should be the cause of his ruine, and of the whole kingdom. This dreame might very likely bee dreamed by Hecuba, in regard, that verie often, Princes and Princesses are (by especial grace) forewarned of God, both in dreames and otherwise, concerning diuers things which are to happen, to the end, that they might preuent them. For, accidents good or euil do not only touch them, but all the people likewise. In brief, Paris from his infancy was so vicious, as his father could neuer afford him a good looke. And when he was in his youthfull dayes, without any aduise of his Parents, he married a Nimph of the Fields, but yet shee was verie faire and vertuous, Named Oenone; and afterwardes forsooke

A second reason the dreame of Hecuba.

Princes haue many admonishments in Dreames.

Paris made a clandestine marriage.

A third reason for the plague in the Grecians Campe.

ſooke her, when he had enioyed her virginity.

Thirdly, they affirme for a fable, that which Dictys Cretenſis, Homer, and other Authours haue Written, of the Plague diſperſed in the Campe of the Græcians, when they aſſembled to plant their ſiege before Troy, the Armie conſiſting then of no leſſe, then twelue hundered thouſand able men. Euery man knoweth, that contagious Diſeaſes doo ſeldome ceaſe from purſuing great Armies, becauſe men liue there vnwholeſomely, in regard of Corruptions by dead Bodies, and other annoyances amongeſt Men: Beſides, Welles and Waters abuſed or corrupted; for men and beaſts drinke all together, whereby the ayre becommeth infected.

Diana cauſe of the plague and wherefore.

The people then perceyuing ſo great a Mortality, without finding any Remedie for it, had re-courſe to their Goddes, and conſulted with Oracles. The Prieſts being then verie ſubtle and craftie, made aunſwere; That this Peſtilence enſued by the anger of Diana, and this was the reaſon thereof. Agamemnon, Brother to Menelaus, elected Chiefe Leader of the Armie, had ſlaine a goodly Hinde, which was Priuate and Sacred, and was kept by the Sacrificing Prieſts (for pleaſure) in ſome Fielde or Forreſt, Dedicated to the ſaide Goddeſſe. They made them alſo beleeue, that they had oftentimes ſeene Diana, to take great delight in ſporting and playing with that Hinde. Wherefore, if they would haue the plague to ceaſe, they muſt Sacrifice the Daughter of Agamemnon, King of Mycæna, who was the onely cauſe of all the euill.

A meere practiſe or Conſpiracy againſt Agamemnon.

Now, it is well knowne, that this ydle practiſe or Gullerie, was expreſſely prepared againſt Agamemnon, by ſome of the other Kinges, who were malicious and enuious (eſteeming themſelues aboue him) becauſe he was choſen chiefe Soueraigne, and commaunded ouer ſo great an Armie, wherein were no leſſe then thirtie nine Kings. And this was deuiſed onely to diſcontent him, and giue him occaſion for to depart home againe: yea, and the Oracle being enſtructed to this Cooſenage, returned that anſwere.

Beeing on the verie point of conſtraining him to deliuer his Daughter to bee Sacrificed, Achilles and ſome other of his Friends, who had Credite ſufficient with the other Kings, found the meanes to redreſſe this extreamitie. For, they being aſsiſted by ſome of the Prieſts and Sacrificers, that re-conſulted with the Oracle, hauing receyued a good ſumme of Money, returned a report, that Diana would be contented with the ſacrifice of another Hinde, and of a Bull, which accordingly was performed.

A remedie found againſt ſo great an inconuenience, by retracting of the Oracle.

Then the Græcian Armie entered into their prepared Shippes, which amounted to the number of eleauen hundered and fortie Saile, or there-aboutes: and diſlodging thence, chaunged the Ayre. So, by Naturall Reaſon, that Contagious infection ceaſed: and thus ſhould that part of the Hiſtorie bee vnderſtoode.

A fourth reaſon, the Palladium or image of Pallas in Troy.

For the Palladium, which was an Image of Woodde, repreſenting Pallas ſalne from Heauen, with a mighty thunder, into a Temple newly made, which the Troyans had builded in the Cittie; which being finiſhed, and they not knowing to what God or Goddeſſe they ſhold make their Vowes, or elect as their Patron, this happening in the Night time, the Gates of the ſaide Temple being faſt ſhut. This was nothing elſe, but onely a meere inuention of men, and principally of the Sacrificers, and Couetous Idolatrous Prieſtes, who found the meanes (one Night) when there was great lightning, Thunder, and Raine, to bring the ſaide Image thither ſecretly. And comming the next morning to open the temple Gates, in the preſence of manie people; they made them beleeue, that in this terrible time of night, the Image was deſcended from Heauen. Whereuppon, the Troians admyring this deceitful wonder, ſent ſome of their Nobleſt Cittizens (with the Sacrificers) to Delphos, there to conſult what was to be done with this ſtatue deſcended from heauen. The Prieſts of Delphos, vnderſtanding the drift of the ſubtle Troyans, conſpired one with another, to aunſwere by the Oracle (which was a Virgine cloſely concealed in the Vault, and well inſtructed in hir anſwer:) That the Image of Pallas had not beene ſent from Heauen, but for the more aſſurance and preſeruation of the Troyans eſtate; and that ſo long as ſhee remayned within the Temple, the Cittie of Simple people are ſooneſt deceiued, eſpecially vnder the cloud of Holineſſe.

Troy

Both sides abused by a false Oracle.

Troy could not be surprized by Warre. The Troyan people tooke this Oracle for an Article of Faith, and so did the Grecians also: for it brought them into dispaire of euer taking the Citty, and gaue the other side vndoubted assurance, that they should neuer be surprized or vanquished; and the better to countenance their perswasion, the Troyans placed strong Guards (ordinarily well payed) about the Palladium.

Troy brought into wofull extreamity.

Now, it fortuned, that by long delay of time, many rough battailes and skirmishes, and all places of entrance into the Citty so strongly besiedged; that Troy could no way bee supplyed with victuals. But being thus seuerelie beleagerd, the more part of the best men of warre; yea, euen the most resolued and valianteſt Troyans, dyed with hunger: and none remained, but tyred weake men, wearied with sustaining so long a siedge, and voide of any hope of succour. Some Princes, and other men of marke, fore-seeing that the Palladium could not bee preserued; without speaking to Priam their King, (who was then very old and feeble) or Hecuba the Queene: conferred closelie with the Greekes, (who were as much weary and tyred as they, desiring nothing more, but to raise their siedge, & returne home to their owne Countrey) yet made an outward bold shew, of stil continuing the siedge. When they met to capitulate, among others were Anthenor, Æneas, and some else, who promised, if they might haue their liues and goods saued, they would admit the Enemy benefit of entrance. Promises past on both sides by sollemne oath, in a place very secret and free for the purpose; the people (in meane while) supposing, that they treated of a truce among themselues, of the reddition of Prisoners, and recouery of worthy mens bodies, slaine in the skirmishes. But aboue all thinges else, the Greekes strictly held, that the Palladium should bee deliuered to them: for they were perswaded, that they should neuer get entrance into Troy, so long as the Image continued there, so farre did the deuill (then) preuaile with men. This sottish light beleefe, S. Augustine verie exceeding wel mocked, when he said: The Troyans were keepers of the Palladium, but not the Palladium of the Troyans. The Guards were wun with Mony, and the Vestales that were there destined; contrary to their Oath and Vow, suffered their Palladium to bee lost, and another Image put into the place, very neerelie resembling it, couered with the same ornaments and Iewels, whereof none was then mindfull.

The Palladium stolne, & how.

The Palladium being now in the besiedgers power, they were highly contented, and sent great presents to the Traytors, with reiteration of their Oathes. Whereupon, in the dead time of night, the Traytours opened the Gate called Scea, whereon was emboss'd the head of a Horse, and by a flaming Torch, gaue signall to the Greekes for entring the Cittie, which they did, hauing yet the Traytours Children in their hands as hostages. Thus was the Citty taken, King Priam slaine, his wife and Children led away Captiues, and such as remained of the Royall Issue, were murdred, and almost all the people massacred: Faith was kept with the betrayers, but yet with great difficulty: neuertheless, after the reduction, they were exempted from spoile. To wit, Anchises, Father to Æneas, Anthenor, neere Kinsman to King Priam, Polydamas, Vcalegon, Amphidamas, Dolon, and diuers other; to whom Ships were giuen, for conueighing thence their wiues, children, & whatsoeuer else they could carry away. After the sacke had continued the space of eight daies, the Citty was wholy burned, but they had great difficulty to destroy it: for the buildings were all of Marble, or of free Stone, strongly couered and tarrassed. But the Greeks were very great in spleen against it, because the most part of them (in this long siedge) had lost many of their Kinred and deere Friends, beside their owne hard sufferance in the warre. There dyed in this besiedging, eight hundred, eighty and sixe thousand Greekes, vntill the reddition of the Citty; and sixe hundred, seauenty, sixe thousand, as well of the Citty, as such succours as was sent them, by Kinges, Queenes, and their Allies abroad, without making any account of both Men and Women, that were led thence captiues.

Troy betraied, surprized, and destroyed

The betraiers of Troy saued, and their names.

The number that dyed in this warre.

As concerning the Horse of wood, which

A fift reaſon, the fable of the Greekes horſe of wood which is ſaid to be made by the Greekes, within whoſe belly men were hidden, and whereof they made an offering to Pallas, to compaſſe the meanes of breaking the wals thereby, and ſo to ouercome their enemies: theſe (truely) are Poeticall Fables. But yet we are to obſerue, that the Citty was ſurprized at that gate, whereon there was the head of a Horſe (very bigly) emboſſed, and of blacke Marble, as before wee haue ſaid, and it remaineth yet to be ſeene.

A ſixt reaſon, the Fables of the Amazones.

Next, for the Amazones, which are ſaid to come to the ſuccour of Troy, conducted by their Queene Pentheſilea; this is a Fable too. But yet we muſt credit that this Woman was a Queen, and commaunded ouer many Countries; a Friend and neere Ally to King Priam, in whoſe aide ſhe came: bringing with her eight or ten thouſand men, and not Women, that were ſlaine in ſeuerall fights; and ſhe her ſelfe (at laſt) in a ſingle combate with Achilles. For, there was neuer any Countrey, inhabited onely by Women, nor is at this preſent, which I purpoſe elſe-where to ſhew.

A ſeauenth reaſon, the tenne yeares fiedge of Troy.

It is alſo held for a Fable, that the Greekes ſhould abide at the fiedge of Troy, the ſpace of ten yeares: this is not altogether incredible, becauſe as much hath beene done in our time. The fiedge which Baiazeth brought before Conſtantinople, laſted eight yeares and ſome moneths, in the yeare 1373. and yet (for all that) was not taken. That which I haue written, concerning the ſubtilties of the Prieſtes in thoſe daies: I proteſt, I ſaw them in the hand of Monſieur Pelerin, a Pariſian, Schoolemaiſter to the children of the late Lord De l'Aubeſpine, in a Booke being a Manuſcript, & in the Greeke tongue, which a man of the Church had giuen him, who was a follower of Monſieur de Fumell, Ambaſſadour in the Eaſt. This man had the Booke of a Caloere, or religious Greeke at Mount Athos; and therin is the Interpretation of the Fables, which I haue alledged in this Chapter, and many more beſide. The Authour thereof was one Temiſon, a Smyrnian, who (I thinke) was a Sacrificer, and afterward became a Chriſtian.

Whence the Author tooke his interpretation of the Poeticall Fables.

There is a certaine Booke, intitled, Troy not taken, it is in the Greeke toong, and tranſlated likewiſe into Latine, which is ſaide to be compoſed by one named Dion the Sophiſter, that liued in the time of Traiane the Emperour, and neuer vſed any other Garment, then the skinne of a Lyon. But he alleadgeth ſuch poore reaſons, to proue that Troy was neuer taken, nor beſieged by the Greekes: that a Childe of tenne yeares olde would ſet downe better. Therefore, ſuch as doe yet hold that error, and are perſwaded, that what hath beene written by many oculary Authours, and others beſide of good credit, concerning the Troyan Hiſtory, is no way veritable: let them ſee (to their ſhame) the ruines of that famous Cittie, which yet (to this day) doe make ſhew of themſelues, as I haue deſcribed them in this Chapter. The round neighbouring places, ports of the Sea, which doe (yet) retaine the very ſame names, that then they had. The Toombes of ſuch famous men (with their inſcriptions) that died as well on the one ſide, as the other; being all of Marble, with the couertures whole, but no bones in them: for neuer was any thing put into them, but the aſhes of the dead, becauſe (in thoſe times) the bodies were all burned.

Dion the Sophiſter deceiued in his writings.

CHAP. XXXV.

How a Man may eaſily know, what kinde of drinke will ſooneſt make one drunke: As with Wine, Beere, Ale, Cider, Perry, and other drinkes.

WIne is not the only drinke that cauſeth drunkennes, when it is immeaſurablie taken, or when it is receiued by Men or Women, whoſe braines are weake and feeble. For, there are many other artificiall Beuerages, made in thoſe Regions, where no Wine hath encreaſe or growth; as in Normandy, Brittaigne, in the more part of Piccardie, the lower Germany, and other Northerly Countries. But they make vſe of Cider, Perrie, Beere, Ale, Raſſis, and other drinks, which procure drunkennes more then Wine Wine onelie doth not procure drunkenneſſe.

Countries that yeild no Wine.

Turkes prohibited from drinking wine

Wine doth. In Turky, it is forbidden to ſuch as are of the Mohometane Law, to drinke Wine vpon paine of life; and there are likewiſe Drinkes arteficiallie made.

The drinke of the Caribes & Anthropophages

The Caribes and Anthropophages, people that feed on the fleſh of Men, make a kind of drinke, which they call Canonin: it is made of certaine roots called Aypie, and groſſe Millet, champed in the mouths of Women, and then boyled in ſome quantitie of Water. Of this drinke they make vſe after their repaſt, for they drink not at all in the time of their feeding, as wee doe in theſe partes: but rather imitate nature, as other Creatures do. This Canonin cauſeth drunkenneſſe, more then Wine doth here, if too much be taken thereof.

A kinde of drinke iſſuing out of a tree.

In the Kingdome of Narſingua, Taranganor, Calecut and Peru, they drinke a kind of liquor which commeth forth of a Tree, that is therefore purpoſelie cut in the Spring time, like vnto the Palme; and it inciteth drunkenneſſe alſo. Many Countries in the Aſian Indiaes, do make diuers drinkes of Rice and ſpiceries, which will procure drunkenneſſe likewiſe. In Turky they make a certaine Hydromell or Metheglin, which troubleth the braine much more then Wine. In breefe, there is not any Nation that will content it ſelfe with drinking Water onely: but haue deuiſed one or other arteficiall beuarage to pleaſe the Pallet, and delight their taſt. I my ſelfe hauing frequented thoſe Countries, where no Wine at all is made, but other arteficiall drinkes dailie vſed, as hath before beene declared: I haue apparantly perceiued, that ſuch as receiue their drunkenneſſe by wine, haue quite contrary behauiour to others, that are ouercome with Beuerages; as of Beere, Cider, Perry, and the reſt.

Metheglin made in Turky

Arteficiall drinkes hurt more then wine.

Diuerſity of actions and behauiour in drunkenneſſe

And although thoſe men that are drunke with Wine, do commit a thouſand follies, and counterfeit diuers anticke fopperies: yet it is moſt certaine, that none can declare the like ſottiſhneſſe, and yeelde more argument of ridiculous laughter (when wee behold their faces, eyes, and geſture;) then ſuch as are drunke with made drinkes, and (among the reſt) with Beere. For they neither reele or ſtagger on any ſide; but onely backeward, and fall downe flat on their backes: but ſuch as are drunke with Wine, reele forward, and alwaies fall or lye vpon their face and noſe; whereas the other do bruiſe their ſhoulders, and breake their heads behind. As likewiſe may be diſcerned when they are ouercome with ſleepe in drinking, for they that are drunke with Beere, Ale, Cider, and other drinkes arteficiall; doe ſleepe on their backes, with their boſomes open. I haue beene credibly aſſured, that euen ſuch is their behauiour in Turky, the Indiaes, America, and other Regions, when they are in like caſe.

The differẽce in drinking wine and other beuerages.

Where men doe become drunke with Wine, they ſleepe vpon their faces, the Chinne enclining into the boſome. The reaſon is, becauſe the fumes and vapours proceeding from Wine; do gaine poſſeſſion in the heads formoſt part, and the anterior parts of the body alſo. But thoſe fumes which mount aloft by other drinkes; doe incline to the head behind, and the poſterior parts alſo: which is a reaſon, that they are very obliuious, euermore ſleepy, and no great praters or brablers.

Wine ſeazeth on the foremoſt part of the braine.

French Souldiers are apt at all occaſions.

The French, that (during the States Warres in the Lowe-Countries) trauailed thither as Souldiers, would make their boaſts: that they had familiaritie with many Women there, when they found them to bee made drunk with Beere: for then they would fall downe backeward, at which time, their pudicity might eaſilie be attempted, finding them in ſuch vnwomanlie readineſſe. Let them (therefore) that haue care of their Chaſtity, take heede how they become drunke. And as for men, ouer and beſide, that many doe then diſcloſe their owne ſecrets: they enter alſo (oftentimes) into quarrels, deſtroying their health, and vndoing themſelues. Our Lawes do hold them for infamous perſons, that are addicted to drunkenneſſe.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Against the Axiome, which maintaineth, that all Repletion is naught, by what sustenance soeuer it be; But of Bread most pernicious.

I Could neuer vnderstand the reason, although I haue enquired of many learned Phisitions, who (neuertheless) haue published the same also: that Repletion of bread, is more dangerous and pernicious, then all other nourishments beside. For not onely it seemeth to me voyd of all reason; but it hath beene so accounted, by all them that I haue conferred withall. Because all other foods, as the flesh of Oxen, Kine, Mutton, Veale, Goat, Hare, Hart, Hinde, Boare, Swine, of Fowles, and also of all Fishes which we vse, and any Fruit whatsoeuer; doe corrupt easily of themselues, if they remaine any while in the stomacke and be not digested: the like doth Egges, and all things prepared with Milke, except Cheese, which is saide to be (almost) indigestible. All such as vse these meates without Bread, haue neuer any good colour, but are much subiect to vnsauoury breath, and sometimes (of their owne bodies) a smell scant pleasing: neither are they so wel nourished, nor so strong; as they that eate more Bread, then any other meat beside.

Great vse of flesh without Bread, causeth stinch.

Bread maketh men strong and robust.

To prooue that it must needs be so, we may behold, that the most of other Viandes, how acceptable soeuer they seeme to the taste, well prepared and seasoned with good Sauces: they doe yet (very often) bring a dislike and contempt of themselues. Bread only neuer distateth, be it in health or in sickenesse; it it is the last appetite lost, and the first recouered in sickenesse. In health, it is alwaies the first and last eaten, pleasing and most agreeable to nature, beyond all other kindes of repast. Againe, it is most certaine, that Bread (by a wonderfull blessing in Nature) is endued with all those fauours; which perticularly doe incite and allure each meates to bee fed on: pleasing some in their sweetnesse, others in their sharpnesse or tartnesse; some in their saltnesse; others in their sowrenesse, and all in their due apprehension. Bread containeth in it, whatsoeuer any Man can taste, or is acceptable in other meats. For, albeit other foodes haue neuer so good rellish of themselues: yet can they not bee sutable, or profitable to feede on for health, except they be accompanied with Bread. To speake all in a word, Bread, by his goodnesse correcteth the vices of other meates, and helpeth their vertues; whereon it is vsed as a common Prouerbe: That all meats are good and beneficiall, when Bread is their companion.

Bread comprehendeth in it all kinds of tasts.

Without Bread no food auaileth

Some Spagirickes, Alchymists, and Extractors of Quintessences, haue told and assured me, that hauing put Bread into their Limbecks or vessels of glasse, as meaning to deriue an Essence from him: they haue diuers times found the Bread conuerted into Flesh. We doe daily note (as already I haue said) that the most part of them, which doe eate their meate without Bread, be it Flesh or otherwise, they haue continuallie stincking breath. The Athletes or stout Wrastlers (as I finde recorded in the Bookes of Galen) such as were esteemed the very best, and strongest in habitude among other men: had neuer any other nourishment but Bread, accompanied with a little Hogs Flesh.

A lye proceeding from the Extractors of Quintessences.

Athletes or Wrastlers their breeding.

When the Scots vsed to warre out of their owne limits, as in England and other places, if they thought to finde the Country ruined where they should passe: they droue with them a great number of Beasts for slaughter, and liued (by the way) vpon those Beastes. And because they had liued sometime by Flesh alone, their stomackes a long while would be sickely, by not hauing had the vse of any Bread. For remedie of which stomachall disease, each man perticularly carried a Sachell of Meale, weighing about some pound & a halfe at the most, and a little Iron Plate, thin and slender. Then mingling a little of the Meale, in a woodden dish with water, and driuing it into a Past: they laid it it on the Plate ouer a ſmall fire; and in this manner (immediatly) they made Bread. This doth in ſome manner) reſemble our Waferers making of Wafers. The Scots hauing eaten of this Bread; found their ſtomackes well refreſhed, and their bodily ſtrength ſufficiently reſtored; after which, they would begin againe to vſe fleſh onelie, according to their wonted cuſtome.

An argument to approue the power of good Bread.

I alleadge this Hiſtory, to demonſtrate, that if ſo little bad made Bread, neither leauened nor kneaded, could reſtore the languiſhing ſtrength of men: what then is good Bread able to do, being kneaded and baked to full perfection? This benefit of baking Bread vpon a Plate of Iron, brought much commodity to that Nation: for they needed little ſearch after Brakes or Mils, which commonly are beaten downe and deſtroyed (before all thinges elſe) that in the degaſtes of warre, the enemy may haue no benefit by them.

Arabes and Moores becom Theeues for Bread.

The Lord of Villamond declareth, that being gone forth of his Ship, and likewiſe all thoſe in his company, at the Port of Ioffa, and putting themſelues on the way, to trauaile by Land to Ieruſalem: the Moores and Arabes entred vpon their veſſell lying at Anker, and robbed them of nothing elſe but Bread. Other Theeues alſo, of the ſame ſect and kinde of men, meeting with the ſame company the day following: tooke alſo nothing from them but Bread. All Nations haue not Bread, nor the vſe thereof, and ſuch as neuer had (as many Countries but lately diſcouered) when Chriſtians giue it them to eate, although it be but a Biſket, and of the very courſeſt: they make great account of it, they finde it ſo ſauourie.

Sauages doe highly eſteem Bread.

I am of the minde, that he which ſaith, ſatietie and Repletion of Bread, is more dangerous then all other nouriſhments: his meaning is of ſuch bread as is not faſt kneaded, and well baked, or without Leauen, becauſe it is the more hard to digeſt. As for my ſelfe, my meaning is of ſuch Bread, as is made of good and pure graine, wel cleanſed, kneaded, raiſed, baked, and freſh. I ſpeake not heere of Fiſh-bread, which is made in Hirland, among the people which dwell on the Lake of Barcena, & that in the Iſles of Imangla, Inebila, and and an infinite of Countries on the red Sea, and elſe-where. Nor alſo of that which is made of the barke of Trees, vſed in the Country of Vendenao, which is called Sagu, and is ſaide to be very ſauoury; being reduced into Meale, and afterward into Bread; As fruite alſo of the ſame Tree is, in the Iſles of Moluquoiſes. By the reaſons fore-alleadged, I would perſwade all perſons, not to forſake the vſe of Bread, for fond or lickoriſh deſire after other meats: if they couet to haue good ſtrength, a chearefull complexion, and health.

Bread made of the barke of Trees.

Concerning the inuention of Bread, ſince what length of time it hath continued, and who was the firſt Inuentor thereof; there is not any thing found for certaine. In the Eaſt Countries, the vſe of Bread is very ancient, for we finde, that it was vſed in the times of Abraham, and of Iacob, when his Sons deſcended into Ægypt, onely to buy Corne, to make Bread. But neerer vs, the vſe thereof is not found ſo ancient; becauſe the Romaines vſed no kinde of Bread, but onely Corne boiled (as likewiſe the Gaules and Germaines did) till they brought it a perfect riſting in ſunder, and then they did eate it among their other meates, euen as at this preſent as we do our bread. This continued thus till the Perſian Warres, which was in the yeare (after the Cities foundation) 580. And then came Bread-makers, or Bakers of Bread, out of Aſia to Rome; who gaue inſtruction, how to multure or grinde Corne, then to knead it with Leauen; and laſtly, to bake it in Loaues.

The vſe of Bread very ancient in the Eaſt parts.

In Italy a long time after.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Of the excellent and profitable properties of the Swallow; And the Nature of the Bird.

BEcauſe the Swallow neuer neſtleth in Cities, nor on their Walles; which are ſubiect to be taken and retaken by war; becauſe by her comming and preſence, ſhe aſſureth thoſe places where ſhe is, not to be ſubiect

The Swallow fore-telleth many excellent things.

iect to the rigour of Warre; as also the House or Wall where she buildeth her nest, not to be threatned by any neere ruine: Because, that by her comming, she resolueth winter to be past, and the Spring time beginning; because (likewise) she hath in her many especial properties, by diuers benefits and other things arising to man, whereof we shal discourse hereafter: it seemed meet (in my iudgement) that this Bird well deserued to haue a perticular Chapter written of her, in her iust defence against such as labour to depraue her.

The Swallow knoweth the seasons and temperature of Climates.

The Swallow abideth ordinarily, in Regions temperately hot, shunning the extreamity of heat, and of cold likewise. Pliny saith, that this Bird, feeling the extreame heat of Affricke approaching; she flyeth thence in the prime, to delight her selfe in a temperate ayre: And when she perceiueth Winter ensuing, which is about the midst of September; she then returneth to the Countries extreamely hot, where winter is in the same manner, as Summer is here with vs. This Bird hath such an absolute memory, that hauing re-passed the Sea, and many other Regions, which are two thousand miles off, at the least: yet shee well knoweth to returne to the place or lodging, where (in the precedent yeare) she made her Nest, and where shee had young ones. This I haue seene, and made proofe of by one Swalow, hauing tied a red Silk twine about her Claw; and she fayled not the yeare following, to returne and build her nest, where she had done the yeare before, bringing the Silke fast tyed at her foote. She neuer lodgeth two yeares together, in one and the same nest.

The great memory of the Swallow.

The Swallow cleanseth the ayre of Flies.

She is not affraid of a man, and (willingly) buildeth not her nest in Houses. It is saide, that God hath done this in his great prouidence, to the ende, that such Creatures, as haue no other feeding but on Flyes, which doe so much mollestation to men all Summer, and in the beginning of Autumne; might thus be deuoured. It is the onely Bird which feedeth in the Ayre, and there catcheth a prey, to carry to her young ones. But some people, not knowing what they do; will breake downe their Nests, shut their windowes and doores of their Chambers, to the ende, they may not enter in or out, to carry feeding to their young. Nay, they do them all the iniuries they can, breaking their Egges; yea, sometimes they kill both He and She. But if a man knew the good and commoditie, which these pretty Birdes doe bring vnto vs; they would be more milde, and let them liue in peace.

The barbarousnesse of some people, in abusing this poor bird

I know very wel, there are some who will alleadge, that the Dung of these Birds is so pernicious, as if it fall into a Mans eyes (as it did to Tobias) it will then, without all question, make him blind. But they that haue alleaged this History, were not skilful in the tongs; albeit Mathio'us, a man learned, hath auouched the same, following their opinion. For the Iewish Theologian Doctors, wel skild in the Syrian and Hebrew Languages, say: that it was not Swallowes that dunged on the eyes of Tobias, but Sparrowes, which is confirmed by Dioscorides, when he saith, Swallowes being eaten, doe cleare the sight, like as the Becficus, or Gnat-snapper. The Ashes of them, as well of the great as smal (their bodies being burned in an earthen pot, and Hony applyed to them) doe take away al impeachments that trouble the sight. It may then well be discerned hereby, that the dung of the Bird which tooke away the sight of Tobias, was not that of the Swallow, according to their iudgement. And Galen is of the same mind with Dioscorides: I refer it then to better censure.

By not vnderstanding the Hebrew, this fault was committed.

The Iaarned Iewes write in their Bookes, that Tobias became blind not by Swallowes, but by Sparrowes.

The Swallow builds with Morter as man doth, and prouideth for her yonng.

She hath enstructed man, how hee ought to builde, for with Straw and Morter she buildeth her Nest, and with such cunning; that hardly can any Man make the like. When she desireth propagation, the Male medleth with his Female; but not in mounting, or treading vpon her, but by ioyning both their hinder parts together, for which to yeilde a reason, Ælianus saith, that he neuer knew any rendred. They fly abroad in the fields, to seeke for Wooll, which they plucke from the backs of Sheepe with their clawes, and carry into their Nests, whereon they lay their Egges, to preserue them from breaking, as also the enclosed young ones from hurting.

The Male and Female, supplying the place

The manner of feeding their young Birds.

place of Father and Mother, giue feeding to their little Birdes, beginning at the first which is hatched, and first breaking forth of the shell. Then they seeke another feeding, & giue to the second, and so to the rest following, euen to the fift and last: for they lay and sit no more but fiue Egges at each brood. Thus we may see, how this Bird instructeth man, how to carry himselfe in nourishing, exalting and distribution of his goodes to his Children, aduancing alwaies the first borne or eldest. They daily cleanse their nests of al ordure and dung found therein, and are very skilfull in defending themselues from vermine, which are enemies to their Egges, and will bite them. But nature hath endued them with so much knowledge, as they can well preserue their Egges from harmefull vermine: for they seeke out the Hearbe called Smallage, in Latine called Apium, and bring it into their Nests, and by the strong sent or bitternesse thereof, the vermine dye.

Cleansing their nests, and defending their Egges.

Their young Birdes doe resemble whelps, that continue for a time blind: but the Male flieth abroad, and findeth a certaine Hearbe, by meanes whereof their sight quickly commeth. Very long and diligent inquisition hath been made after this Hearbe, and the Birdes very narrowly watcht for it; yet could it neuer bee knowne what Hearbe it is. If a man open the eyes of the young Birds, they recouer their sight without any other help: but some do assure vs, that (by meanes of that Hearbe) their sight is the clearer. Which being known to men, the Plant would serue to make their sight more perfect: and therefore (guessing at the true Hearb) they call it Chelidonia, or Hirundinaria.

Swallowes are hatched blind like our Whelpes.

Celandine, or Swallowort.

For so many benefits, which men receiue by means of this Bird, beside those recited in the beginning of this Chapter; enstructing how to build, keep our Houses cleane, delighting vs by her singing, preseruing sight by that kinde of Hearbe, and destroying hurtfull vermine: me-thinkes no man should molest her, but rather peaceably conuerse with her, as a guest or friend that commeth but to see him. She eateth not any thing of ours, but she frees vs from a multitude of flyes, as she flyeth in the Ayre: and she should bee entertained, (as Homer saith) chearfully, like a good guest at her comming, and when she is willing to depart, not to with-hold her.

Swallowes are no way hurtful to men.

The Ashes and Flesh of this Bird, as we haue formerly said, doth not onelie serue to cleare the sight, and recouer it if it bee lost: but it is a remedy also for many much greater euils. For, if wee take the Swallowes first young ones, in the Moones encreasing, and cleaue them: we shal finde diuers little stones in their bellies, whereof two are to bee taken; to wit, one that is of many colours, and another which is but of one colour onely. These stones, wrapt in the skin of a young Hart, or Heifer (before it haue toucht the ground) and tyed about the necke or arme: is much auaileable for such as haue the falling sickenesse, and maketh them very chearfull. Galen giueth assurance, that Swallowes ashes, incorporated with Hony; doe helpe the Squinancy, and all other defects or Impostumes in the throat, as also the Almondes, or Pallat or Vuula.

The Ashes & flesh of the Swallow.

Stones found in young Swallowes, good against the falling sickenesse.

Plinie saith, that there are three kinds of Swallowes, whereof, one buildeth her Nest vnder Houses; the second, in old ruined buildings, in holes and Cauernes of Rockes and clifts on the Sea side; and the third, buildeth in the bankes of Riuers. In the Isle of Samos, there are Swallowes naturally all white. Behold what I haue gathered out of good and approoued Authours, concerning the properties of this Bird; in whose imitation we may well order our Oeconomy or Houshold gouernment.

Plin. in lib. 14. Three kindes of Swallowes.

I cannot sufficiently wonder at some Men, who haue compared these friendly Swallowes, to scarse faithfull and dissembling Friendes; who are no Friendes, but so long as there are meanes remaining, to deriue any commodities from them. For they haue imagined, that these Birdes doe liue on the Seedes, Graine, and Fruites of the fielde: and that so soone as they are lockt vp, they flye away into some other Countrey. But it is a matter most certaine, that these kinde Birdes doe not liue vpon any kind of Graine or Fruites: but on Flyes, which (by very great agility) they take in the Ayre, being very molestuous to men, and our houſhold creatures. And therefore many men are deceiued, by the ſaings of ſome fabulous Authors, ſlenderly experimented in naturall things.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

A Paradoxe in defence of Hard-Lodging, approouing it to be more healthfull and commendable; then thoſe in great Pallaces, and houſes of pleaſure.

ALready we haue diſcourſed of poore and meane deſcent, now come we to ſpeak of the humble cottage, the dwelling wherein I haue and will maintaine. The building of ſuch honeſt houſes of harbour, doe require little expences and charge, in leſſe time are they erected, more eaſily furniſhed, and with far greater commodity kept and frequented, then ſtately Pallaces, and houſes of pleaſure. The proportion of a handſome little houſe, carrieth good correſpondency, and no outward wanton appearance. It is leſſe ſubiect to the danger of Theeues, then is the large and ſpacious Pallace, compaſſed about with rare deckings, great & baſe Courts, Offices, Stables, Dog-kennels, Hearnries, Haukſ-mewes, and other ſuch ſuperfluous delights.

The benefit of poore and homely buildings.

Heauen no enemy to humble dwellings.

The poore and ſimple houſe, is not eaſily toucht with lightning and tempeſts from Heauen, and a man may dwell there more quietly, then in the faireſt proſpected Lordſhip: garniſhed with ſo many Gardens, Arbours, Turrets, Vaults, Mountainelike wals, and other curioſities, which doe nothing elſe but tire and weary men. The poore houſe is ſooner prouided, and with leſſe coſt then the greater. It excuſeth the Maiſter from making Feaſts, to ſuch as (commonly) returne but mockes when they are inuited. The ſmal houſe is free from the Harbingers marke, or the Marſhals of Princes, Cardinalles, and Lords, that cannot be entertained but in pompous d welings. Let vs but conſider, where ſuch States haue made but the leaſt ſoiourning; how many things haue need of new mending? And their paſſage that way, reſembled a ſtorme and tempeſt of raine, waſhing all good order for a long while after. See if your Seruants become the better inſtructed thereby, your Houſhold in any more ciuill manners, or your houſe furniture in ſuch good ſort as it ought to be. I had almoſt forgot, that (many times) they put their Hoſt to the perill of borrowing, inciting great Lords to affect his Liuing. So that, if they can cunningly compaſſe the meanes in recompence of their kinde entertainement: the Hoſt is brought to the hazzard of confiſcation, for the very leaſt word inconſiderately ſpoken, eyther againſt the Prince or Religion.

Great perſons are but ſorrie gueſtes in meane houſes

Mean houſes are no harbors for great gueſtes.

This is the reaſon, why I cannot ſufficiently meruaile, at the great follie and poore iudgement of ſome Men, who couet huge Pallaces, and ſumptuous Houſes for their abiding and lodging; beeing much grieued and offended, if they ſhould take but one nights reſt in a meane, poore, and populer houſe. As if our Soule (full of all excellent nobleneſſe, and endued with infinite priuiledges, which God hath thereto aſſigned;) ſhould imagine the body too ſtraite and narrow a roome, for hir to abide in. Or as if (in how ſhort time God beſt knoweth, whether wee be willing or no) we ſhould not render the bodie into a much leſſe Lodging, to finde out one farre more excellent and magnificent for the Soule. Can a meane Houſe, a hard Bed, or a narrow roome bee any hindrance: but that our Spirit (freely, and at her owne eaſe) may make diſcourſe thorow all Celeſtiall pleaſures, much better delights then can bee wiſhed for in this world? It need not (there) ſtand bound to ſo many inconueniences; as the dwellers in faire and Lordly places, are euermore ſubiect vnto.

The ſpirit is at liberty in the leaſt Cottage.

Great houſes are fitteſt for great perſons

When Warre had his beginning, and entred into conſultation, to burne and deſtroy the Countrey on all ſides, as it prooued moſt to yeelde diſaduantage: the Soldiours, and men appointed for ſpoyle, receiued no charge to meddle with little Hamlets, or poore Shepheardes Houſes; but the moſt magnificent and beautifull habitations of Souldiers can make but ſmal booty of poor places, their aime is at greater benefit.

of great Lordes and Princes. Beside, if neede required to make a Fielde assembly, in what place soeuer it were: the fayrest Castels & costliest buildings were sure to bee first taken vp and vsed.

But let vs admit, that a poore mans Cottage suffers spoyle among the rest: yet the Man hath this comfort left him (a priuiledge beyond the large capacity of Castles) that his House will (well-nere) be as soone builded againe, as a Captaine can commaund and set his fielde in order. But when a great Pallace becommeth ruined, many years are required to erect it againe; beside, it serueth (a long while after) as a receptacle for Rascals and Field Run-awaies, or as a warren for Toads and Serpents, or as a Garden for Fresh-water Souldiers.

Great houses ruined, aske long time to rebuild.

I cannot chuse, but take pitty and compassion on such mens affections, that place their whole felicity on such thinges, whereby they can receiue no praise or honour. For it oftentimes commeth to passe, that the glorie of a goodly building, beareth not his name that caused it to bee made; but of the new Purchaser, or the cunning Architect, who deseruedly is styled Maister of the worke. But say, that the party himselfe, who was at the charge of the building, doe carry Name and Title thereof: what a sillie glorie is it (but farre greater vanitie) to couet honour by beeing a Lord ouer Stones, which are thinges senceleſse and voide of life? To be Maister of a peece of Wood? Or, when all is said, a Lord of Chalke and Dust? Were it not much more famous for him, to bee entitled a Lord of many faire Artes and Sciences? Or to win honour by some heroycal, worthy, and vertuous actions.

One man easily purchaseth anothers honour.

The Titles of vertue are truelie famous.

That it ought to be so, ancient Princes and potent Lords, who more esteemed valour and vertue, then matters earthly & transitory; were neuer wont to set their affections on sumptuous buildings: but were altogether studious, and addicted to the excellencie of vertue and prowesse. Was not the house of great Euander, little, mean, & poorely built? And yet notwithstanding, the fame of the vertuous Maister thereof, made it esteemed of no lesse value, then other great & royall Pallaces, and deserued to entertaine the famous & highly renowned Hercules. In ius Cæsar, neuer builded but a little house; because he would not be hindred from so many singuler vertues, as brought him (at length) to gouern the great Romaine Empire. Mighty Scipio, that conquered most stubborne Affrica, had neuer any perticuler Lodging: but aboad in one poore village, then in another; to shake off wearinesse, and with-draw himselfe from the molestation of great affaires.

Great persons haue lodged in poor mens houses.

Diogenes, the graue Philosopher, that was of such an excellent Spirit, as euer any man was in his time: made his dwelling in a poor Tub, to defend himselfe from the raine, and heate of the Sunne. Hillarion, that good and deuout man, lay very hardly in the Easterne Deserts, in a poore little Cell, which he had (as Saint Hierome reporteth) more truely made as a Sepulcher, then any House to dwell in. Caius lodged in a House so rent and torne on all sides, & open aboue in so many places, that being (one day) desired by a friend of his, to lend him his Mantle: he answered that hee could not spare it, because it serued to counter-guard his poor lodging. This he spake, beholding a great hole in the roofe ouer his head, which had been lately broken; and perceiuing a darke cloud not farre off, that threatned a present shewer of raine. Iulius Drusus Publicola, had (in like manner) a house so broken and shiuered: as whosoeuer was without, might easilie discerne and count the moueables within, and behold what the good man did in his house.

The poueritie of dwelling doth not disparage the vertue of the mind.

To speake truely, me-thinkes they haue a great portion of folly and ambition, that couet to dwell in goodly Pallaces, holding little Cottages & meane Houses in contempt and scorne: as if those gaudy places, and built with such beauty, were more defensiue then the other, from meeting with the assaults of death, and infinite mishaps and diseases that befall vs in the World. Such as are read in Histories, or conceiue in the any pleasure, can say with me, that when Tullius Hostilius was smitten with thunder, he was then most merry in his Pallace royall. When Tarquinius Priscus was slaine, he was in his most magnificent Lodging. How many other Lords may we speake of, both Ancient and Moderne, that haue beene slaine in their braue Castles, by diuers accidents and misfortunes? The Duke of Vrbine, who builded a Pallace most faire and rich: did it defend him from danger, or being the most wofull example of calamity to euery eye, that happened in his time? The goodly Pallace of Trent, said to be without comparison, for the infinite Roomes contained in the round: was it any priuiledge to the Builder thereof, in exempting him from as many miseries and mishaps, as the wretchedst Varlet in the World could haue no more? To what end serued so many and excellent rare Buildings, erected by Lucullus and Metellus? wherein were Caligula or Nero more happy then others, though they had houses of such spacious circuit, as comprehended (wel neere) the whole Citty? The braue worke-man that builded the Pallace at Paris; could he warrant himselfe from stretching on Mount Falcon, which hee likewise made for Malefactors?

A little Cottage (with content) is a poore mans Kingdome.

We wil conclude then, that he is to be accounted a meere Foole, that disdaines to dwell in a poore or meane house, or take quiet rest in a good hard bed: couering with heat and greedy desire, to make his aboad in stately places, wherein (for the most part) lurketh all misfortune, fraud, dissimulation, slander, treason, and misery. He that is loth to credit what I say; let him make but one moneths experience, and he will finde it too true to his cost. For assuredly, these are the places, where commonly hapneth most secret mischiefes; either by broaths or drinkes, seasoned otherwise then they should bee, or by the power of too keene a Weapon; or other Stratagems of like nature. They are safe shelters also, for wanton and libidinous pleasures: where a false friend may soonest graft hornes on his companions head, and where fire is soone kindled, but slowly quenched.

Great Houses are the places subiect to most dangers.

Loue is a lord in gay buildings.

Let vs then shunne them so diligently, as (with our best meanes) we may, and let vs delight in simple habitations, fit and aptly furnished with all peace and tranquility. In so doing, we shall not stand obliged, or be any way beholding to cunning Builders, highly praised and esteemed by their Worke-Maisters; and yet can purchase good Liuings out of their vanities, where afterward they sit and floute at their follies. Rather let vs content our selues to imitate the workes and Buildings of Doxius, Sonne to Cælius; who first found out the inuention, to erect his House after the manner of Swallowes. Then will wee remember, to frame our Houses, according as Mortall men ought to doe, not as if wee should continue in them perpetuallie: but as hoping (one day) after our short voyage in this world, to inherit & haue part in another manner of dwelling, builded after a much better fashion and compasse; then those that are framed, by the fraile and earthlie hands of men.

The Authors conclusion of this Paradox.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of some that haue beene punished, for hauing done better then they were commaunded: And others, because they did well, without commaund.

HE that dependeth on another mans will, ought to be careful of himself, not onely in well-doing; but also in doing better then he is commaunded. For, I will declare by some Histories in this Chapter, that of these two sorts, of doing well, and better then well; there haue been some seuerely punished. As it happened to an ingenious Maister of Athens, to whom Publius Crassus, a Mutian (being Proconsull in Asia for the Romaines, and being ready to besiedge a Citty) gaue charge, to seeke for two Shippe Masts, which he had seene in Athens, to make an Engine for battery of the wall, telling him, that he would haue the greatest. The skilfull Maister, beeing a Man of great vnderstanding, well knew, that a Mast of such greatnesse, would not be apt for any such effect: in regard wherof, because a meaner was much more conuenient for the battery, and easier for for carriage; he sent such a one to Crassus. When he perceiued his purpose to be thwarted, hee caused the ingenious man to be brought before him, and demaunded of him, why hee had not obeyed as he was commanded? And being willing to hear no reason or excuse; gaue charge to strip him naked, and to be whipt with Rods, as he was, and so long, till he dyed. For it appeared to Crassus, that in stead of obeying, hee fought to counsell him. So, it was not without cause, that there arose a common Prouerbe; A Man shall haue worke enough to gouerne himselfe well in this World.

A cruell act in Publius Crassus

The History of Papyrius the Romaine Dictator.

Long time before this Mutian dealt so hardly with this skilfull man, one Papyrius, a Romaine Dictatour, did no lesse: but rather proceeded further, of more rigorously, (in regard of quaitie among persons) towards a Noble Romaine, Colonell of the Romaine Cauelery. This man gaue battaile to the Samnites, without his expresse commaund, and slew twenty thousand of the enemies. Neuertheless, though he had done well and valiantly: yet hee was condemned to death (beeing named Quintus Fabius Rutilianus) without any respect of his merit, or race. And, as the custome then was, before the stroke of death, the condemned person must be seuerely beaten, which while the miserable Rutilianus endured: the most Honourable Lords in the Armie, entreated Papyrius, to deferre his death till the next morning, which (with much ado) at length he granted. In meane while, night granting means to the condemned man to saue himself, he fled to Rome, and implored the ayde of the Senate, for safetie of his life: but it was in vaine, for Papyrius still stood resolute for his death. Whereupon, the condemned parties Father (who had formerly beene Dictatour, and three times Consull) was constrained to make his recourse to the people, and (by way of supplication) to sollicite the Tribunes of the people for his Son; all which could not diuert the rigor of Papyrius. Finally, he was entreated of all the people, and by the Tribunes of the people, protesting, that he should not pardon Fabius the punishment hee had deserued: but to deliuer to the Romaine people, and the Tribunes, the power of his correction.

Miserable correction before death.

The cruell constancy of Papyrius against Rutilian.

The people of Carthage would not haue laboured so much, to saue the life of any Man, that had committed such an Act as Rutilianus did: For, the Captaine or Generall, that had giuen battaile to the Enemy, without expresse commaundement of the Senate, although he had won the day; was sure to be hanged. And to speake truth, it hath euermore beene obserued, in all Militarie discipline; yea, from all antiquitie; that the Souldier or Captaine, that fought or gaue battell, against prohibition made vnto him deserued death.

Obedience is the chiefe in Military discipline.

In like maner, Cæsar speaking of one of his Captaines, named Syllanus, said: He did well and wisely, not to giue battaile, albeit he was sure to haue had the victorie. Because (saith hee) it is not in the Captaine, to goe beyonde the prohibitions giuen him. For it is most certaine, that nothing should be done in matter of warre, contrary to commands: nor a Captaine or Liuetenant ought not to giue battaile, except he bee expressely commaunded. And this was the cause, that the Counte of Aignemont was in danger, and had at length (by especiall fauour) onely as punishment, a reprehension publikely giuen him, by Charls the fift, Emp. for gaining battaile to the Marshall de Termes, although hee had the victory, because the danger of al the Low Country lay at the stake, if he had lost the day.

The iudgement of Cæsar in this case.

The Counte of Aignemont censured.

But this last point is to be vnderstood of Captaines, that haue no charge of command in title of offices, for the Officer, as the Consull, Constable, the Captaine erected in Title of Office, to haue ful command ouer the Army, and make the warr: may by vertue of his office) without attending especiall commaund, giue warr to a published enemie, pursue him, bid battaile, besiedge, and (if he can) take Fortes, and dispose the Army at his discretion; if hee haue not perticular prohibition from his Soueraigne, by whō his power is appointed. But hauing taken strong holdes, or the chiefe of the enemies; he canot re-deliuer them without especiall commaund. True it is, that in the populer Cōmonweales, these points are not obserued, neither can they bee kept with rigour: but often it happeneth, that Captaines doe diſpoſe the very greateſt affaires, which they cannot doe in a Monarchy, for the difference of aduiſe and will of a Prince, or the people, of one man, or thirty thouſand.

Of Helyodorus the Mytilenian and his banquet.

We read in the Greeke Hiſtories, that one Heliodorus a Mitylenian, made a banquet, in midſt whereof, deliuering demonſtration, that his gueſts ſhould not make ſpare of any thing: he cõmanded two of his Slaues to goe buy two Septiers of Wine, of a Man that ſold wine neere to his houſe. The Slaues finding the Wine to be bad, went and bought elſe-where, ſuch as was excellent good, and liked all the company; ſaying, they neuer dranke better. Whereon the Slaues ſaid, that it was not of the wine which their Lord ſent them for, for it beeing naught, they were faine to buy in another place. Whereat Heliodorus grew offended, becauſe they brought not according to his commaund, although the wine was better: when the company was departed, he ſo tormented the poore Slaues that they dyed. Thus you ſee what ill fortuue it is, to be in ſubiection to people ouer ſeuere, and without any temperance: puniſhing ſuch as they haue command ouer, rather for doing well, then ill.

CHAP. I.

Of the Emperour of Æthyopia, called Prete-Ian, or Prester-Iohn: Of his Originall, and Customes of his people.

THe Great Emperor of Æthyopia, vnto whom we corruptlie giue the Name of Pres-biter-Ian, is neither Priest or sacrificer, though he be (by some) called PRETE-IAN, and (by his owne people) named Belaugian, that is to say, Ioy of incompareable excellencie, or of most value; and by others of them, he is also called Ian, which (in their Language) signifieth Mightie. He commandeth ouer seauenty and two Kingdomes, which are all of different languages, hauing their diuersity of Customs, and the colour or complexion of their Faces, are much disagreeing. He is able to leuy in preparation for warre, a Million of fighting men; fiue hundered Elephants with their Armour and Munition for encounter, with an infinite number of Horsses and Camels. His Knights or Warlick Soldiers, enter armed to the battell, each wearing a long Coat of Maile, stretching downe closely to their Thighes, a Sallet or Head-piece on the head, a croo'ed Fauchion by their side and a Lance with two Steele points or Pikes. Such as haue no Sallets or Head-pieces, do wear thick quilted Caps on their heads, plaited after the manner of Mameluke Soldiers. The yonger sort, carry Darts, Arrowes, and Slings, obseruing the same Discipline, & be as obedient or well-gouerned, in ranging their battaile, as wee are. They vse Drummes of Brasse, and Trumpets also, to encourage their Soldiers to the fight, which is performd with great hardiment, appointing also, sundry honours, and respective rewards, to such as declare themselues to be of highest merit. They doo daily pay the families of their Warriors, and marke the Children that are born of them, with a Crosse, which they imprint suddenly in the flesh with an hot Iron, so that the signe remaineth, as if it were naturall vnto them.

He is serued by Pages, who are of Noble birth; and they bring him his meate (ready cut and prepared) in little Baskets or Panniers. He drinketh

While hee feedeth, three hundred lustie young men (chosen out of the seuerall kingdoms vnder his Dominion, hauing the place of Archers, and of his Guard) doo stand about the Tent-royall. For, by an auncient custome it hath been kept, that the King liueth continually out of any City, wherein he neuer abideth but two dayes only; and those Tents are erected in such manner, that the back-part is euer placed to the East, and the doore opening is opposite to the West.

An Ancient custome still obserued.

The attendants vppon the Emperor

The vsual Armes or weapons of these Guards, are Swords, Daggers, and Iauelins, their neckes and shoulders beeing gorgetted with thicke skinnes of Beasts. Foure Kings, who (by commandement) do attend the Court, follow (each after other) the Table-seruice, accompanied with many Barons, and meaner Officers, euen from the Kitchen, vnto the Tent of Prete-Ian, all cloathed in Silke, Seudale, and Scarlet: and there they deliuer it to the Pages, who come forth purposely to receiue it. The King and al his Court fare deliciously, with Fowle, Fish, and al kind of Venison. So soone as he hath dined (for hee neuer supps, but in Feastiuall dayes) his Eunuchs goe to fetch diuers Queenes (according vnto their seuerall quarters) being Wiues of the forenamed Kings, to waite on the Queene and wife to Prete-Ian, conducting her vnto his Tent, to giue him pleasure and contentment, and there they sing and Dance in his presence. He hath foure Wiues, who are the Daughters of his neighbor-kings, yet he lodgeth but with one of them, to whom he is solemnly maried with many Ceremonies: but if it chaunce that hee haue no Children by her, then he cals to his bed one of the other.

The wiues of the Emperor

His manner of shewing himselfe in publicke.

When he purposeth to shew himselfe in publicke, his face is couered with a vail of Taffata, which hee lifteth vp, and pulleth downe, that hardly can his face bee wholly discerned: but if it bee, it is verie quickly couered againe. Hee vseth to shew himself vnto the people three times in the yeare, that is to say, on the daies of Christmas, Faster, and the holy Crosse in September; and (for this purpose) is a goodly high Scaffold duly prepared. The cause of this Ceremony, receiued Originall from Dauid Prete-Ian, sir-named Alexander, whose death was three whole yeares concealed by his chiefe Seruants, that gouerned the Kingdome in his time. Therefore to auoide all the like succeeding inconueniences, the Father of Dauid Prete-Ian, at the earnest entreatie of his people, began first to shew himselfe on these ordained daies, which hath continually (euer since) been obserued, euen to Panuscius Prete-Ian, now raigning in Æthyopia, only excepted when he goeth in warre, for then he marcheth daily discouered. He is crowned with a precious Diadem; the one part whereof is Gold, and the other Siluer, and carrieth (instead of a Scepter) a Crosse of Siluer in his hand: All his Seruants are marked with a Crosse, in the verie flesh on the right shoulder. He is cloathed with rich Garments of frizeled Cloath of Golde, wearing a shirt of Silke, with verie large and wide sleeues, as Dukes in elder times were wont to doe. And from the Girdle downward, he weareth a wide Kirtle of Silke and Cloath of Gold, with a Linnen couerture, after a Byshops manner. On either side of him, goe two Pages, each holding a Crosse of Siluer in the one hand, and a naked Sword in the other.

His Lords, who are as Kings, and carry that Title, do pay him tribute of Gold and other Mettals; of Horsses, and great Cattell of diuers kinds: likewise of cloath of Golde, and of Wooll, according to the quality & best Nature of those countries vnder their Gouernment: Which rights and Tributes they haue from their Subiects, although they be Vassailes (indeed) to none but Prete-Ian himselfe, and to whom they yeilde the greater part of their substance. Some do pay him large quantities of Corne, and of Salt, for the maintaining of his Armies. Others do bring him Pepper, which is a rare Commodity in that Countrey; and some do pay him Slaues.

The Emperors Subiects are very rich.

Prete-Ian, is greatly honoured and loued of his people, who are verie rich in Gold, not Coined, and other Mettalles: and his Landes being well peopled and inhabited, he deriueth from them verie great Reuennewes. They cloath themselues with Linnen, Wollen, and Silke: addicting their minds much to Husbandry, and Tilling the ground.

*Or Xoa, as some call it.

In the Realme of * Sceua, where the King most abideth, they haue two crops or Haruests each yeare, for they haue also two Summers. They gather al things necessary for the maintenance of life, and in great abundance; especially, the grain of Barley, and all kinds of Pulse, Pease, and Beanes, &c. Millet and Panicke, or Indian Oat-meale, groweth there so hie, as it ouer-toppeth a man riding on horse backe. The Vines do yeelde an infinitie of Grapes or Raisins, whereof they make great plentie of Wine: but beside, they do ordinarily make Beuerages of Beere, and other of Peares & Apples well compounded with Barley, Millet, or Wallwort, whereof the verie meanest of the people do daily drinke. They vse to set foorth their Bankets yearely, with greene Figges, and Apples that are very sauoury. They haue great store of Wood, called Ibonie, and diuers kindes thereof. They vse to hunt Lyons, Leopards, Rhinocerots, and Elephants. They haue great store of Cattle, goodly Horses, and gallant Mules, which they sell (at great price) to Barons of the Court.

The first dignity among them, is that of the Priest: the second, of prudent and wisemen, whom they call Ealsanats and Tenquats; Bounty and good Conuersation is highly esteemed amongst them: The third degree is of Noblemen, and then that of Soldiers. Such as are established to render right and reason to euery man, do punish greeuously the delinquements. They plucke out the eyes of Theeues, and then afterward, giue them a publick Slaue to keep them company, and lead them thorow far remote Countries and Kingdomes, getting their liuing by playing on the Harpe; to the sound whereof, they accord their voices, and so go singing from doore to doore: and if they chaunce to stay in one place more then a day, they are both put to death, the Theefe and the Slaue. They deliuer a Murtherer, into the handes of his Kindred whom he hath slaine, to the end, that they may take such vengeance as to them seemeth good, for the outrage committed on their blood. If anie deale with Children, in the abhominable sinne of Sodomy, the offender is iudged (by them) to be worthy of death. And whosoeuer doth rashly reuolt from his Religion, is stoned to death before al the people. Also, hee that transgresseth the Ceremonies and Commandements of Religion, wickedly blaspheming God, the glorious Virgin, or the Saints, is burned aliue in a publicke place. Other delicts of lesser Nature, are iudged according to the will and Arbitrage of the Interpreters of the Lawes.

The Abyssines haue a perticular Language, and Carracters of Letters proper to themselues, wherein the New Testament was imprinted at Rome. The Holy Scripture hath also beene translated into their Abissine tongue; and * I my selfe (being then a young Lad at Rome) began to learne the Language, of one Frier Peter, an Abyssine, and of the order of Saint Francis, a man of excellent guifts, good life, and greatly beloued by Pope Paule the third, and all his Court. This Fryer dwelt behind the Tribunall of S. Peter, in the house and Church dedicated to the Abyssines, where they celebrated after their maner, and were maintained at the Popes charges.

Of the Abyssines.

*This is spoken by Hieron Gigli an Italian, from whō I translated this whole Chapter.

The Abyssines do not stamp anie money, but make vse of that which commeth from others; which is of gold marked with Strabesque Letters, and they cal those pieces of mony, Fardals & Syraphs. They pay their Soldiers in certain pieces of Gold and Siluer, of diuers waightes; and with them also, they buy such things as are sold in the Markets. They celebrate their weddings with meats very solemnly, and if the man or woman be taken in Adultery, they doo repudiate both the one and the other. They are baptised, and yet notwithstanding that, they adde some marke vpon the fore-head, with a hot Iron, and will not wholy leaue the Hebrue vse; for they cut the Prepuce, and take a little flesh also from womens secrets. The children most in yeares, are heirs to their Fathers

The error of some Cosmographers, in situation of his kingdom.

They haue greatly erred, that in their Maps and Tables, haue placed his seate in Asia, beeing ignorant that there is a double India; the one in Asia, and the other in Ethyopia. His Kingdome confineth (on the Leuant or East-side) the Red and Barbarian Sea: And on the South, the Sea called Agisimbe; and on this side, the Region goeth like a Promontorie towards the South, to the Cape called De bona Speranza. Almost at the end of Prete-Ians Land, in one of his Kingdomes called Goyaume, is the sourse of Nilus, a Riuer that runnes bathing all Ethyopia; and hauing made a long course, trauersing many Islands (whereof Meroe is the greatest) it passeth swelling along Egypt. It confineth on the North side, Egypt & Lybia; and on the West, the lower Lybia, and the Moores. But the Father of Prete-Ian, being a warlicke man, and expert in Armes; amplified and enlarged his Empire; and among other difficult and perrillous Wars, he vanquished the* Troglodites, who vsing poysoned Arrowes, he tooke (by the way) King Casant, conquered in battell, and smote off his head, as an infamous and cruell Traitor. This man raigned also in that countrey, which looketh plainely Southward to the Sea, called Magambizique, and is face to face with the great Isle of Saint Laurence. He ouercame likewise the King of Manicongoso, who afterward became a Christian: and Thermeda Prince of the Blacke-people. He vanquished also King Selan, Lord of the Mahometan Moors, whose passage was a long time out of Arabia Fœlix, by the strait of the Red sea, into the firme Land, neighboring on Ethyopia.

These Abyssines (for so are they called of all Prete-Ians subiects) haue a Patriark, whom they name Abuna, that is to say, [Father;] hee hath the gouernment of spirituall things, and soueraigne Authority ouer the Priests, which are infinit in number, and distinguished by their churches and Monasteries. To persons badly complexioned in manners, contumations, and corrupted in the right rules of Discipline: hee exerciseth a seuere Censure, and excommunication; so that being expelled and abandoned of all men, they wander and dye miserably starued. This Patriarke maketh residence (with his Senate) in the Cittie of Borrara, situate in a Mountaine verie austere and full of Woodes, enuironed with perpetuall umbrages, for his better recreation: and there the braunches of the broad-leafed Trees are so plyant, & twine themselues in manner of an Arch, that though the Countrey be most hot, yet in the midday Sun, little or no heate at all is there felt: for their continuall dewing with healthfull and liuely springes, compleateth the grace of their freshnes and verdure. This Patriark receiueth a great leuy of tenths; as also the Reuennues of the King Prete-Ian, who is greatly giuen and affected to Religion, as appeareth by his liberall pietie and deuotion.

When the Patriarke dyeth, such Riches of his as is found remaining, returneth to the Exchequer Royall: and then they proceed to new election of another, that shall be iudged to be the most vertuous. The only glories of Prete-Ian and his Ethyopians, are, that they do repute themselues to be the verie ancientest Nation among men, because they haue alwayes liued in their innated libertie, and were neuer conquered, either by Semyramis, nor Hercules, nor Dyonisius, nor the Romaines; but they themselues vanquished King Cambyses, and ouer-threw his potent armie. Heereto they adde a more true and eminent glorie indeede, which is, that they were one of the first nations, in receipt of the christian Faith, wel-neer from the verie beginning thereof. By meanes of the Eunuch, vnto the famous Queene Candace, who was baptized by Saint Phillip. And that since their Conuersion, they haue constantly kept the same Religion, for so many hundreds of yeares. Albeit, that during this time, they haue haue beene generally (euen as yet they are at this day) molleſted, aſſaulted, and enuironed with Moores, Sarazins, & the Idolatrous Worſhippers of Mahomet. And yet, notwithſtanding all thoſe cruel Tempeſts (which heeretofore deſtroyed the Romaine Empire, and the very greateſt part of Chriſtendom, Ethyopia could neuer hitherto be ſpoyled, either of their Dominion or Religion, albeit ſome Idolatrous mixture hath crept thereinto: which is the leſſe to bee maruelled at, if we may credit their own ſaying, in alledging their conſtancie and Antiquity, becauſe they deriue their Noble Originall and continuance, from the royall Kings, Dauid and Salomon; of whome, the bleſſed Virgin Marie (Mother to our Sauiour) deſcended, and he himſelfe, according to the fleſh.

Ethyopia could neuer be conquered.

Whence the Ethyopians do deriue their antiquitie.

Pope Eugenius the fourth, in the yeare one thouſand foure hundered and forty, ſent an Ambaſſadour vnto the Prete-Ian then liuing. And afterward, in the yeare one thouſand fiue hundred thirtie three, Pope Clement the ſeauenth, and the Emperour Charles the fift, being met together at Bologna, an Ambaſſador came to them, from valiant Dauid King of Ethyopia, being named Don Frances Aluarez, a Portugnais, to whom audience was giuen in the publicke Conſiſtory, the 29. day of Ianuary. There hee preſented the Letter (enſuing) to his Holineſſe, & (in name of his King) he gaue the obedience obſerued from Antiquity, and likewiſe in his name, preſented a Croſſe of Golde, waighing a pound; hauing firſt kiſſed his foot, hand, and mouth. The Letter was written in the Ethyopian Language, afterward tranſlated into the Portugall tongue, then into Latine, and againe into Italian, and it was read by the Secretary to his Holineſſe, in the publick preſence.

MOſt Happy and Holie Father, ordained of God to be the Conſecrator of men, and to ſit in the ſeat of Saint Peter; to whom the Keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen was giuen, and whatſoeuer he bound or looſed on earth, the like ſhould be done in Heauen, as Ieſus Chriſt himſelfe ſpake, and Saint Mathew hath written in his Goſpell: The King to whoſe name Lyons doo reuerence, and (by the grace of God) named in Baptiſm, Atanatingil, that is to ſay, Inſpired by the Virgin; but after I tooke the royall Scepter, was named Dauid, Beloued of God, a Piller of the Faith, of the Line of Iuda; the ſonne of Dauid, the ſonne of Salomon, ſonne to the Piller of Sion, ſonne of the ſeed of Iacob, ſonne to the hands of Mary, by carnall ſucceſſion, and ſon of Nahu, Emperor of high Ethyopia, of manie great Kingdomes, Iuriſdictions, and Lands; King of Xoa, of Caffata, of Fatigar, of Angota, of Baru, of Bellenguangna, of Adeor, of Vangua, of Gazama, whence iſſueth Nilus, of Amara, of Burgnamedi, of Ambea, of Tigremalion, of Sabata, where raigned the Queen of Saba, of Bernagaes, and Lord ſo farre as to Egipt. All theſe Landes are vnder my power, and manie others, great and ſmall, which I neyther number or expreſſe by their names, as induced thereto by any pride: but onely to the end, that the ſoueraigne God may be praiſed, who hath beſtowed Chriſtian Religion on ſo many great Kingdomes, and hath enlarged to me ſo great a grace as continually I may do him ſeruice, hauing made me a Capitall enemie to the Moores, and ſuch as worſhip Idolles. I ſend to kiſſe the feete of your Holineſſe, as other Chriſtian Princes vſe to doo, to whom I am not the meaneſt both in power and Religion. I am in my Realmes, a ſtrong Collumb of the Faith, and haue no neede of any other, but put in God my whole hope and ſuccour, he hauing alwaies ſuſtained and gouerned me ſince ſuch time as the Angell of God ſpake to Saint Phillip, when hee taught the true & ſincere Faith vnto the Eunuch, belonging to the potent Queene Candace, Qu. of Ethyopia, when hee returned from Ieruſalem to Gaza, where Saint Phillip baptized the ſaid Eunuch; by whom likewiſe the Queen was afterward baptized, with a great part of her houſe and people. The ſucceſſors of which famous Queene, did neuer ſince faile in true Chriſtianity, but haue continued euermore firme & conſtant in the faith, ſo that my predeceſſors haue not beene holpen by any but God, and haue extended the Chriſtian Faith, as I haue laboured to do the like.

I keepe my ſelfe impaled within mine own limits, like a Lyon compaſſed with: in a thicke Forreſt, ſtrong againſt the Moores, and other Nations enemies to Chriſt, that will not heare the worde of God, nor my faithfull exhortations. I haue purſued them with my ſword in my hand, and (by little and litle) chaſed them from their Neſtes, by the helpe of God, who neuer failed mee; which hath not happened in like manner to other Chriſtian Kings; for when they wold extend their limits, they went not againſt Infidelles, as eaſily they might haue done, by meanes of aſsiſting one another, beſides their further aid of your Holineſſe Benediction, wherein I alſo claime a part. For among my Charters, there is found the Letter of Pope Eugenius, which he ſent heeretofore (with his benediction) to the King of the ſeed of Iacob; of which benediction, I haue iouiſſance, and highly delight in it.

Beſide this, I holde the Temple of Ieruſalem in great honor, and thither I ſend goodly offeringes by my Pilgrims, and much more rich and coſtly ſhould they bee, if the wayes were aſſured from Infidelles, who beſide their robbing the meſſengers of their preſents, do hinder them alſo from free paſſage. And if the voyage to Rome were free and open, I wold com in familiarity and company of the Roman Church, as other Chriſtian Princes do, to whom I am not inferiour. For, euen as they do, I confeſſe one direct faith, and one Catholicke Church, I beleeue ſincerely in the holy Trinity, one only God, and I beleeue the virginity of our bleſſed Lady. I hold and keepe the Articles of the Faith, as they were written by the Apoſtles.

At this preſent, the Lord God by the hand of the moſt puiſſant King * Emanuel, hath opened the way, to the end that we may viſit one another by Embaſsies, and (ioyntly in faith) ſerue one God. But it ſo pleaſed God, that his Ambaſſadors being in our Court, they told vs tydings of his death, and the ſucceſsion of his ſon (my Brother Iohn) in the Crown. So that the death of the Father, brought me not more griefe and diſcontent, then the happy comming of his ſon to the Kingdom, cauſed ioy and gladneſſe.

Aed ſuch is my hope, that ioyning our forces and Armies together, we may run thorough the Prouinces of the Moores, and vtterly deſtroy them. By which meanes, Chriſtians may (more commodiouſlie) go and returne from the Temple of Ieruſalem. And as I earneſtly deſire, that I may be made pertaker of the loue of God, in the Temples of the holy Apoſtles Paule and Peter, ſo do I wiſh to haue the Benediction of the Vicar of Ieſus Chriſt, which (without any doubt) I repute you to be.

I heare manie things alſo of your ſanctitie to Pilgrimes, which go from our Regions vnto Ieruſalem, and thence to Rome, returning backe miraculouſlie, which hath beene to mee vnſpeakeable pleaſure. But indeed, I ſhould receiue much greater contentment, if my Ambaſſadors could vſe a ſhorter way, and bring me (at all times) tidings from you, which I hope they will doo heereafter, ſometime before I die, God aſsiſting, whō I pray maintaine you in health and holineſſe. So be it. I kiſſe your Holie feete, and humblie pray your Holineſſe to ſend me your bleſſing.

* This was the K. of Portugal.

An other Letter ſent from the ſame Prete-Ian, to the fore-named Holy Father.

IN the name of God the Father Almighty, Creator of Heauen and of earth, and of all thinges viſible and inuiſible. In the Name of God the Sonne, Ieſus Chriſt, who is one and the ſame with him, from the beginning of the world, Light of Lights, verie God of very God. In the name of God the holy ſpirit, liuing God, proceeding from God the Father: [I] the King, to whoſe Name Lyons doo reuerence, ſend you theſe Letters, and by the Grace of God, am called Athani-Tinghil, that is to ſay, Incenſe of the Virgin, the ſonne of King Dauid, the ſonne of Salomon, ſon of the King of the hand of Mary, the ſon of Nahum by carnall ſucceſſion, ſonne of S. Peter and S. Paul by grace; Peace bee with you iuſt Lord, Holy Father, Mightie, pure and conſecrate, that is the chief of all Byſhops, not fearing any, nor anie one being, that may ſpeake malediction of you; who is vigilant ouer ſoules, the friend of Pilgrims, a Holy Maiſter, Preacher of faith, and capitall enemie vnto all things that offend conſcience, a louer of good manners, a holy man, lauded and bleſſed of all.

O happy holy Father, I render ye obedience with great reuerence; you beeing the peace of all, deſeruing all goodneſſe, procuring (by duty) that al ſhould render ye obeyſance, as the holie Apoſtles commanded, next vnto God. It is truly ſaide of you, and the ſame Apoſtles commanded vs, to do reuerence to Byſhops, Archbyſhops and Prelates. Alſo to loue you in place of a Father, reuerencing ye in place of a King, and to haue Faith in you as in God. For this reaſon, I bowing my Knees humbly to the earth, doo acknowledge you with a pure and ſincere heart for my Father, and that I am your Sonne.

O moſt Holie and mightie father, why haue you not ſent ſome one hither to vs, to the end, that you might bee informed of my life and helth, you being the ſhepheard and I your theepe? For the good Shepheard neuer forgetteth his flocke. I ſhould not ſeem to be too far from your Regions, but that your Meſſengers may haue the meanes to come hither, conſidering that the King of Portugal Emanuel, your Son, hath verie commodiouſlie, and from much farther Regions of land, ſent me his Ambaſſadors. And if God had deferred a little longer his calling to heauen, doubtles thoſe matters that then were in diſcuſsion betweene vs, wold haue ſucceeded to an happie end. But my deſire is at this preſent (euen ſo much as can be) to heare good, wholeſome and proſperous things of your holineſſe, by meſſengers truſty and faithful, & ſent expreſly: becauſe I haue neuer receiued anie word from your Holineſſe, but heard only ſome ſmal matters, by ſuch as haue gon on pilgrimage in my name, and yet neuer broght me any of your letters. But in our interogations, they haue anſwerd (vncertainly enough) that hauing paide their vowes and deuotions at Ieruſalem, they went afterward to Rome, to viſit the ports of the Holy Apoſtles, hauing firſt of all vnderſtood, that it was eaſie enough for them to abide in thoſe Countries, and to be accounted as Chriſtians. And ſurelie, it pleaſed mee highly to heare their diſcourſe, by meanes whereof (in a ſweete conceiued immagination) me thought I beheld and contemplated the figure of your Holy face, which ſeemed to me like that of an Angell; and I confeſſe to loue and honor it as Angellicall. But aſſuredly, it would be more ſweet and acceptable to mee, deuoutly to contemplate your words and Letters. Wherefore, I praie you at this preſent, that it would pleaſe you to ſend me your Nuntio, with your benediction to reioyce my hart.

For ſeeing we are both of one faith & Religion, me thinkes that (aboue all thinges elſe) I ſhould require you to do this. Moſt humbly praying you alſo, that as you put the Gold Ring vpon your Finger, and the Chaine of Gold about your necke: euen ſo, you wold place my amitie in the depth of your heart, that the memorie thereof may neuer bee loſt. For, by kinde Wordes, and Gracious Letters, amity encreaſeth ſtronglie; eſpecially when it is embraced by holy peace, from whence (doubtleſſe) all humaine ioy proceedeth. And like as the man that is extream thirſty, deſireth earneſtly freſh water, as is to be found in the ſacred Writings; euen ſo my heart longeth, to haue Newes by Meſſengers and Letters from farre-off Countries, wherein I take incredible pleaſure. And not only if I might hear ſome matter of your Holineſſe: but alſo, if ſuch Newes bee certaine, which haue been reported to me, concerning Chriſtian Princes, which ioy would be anſwereable to that, which Conquerors get by rich ſpoiles and purchaſes.

Which now at this time may the more eaſily be done, becauſe the King of Portugall hath opened the paſſage, which long time hath beene vſed, ſending mee his Ambaſſadours, accompanied with many valiant Knights, in the time of his Father Emanuel, & while he liued. Since when, I haue receiued neither Embaſſie nor Letters from any Chriſtian King, much leſſe from any Pope. Albeit in our Rolles, or Treaſury of Charters, which belonged ſometime to our great Grandfather, is preſerued the memorie of Letters from a Pope of Rome, named Eugenius, ſent into theſe parts, when the ſeed of Iacob raigned, the King of Kinges thoroughout all Ethyopia, & the ſuperſcription of the ſaide Letters was in this manner: Eugenius Pope of Rome, to our Well-beloued Sonne, the King of the ſeede of Iacob, King of Kings throughout all Ethyopia, worthy to be reuerenced. And by the ſummary of the ſaide Letters, hee declared, that his Sonne Iohn Paleologus, who was as forgotten two yeares before, K. of the Romanes, was called from Conſtantinople, to celebrat the ſacred Counſel, and with him went Ioſeph the Patriarke of Conſtantinople, accompanied with a great number of Arch-byſhops, Byſhops, and Prelates of all ſorts; and among them alſo aſſiſted the Procuraters of the Patriarkes of Antioch, of Alexandria, and of Ieruſalem, all aſſembled with him in loue of the holy faith and religion. By meanes whereof the vnity of the Church was confirmed, with grace of the Lord, and al difficulties of the paſſed times (which appeared to be erroneous, and contrary to Chriſtian religion) taken away: which things, being by good order eſtabliſhed and confirmd, the ſame Pope had giuen to all the world occaſion of reioicing, as to each one perticulerly.

Now at this time, wee ſend you this Book of pope Eugenius, that hath alwaies bin kept by vs without corruption. We would alſo in like maner haue ſent ye, the tract of the order and power of the pontificall benediction, had not the Volume bin ouer-great, for truly it is as big as the Booke of S. Paul to the Gentiles. And the Legates which brought theſe things hither on the Popes behalfe, were Theodorus, Petrus Dydimus, and George, ſeruants of Ieſus Chriſt. But you (moſt holie Father, ſhall do well to command that the Bookes of your Rols may be turned ouer and peruſed, where I think you ſhall find ſome memory of this which I haue written vnto ye, that if any thing be reſerued on our behalfe, it may be diligently regiſtred among our Bookes, that perpetuall memory thereof may remaine to our poſterity & ſucceſſors. And truly, I account him moſt happy, whoſe memory is in letters preſerued in the holy City of Rome, the ſeat of S. Peter and S. Paule, who are Lords in Heauen, & Iudges of the whole world. And becauſe my beleefe is ſuch, I ſend yee theſe preſents, to the end, that I may win grace with your holineſſe, and with your moſt ſacred Colledge, hoping that from thence will come holy benediction, with encreaſe of all goodneſſe.

Moreouer, I do intreat your Holineſſe to ſend me ſome Images of the Saints, & principally of the virgin Mary to the end that the name of hir and of your holines, may be often in my mouth and memory, and that I may continualy take delight in your preſents. I alſo require ye to ſend me ſome Artezans and workmen, that know how to make thoſe Images, and ſwordes and armor of all kinds, to fight withal; as alſo ſuch as can engraue in Gold and Siluer, Maiſter-Carpenters, Architects, and Maſons, to make houſes of ſtone. And men that are skilfull in Caſting of Lead, Copper and Braſſe, to couer the tops of thoſe houſes. Beſide theſe men, we ſhall highly eſteeme ſuch worke in Glaſſe, or ſuch as are Falconers, & ſuch as can make Inſtruments of Muſicke; as alſo ſuch as can play on Flutes & trompets. Al which workemen, I deſire that may bee of your houſe; or if you bee not ſo ſufficiently prouided, prouided, your Holineſſe may eaſily win ſuch from other Chriſtian Kinges your children, who are all obedient vnto your command: aſſuring yee, that no ſooner ſhall thoſe workemen heere arriue, but they ſhall be held in great honour, according to the ſeuerall merit of euerie man, and ſhall receiue of my liberality, ample courteſie, reward, and wages: with this condition, that if any one heereafter, be deſirous to returne into his owne Country, hee ſhall depart from my Court ſo well recompenced, as ſhall giue him cauſe to reſt contented, carrying hence with him, ſuch thinges as himſelfe ſhall pleaſe, for I wil not keep any man againſt his mind, when I haue receiued ſom benefit of his Art.

Now am I to ſpeake of other things, and would gladly demand of you Holie Father, why you doe not admoniſh the Chriſtian Kings your Children, to agree among themſelues, as it becommeth brethren, conſidering they are of your flock and you their Shepheard? And wel doth your Holineſſe know that which is commanded in the Goſpell, where it is ſaide; Euery Kingdome diuided in it ſelfe ſhall bee deſolate. For, if the kings of Chriſtendom were vnited and leagued together, eaſilie might they deſtroy the Mahometans, & all other Infidelles, and all their actions wold ſucceed to their wish; ruinating the Sepulchre of that falſe Prophet, which is in the Citty of Mecha. Wherefore I pray ye, to labour a firme league of amitie among them, exhorting them to lend me fauour and ſuccor. For, on all the Confines of my Kingdomes, I am enuironed with Moores, Mahometans, and wicked people, who (neuertheleſſe) do hold ſuch fidelity together, as wee ſee not the like. They interchangeably aide one another, making alliance Kings with Kinges, and Lords with Lords, in great Loyaltie and conſtancie, and all againſt vs. There is a King Moore my Neighbor, whom al the other Moare-Kings (his Neighbours) do furniſh with Armes, horſes, and all other Inſtruments for warre. Theſe men, are the Kings of India, Perſia, Arabia, and Egipt, by whom I daily receiue much grieuance, beholding the enimies of Chriſtianity ioyned together in brotherly charity, enioying peace: & chriſtian Kings my Brethren, not according togither in any maner, nor are moued at their outrages, or any way giuing mee ſuccour, as is the duty of al chriſtians. And ſo much the rather, becauſe the moſt filthy ſons of Mahomet ſo aid one another. Not that (in this reſpect) I would haue you think that I deſire any forces for ſuch an enterpriſe, for I haue ſufficient of mine owne, and more then I need. But I intreat only your Prayers and Oriſons to God, and couet to find grace with your holineſſe, & with all other Kings my Brethren.

This is the reaſon why I ſeeke amitie with you and them, to the end, of beeing furniſhed abundantly, with ſuch things as are before required, to the feare and aſtoniſhment of the Moores, and that my neighbours (enemies vnto the Chriſtians name) may know, that Chriſtian Kinges (my Brethren) can giue me fauor and aſſiſtance, which truly appertaineth to our common honor, ſince we agree in vnitie of Faith and true religion. We are reſolued to continue firme in this counſell & deliberation, which ſeemeth to Vs, moſt aſſured, perfect, and profitable. God fulfill your deſires to the praiſe of Ieſus Chriſt, and of God our Father, whoſe name be praiſed of al, in al ages. And you holie Father, embrace mee with all the Saints of Ieſus Chriſt, which are at Rome: and in the ſame imbracement, I pray yee to receiue al the inhabitants of my kingdomes, and they that remaine in Ethyopia. Thankes be rendred to our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, by your ſpirit.

Your Holineſſe ſhall receiue theſe Letters, by the helpe of my Brother King Iohn, ſon to the moſt potent King Emanuell, by the handes of Frances Aluarez our Ambaſſador.

CHAP. II.

Of the ouergreat Superſtition of the Queen of Maugy, who loſt her mighty Eſtate, by putting too much confidence in the predictions of Aſtrologers.

THat Superſtition is a verie great Vice, bringing manie diſcommodities and daungers, vnto ſuch as are thereto inclined, may Ordinarily bee ſeene, As for example:

Note the vain opinion of this world, in meeting ſome accidents on the way.

If a man (returning from ſome iourney, or ſetting forth vpon it, his buſineſſe being ſerious and importent, if hee chance to meet an old Woman on the way, or perceiueth a Hare to croſſe the paſſage before him, he preſently takes it for an euill encounter, and to preſage ſome perill towards him.

Some Huntſmen alſo are of opinion, that if they meete a Prieſt or a Frier vpon the way, as they ride on Hunting, they ſhall ſurely (that day) not take any thing. Some others, if they but heare a Pie to chatter, they ſhall ſhortly vnderſtand of euill tidinges. There are ſome alſo, ſo ſtrangely incenſed, that they verilie beleeue, if they meete a Serpent or Snake: that day no inconuenience can betide them; with diuers other vanities beſide, which ſauour much more of Paganiſme, then of any Chriſtianity. Such ſuperſtitions were deepely grounded among the Romaine people, yea, much more then in any other, witneſſe their Auſpices, that is; their Conſultations which they wold make, before they began any war or expedition, by the obſeruation of Birds, beholding their flight, liſtening their ſongs, and whether they fed wel or ill; in regard whereof, they loſt many commodities in their warres. And it is not to be doubted, but that euerie ſuperſtitious Captain, wil hardly do any thing of deſert; which Cicero well noted in his Bookes of Diuination, and maketh a mockery thereat.

The Romains were greatly addicted vnto ſuperſtitions.

Cicero in Lib. de Diuinat.

This follie is diſperſed thorough the world, but yet in ſome Countries more then other. As among the Aſian Tartars who are ſo much addicted to iudicial Aſtrologie, and therein ſo ſuperſtitious, as they will neither build a Houſe, Village, Cittie, Temple, or any other building whatſoeuer, but at laying the firſt ſtone, they will ſet downe in Writing, the day, the houre, the moneth, and the ſeaſon. The like they do at the Natiuitie of their Children, then they conſult with Aſtrologers and Genethliaques*, who then doo fore-tell what pleaſeth themſelues. And theſe people are now (at this day) more ſuperſtitious in theſe affaires, then euer they were. And this is the matter which I am now to ſpeake of, in ſhewing that a woman (being too much ouer-ſwaied by theſe ſuperſtitions, loſt one of the verie faireſt Eſtates in the worlde, and how it hapned, I ſhall briefely relate.

The Tartarres of Aſia very ſuperſtitious.

* Caſters of mens fortune by the day & houre of their birth.

Of Iada the King of Maugie, and his hunting.

The Tartarian Annales do declare, that there was a King of Maugy, named Iada, who beeing on Hunting, eſpyed a great Lake of Freſh-Water, thorough the middeſt whereof, paſſed ſo ſtrong a Riuer, as was able to beare a Boat, which came from the Eaſt Indiaes, a rich countrey. Heereon he conſidered, that for Commerce and good of his Kingdome, the Territorie round about it was fruitfull, and the Lakes Water nouriſhed great ſtore of Fiſh, a faire Hauen alſo, being not farre off thence, ſtanding for the benefit of all Windes, being on the Ocean Sea, which is (almoſt) continually calme, and in that quarter it would be verie conuenient to build a Citie. Haüing had Communication in this caſe with his Counſell, and they allowing the goodneſſe of his conceit, hee gaue order to them, for further proceeding in the purpoſe: this hapned in the yeare of the worlde, according to their ſupputation, fiue thouſand, ſixe hundred. This Citie was founded vpon piles, and (according to their Cuſtome) they conſulted with their Genethliaques, to know if this Cittie ſhould flouriſh and continue for any length of time. Whereto they anſwered, that it ſhould neuer fall into anie others power, but only of them as ſhould be of the Lignage of Iada, firſt founder thereof, vntill ſuch time, as a man (who ſhould haue an hundered eies, all clearly ſeeing) came to beſiege it. The Cittie was named Quinſay, a worde corrupted of Kynſin, or Checin, in the Iauian tongue, which ſignifieth a Happy Cittie, and whereof, the whole Prouince where it is ſeated, tooke the Name of Quinzi. There are two Caſtles, which command on the Sea, and are adioyning vnto the Lake before named: and there doo the Waters of the Riuer of Babala, yeelde ſurrender of themſelues, as they make their paſſage ouer the Lake.

Determination, for building a Citty.

The foundation of the Citty of Quinſay.

It is ſeated about forty fiue degrees on this ſide the Tropicke, in the ſixt climate, and the tenth Paralell. This goodly Cittie containeth (as ſuch as haue Voyaged thither ſay) fiue good Leagues or thereabout in circuit: which is verie likely to be true, by reaſon it is erected in the water; and the ſtreetes are verie large, the Pallace great, and forced Garden-plots: the whole bodie being planted at eaſe, & ſo well diſpoſed, as a man may goe thorough rough all the Cittie on Land, and in the Channels alſo, which are large, eaſie, & great, becauſe the Barkes may the ſooner paſſe them. Horſes alſo may eaſily paſſe through the ſtreets, to bring ſuch things as are neceſſarie for them of the Citty: And there is no encloſed City in the whole Vniuerſe, either on this ſide, or beyond the Equator, of ſuch wonderfull greatneſſe. In regard of the goodlie Scituation, it required no long time of peopling, & frequentation of Merchant-ſtrangers, comming from many Countries: as from the rich Eaſterne Indiaes, by the Riuer of Babala; and by Sea, the Ethyopians, Armenians, Perſians, Arabians, Egyptians, Scythians, and others. Hereupon the King failed not to graunt good ſtore of immunities, to draw inhabitants thither: which ſorting to his expectation, hee builded a verie beautifull Pallace, that ſtandeth yet intirely whole.

The Traffick and reſort to Maugy.

Now, it came to paſſe, fiue hundered yeares after, that there raigned a King, very rich, named Facfur; by whom, the Kingdomes were ſeated in the great Prouince of Maugy, which is ſaid to be one of the verie greateſt in the world; and by whom, the Lands and Seigneuries were ſo well fortified, as they were thought to be inuincible. By means whereof, none durſt aſſaile or meddle with them; and this was the cauſe, that both the King and his people left off, and ſuffered the exerciſe of Armes to grow quite out of vſe. For euerie Cittie was circled and engirt with great and deepe ditches (brim-full of Water) as alſo with huge walles, verie ſtrongly flanked with goodlie Towers & vnder-props. And in thoſe times, he had (at the leaſt) the number of one thouſand and fiue hundred, but now they can reckon no more then eleauen hundred; and yet hee had no Horſes for warre, or anie other ſeruice; and this aſſurance occaſioned, that the King made no vſe of time, but continually tooke his delight & pleaſure. He had ordinarily in his Court a thouſand Gentlemen, beſide his traine of Seruants and Officers, which was great and honourable. Neuertheleſſe, hee held Iuſtice in higheſt eſteeme, affecting peace and tranquility, and he was verie mercifull. No man durſt offend, or do wrong to his Neighbor, but he was ſure of ſeuere punniſhment. In breefe, his Kingdome was of ſuch freedome and aſſurance, that (many times) Tradeſmen left their ſhops wide open in the Night, yet none durſt be ſo bolde, as enter into them.

Strangers and Trauailers paſſing thorough the Countrey, might goe both night and day in ſafe ſecuritie, without feare of any man. In like manner, the King was verie kind and charitable to the poore, and neuer ſuffered ſuch as were in extreame pouerty, to complaine of their want and indigence. Moreouer, euerie yeare (by diligent ſearch) he aſſembled togither a great number of children, expoſed as Orphans, and forſaken of their Parents (whereof ſometimes there were twentie thouſand) and them he cauſed to be kept & brought vp at his own charge, beſide many other Charities which wold require much time to reherſe, and which is not vſed by chriſtian Princes elſwhere. And although he was a Pagan and Idolater, yet hee ſuffered Iewes and Chriſtians (whereof ſome were Neſtorians) to liue in all his Kingdoms; and theſe things were in the yeare of Grace, 1268.

This would do well in all parts of the world.

Great charitie to poore Children.

Cublay, King of the Tartars, was then accounted one of the greateſt Princes in the world; for he had (as ſome haue left in writings) thirty or fortie great Kingdomes. Such as make any doubt heerof, let them read M. Paulus, who was (at that time) in thoſe parts, a verie true Author, and they ſhall find much more then I can heere ſpeake of. His Captaines gaue him to vnderſtand, that they could not find any more lands to conquer: for the Sea, and verie huge deſerts had ſet a period at their Conqueſts, only this Kingdome of Maugy excepted, which confined on ſom lands of the great Cham Cublay. Now, albeit Facfur was a frend, and had giuen no occaſion of making warre vpon him, only becauſe he was almoſt as powerfull as the ſaid Cublay, yet Cublay was now aduiſed to contend for ſuperioritie, and to make his great neighbor tributary vnto him. So minding to vſe his men of war, he found them at variance among themſelues, and that a great buſineſſe was firſt to be ended, touching his two nephewes, whereof I haue formerly ſpoken. Hereupon, Neſtordin a neere Kinſman to Cublay, was choſen for this expedition, albeit hee was not then in the Court; but the Commiſſions beeing directed to his abiding, the king had newes ſent him, that he died two dayes before of a ſtraunge ſickneſſe. Wherefore, the charge of this buſineſſe, was tranſ-ferred to Baiam Chinſan, the Sonne of a publicke poore Woman, not auouched by anie Father, and he was borne with many ſpottes on his bodie, verie neere reſembling the eies of a man; whereby hee had the ſirname giuen him of Baiam Chinſan, which ſignifieth in their Language, the ſight of an hundred eyes.

The education of Baiam.

This poore Boy was brought vp by his Mother, ſo well as her pouerty would permit, not hauing any man that would auouch her to be his wife. As he grew in ſtature, he addicted his minde to follow one of the Emperors Armies, beeing at firſt but as a Lackey or Drudge, that carried a Soldiers furniture after him. Afterward, hauing attained to more yeares and ſtrength, he was entertained as a Soldier, becomming firſt a Corporall: next Enſigne, Lieutenant, Captaine, or Chiefe, then a Colonell: at length, being knowne a man of vnderſtanding, valiant, and fortunate, he had the charge of an Army, which hee guided ſo ſucceſſefully, that he annexed to the Crowne of Cublay, Emperour of Tartaria, and his Maiſter, ten great Prouinces or Kingdomes, to wit; Miena, Caraiena, Beugala, Canguigu, Amu, Tholomana, Gnigui, Cacanſu, Ciangli, and Tadiuſu: and he neuer attempted any matter, but he brought it to full effect, except the conqueſt of Piamſu, whereof I am to ſpeake elſwhere.

The famous Conqueſts of Baiam Chinſan.

Baiam entred with a great Armie into the Prouince of Maugy, and ſummoned the King to render himſelfe tributary, or elſe he would warre vpon him, for and in the name of his Prince Cublay: but the King made anſwere, that he had no ſuch intention. Wherefore, at his firſt arriuall, he beſiedged the Cittie of Coniganguy, and ſummoned the Cittizens thereof to yeelde themſelues: as alſo, to take an Oath of fidelity and obedience to the Emperor Cublay, which they likewiſe refuſed to do. By meanes whereof, hauing heard their anſwere, he raiſed his ſiege, and departed thence, without offering them anie other harme or molleſtation. Afterward, hee did as much to the next Citty, which alſo made the like refuſall.

Baiam entred into Maugy, and ſummoned the King and diuers Citties.

Paſsing on, he ſummoned four or fiue other Citties, all which refuſed yeilding: but comming to the ſixt, he aſſailed it in great furie, and tooke it by aſſault: which being done, he returned backe vpon the other Citties, which he took and ruined; ſo that in very ſhort time, he ſubdued & tooke twelue Cities. For, he had in his Army verie braue and valiaunt men, all pickt or choiſe Soldiers, bold and courragious. And the Great Cham, ſent him another Armie, as a freſh ſupply of as great power as the firſt, which gaue great terror to them of Maugy, cauſing them to wax deſperate, and their hearts to faile them. And King Facfur himſelfe, hauing had ſuch deare experience of the corage and valour of the Tartars, and perceiuing how they proceeded on ſtill in their vndanted fury, became ſo much amazed, that he betooke himſelfe to ſea, with ſo many people as hee could muſter togither, withdrawing into an impregnable Iſland, hauing with him aboue a thouſand ſhips; and leauing the guard of the Citie of Quinſay, to the diſpoſition of his wife, there to haue her beſt ſupport & defence. In this extreamity the Queen contained very manly courage: and caried her ſelfe ſo prouidently, as nothing wanted whatſoeuer, that was iudged neceſſary for ayd and defence of the Cittie. For ſhee had fiftie thouſand men of warre, both Inhabitants and ſtrangers, and twelue or fifteene thouſand Diuers, men that coulde abide long time vnder water, and pierce the bottomes of the enemies ſhips to ſink them in the Riuer. The Cittie was well furniſhed with Victuals, and all needfull Munition, to endure a long ſiege, impeaching (euerie way) the entrance into the Hauen, by the Sea. Neuertheleſſe, the Queene and the chiefe Commaunders were poſſeſſed with ouer-great ſuperſtition, till they heard, that he who maintained the ſiege, was named Baiam Chinſan, that is (as we haue formerly ſaid) the ſight of an hundred eies. This made both her and them to tremble with feare, remembring both the Father and ſon: and alſo, becauſe it was regiſtred in the books which were kept in the publick treaſurie, that neuer ſhould the Citty be ſurprized, but by a man that had an hundered eyes; and therefore they reſolued to yeelde it, though it ſeemed a matter wholly impoſſible, yea quite againſt nature, that a man ſhould haue an hundred eyes. As they were vppon the point of ſurrendering the the Cittie by composition; the Christians, who had liued in all quietnesse in those Countries; by the meanes of their Bishop Gaspar, declared in the full Senate, where the Queen also was present: that no regard was to be made of such Prognostickes, as proceeded from lying Mathematicians, and Genethliaques, to whom if the Mans Name appeared for to haue the sight of an hundred eyes; yet notwithstanding, the man himselfe had onely but two, as other men haue, and these were but the illusions of Sathan, the Father of lying. heereupon, some in the Senate-house alledged many Histories, which happened in their time; to shew how vaine these friuolous predictions were. Neuertheleſſe, the Cowardise of diuers, that neuer vnderstood the nature of warre, or what honour attended on bold hardiment, they being of the greatest in authority, and relying on these fooliſh superstitions; concluded to surrender the Citty. Wherefore, hauing made (by consent of the Queene) an honest capitulation: they suffered the Enemy to enter, that kept faith exactly with them. Whereat Baiam was not a little amazed, for hee imagined his strength neuer able to surprize it. Cublay being aduertised thereof, caused generall processions to be made, and solemne sacrifices performed to the Sun; mocking at the superstition of the Quinsayans, and admiring the vnmatchable fortune attending on Baiam. As for the Queene, she retyred her selfe to the Court of the great Cham, who receiued and vsed her very honourably: and concerning the King of Maugy her Husband, he continued his aboade in the Island, where he ended his daies.

Quinsay yeelded vp to Baiam and his power.

The capitall Citty being taken, the lesser yeilded.

At that instant also, the nine Kingdoms contained in that Prouince, yeilded themselues: except the Citty of Stanfu, which out-held the Tartars Army three whole yeares. And it had neuer beene taken, but that M. Paulus, and his Father and Vnckle (by permission of the Tartarian Emperour) made Engines of Wood, which hurled great Stones into the Citty, and did such harme to the so long besiedged; as they were constrained to yeilde themselues. Thus you may perceiue, that superstition is the cause of much euill, for doubtlesse, if the Queene and the besieged had stil kept Quinsay, and the other Cities: an hundred years labour could not haue conquered the Kingdomes of Maugy.

These Kingdomes could not haue been conquered in an hundred yeares.

And heere I would entreat the gentle Readers, not to conceiue amisse of me, for not following the writing of M. Paulus, in his description of Quinsay, for hee saith: That there is in the midst thereof a lake, which containeth ten miles in circuit, and that the Cittie is 34. miles in compasse, and hath sixe hundred thousand Houses in it. I rather thought fit, to follow what I finde written in a Dialogue, made by Garcias Orta, a Portugall Philitian, who saith: That it is not aboue thirty fiue yeares since he wrote, that it contained not aboue foure or fiue leagues in compasse, beeing seated wholly in a Lake, and hath not aboue threescore thousand Houses in it. I know not whether it be diminished, since the said Venetian came thence. It valued in reuennewes, fifteene Millions, and sixe hundred thousand Crownes, to the King yearely, in regard of his right (by way of leuey) vpon merchandises; and yet not counting the Toule laide on Salt, and this was but the ninth part of the great Prouince of Maugy. At this day, as I heard by a Iesuite of Chalons in Champaigne, named Gobert, who told me, that he remained there aboue two yeares: and he saith, that the valuation is much more now at this instant.

What the state of Quinsay is in these dayes.

The great Reuennues of Quinsay yearly to the king

Augustus Cæsar made better vse of his superstition, then the men of Quinsay, or their Queene did; for, a little before the last battaile, which hee had against his Competitor Anthonie: as he went from his Land-Army, to that on the Sea, hee met a Sutler or Victualer to the Campe, driuing an Asse laden before him, of whom he demaunded, how hee was called: the Sutler made answer, that his owne name was Eutichus, and his Asses Nicanta: which two Greeke Names signified nothing else, but Fortunate victorie. Heereupon, the said Cæsar, presaged by this encounter, that he should be victorious ouer Anthony, who contended for the Empire of the World, and that the Gods had designed it vnto him. On this assurance, he forth-with gaue battell by Sea to Anthony,

A good kinde of superstition in Augustus Cæsar.

Anthony, wherein he preuailed, and so (by consequent) got the Empire.

Pompey neuer tooke any thing in good sort, or successefully.

Pompey, quite contrary, through a great distrust, that he could neuer saue himselfe, nor finde any ayde or assured retreat, after he lost the battaile at Pharsalia against Iulius Cæsar; grounded his folly on this occasion. In his flight, passing by the Isle of Cyprus, to the end hee might breath a while; with-drew into Ægypt. And being entertained (by the Gouernour) into the Citty of Paphos, where his lodging was prepared in a Pallace, builded in a very pleasant plot vpon the Sea, he desired to know who builded it, and how it was named. Answere was returned, that the place was called Cacobasilæa, which is as much to say, as Bad Harbour. In regard of which name, it appearing to him to be an euill presage: hee would not enter into it, but passed on farther, and tooke Shipping very suddenly. Being verilie perswaded, that this accident to him at this Pallace, did presage; that he should soone enough meete with a bad lodging to last all his life time. Being landed in Ægypt, to deriue some succour from the King, whose Father he had reseated in his Kingdome: he caused him to be trayterously slaine, as thinking to doe a great fauour to victorious Iulius Cæsar.

Sylla, by not being superstitious won the battaile.

But Sylla did better, who perceiuing his Army ready for to giue battaile to the power of Mithridates, King of Pontus; yet all being out of hart, as holding that the day would be lost, because both the Priests and Soothsayers had obserued, that the like day had been alwaies vnfortunate to the Romaines. For it was registred in their Calender, that (as on the very same day) three hundred and sixe Noble Gentlemen, al of the Fabij, were slaine in the Warre, by secret Ambushes of the Veientines, who had long time warred against thē, hard by * Cremera; and many worthy Captaines beside, had receiued great mischances on the same day. But Sylla, who was no way superstitious, encouraged his Army, saying. Let vs shew our selues so valiant this day, that although it hath beene infortunate heeretofore: yet it may prooue happy to vs. So, suddenly giuing battaile, they won the day. Some other would not haue done it, but rather would haue giuen credit to the dissemblings of Wizzards and Sacrificers. But to punish such men, for weakning the courage of Souldiours prepared to fight: some of them haue beene put into the front of the battaile, where they haue beene slaine, and very few others. In breefe, superstition neuer caused any goodnesse; but hath procured many great losses.

CHAP. III.

Of the Order and Knight-hood of the Templers; and how long it continued.

A congregation of Christian Princes, and the cause.

IN the yeare of our Lord, one thousand, ninety six, some Christian Princes (of diuers Nations) made a Congregation, by the counsell of an Hermit named Peter, a man of honest and holy life. It was then determined, to goe for the Conquest of the Holy Land, which was in the power of prophane Infidels, who had kept it foure hundred and ninety years. Among the chiefe in this action; was Godfrey of Buillon, Duke of Lorraine, the most apparant of them all, and he that carried the greatest merit. It pleased God, that after many battailes, which lasted for the space of three yeares: the Citty of Ierusalem, and many other Cities in Syria and Iudea were conquered, beside diuers other neighbouring Prouinces. Afterward, all the Christian Princes hauing regard to the high deserts of Godfrey; elected him King of Ierusalem: and Arnulphus, Arch-bishop of Pisa, was likewise created Patriarch, by Pope Calixtus the second.

The Conquest of Ierusalem by Godfrey of Buillon.

Godfrey of Buillon remaining King of Ierusalem, there also continued in his company, many great and worthy Christians, who daily made warre vpon the Infidels; as well round about Ierusalem, as in other neighbouring Countries. Which being vnderstood by diuers faithful Christians in the westerne parts, and on what tearmes the affaires stood stood beyond the Seas: great numbers of people went continually thither, some (in meere zeale) to assist Gods seruice, and regaine the vsurped Landes; and others on voyages, to visite the Holy Sepulcher. Now, about a yeare after his Coronation, Godfrey of Buillon dyed, and his Brother, named Baldwine (a man equall euery way to the others merits) was crowned King in his stead. During whose raigne, among many other that resorted daily thither: were nine Gentlemen, intimate friends and great companions, of whom we finde the names but of two; who (it may be) were the chiefest, to wit: Hugues de Paganis, and Gaufrede de Saint Adelman. These men being come to Ierusalem, and hauing well contemplated the Countrey, and all the neighbouring places: they found, that at the Port of Iapha, and other places of their passage, there were many busie spies vpon the waies, that daily both robbed and kild Pilgrimes and Passengers. In regard whereof, after good and mature deliberation, they concluded, with the helpe of many more (for it is to be presumed, that they leagued themselues with other people of the same mind) to make a vow, for doing some seruice acceptable to God, and to imploy their whole life time, in making the waies secure & passable, or else to loose their liues in the enterprise; while the other Christians were busied in other places, fighting with the Infidels. Persseuering in this religious purpose, they tooke (as an assigned place for their retreate) a Church, called, The Holy Temple, by permission of the Abbot there abiding: and in that respect, they were cald Templers, a name which alwaies after remained to them.

The death of Godfrey of Buillon & the instaulment of Baldwine.

Hugues de Paganis, and Gaufrede de Saint Adelman.

How they first attained to the name of Templers.

When the King and the Patriarch had intelligence thereof, and perceiued their paines to bee holy and commendable: they administred all thinges necessary vnto them, so that they liued (after this manner) in the Temple, both very religiously and chastly, and (which is more) their number multiplyed, and encreased day by day. Notwithstanding, albeit there were now a great number of them, yet had they neyther habite, or any rules designed them, but liued together in common, obseruing their vow, and so they continued for the space of nine yeares. During which time, for the great seruice they did to Christendome, their credite and renowne highly encreased, beside the meanes of so worthy an example. By reason of their encrease in number, Pope Honorius the second, at the request of Stephen, Patriarch of Ierusalem; deuised a rule and manner of life for them: appointing, that they should be cloathed in white. Afterward, Pope Eugenius the third, added a Badge, or Armoury of a red Crosse, to be worne on their breasts: which they promised by a sollemne vow to obserue for euer, according as other religious Knightes did. And therefore they were honored, to haue it brought them by the hand of Saint Bernard, a reuerend and holy Doctour, whom they elected as chiefe and first Maister of their Order, according as other religious Knightes had the like obseruation.

Pope Honorius the second iustituted the Order of the Templers.

S. Bernard was the first Maister of the Knights Templers.

The King and Patriarch, allow their proceeding.

In short time after, such was the multiplication of their Order, and honour of their deedes in Armes; as not onely they kept the wayes of the holie voyage, safe from Theeues and Murderers: but also (both by Sea and Land) they made great incursions and strong warres vpon the Infidels. So that their fame and worth spreading it selfe throughout Christendome, the Kinges and Princes (in many partes) ordained and allowed them great Rents and Reuenues, which they imploied in those warres, like true Knights, attending on the seruice of Iesus Christ. And by succesſe of time, growing on in strength and ability of wealth: in all Countries and Prouinces, they had abiding in the cheefest Cities and strongest places; but most especially in the Holy Land, where ordinarily the great Maister of the Order made his aboad, with the greater number of them, keeping an Army cotinually there, as also in other places, where most necessity required. It happened afterward, that for the sins of men, discord mooued among the Christians, and the great negligence in Princes: not onely the Citty of Ierusalem, but other places also formerlie conquered (as we haue before declared) were regained by the Infidels; ninetie yeares after the conquest made by Godfrey

The Great Maister of the Order stayed in the Holy Land.

The Knightes Templers expelled out of the holy land.

frey of Buillon. All which notwithstanding, this Order of the Knights Templers left not their holy labour: but being expulsed thence, they assembled their forces to other places, performing still worthy deedes of Armes against the enemies to our Faith, and continued sixscore years (after the losse of Ierusalem) preseruing that which was left them in the East parts.

The Order of the Templers destroyed by Pope Clement the fift.

In the yeare one thousand, two hundred and ten, or thereabout, the Order of the Templers, which had continued more then two hundred yeares: was vtterly destroyed and ouerthrowne by Pope Clement the fift, who then remained and kept his Court in the Citty of Poitiers, in the Kingdome of France: And (as some report) he did it at the request of King Phillip le Bell. This happened, either thorough their prosperity, or ouer-great abounding in welth, by meanes whereof they grew to wickednesse, and were the ruine of themselues. Or, it may be, King Phillip then raigning, was abused by false reportes made of them: Or peraduenture, to get the riches of this Order, he perswaded the Pope to doe such a thing, for there are variable opinions written thereof. Neuertheless, it sufficeth to say, that they were condemned, and all their goods confiscated. And to compasse the matter the more easily (because they were growne very powerfull) a secret Inquisition was made against them, true or false: after which, the King tooke such order in all parts of his Kingdome, that vpon a certaine daie, purposely appointed, all the Templers that could be found, were taken, their goods seazed, and deliuered into the hands of Iustice, which beeing done, processe proceeded against them, and iudgement executed, according as wee meane to declare.

A secret Inquisition against the Templers.

The offences where-with the Templers were charged

As concerning the crimes imposed on them, they were these. That their Predecessors were the cause of loosing the holy Land; That they elected their Great Maister in secret; That they vsed wicked superstitions; That they helde some hereticall propositions; That they made their profession before a Statue or Image, cloathed in the skin of a Man; That they dranke the blood of Men; that they had made a secret coniuration, by their ayde and assistance, to betray all Christendome to the Turk; That they were guilty of the most abhominable sin against nature, Sodomie; and all these matters directly prooued against them. For which causes, processe was directed against their Great Maister, named Fryer Iaques, a native of Bourgougne, descended of a very worthy House: and consequent (after him) the like proceeding passed against all the other.

F. Iaques great Maister of the Templers first arested.

Finally, the Popes sentence condemned them all to the fire, and accordingly they were executed, and their goods made confiscate; the greater part wherof, was giuen to the Knightes of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, who, about this time, or a little before, had conquered the Isle of Rhodes from the Infidels. Another part of their goods was bestowed on other Orders; and a third part (by permission of the Pope, or otherwise) remained in the hands of Princes, who tooke possession thereof, euen so soone as the sentence went out against them. This sentence was published thorough all Christendome, and allowed for good and iust by the Chronicles of France; as also by Platina, in the life of Pope Clement the fift; likewise by Raphaell Volateranus, and Polidore Virgill.

The Knightes of S. Iohn of Ierusalem had part of the Templers goods.

Some authors against the Popes sentence.

Neuertheless, there are some that doe maintaine the contrarie, affirming the sentence to be vniust, and giuen vpon false Testimonies, charging King Philip principally with the fault, saying; That for desire of their goods, he purchased their destruction: saying moreouer, that at the time when they were iusticed, the common people reputed them for Saints and Martyrs, and kept peeces of their Garments as Reliques. Of this latter opinion was Saint Iaques de Magonce, Nauclerus, and Antonius Sabellicus, in their Histories; and Iohn Boccace, in his Booke of the fall of Princes, affirming, that hee heard it spoken by his owne Father, who was present at the execution of the sentence.

S. Anton. in 3. par. de Histor. How he reporteth the History.

It appeareth also, that Saint Anthonie, Arch-byshop of Florence was of the same minde, and reciteth the case as it happened, in manner following. Pope Clement (saith he) and his Romain Court being in France, whereas then he made his abiding, seeing himselfe much prouo-prouoked by Philip King of France, to keepe his promise made him, when he created him chiefe Bishop; which was, to condemne Pope Boniface, and cause his bones to bee burned; and the Pope deferring to doe it, because it seemed difficult to effect: It fortuned, that a Knight of the Templers Order, a Prior in one of the Commanderies, named Monfaucon, in the Citty of Toulouse, was taken and brought as Prisoner to Paris, by appointment of the great Maister; in regard of some crimes by him committed, and (as some doe testifie) for Heresie. At the same time, another Natiue of Florence, and Knight of the same Order, was sent to the same Prison, by commaund of the Great Maister, for many other foule delictes.

Two Knights Templers imprisoned in Paris.

These two together, knowing that their misdemeanor had beene such, as admitted no hope of their deliuerie: concluded, to free themselues from imprisonment, and to be spleenefullie & maliciously reuenged on their Great Maisters, accusing their Religion, and charging thē with such crimes as haue formerly beene spoken off. To effect it the better, they called some other to counsell, and practised with the Kinges Officers, accusing the Great Maister and the other Knightes, that they were worthy of death, and vtter destruction of their Order. Affirming also, that the King, being a Man good and iust, ought to labour it, considering the great benefit that thereby would redound vnto him, in confiscation of so many goodly houses. This being reuealed to the King, he quickely lent an eare thereto, and gaue order, for more ample conference with both the Prisoners. Afterward, he made it speedily knowne to the Pope; declaring, that such an Order deserued vtter spoile and ruine.

King Philip made acquainted with the businesse, reuealeth it to the Pope.

The Pope, after he had heard the Prisoners, or the relation made to him by others; or rather, to free himselfe from the Kinges importunity, against Pope Boniface: without vsing any more sufficient inquisition, or processe against them, but onely led by these informations: wrote secretly thorow all Christendome, that a certaine day should bee appointed for the Knightes Templers, to apprehend their bodies, and seaze all their goods. On the same day as these Letters were expedited, the Great Maister (who then made his residence in Paris) was taken, with threescore Knights of the chiefest, and after proofe made, beeing brought to confronting: they stoutly denyed, and with great boldnesse, that euer they committed any such offences, no, not so much as in thought, but liued as good and faithfull Christians ought to doe. Neuertheless, the processe was concluded against them, and all the threescore persons (except the Great Maister, and foure other, who were reserued till another time) were drawne forth of Paris, and brought vpon a scaffold purposely prouided, where (before all the people) they were each after other throwne into a fire, to the ende, that if any one had confessed the offences, or any part of them, his life might haue beene saued. But although they were exhorted by their Kured and Friendes, to confesse the faultes, albeit they were not guiltie, onely to saue their liues: yet did they still make deny-all, calling God and the Virgine Marie to witnesse their innocency, and were all burned, without confessing any thing.

One day generally appointed for destruction of the Templers Execution began at the citty of Paris on the Knights Templers.

This being done, the Great Maister, with one named F. Danfin, and one F. Huguet, and some others that had been Officers in the Kinges Court, were brought before the Emperour and the Pope (by whom great promises were made vnto them, if they would confesse the crimes where-with they were charged. By meanes of such importunity, they confessed some part of them, and other thinges beside: but after that they had made this confession, they were led away to punishment, where their processe was publikely read, and the sentence ratified, whereby the Pope had condemned the Great Maister, and all the rest of his Order. While thus they proceeded, the great Maister started vp on his feet, saying, that they ought to heare him; adding further, that he had iustly deserued death, by so many offences which he committed against God. Notwithstanding, the crimes where-with both he & the Knights were burdened in the Processe; both he and they were innocent cent of them; and whatsoeuer he had confessed: he did it in feare, and at the Popes perswasion, speaking now nothing else but truth. The like saide F. Dansin, and thinking to proceede on in more speeches; they were exposed to the fire, and burned. But F. Hugues, and his companions, saued their liues by confessing their guiltinesse, according as it was obiected against them in the processe: yet liued they not long after, but dyed (as is reported) miserably, as likewise the two imprisoned Knights did, who were their first accusers; the one, being saide to be hanged or strangled, and the other slaine, which seemed to the people as a great worke of God. In regard whereof, diuers great personages, and of good knowledge, were partly perswaded, that the sentence was vniustly giuen, and ill executed vpon the Templers. Al these thinges are thus alleadged by S. Anthony, in the place fore-named, beside the other Authors. Wherefore, I stand doubtfull how to resolue herein, because it is hardly to be credited, that the Pope would faile in a case of such importance. On the other side, it seemeth as incredible, that such an Order, wherein were so many and great diuersitie of Knights; would wholly bee so wicked. But this secret, and many other, must be referred to the day, when the faults of all men will truely be reuealed.

F. Hugues and others by confession of their facts, saued their liues.

The Authors Conclusion.

CHAP. IIII.

¶ By what meanes the Holie Apostolicall Chaire or Seate, was transferred into France: How long it continued there; And how it returned to Rome againe.

SEeing wee haue declared the History of the Knights Templers, me thinkes it fitteth well our purpose (in this next place) to make some mention: for what cause, in the time of the very same Pope Clement the fift, the Holy Chaire Apostolique was transported into France. It is then to be vnderstood, that Pope Bennet, or Benedict, eleauenth of that name, being dead, who was an excellent and holy Byshop, and whose body was said to worke miracles after his death: the Romaine Church was thirteene months without a Chiefe Bishop, by reason of the Schisme and discord among the Cardinals Electours, who (during this time) neuer came forth of the Conclaue, and yet could not agree vpon any election. For there was growne two factions or contentions among them; one side holding voice for the French Nation; and therefore they laboured to elect a man, that might agree with the appetite of their King. The other faction consisted of Italian Cardinals, that stroue to haue a Pope of their nation, and because both partes were equall in power and number; they continued in this long suspence, yet neither of them reaching to their intention.

The death of Pope Bennet, the eleuenth, & the schisme then in the Church.

Two Factions among the Cardinall Electors.

When the French Cardinals perceiued this impertinent losse of time, they be-thought themselues of a subtiltie, whereby they might beguile and ouerreach the other. For, they would make a party for them; to wit, they would name three Italians; one of which three, should be chosen by the Italians to bee Pope. If they would not agree on that partie; then themselues should name three French-men, such as they had best opinion of, and one of them should be elected by the French, with their liking. The Italians (thinking the matter firmely in their power, purposed to nominate three French men, great Enemies to their owne Crowne, and that the meanest of them should bee elected Pope) accepted the part of nomination, and gaue in the names of three men, who were mightie Enemies to their King. For the King was then but slenderly esteemed by the Romain Church, in regard of the great difference, that had beene betweene him and Pope Boniface, Predecessour to Bennet the eleauenth, and one of the 3. was the Arch-Byshop of Bourdeaux, named Bertrend. The French Cardinals aduertised their King of this nomination, to the end; that he might compasse the meanes to reconcile himselfe with the other two, which beeing done, to let them haue know-knowledge thereof with all possible speede.

The King desired kinde conference with the Archbishop of Bourdeaux.

Heereupon, the King wrote a verie kind Letter, entreating the Archbishop of Bourdeaux, to meet him immediatly at a certaine place, about a matter of great importance, & highly concerning his honor and profit: assuring him, that he was very desirous to hold loue and friendship with him. The Arch-bishop (vpon this gracious motion) made no delay, but came presently to the place appointed by the King, where being met together: The King plainely told him, that he would make him Pope, vnder condition of promises to be passed between them. Which when the Arch-byshop heard, he made no difficulty of promising what the King should desire, prouided, that he might attaine to so high a dignity. Finally, by meanes of many promises, signed, sealed, and sollemnly sworne between them: the King gaue him his royal word, that he should bee elected before the other two likewise named. Then, with the greatest diligence that possibly could be made, he wrote back to the Cardinals, who fauored and made good his cause: that they should nominate the Arch-byshop of Bourdeaux. So that, although he was then absent, hee was elected the Soueraigne Byshop, in the year of our Lord (according to Platina) 1205. and was named Clement the fift. And he hauing intelligence of his election, at the instance and request of the King: went to the Citty of Lyons, whether hee caused the Cardinals, and the whole Court of Rome to come; for it was one of the promises which hee had made to the King. By meanes whereof, the Italian Cardinals found themselues deceiued, and constrained (greatly against their wils) to come into France, to satisfie the pleasure of the Pope.

Platina would be perused, for according this presage of time, with that in the precedent Chapter.

Thus came the Court of Rome into France, where it stayed and continued with great honor, but to the endamagement of all Italy. And in this Citty was performed, the sacring and crowning of Pope Clement the fift, with no meane sollemnity. But as they were in this serious businesse, and the whole World (as it were) attentiue and beholding the ceremonies: a great part of a wal, in the place where the royalty was performed, fell suddenly downe, and killed aboue a thousand men, among whom dyed the Duke of Bretaigne, & diuers other worthy persons. And it happened in such maner, that the hug crowd of people, which thronged (for their owne safety) from the place of this mishap: ouerthrew the Pope from his Horse, where he was in great danger of his life. The King also was in meruailous great perplexity, being carried out of the crowd, sore wounded and trampled vpon. This businesse being somewhat more quietly ouer-blowne; the Pope created many new Cardinals, who were all on the part of France. He sent also three Cardinals to Rome, to gouerne there the State of the Church for Italy; hee determining to dye in France, where hee held the Seat eight yeares and eleauen months.

A thousand men & more slain accidentally at the Popes consecration.

The King and Pope in perill of their liues.

After him succeeded Pope Iohn, the three and twentith of that name, who liued likewise in France, bringing his Court to Auignon, a part of Prouence: which was saide to appertaine to the Church, because it had beene bought (as diuers doe maintaine) by Pope Clement the sixt, of Madame Ioane, Queene of Naples, and of Prouence. There were sixe Popes, which liued and dyed there each after other, the seat remaining there the space of threescore yeares: whereby some Italians tooke occasion, to name it the transmigration of Babylon, and so it continued to the time of Gregorie the eleauenth, a learned Man, & of holy life, in whose gouerment this exile ceased, and the Seate was restored backe againe in this manner.

Pope Iohn 23. Successour to Clement translated his seat to Auignon.

The Transmigration of Babylon.

Vpon a time, as a Byshop of his Court passed by before him, the Pope demaunded of him; wherefore hee went not to the gouernment of his owne Byshoppricke, for it was not conuenient, to see a Flocke without a Shepheard? whereto the Bishop made this answere. Holy Father, why do you vse these speeches to me? Considering, that your selfe, who ought to giue vs example: doe not goe to abide at your owne Byshoppricke, which hath beene so long time without a Shepheard.

The manner of the Chairs reduction to Rome.

These words did not a little moue the Pope, knowing well, what mischiefes had happened in Italy, in the abſence of the Prelacy: and therefore he determined to returne to Rome, beeing thereto alſo incited (as ſome write) by Letters and admonitions from S. Katherine of Sienna. And for his better attaining thereto, he cauſed ſecretly to be prepared one and twenty Gallies: pretending to vſe them about ſome other buſines, and bringing them on the Riuer of Roſne, furniſhed with all things neceſſary belonging to them. Going aboord at an appointed time, they launched forth into the Sea, and within few daies after arriued at Genes, and from Genes, at Cornetta: where taking Land, they went directly to Rome, in the yeare 1364. where he was receiued with great magnificence, and vnſpeakable pleaſures, as a Father earneſtly deſired by his Children. Soone after, like a good Paſtour, he re-edified Churches and Buildings in Rome, which were falne into ruine by age and negligence of men. In which workes, and other holy exerciſes, hee ſpent the remainder of his life; which he finiſhed in the yeare, one thouſand three hundred, ſixty and eight, and was buried with as many moanes and tears, as any other that died before him. But after his death, neither Schiſmes, or any other diſcordes happening in the Church; could cauſe his Succeſſours to forſake their continuall abiding at Rome.

The Pope prepared 22 gallies for his returne to Rome

The Authours for affirmation of theſe things, are Platina, and Martine in the liues of the Popes: Sabellicus, Volsteranus, Antoninus, and Nauclerus, in their Hiſtories: Beſide diuers other of latter daies, who haue Commented vpon their paines, and enlarged this diſcourſe in more ample manner, then this little roome would admit their labour; but for truth and certainety, enough is contained in this breuity.

CHAP. V.

How dangerous a thing it is, to Murmure againſt Princes; With praiſe and commendation of their clemency.

IT hath beene a ſaying of great Antiquity, and deriued out of our Elders graue Prouerbes. That Kinges haue verie long Armes, and as wide Eares. Inferring thereby, that Kinges and mightie men, may (a farre off) be reuenged on ſuch as offend them, and vnderſtand likewiſe, whatſoeuer is ſpoken in ſecret of them: for there are ſo many, that contend for affection in ſuch as beare command, as nothing can well be hidden from them. For this cauſe was it, that wiſe men aduiſed; To ſpeak nothing of the King in ſecret, becauſe (in ſuch caſes) meere wals are ſaid both to heare and ſpeake. And Plutarch ſaith; The Birdes can carry our wordes through the Ayre. If then, for ſpeaking truelie and freely, men haue falne into great dangers: what ſhall we iudge of ſuch as dare murmure againſt the mightie? Examples which might be alleaged in this caſe, are infinite. Among which, we read in the Hiſtories, both Greeke and Latine, that Antigonus, one of the Captaines and Succeſſors to Alexander the Great, his Armie being in the field, and he couched in his Pauillion one night: heard ſome of his Souldiours talking without, murmuring greatly againſt him, not thinking that he was ſo neere to heare them. Neuertheleſſe, he would make no ſhew thereof, but altring his voyce (as if it had been ſome other that heard them) ſaide ſoftly to them: That if they meant to vſe ſuch language, they ſhould get them further off from the Kinges Tent, or elſe himſelfe might hap to heare them.

The great power of Princes.

Care of the tongue.

Of Antigonus the Captaine to Great Alexander.

At another time, the ſame King Antigonus, guiding his Army (in the night time) through a way which was verie foule and dirty, the men finding themſelues to be much wearied: murmured againſt him as they went along; ſpeaking very bad words of him, imagining him to be far behind, & heard nothing. Notwithſtanding, he beeing preſent in diſguiſe among thē, hauing heard their iniurious and diſcontented ſpeeches, & perceiuing what a priuiledge the darke night allowed him: hee fell ſtoutly to work among the reſt, laboring (ſo much as lay in him) to releeue them thence. And Another notable example of the ſame Antigonus.

And when his intent was compassed, he came among the Murmurers, that had well obserued his paines, and wrought the harder with him for company: to whō he said in like change of his voice; Speak against the King what you please, for bringing ye into such a filthy passage: But yet I hold it fit and reasonable, that you should make much of me, for helping yee so quickly to be released out of it.

Of Pyrrhus K. of Epire, warring in Italy.

The patience of Pyrrhus, King of the Epirotes, may well be said to be no lesse. For when he made war in Italy against the Romaines, he and his men being lodged in the Citty of Tarentum: there were some of his younger Souldiours, who, after they had supped together, began to talke iniuriously of him at the Table. He hauing intelligence thereof, sent for them before him, and demaunded whether it were true or no, that they had deliuered such language of him: whereunto, one of them boldlie thus replyed. Sir, most true it is, that all these speeches which wee haue vsed of you; and be you well assured, that if wine had not failed vs at the Table, our tongues had walked much more liberally. Heereby hee strouue to shew (in his own excuse) that wine had induced them to speake euill of him. Pyrrhus was no way displeased with this answer, but falling into a pleasant laughter; sent them backe to their lodgings, without any other checke or punishment.

Of Tiberius, Emperor of Rome.

The Emperor Tiberius, although he was a cruell Tyrant; yet among other things, and fit for this purpose, he left a very memorable example. For, knowing that some body had made a diffamatory Libell against him, and that many people murmured at his cruelties: hee was perswaded by some, to do Iustice and correction vpon the offender. But he answered courageously; That Mens tongues ought to be free in the Citty. Being yet further incited by some of the Senate, to find out (by enquiry) the inuenter of the Libell: hee would (by no meanes) yeilde thereto, but said, He was not voide of other businesse, which required more due care, then such idle matter as a vaine libell. The great mildnesse of Dyonisius, the Tyrant of Sicily (albeit hee was most cruell) to an aged Woman, may not be forgotten. For he being aduertised, that this old Woman prayed deuoutly to the Gods, for continuance of his prosperity; sent to seek for her, & caused her to bee brought before him. Then he demaunded of her, for what cause shee prayed so earnestly for him; considering, that al the rest of the people desired his death? Whereunto the aged woman made this answere. Know Sir, that when I was young, we had here in this Country a most cruell Tyrant, of a stern nature and wicked complexion: wherefore, I prayed to the Gods deuoutly for his death, and I found my desire to bee accomplished. Next to that man succeeded another, who tyrannized in the kingdom much more cruelly then the first; and I prayed in like manner for his death. So that by continuall praiers and requests, made with such instancy to the Gods: as they heard me for the first, so did they for the second, because soone after his death ensued. In his place now art thou come, a more bloody man then both the others; and because (I feare, that (after thee) another will come, worse then all the three: I pray continually to the Gods, that they would send thee long life and happinesse. This free and audacious answer of the old Woman, vrged no indignation or displeasure in him, who disdained all others that durst reprone him: but he suffered her to depart freely and pleasantly.

Of Dyonisius the Tyrant of Sicily.

The old Womans answere to the Tyrant

Plato, the Prince of Philosophers, who had long time continued with this Tyrant Dyonisius; craued fauour of him, that he might returne to Athens, & his suite was granted him. But at his departing thence, Dyonisius demanded of him, what report he would make of him at Athens, in the Academy of so many famous Philosophers, whereto Plato (boldly) thus replyed. The that liue in Athens, are not so idle, neither can they find so much leysure, as to question of thee or thy actions. I remember two other aged women, that (with no lesse libertie of soule) spake to their Kinges, and both were patiently endured: the one was of Macedon, and spoke vnto Demetrius, Son to King Antigonus, before named; the other was a Romain, & vttered her mind to the Emp. Adrian. For both of them had the like kind of answer, when they required to haue Iustice done them; Demetrius & Adrian both replying, that they could not intend them. The Women made answere, That if they had no leisure to intend them, they should leaue the Empire to such as cou'd do it. Neuertheleſſe neither of the Princes were offended with their words, but patiently admitted audience, and granted them Iuſtice.

Of Philip King of Macedon, & the Athenian Ambaſſadors.

Phillip, K. of Macedon, bidding Adieu to the Ambaſſadours of the Athenians, and making them goodly offers, as (in like caſes) it had been a long continued cuſtome; demaunded of them: If he ſhould doe any thing elſe for them? Whereunto one of the Ambaſſadors, named Democrates (who well knew, that King Philip greatly hated the Athenians) being not able to conceale his fury, anſwered: Wee would haue thee to hang thy ſelfe by the necke. At this anſwere, all his companions were much diſpleaſed, as alſo all the reſt in preſence, doubting leaſt the King would doe ſome harme vnto them. But in his wonted naturall clemency (or diſſembling his ſpleene) he made no other ſemblance, but turning himſelfe to the other Ambaſſadors, ſaid. You may ſay to the Athenians, that he that can endure ſuch wordes, is much more modeſt then the wiſe Men of Athens, that haue not diſcretiō to be ſilent.

Another example concerning the ſame Macedonian K.

Domorates the Cornician, went to ſee this King Phillip, at ſuch time as he was highly offended with his Queene, and his Sonne Alexander. Among other ſpeeches paſſing betweene them, King Phillip asked of him; If he had peace and vnitie with the Cities of Greece? Domorates, who knew very well, that the King took delight to ſee his Commonweales in diſcord; made anſwere, and truely (in my iudgement) very freely, conſidering how it behooued him to anſwere ſuch a Prince. Truely King (quoth he) becauſe thou art at diſcord in thine owne houſe, thou enquireſt after the diſſentions of our Cities: But if thou were at peace with thine owne, it would appeare more commendable in thee, then to ſeek after the afflictions of others. And yet notwithſtanding, the King was not moued a iot heereat; but conſidered, that hee iuſtly deſerued to be taxed, & therefore became friends with his wife and Son.

Of Alexander and Diogenes.

As concerning the freedome and boldneſſe, where with Diogenes ſpake to Alexander, and with what royall modeſty hee endured it; is ample mention made of in the Chapter of the life of Diogenes.

But if we would haue ſome examples among Chriſtians, that of Pope Sixtus the fourth, a religious man of the order of S. Frances, may well fit the purpoſe. He hauing attained to the Papacy, one of his religious Brethren, a very ancient man, went to ſee him in his Cordelier habit. To whō the Pope hauing ſhewn ſome Iewels and precious Stones, which were very rich; he ſaide withall. I cannot now ſay as ſometime S. Peter did, I haue neither Gold or Siluer. It is true (anſweted the Fryer boldly) nor can you ſay (as he did) to the paſſie, lame and impotent people, Ariſe and walk. Giuing him hereby to vnderſtand, that the chiefe Byſhops were now become more carefull of Riches, then of holineſſe: and the Pope, who knew very well, that his poore Brother had reaſon to ſpeake it, endured his words patiently.

Of Pope Sixtus the fourth, and a Gray Fryer.

Of the Arch-Byſhop of Colongne, and a poore Huſband-man.

It happened (well neere) in the ſame manner, to an Archbiſhop of Colongne, conferring with a Husband-man in the fields. For, as the poore man was at his labour in the fielde, the Arch-Byſhop chanced to paſſe by ſome-what neere him, hauing a Guard of men waiting on him, after the order in Germany. As the Arch-biſhop went by, the poore Country-man laughed ſomwhat loudly; which beeing perceiued, the Arch-byſhop demanded, what mooued him to laugh? Whereto the Husband-man preſently anſwered. I laugh (quoth he) at S. Peter, who is teatmed the Prince of Prelates, that hee ſhould liue and dye in ſo great powerty, and his Succeſſours to bee ſo rich. The Arch-biſhop feeling himſelfe ſomewhat toucht; to iuſtifie himſelfe, thus replied. My friend, I go with this fair traine of attendants, becauſe I am a Duke, as wel as an Archbiſhop. Which when the Husbandman heard, he laughed more extreamely then he did before; and the occaſion being requeſted of this great laughter, the Country-man ſpake verie boldly. I would (quoth he) my Lord gladly haue you tell me, that if the Duke (which you name your ſelfe to be) were in hell, where do you think the Arch-byſhop ſhould be? Inferring heereby, that two profeſſions can neuer agree in one man: for, ſinning in the one, he cannot iuſtifie himſelfe by the other. At this anſwere, the Arch-biſhop holding downe his head, not making any reply, or offering any diſpleadispleasure or iniury to the poore man, in a strange confusion, rode on his iourney.

Of Artaxerxes the King of Persia, and his Captaine Aclides.

To speak of Gentiles. Artaxerxes King of Persia, had knowledge giuen him, that a Captaine, named Aclides, whom he had brought vp frō his youth, Murmured greatly against him. For which offence, he gaue him no other chastisement, but sent him word by the same man that brought the accusation: Tell him (quoth Artaxerxes) that he may speak what hee pleaseth of his King; because his King may as well talke of him, and doe also what he listeth to him.

Of K. Phillip and Nicanor.

Phillip, the Father of Alexander, hearing that Nicanor spake euil of him publikely, was counselled by some, to send forth an especiall processe for him. To whom he answered. Nicanor is not the worst Man in my Kingdome; but I would fayne know if he stand in need of any thing, for it may bee, that this necessity requireth our assistance. Presently he vnderstood, that Nicanor suffered great pouerty, and therefore, in stead of punishing his reprochful words; he sent him a rich present. Which being receiued, he that formerly had accused him, came and reported to the King: That Nicanor went vp and down the streets, speaking most honorably of the King. Why then (quoth the King to Simicius, for so was the tell-tale named) I see that it is in mine owne power, to make men speake well or ill of me.

Of a rayler & depraver of his Prince.

This Phillip was once more aduised, to banish out of all his Countries, a bad tongued man, one that did very much scandalize him; whereto he answered. In any case I wil not yeild to his banishment; for seeing he can slander a Man in his owne Country: I will not haue him doe as much in other strange places. Giuing hereby to vnderstand, that whatsoeuer hee did in clemency and magnanimity, proceeded from a Princes good aduise and discretion. He saide moreouer, that hee was much bound in thankfulnesse, to the Gouernours and principall men of Athens. Because (quoth he) by the means of their continuall euill, speaking of mee and mine actions: to make them lyers, I may the more commodiously amend & correct mine owne bad gouernment.

Of the Gouernors of Athens.

A memorable example in a Prince.

He would neuer punnish any, that spake euill of him; but rather stroue to take away the occasion of any such defaming. If such rules might be in these daies obserued, they would bee two waies very beneficiall to vs: The one, in amendment of our bad liues; the other, that there would not be such store of deprauers. For truely, it is a great vertue, to make no account of euil spoken in our absence: But yet there is much greater temperance, when wee are not mooued or iniuriously prouoked, at offences vrged in our presence.

CHAP. VI.

That Imagination is one of the most principall inward powers, approued by true examples, and very notable Histories.

Like as the exteriour sences are fiue in number, as is generally well knowne to all men (to wit; Hearing, Seeing, Tasting, Feeling, and Smelling:) So are there likewise fiue inward sences and powers in man. Now, albeit some doe reduce them to foure; yet the first is vulgar and common opinion, as namely: The sence common, Imagination (whereof wee are now to speake) Iudgement, Fantasie, and Memorie. Concerning the office and vertue of these seuerall sences, we purpose not to discourse at this time: but our intent only is of Imagination, the charge and property whereof, is; to retaine the Images and figures, which the common sence receiueth first from the outward sense, and afterward she sends them to Iudgment, from whence they proceed on to the Fantasie, and thence are conuayed into the Coffer, commonly called Memory. Imagination hath power to change it selfe, by the representation of thinges, although they bee no more presented: which the sense common cannot doe, except shee haue them in presence; wherein is demonstrated the greatnesse, and wonderfull power of Imagination. For we plainly perceiue, that a man being asleepe, and his senses at rest: yet his Imagination ceaseth not from labour, but still representeth all things, euen as if they were personallie present, and the man wide waking.

Fiue senses inward, as well as outward.

The admirable power of Imagination.

The strange and violent effects of Imagination.

Imagination is able to moue the passions and affections of the Soule, and it can (diuersly) prouoke the body, alter accidents, turning the Spirits topsie-turuy, and the in-side outward, producing likewise diuers qualities in the mẽbers. Imagination can make a man sick or sound, and worke many other admirable effects. When Imagination conceiueth any matter delightfull; ioy brings the Spirits outward: But if it be of feare or terror, then they fly inward; becauſe that the motion or conceipt of ioy, entranceth the hart, and sadneſſe or ſorrow ſhuts it vp in reſtraint. The imagination of feare begetteth coldneſſe, makes the heart to tremble, expulſeth heat, and cauſeth a kind of quiuering in ſpeech. Mercy being cauſed and incited by Imagination, in ſeeing the ſufferings of ſome other body: doth (oftentimes) much more moue and change the party ſo conceited, then the patient himſelfe. As may euidently bee noted in ſome, that will quickly ſwowne or fall into a trance; by beholding another perſon let blood, or his wounds handled and dreſt by the Chirurgion; yea, & in more violent manner, then the party that endureth the paine. Strong Imagination hath moreouer the vertue, to make a tranſmutatiõ of things, though they be true when we behold them: as when we heare or ſee a man eate ſuch things as are ſharp or eager, it makes vs preſently to feele a ſtrange eagernes in the mouth. And contrariwiſe, beholding ſweet and ſauory things eaten; the very ſight and apprehenſion thereof, ſendeth the like ſweet Imagination into the mouth, euen as in bitter things it hath the like working.

The power of compaſſion cauſed by Imagination.

The vertue of ſtrong Imagination.

If we would haue examples of ſtrange Imaginations; we may eaſily heare many. Saint Auguſtine ſaith, he knew a Man, that at al times when himſelf pleaſed, would ſweate very aboundantlie, exciting the expulſiue vertue by meere Imagination. He declareth alſo in the ſame Booke, that another man whom he knew, when he heard a mournefull ſong, or dolorous ſounding voyce, or of one weeping or ſobbing: he would apprehend the ſame with ſo ſtrange an Imagination, as hee fell downe in a ſwoune, lying ſtone-ſtill without any feeling. And whatſoeuer men did vnto him, pricking him with pinnes, or burning his fingers; yet he appeared not to feele any thing. Neuertheleſſe, hee would reuiue, and come to himſelfe againe, when ſome ioyfull or pleaſing ſound came neere him, euen as if hee heard it a great way off. Pliny reporteth (well-neere) the very ſame, of a Man named Hermotimus, who when he conceiued an Imagination: he ſeemed ſo ſtrangely tranſported, as if the Spirit were gone out of his body, and when he returned to his former condition, he would report what wonders hee had ſeene. Monſieur Guillaume de Paris ſaith, he knew a man, who onely by ſeeing a Phiſition, without taſting any dram or Potion: yet ſuch was the violence of his Imagination, that he would fall to purging, as if he had miniſtred Phiſicke to him. It fareth in like caſe with ſuch as are ſubiect to dreaming; for, let vs admit, that it is Imagination which worketh heerein: yet it hath maniſeſtly bin knowne, that in dreaming they haue beene burned, or killed; they haue felt pain and torment, though neither weapon or fire touched them, & they haue declared it by loud ſhrikes and cries.

Imagination hath ſuch a powerfull Soueraignty, in the inward apprehenſiue parts: that it imprinteth in it ſelfe the liuely figure of imagined thinges; and then ſetteth them on worke in the blood; yea, this a matter of ſuch power, as it extendeth it ſelfe to the members of a ſecond perſon. As we may diſcerne in a Woman great with Childe, who, only through the preheminence of Imagination, which ſhe faſtens on ſome food whereof ſhe deſireth to eate; imprinteth on the Infant in her whomb diuers ſtrange ſignes or Markes; yea, ſometimes it extendeth to the death both of Child and Mother. It hapneth ſometimes, that he which is bitten by a mad Dog; by his neere imagination conceiued of the Dog, hath the figure of a Dog imprinted in his Vrine. To this purpoſe, it is recorded by ſome Authours, that a King, named Cyphus, hauing (with great attention) noted a fight betweene two Bulles, falling (on a day afterward) into a very ſound ſleepe: the ſame Imagination preſented it ſelfe before his thoughts. But when he awaked, he found the young Hornes Hornes of a Bull growing vppon his head. If this were true, it proceeded from this cause, that the Vegatiue Vertue, giuing aide and impulsion to the immagination: it raised such Humors in the head, as were apt to engender and bring forth hornes. According to this which we haue declared, the imaginatiue Vertue hath such Dominion, ouer the bodies of second and third persons; that Marcus Damascenus reporteth, that on the Confines of Pisa in Elis, in a place named Saint Peter, a Woman was brought to bed of a sauage child, hauing the skin in forme and semblance like vnto a Camels, which happened in this maner, by reason that at the instant of this childs conception, the Mother (ouer earnestly) contemplated the picture of Saint Iohn Baptist, which hung on the Wall in the Chamber. And therefore, as we haue formerly spoken of Infants, that imagination hath such powerfull prehemiinence, as it can cause Children to resemble persons, imagined by the Fathers and Mothers.

Of the immaginatiue Vertue on the bodies of second or third persons.

What power Imagination worketh on Infants.

Auicenne is of the minde, that imagination may bee so strong, as (when it listeth) it will take and benumb a man in his members, prostrating him on the ground, and tormenting him with the paines of madnesse. Moreouer, saith he, the charming or enchaunting which is made by the eie, passeth ouer from one person to another, by immagination of him that worketh the Sorcerie. Likewise Thomas Aquinas, speaking after Auicenne saith, What is that which can most subuert the body it selfe, either the melancholy imagination, or the most pleasing? answereth; The violence of the one and other. For, the chaseth all the spirits outward, and leaueth a man (as it were) liueless. The other locketh them vp so strongly within, as it groweth to a violent suffocation. It was well obserued in Seuil, that Iaques Orosius (who was surprized as prisoner by the Catholick king) apprehended so strong an imagination of feare, as in one night onely, hee became white and aged, being the day before verie blacke and youthfull. Againe, it hath oftentimes beene noted, that imagination hath made men to become Fooles: And other-whiles so extreamly sick, that the power of imagination can neuer be sufficiently admired.

CHAP. VII.

Of what Countrey Pilate was: How hee died: Of the Lake named Pilates Lake, and the property thereof. As also of the Den or Cauerne in Dalmatia.

Pilate the most Wicked and sinfull Iudge that euer was, or shall bee, according to the most and common opinion, was a Natiue of Lyons in France. Neuertheless, some of that Nation, who take the matter scarse pleasing, do say, that the name Pontius came from an house in Italy, and from Pontius Ireneus, Captaine of the Samnites, who vanquished the Romaines at the Caudine Fourca. But bee it howsoeuer, this Pilate, either whether it were in respect of his person, or for his parentage, became one of the most eminent men in Rome. And being well knowne by Tiberius, the successor to Octauius (according to Iosephus and Eusebius) he was sent by him, in the twelfth yeare of his Empire, to gouerne Ierusalem, and named himselfe in his dignitie, Deputie of the Empire. In this maner then did Pilate gouerne the Holie Cittie, and the whole Prouince of Iudea, which was named Palestine, and his Office endured the space of ten years. In the seauenth whereof (which was the eighteenth of Tiberius his Empire, according to Eusebius, and venerable Beda) he gaue sentence of death, against the Sauiour & Redeemer of all mankind, our Lord Iesus Christ, God and man. At which time happened those things, which the holie Euangelists declared of his death & passion, and his resurrection was euident & publicke in Ierusalem, albeit they greatly laboured to conceale it. Which being reported to Pilate (although hee was wicked) he conceiued, that such a resurrection and myracles of Christ, could not be done by any humain power, but by God. In regard whereof (according as it is recited by Paulus Orosius, Eusebius & Tertullian in his Apologies) hee aduertised the the Emperor Tiberius in the matter: for it was a custome, that the Consulles and Pro-consuls should send to the Emperor or Senate, to acquaint them with such occasions as happened in their Prouinces.

Pilate writeth to Tiberius, concerning Christ & his Myracles.

These meanes appeared verie meruailous to the Emperor, and he referd them to the Senate in Counsell, there to consult, whether they thought it fit, or no, that this Prophet by his memorable actions, should be honoured as a God. For without authoritie of the Senate, they could cause no new God to bee adored in Rome, other and beside the vanitie of their owne ydle Gods. But as the Godhead had not any neede, neither would confirme it self by the probation of men only: euen so God permitted, that the Senatours should not agree vppon anie thing, but rather (as some Authors say) they were greatly discontented, that Pilate had not written as well to them, as he did to the Emperour Tiberius. Notwithstanding, Tiberius prohibited the persecution of the Christians. After these occasions thus happening, Pilate made his abiding at Rome, and beeing confirmed by the Deuill for his faithfull seruant; he neuer did any thing afterward in his Office, but such things as were most vniust and wicked. Whereof being accused before Caius Caligula, the successor of Tiberius, as also because hee had prophaned the Temples, placing Statues & Images therein; and somtime had stolne monies out of the common Treasurie, beside other great crimes and vile actions: he was banished thence to the Cittie of Lyons; others say, to Vienna in Dauphine. And because this was the assigned place of his exile, some haue thought it also to be the place of his birth, where hee found such entertainment and welcome, that he slue himselfe with his own hands; which questionlesse could not happen, but by Gods diuine permission, and that his life should not be taken away, but by the most wicked man in the whole world, and that was himselfe.

Venerab. Beda in Lib. de Temp. & in Hist. Eccl. sup. Act. Apo.

They that haue written heereof, are the fore-alledged Authors, and Beda in his Booke of Times, and likewise in his Ecclesiastical History on the Acts of the Apostles. Eusebius farther saith, that his death hapned eight yeares after our blessed Sauiours suffering: from whence this wicked Pilate could not deriue any benefit, because he died desperately. For so great is the goodnesse of God, that although he condemned his innocent Son to death; yet if hee had repented him of his sin; euen he whom he had adiudged to death, would haue granted him eternall life.

Hauing spoke thus much of Pilate, I may not forget a Lake cald Pilats lake, which Lake is in Swetia, neere to a City named Lucerna, on a plaine enuironed with very high Mountains. From the top of one of them (as some good Writers testifie) Pilate (in his desperate mood) threw himself into the water. And it is a common voice of the people to this day, that euery yeare he there sheweth himselfe in the habit of a Iudge: but whosoeuer seeth him, be it man or woman, is sure to die within that years compasse. Beside this, and the common fame bruited of this Lake, I must alledge the testimony of Ioachimus Vadianus, a man very learned, who Commenting vpon Pomponius Mela, writeth another notable thing of this Lake, which is both certaine and meruailous. He saith, that if any one throw a stone, stick, or any thing else whatsoeuer it be into the Water; the Lake containeth such a straunge propertie, that it swell, rise, and moue with so impetuous a Tempest, that it ouerfloweth and drowneth a great part of the Countrey, whereby ensueth great losse and domages, aswell on the seeds in the grounds, as to Trees and beasts. And yet notwithstanding, if no such things be throwne into it, it standeth still without any motion. This Ioachimus further saith, (being a Natiue of Swetia) that there are very seuere ordinances made, prohibiting on paine of death, from casting anie thing into this Lake, and that such as break these prohibitions, haue bin put to death. Whither this do proceed naturally, or by miracle, I am not able to say, albeit some waters haue very great and admirable properties; for part whereof, reasons may be deliuerd, but for others not.

Pliny reporteth a matter like to this, & saith, that in Dalmatia, ther is a deep hole or caue, wherinto if any man cast a stone, or any waighty thing, there sodenly issueth forth a furious aire so violently, as it procureth a daungerous Tempest, to all the neere dwellers. It well may be (which yet I will not stand to auouch) that the body body of Pilate was throwne thereinto; and that the Deuill (by diuine permissi-on, and for his much greater infamy) doeth performe such horrid and vncoth accidents in this place. Howsoeuer the cause proceedeth, certaine it is, that such a Caue is there to be seene, and such affrightments issuing thence, vppon the hurling of any heauie thing into it: For the rest, I refer it to the Learneds iudgement.

CHAP. VIII.

Of negligence, in the execution of Iustice vpon Offenders, and for the sins of the flesh.

Plut. in Romulo

A great plague & famine in the Cities of Rome and Laurentum.

WE read in Plutark, that when Romulus King of Rome, and Tatius King of the Sabines, had made their compositiō to gouerne the Romains and Sabines ioyntly, there fell a strange kinde of plague and famine in the Cities of Rome and Laurentum, for two murthers committed by the Romaines and Laurentines. The one was done by the Kinsmen of Tatius, vpon certaine Ambassadors of Laurentum; which murder, Tatius neglected to punnish. And the other, by the frends of the said Ambassadors vpon Tatius, in reuenge of the Iniustice done by his Kinsmen, and suffered by him, which also, Romulus let passe vnpunished: whereupon, it being noted that the plague and famine encreased strangely in both Cities, and a common opinion conceiued, that it was a punishment of God vppon them, for those murders committed, and not punnished: they resolued to doo Iustice vpon the offenders; which beeing done, the plague ceased presently in both places.

Plut. in Camillo

Rome sacked and spoyled by the Gaules, in punnishment of two iniuries committed by the Romaines.

The same Authour also ascribeth the sacke of Rome by the Gaules, vnto the iust iudgement of God vppon the Romaines, for two Iniustices by them committed. The one, was the banishment of Camillus. The second, their refusall to punish certaine Ambassadors of their own, who being sent to treate peaceably with the Gaules, in behalfe of the Clusians, committed acts of hostility against them, contrarie to the Law of Armes. And when the Gaules sent to Rome, to demaund reparation of the iniurie, the Romaines not onely refused to giue them satisfaction; but also made their Ambassadors, (who had done the iniurie) Generals of an armie, to assist the Clusians against them: notwithstanding, that the Fecia'es (who were certaine Officers ordained by Numa Pompilius, to determine of the iust & lawfull causes, either for warre or peace) made great instance to the Senate, that the Ambassadors might be punnished, least the penaltie of their fault, might otherwise fall vpon the Common-wealth, as indeed it did. For, the Gaules giuing battell to the Ambassadors, easily ouerthrew them, and prosecuting their victorie, spoiled and sacked Rome.

The Feciales, Officers for war or peace.

Heerein I wish to be noted, how grieuous a sinne it is, in the opinion of the verie Paynims themselues, and how dangerous to the Commonwealth, to neglect and omit the punishment of wrongs and iniuries done them; whereby the offences of perticular men, are made the sinnes and transgressions of the whole state, and draw the wrath and punnishment of God vpon the same. Whereof another example may also bee gathered, out of the same Authour and history, concerning the cause and manner of the first comming of the Gaules into Italy, and of the great spoile they made in Tuscane; which seemed to proceede from the iust iudgement of God, for like negligence in the execution of Iustice. For one of the Countrey of Tuscane, called Arruntius, hauing his Wife taken from him, and kept (perforce) by a Nobleman, called Lucumo, and finding no remedie by Iustice (by reason that his Aduersarie was supported by the Magistrates) was so incensed therewith against the whole state, that he went into France, and caried with him some of the Grapes, and other commodities of the Countrey, to inuite the Gaules to attempt the inuasion of Tuscane. Whereto he easily perswaded them, and ferried them for their guide: God so disposing his Iustice, that hee to whom the State had done the wrong, should be the meanes and Instrument of the punnishment due to the same.

The Paynims obseruers of Iustice in punishing iniuries.

Plut. Ibid.

The cause why the Gaules came into Italy.

Heereto I will adde another notable example (in the same kinde) of the ouerthrow of the Lacedemonians, & their losse of

The Lacedemonians greeuously punnished, for

of the Empire of Greece, by the iust iudgment of God for the like offence, as both Diodorus Siculus, Plutarch, Cicero, and others affirme, and the euent made it selfe manifest: the Story is thus.

Two Lacedemonians passing ouer the plaine of Leuctra, were lodged, and curteously entertained in the house of one Scedasius, who had two handsome Women to his Daughters. And returning that way againe shortly after, finding the two Women at home, and their father absent, they first rauished, and afterward killed them both.

The Father at his returne, finding his Daughters slain, and vnderstanding who had beene the doers of it, went to Lacedemonia, to craue Iustice against the Malefactors. But so potent were both they & their friends there, that hee could by no meanes obtaine it. Whereupon, after infinite maledictions, powred forth (in the sorrow of his heart) against them & their whole state, he went home, and desperatly killed himselfe on the graue of his two Daughters. Not long after, wars growing betwixt the Thebanes and Lacedemonians, the soule or ghost of Scedasius appeared to Pelopidas (one of the chief captaines of the Thebanes) and encouraged him to giue battaile to the Lacedemonians on the plaine of Leuctra, where he & his Daughters were buried; telling him, that their death should bee reuenged, and so afterward it fell out. For there the Lacedemonians lost not only the battel, but also the Empire of Greece, which they had many yeares before possessed. Wherein may also be noted, how God executed his Iustice vpon them in another respect. For, whereas the sinne of the Flesh was growne in Lacedemonia to such excesse, as that no part of Greece was therewith so much infected, it seemed conuenient to the diuine Iustice, that the same shold be a meane to draw his further wrath vpon their whole State, that so they might bee punnished, by the meanes of that sin wherein they had most offended.

Rape & murther do seldom escape without deserued punishment.

Examples of Gods seuere iudgements, vpon whole Common-weals, for the sinnes of the Flesh.

Genes. 19, 24

And truly, though many sinnes are counted more hainous, and are more seuerely chastised by humaine lawes, then the sinnes of the flesh, yet almighty God hath not more rigorously punished any, in whole Countries and States, then the same. As, to omit the exemplary plague that fell vpon Sodome and Gomor by fire from Heauen, for the detestable sinne against Nature (which in that respect is called Sodomy:) We read in the Holie Scriptures, that all the whole Tribe of Beniamin (excepting only sixe hundred) was slaine by the Children of Israell, by the commandement of Almightie God, for a rape which those of the Towne of Gabaa committed on the wife of a Leuit, whom they abused in such excesse, that she presently died. Whereupon, the other Tribes assembled themselues, and first demaunded to haue the Malefactors deliuered vnto them; and then vpon the refusall thereof, they consulted with Almightie God, whether they shoulde inuade them or no, which God commanded them to do, and appointed them a Captaine. And although in two battailes the children of Israel had the worst, yet in the third battaile, Percussit eos Dominus (saith the Scripture) in conspectu filiorum Israell, &c. Our Lord God strooke those of the Tribe of Beniamin, in the sight of the children of Israell, who killed of them 25000. men, that bare Armes. Whereby we may see no lesse, then by the former example, as well the enormitie of the sin of the flesh: as also, that refusal to do Iustice on a few Offenders of the Towne of Gabaa, drew al the Tribe of Beniamin into participation of the Offence, which was therefore punnished in them all alike.

Iudges 20, 47

Iudges 20, 45

The whole Tribe punished for the sinne of few.

But to omit the later consideration, to wit, of omission to do Iustice vppon Offenders, and to say somewhat more concerning the punishment of God for this fleshly sinne, we haue a notable & fearefull example thereof in the kingdome of Spaine, conquered by the Moores, and possessed by them seauen hundred yeares for that Offence. For, when the Kingdome had flourished both in Religion & power, from the time of King Reccared, the first Catholicke King thereof, the space of an hundered and twentie yeares: the wicked King Witiza (being a man whollie giuen to Lust and Carnality) infected and corrupted all Spain, not only with the bad example of his owne dissolute life (hauing manie Wiues at once, beside diuers Concubines;) but also with abhominable Lawes, whereby he gaue leaue to all sorts of men, to haue as manie Wiues & Concubines as they listed; enforcing Priests, & such as would haue haue liued chastly, to marry. By which meanes, all Spaine becam within a while, to bee no better then a common Stewes or Brothel. And althogh almighty God, (according to his accustomed mercy) expected their conuersion and amendment all the time of his raigne, and laide only the penalty thereof vpon him, depriuing him both of his Crowne and eye-sight, by the meanes of Rodericke, who succeeded him in the kingdome: yet when the saide Rodericke followed his steps, aswell in his vicious life, as maintenance of his abhominable Lawes, it pleased God in his Iustice to permit him, to giue the occasion both of his owne ruin, & likewise of the ouerthrow of all Spaine, by this sin of the flesh, wherewith the whole Kingdome ouer-flowed. For, whereas King Roderick had sent a Kinsman of his own, called Count Iulian, Ambassadour into Affricke, and (in the meane time) rauished his Daughter, or (as some Write) his Wife: the Count vnderstanding it at his returne, was so incensed there-with against the King, that in reuenge thereof, he practised with the Moors, to bring them into Spaine, who with his assistance so speedily conquered it, and with such destruction of the people, that the punishment of God was most euident therin. For, hauing first ouerthrowne K. Roderick (whose body could neuer after the battell be found) they subdued almost all Spaine in eight months, or (as * some say) 14. and slew 700000. of all sorts of people; beside great numbers of Captiues, which they sent prisoners into Barbarie. And from that time forward, they remained in possession of that kingdome, or of some great part thereof, for the space of 700 yeares.

The subuersion of Spaine by the Moors, attributed by wise and holy men (in the same Age) to Gods Iustice, for the sins of the flesh. Baron. An. 745

This example of the Conquest and subuersion of Spaine, for the sinnes of the flesh, was so famous, and so much obserued by godly and Wisemen, at the same time when it hapned: that S. Bonifacius, borne in England, and Byshop of Mentz in Germany, (who liued in the same age, and holpe to conuert the Saxons and Frisons from Paganisme to the Christian Faith) proposed it to one of the English Kings, called Ethelbald, K. of the Mercians, to withdraw him from his dissolute life. And forasmuch as his Epistle to him containeth verie notable matter, I will alledge heere some part thereof, translated out of Latine, thus.

A notable Epistle of S. Bonifacius an Englishman, Bish. of Mentz to Ethelbald, K. of Mercia. Baron. tom. An.

I beseech thee deere Son in our Lord, that if this bee true which is reported of you, you will repent and amend your life, remembering how vnfit it is for you, who haue the Image of God created in you, to conuert the same into the Image of the Deuill by Licentiousnesse. And that you, whom no merrits or deserts of your owne, but the bountiful goodnesse of Almightie God, hath made a Prince and King to gouerne many, shoulde make your selfe slaue vnto the Deuill, by the sinnes of the flesh. For, as the Apostle sayth, What sinne soeuer a man commits, hee makes himselfe Slaue thereof. And the Paynims themselues, who know not the true God, do obserue in this point, that which God ordained from the beginning, liuing in all true loue and loyaltie with their wiues, and punnishing Adulterie and fornication. For, if in olde Saxony (where there is no knowledge of Christ) either Maid or Wife do commit Adultery or Fornication, shee is first strangled, and after burnt. And he that corrupted her, is hanged ouer her. Or else, shee is stripped naked to the middle, and whipped by chast Matrons from Towne to Town, & prickt with sharpe Kniues, vntill shee dye therewith.

How rigorously the Saxons in Germanie (being Paynims) punished adulterie and fornication.

If therefore the Gentiles (who knew not God) haue such a zeale and loue to Chastity, what shold you do that are a Christian king? Therefore haue pittie vpon your owne soule, & vpon the multitude of your people which perish by your example: and for whose soules you are to yeeld account. Consider also this, that if the English Nations (as the very Painims in France & Italy do cast in our teeth) do contemne marriage, and giue themselues ouer to vnlawful Lust, it must needs follow that the Children which shal proceed of thē, wil degenerate, and become (at last) Cowardly and weake in warre, vnstable in faith, shameful, and reproachfull among men, & hateful to God. As it hath alreadie chaunced to the Prouensales, Burgundians, & Spaniards, who falling from GOD by the same meanes, are now (by his iust iudgement) seuerely punished for the same by the Sarazins with losse of the Christian faith.

The hurt that followeth to a Commonweale, by vnlawful procreation.

Thus wrote this worthy Byshop a few yeares after Spaine was conquered by the Moores; and further added certaine examples of Gods Iustice, extended vpon some English Kings for their Licentious life, and other offences. As vpon King Ceolred, predecessour of Ethelbald, who (saith

The vnfortunate ends of the Kings, Ceolred, Ofred, & Ethelbald, in punishment of their licentious liues.

(saith he) was not only a deflourer of Religious Women, but also a breaker of ecclesiasticall priuiledges. And therefore it is said, that God suffered a wicked Spirit to take and possesse him, as hee was banketting with his Nobility, and to kill him, after that hee had blasphemed Almighty God, by his procurement. And to the same cause he also attributeth the vnfortunate end of Ofred, King of Northumberland, who he saith, was Earundē culparū reus, Guilty of the same faults; and that therefore God suffered him to bee miserably killed. Thus this holy man admonished King Ethelbald, who as it may be presumed, contemned his Counsell; and therefore receiued at Gods handes, the punnishment due to such great neglect: for he was afterward cruelly murdered, as appeareth in the English histories.

CHAP. IX.

Of the inuention of Belles, with the vse of them, and what benefite ensueth by them. Also, who were the first that coniured Deuils.

ALthough this may seeme to bee a meane subiect, to speake of such a common thing as Belles: yet so it is, that considering how necessary they are for Diuine seruice, and conuocation of Christian people together, with other effects, whereof we are to discourse, it may (vnder fauor) be presumed, that the inuention & vse of them (in Gods Church) proceeded doubtlesse from inspiration of the blessed spirit. The Lord commanded in the old Testament, that two Trompets of Siluer should bee made, which the Priests should sounde, to the end that all people might bee called to the Diuine Sacrifices. And our Lord, speaking of his comming in the day of Iudgement, saith amongst other things; That he wil send his Angels with Trompets, to assemble and congregate the elect. Now following this goodexample, Christian people comming to increase in some number, to assemble so great a multitude together at one time, to make Prayers, and offer sacrifices in the Temples, neither Trompets which had bin formerly sanctimoniously instituted for this businesse, nor the voices of men could be sufficient; but it was thē thoght fit, to inuent some strong Instrument: by meanes whereof, an assembly might the sooner be made. And to compasse this, among all other that men could dreame on, the vse of a Bell was found to be the best & apteſt; as being of loudest sound, and to be heard the furthest off.

Bels necessary for Diuine Seruice.

Numb. 10, 2.

Math. 24, 31.

The encrease of Christian people in the world.

This inuention then must needs be reputed verie meruailous, and woorthy the name of so excellent a man, as was Paulinus Byshop of Nola, of equal standing in time with S. Augustine, and with S. Ierom: who wrote many letters vnto him, which yet at this day are to be read. He then was the first, that (in his Church and Byshoppricke) brought vp the vse of Bels; which afterward was continued through Christendome, as a thing most necessary: and hence it commeth, that Nola being a Latine word, signifieth a Bell. Now, it is further to bee noted, that Belles are not good only in the cases fore-named, but they are said also to haue a wonderful effect, which is; that the Deuils or Spirits houering in the aire, do flie the sound of a Bell, and hold it in horrour, as a thing found out and instituted, for giuing honor and worship to the true God. And so much the rather, because as they delight themselues in Musicke, which inciteth & prouoketh men to euill; euen so, the sound of Bels they shun and are offended at, as being most hurtfull and contrary to them. And yet they cause a christian man to reuiue his spirits, putting him in mind of God, and such times as befit his Prayers and Sacrifices: for being dedicated to those vses, they moue a man inwardly, & exalt his soule with chearefulnesse to deuotion.

Paulinus Byshop of Nola, the first Inuenter of Belles.

Nola signifieth a Bell.

The sound of Bels displeasing to deuils.

Belles are cheerfull to a Christian man.

They are said also to haue another verie profitable propertie, to wit; That the sound of them doth breake the ayre, and driue on the Clouds, diuiding thunders, and verie euidently resisting Tempestes: because, that by the power and promptitude of such sounds, tempestuous clouds do breake and scatter themselus: by which meanes their force and furie ceaseth. As daily may be noted by experience, that when there is any great wind or tempest, by Great vertue in the sound of Belles.

by ringing a multitude of Belles, the extreamity presently beginneth to growe calme. Notwithstanding all this, I deny not, but that the deuout Praiers of faithfull Christians, in such perrillous seasons haue much greater Vertue and efficacie: yet neuertheleſſe (as I haue saide) it is a matter most certaine and naturall: and whereof wee haue had good apparance, by a great troope of people walking in the Fieldes; for, as they shout or exalt their voyces, the ayre (by little and litle) doth deuide it selfe, so that if any Bird (by chance) be flying aboue them, she falles downe to the grounde for want of Ayre to support her. And it must needes be so, because (to speake truly) Voices and sounds in this manner formed, doo penetrate and cleaue the aire, euen so farre as the place of their power extendeth; and where they are to finish their strength.

Prayer is of great efficacy in times of trouble.

Now, in regard it may seeme strange to some, that I haue saide Deuilles do fly away at the sound of Belles, because they haue no bodies or vnderstanding to hear or else to bee handled and felt, but that (simply) their intelligence is incorporeal. To such I answer, that those things which are not by bodily sense to be comprehended, which they want, they attaine vnto it by intellectuall knowledge; in which manner, wicked spirites are tormented by fire.

Whither Deuils do auoid the ringing of Bels, or no.

Ephes. 4, 7. In like case, we read that Saint Paul commanded Women beeing in Churches, they should be silent, and vailed on their heads, for the presence & reuerence of the Angels, albeit they haue neyther eyes or eares. Also it is most certain, that the Angell Raphaell saide to Tobias, that he offered to God the Prayers which he made. According to this example, it is written in the 6. Chapter of Tobias, that the Angell Raphael going with yong Tobias, after he had kild the fish in the flood of Tigris, hee bad him keepe the Liuer, saying; That throwing it into the fire, the fume arising from it, had the power and Vertue to expell Deuilles from the place perfumed therewith, and they neuer to returne thither againe. Afterward, in the eight Chapter, wee read, that hee laid the Liuer vpon the burning Coales; and with the perfume arising from it, he chased away the Deuill, that had bin the death of Sarras seauen Husbandes; and she freely deliuered from all affliction.

Tobias 12, 12

Tobias 6, 7.

Tobias 8, 3.

Concerning the expelling of Deuils and Coniuring them by Holie words, & other meanes, as now adayes is vsed: it is a case so ancient, that Iosephus writeth in his Antiquities, that Salomon was the inuenter thereof; and the first that (by his speeches) chased them away, being therin illumined and enstructed of God. He declareth also, that he knew an Hebrew, named Eleazar, who in the presence of the Emperour Vespasian, and the whole band of armed men, healed such as were possessed with Deuils; and in dooing it he would hold a Ring against the parties Nose that was possest, whereto was fastned the roote of a certaine hearb, which (he said) was taught him by Salomon; and while the heatbe continued his smel, and it was applied to the Patients power, the Deuill could not preuaile, but fled away from him. Returne we againe to Belles, whose sound is generally affirmed to afflict, torment, and expell Deuils or euill spirits. And for this cause, to despight the Deuill, and for his confusion, there is no Sect, nor Religion of Faith, or of any Law whatsoeuer, that dooth make vse of Bels for Diuine Seruice, but the Christian Catholicke Church only.

Salomon did first inuent the expelling of Deuils.

The conclusion concerning Belles.

CHAP. X.

Of a Combate fought between two Knights of Castille, in triall whereof happened very memorable accidents.

Diuers times haue chanced great aduentures in the triall of Duelles & single Combats; which (in iust reason) haue deserued especiall memory. Neuertheleſſe, being matters so manifest, I shal speake but of one onely; because therein hapned very strange fortune. In the time of Alphonsus King of Castille, who was father to the King Don Peter; there grew a quarrell betweene two Knightes of his Court; the one, beeing named Ruipaez de Viedma, and the other Per Rodriguez d'Auvila. The quarrell grewe from hence, that Ruipaez saide in presence of the King; hee beeing then at Valladolid,

A Quarrell betwixt two Knights of Castille, and the cause thereof that Pay was a Traitor, because hee neyther being of Castile, or a subiect to the King, came thither with the Armie of Portugall, to the preiudice of Castille, and against his owne King, except he had bin drawne thereto by duty.

This he offered to approue by Testimonies, and by Armes, or any other maner of proofe, whereto hee might stand bound: and heereupon he defied Pay Rodiguez, who was then absent. But beeing aduertised thereof, he wrote to the King, that hee stoode not obliged to make any answere, because Ruypaez was a Traitor, and would haue slaine his owne King Alphonsus; whereof he would make proofe by Armes, and on that accusation he defied him. And because the proofe which he purposed to make, concerned no lesse then Capitall Treason, a case farre aboue his Aduersaries imputation to him, hee required the King to grant him safe conduct, whereby he might safely come to his Court, there to approoue his words by Combate.

An answer returned to the Challenge. & the accuser further charged.

The k. doubtfull in the accusation.

When the King was made acquainted heerwith, he stood in some doubt, which of these two Knights was the Accuser or Defender; considering, that the first man had first accused, and the other much more aggrauated the matter. Wherefore, he aduised with his counsell in this case; & concluded, to giue safe conduct to the accuser of High-treason, by means whereof, he came to the Court, & made his accusation in the Kinges presence, where the partie accused gaue him the lye: and therefore, the field was granted by the King, but the day somewhat prolonged, for the space of ninetie dayes, as is recorded, because Ruypaez was then sickly.

The Combat granted.

The day being come, they both apeared in the fielde, where the accustomed solemnities being performd, they entred Combat, and some wounds being giuen on either side, the night preuenting anie further proceeding, they were parted, without victory to the one or other. The next day they were brought againe into the field, where like bold and hardie Knights, each did his best endeuour to vanquish the other: and albeit they fought verie manfully, with many wounds, both giuen and receiued, yet neither of them failed a iot in strength or courage, but wasted all that day likewise, without anie discerning, which of them had the better aduantage. Whereupon, vnder equall tearmes of victory, they were once more commaunded from the field, both with great meruaile and compasion in the Beholders, that two such worthy Knights should thus hazard their liues. Vpon the third day, they were in like maner brought into the field, with the very same vndaunted spirit in either, as formerly hath been witnessed, though not in such strong ability of body, yet thus they there continued againe till night came, neither beeing more aduantaged then the other.

The 3. dayes fight.

When the King had well considered heereon, hee greatly pitied the losse of two so valiant Knights; wherefore, hee caused them to bee parted, determining to imploy them both in his wars against the Moores, and heereupon their Weapons were taken from them. And the King saide (out of his Iudgement) seeing Pay Rodiguez had done his woorst to kill Ruypaez, & yet could not conquer him, he was verily perswaded, that he had not conspired his death, but held him to be a loyall and true Knight. In like manner, hee absolued Pay Rodiguez, of the crime attributed to him by the other: because, hauing continued three daies in such sharpe triall, God surely woulde haue shewne the innocence of the one or other in both their quarrels. And therefore reputing them both to be good and worthy Knights, they were conducted from the field with great honor.

The King ceaseth the combate.

CHAP. IX.

Of manie admirable things, hapning in diuers parts of the world.

ALthough the works of Nature are very wonderfull; and an argument of the infinit power of the Creator of all things: yet such thinges as heeretofore haue beene ordinary, and which the wise and learned haue well vnderstoode, do raise in me much more admiration; as the birth of men, Beasts, Plantes, and production of their Fruits, with all other ordinary semblable things. There are some other beside, not so so vulgar, which neuertheleſſe (in their Nature) do much amazevs: Howbeit, we wonder to behold things, which ſeem repugnant to the common eſſence and order of things, as ſuch bee, which are reported and affirmd by men of great authority.

Fontanus, of an hie rockie Mountaine, neere to Naples, & a tree growing out of it.

Iacobus Fontanus, a verie famous and moſt lerned man, by reaſon of his great reading, ſaith, that he and manie more, haue ſeen an high Mountaine, in the Sea neere to Naples, being an huge part of a Rocke, or mighty maſſe of Flint, fallen down therinto by fortune. Within which flinty Rocke grew a great Tree, ſo faſt knit and combined within the ſtone, as it ſeemed that Nature had there produced it, and made it meerely grow out of the ſtone or Rocke, euen as if they were both but one bodie, albeit it was truelie Wood. Which apeard to proceed from nothing elſe, or anie other place then the earth, where the Water made a mixture of it ſelfe with the Tree, and ſo conuerted and knit it into the Rocke, locking it faſt on all ſides. Neuertheleſſe, becauſe it was in ſuch a place, where (it may bee) men very ſildome reſorted, and it a matter of ſuch rarity, it ſeemed the harder to bee comprehended.

Alexandrinus of Alexandria, concerning a Marble ſtone.

Another thing is declared by Alexandrinus of Alexandria, in like manner very merualous, which happened at Naples, where he then dwelt; to wit, that in cutting Marble ſtone, hewne formerly out of a Rocke, and preparing for building: as they Sawed thorough the middle, they found (within it) a Diamond of great Value, which had been cut and poliſhed by the hand of man.

The ſame Alexandrinus further releateth, that as they prepared another Marble ſtone, ſtriuing to diuide it in the middeſt, it was of ſuch extreame hardneſſe, that they were faine to break it with pickaxes. And in the middeſt of the ſtone, they found a great quantitie of Oyle encloſed, euen as if it had beene in a Glaſſe or Bottle; and the Oyle was very cleare, faire, and of an exceeding ſweete ſauour.

Oyle found in a Marble ſtone.

Baptiſta Fulgoſo, in the firſt Booke of his Collections, certifieth and ſaith, that hee had ſeene a Mountaine very farre off from the Sea, where was found (aboue an hundred fadome deepe in the earth) a Shippe ouer-turned, and euen as conſumed: yet not ſo much, but that the form thereof might well be diſcerned, and perfectly knowne. They founde likewiſe Anchors of Iron, Maſtes and Sail-yards, yet broken and halfe conſumed. But that which is moſt to be admired, they found there the bones and heads of ſortie perſons; and theſe things were ſeene in the yeare, 1460.

Baptiſta Fulgoſus lib. 2 de Cel.

A Ship, Anchors, Maſts, and Sail-yardes found an hundred Fadome deep in a Mountaine.

Some of them that ſaw theſe things, were perſwaded, that they had been thus couered with earth, from the time of the Vniuerſall Deluge (if before that time any Shippes were vſed, or men ſayled on the Seas in thoſe times) which may eaſily be beleeued, in regard that before the Flood, almoſt all Arts were founde out. Others were of opinion, that this might be ſome Ship, which had been ſubmerged in the Sea, and that by the interiour concauitie of the earth, the waters had driuē it in ſo farre; where, ſince the mutation of times, the earth remaining dried vp, it ſtayed there as immured vp in a Vault: but howſoeuer it came hether, the aduenture was admirable.

All arts found out before the flood.

The ſame Author declareth moreouer, that he ſaw an hard ſtone; which being broken thorowe the middeſt, a liue Worme was there founde within it: to whom it was impoſſible there ſhoulde come any nourithment; but what the ſtone it ſelfe affoorded her. A Serpent alſo was preſented to Pope Martin the fift, that liued in the middeſt of a ſtone likewiſe: and it ſeemed, that Nature had thus created her within; and that (without any other nouriture) ſhe receiued ſuſtenance by the onely Vertue and propriety of the ſtone.

CHAP. XII.

The variable opinion of Phyloſophers, concerning Humaine Language: And of the Originall of Marriage.

GOd created Man, after hee had created all other thinges, whereof hee made him Lorde: this is verie true, and wee ought to beleeue it as an Article of our Faith. But this Light and Truth failed, and was vtterly vnknowne to the auncient Philophers, when they beganne to immagine and to search out the Originall and beginning of the world, and of all thinges else whatsoeuer.

The Philosophers ignorant in the worlds creation.

Diodorus Siculus reciteth the opinions to this purpose, and saith; Some were of the minde, that the world and men had both a beginning. Others, out of more vaine fantasie, saide; that all things were eternall, and that not any thing had a beginning. Now, among the former of these two Opinions, there were great differences.

Diader. Sicul. in Lib. 2.

Epicurus and his Sect.

Epicurus, and some other of his Sect, (who mannaged the Diuine prouidence by ignorance) affirmed men to bee casually created and granted their beginning by the Attomies; to whom he vsually attributed the Originall of all things. The Poet Lucretius also followed him in this vanity: VVhereat Lactantius Firmianus smiled, and elegantly mocked him. Anaximander found out a matter well deseruing laughter, to wit; that of Water and Earth, and by the heate of the Sun, man was first producted; as if there belonged no more to a man, then vnto a Fly.

Attomies, little Moats in the sun, hardly to be discerned.

Lactan Firm. in lib. de Oper. dei lib. 7. de Institut Anaximander.

Empedocles.

Empedocles was almost of the very same opinion, intermedling the matter of man with Water and Fire, and saide; That euery member was first created by it selfe, and then conioyning themselus (at a venter) together, they formed and Organized the body of man.

Democritus.

Democritus was not wholly of the same minde, saying; That man was made of Water, and the slime of the earth. The Stoicks were of a more sound iudgment, for they confessed, that all thinges were made by Diuine prouidence. They further held, that God had created man, & all other creatures: Lactantius also speaketh as much. Diuine Plato was of this opinion, and of him (according to Lactantius) the Stoicks Learned. But much more clearely Cicero, in the first Booke of his Lawes, where (commending man) hee saith: This Creature, full of reason and Counsell, among all the other, was created by the Lorde God his Maister, in more great perfection then anie other animate thing.

The Stoicks.

Lactan. Firm. in lib. 2. & li. 7

Cic. in lib. 1. de Legib.

Of the other and second opinion, to wit; that men are eternall, and without beginning, and to endure continuallie, was Aristotle alwayes, of whom Lactantius speaketh in his second Booke, that to draw himselfe from other opinions, hee held this: which also was obserued by the Sect of the Peripatetians, of whom hee was Prince. Pliny was of the same opinion, which Lactantius Firmianus reproued, and destroyed as false. The like (most learnedly) did Tho: Aquinas, in his Summary against the Gentiles.

But leauing these opinions of Men without Faith, wee ought to beleeue for truth, that Man was formed by God, the Creator of all thinges, and that to multiplie this humaine progeny, it was conuenient to create the Woman: which hee did, and tooke her out of the side of the first man. And to the end, that he should not indiscreetly keepe companie with her, as other vnreasonable Creatures doo together, hee instituted Holie Marriage betweene them, saying vnto them; Encrease, Multiply, fill the Earth, and possesse it. As it is testified by Moises in Genesis, and by Iosephus, in the first Booke of his Antiquities. Notwithstanding, the Gentiles being depriued of this Holie Historie, do attribute the inuention thereof to others. Among a great number of whom, Trogus Pompeius saieth; that Cecrops King of Athens, inuented marriage. Finally, the Redeemer of all mankind being come into the world, he approued it, and instituted it as a blessed Sacrament, reprooving the repudiation permitted by the Iewes, to take away the rigour of their seueritie, as Saint Mathew declareth in his nineteenth Chapter: as also, Saint Marke, and Saint Paule.

The Institution of marriage

Genes. 1, 13.

Ioseph. in lib. 1. de Antiquit.

Cecrops King of Athens said to inuent Marriage.

Math. 19, 7.

Marriage then was thus instituted, ioyning one Man with one Woman, and not with manie, neither one Woman with manie Men; which was most iustly done, because the contrarie dooth wholly contradict Natural reason. Moreouer, it was appointed by Diuine Lawe and Ordinance. Besides, what thing could bee more conformable to Naturall rule (albeit, neyther the Lawe, nor Faith commaunded it) then to haue one sole Companion, and not confusion of two or manie VVomen? In which confusion, when as a VVoman will not liue and abide with her Husband, but withdraw her selfe to others, it is against the Lawe of Nature, which forbiddeth that

One man and one Woman, ioined in marriage.

The rule of Nature, and how to be obserued betweene man and woman.

that to be done to another, that the partie would not haue done to himselfe, for amitie consisteth in paritie of personnes. How can it be then, that loue and amitie should be perfect, where there is so great inequalitie? And where a man is at libertie with manie Weomen, when the woman is combinde and made subiect vnto one man only?

Loue consisteth in paritie of persons.

It is not possible, that true and perfect amitie shoulde diuide and extend it selfe vnto manie, as Aristotle hath well maintained it. It would rather seeme a kind of seruitude, as wee may well note among barbarous people, who haue manie Weomen, and with whom they deal in the Nature of Seruants, rather then as Wiues, Friends, and Louers; besides, the multitude of Wiues doth hinder all good order, which ought to be obserued in Domestick affaires.

Arist. in lib. 8. de Ethic.

Moreouer, wee see Naturally, that in all kinds of Beasts, the Sires or Fathers (as we tearme them) haue a great sollicitude and respect to their young ones, as well for teaching as nourishing them, & they are euermore (or most commonly) paired. For, the Male hath no more but one Female, as we may behold in all Birds, and in the most sorts of foure-footed Beasts. Whereby may bee gathered, how a man ought to behaue himselfe, and how he should carrie his Loue and affection vnto his children, and that no man ought to haue more then one Wife onely.

Example of the care in bruite beasts, of their Females.

Seeing then, it standeth thus on the behalfe of men, by the verie same reasons it is prooued, that the Woman ought to haue no more then one Husband. For, if she should haue more, there would arise thereby verie great inconueniences, because the Children borne of a woman which is married to manie Husbandes, cannot be saide to haue any certaine Father: by meanes whereof, and in a case so doubtfull, all loue and paternall care, eyther for education or nourishing, perrisheth presently. Nay, besides this, the difference of Linage and Kindered cannot bee discerned or considered, whereon ensueth vnlawfull and damnable Copulations.

One law bindeth both men and women, to haue but one wife, and one Husband

The first man that presumed (against the Law of Nature) to haue two Wiues, was Lamech the seauenth man, accounting from Adam, in descending by the line of the peruerse and wicked Caine, as it is found in the fift Chapter of Genesis. By the example of which Lamech, many Iewes, and other bestiall barbarous Nations, accustomed themselues to take manie Wiues, wherein they erred and sinned greatly.

The first man that dared to haue 2. wiues.

But if Iacob, Dauid, and other Saintes of the Law, had more then one wife: It was because they were dispensed withall by the holy spirit, and for some perticuler occasions. But the other Iewes, that tooke manie Wiues without perticuler allowance from God; sinned hainously, and with them also haue failed many barbarous Nations, as being a matter conformable to their brutish inclinations, & carnall appetites. Among whom were the Numidians, Ægyptians, Indians, Persians, Tharsians, and some others, who entertained as manie wiues as they were able to keepe.

Holy men dispensed withal by God.

The Nations that had many Wiues.

VVicked Mahomet also in his false Law, both allowed and permitted the same sinne; to the end, hee might draw the more Iewes to him, and all other carnall-minded men. But the Romaines and Grecians, with diuers Nations, that had better Lawes and Customes, neuer allowed any man to haue more then one VVife, nor a wife more then one Husband.

Mahomet allowed plurality of wiues.

CHAP. XIII.

Of what estate, and at what yeares or Age, a man should be married vnto a Woman.

THe ancient Morrall Philosophers, held diuers Opinions concerning the age & yeares that men and VVomen should be married together, to the end, that they might bee proportionable in abilitie one to another. Aristotle deriuing his argument (it may bee) from hence; That VVeomen conceiue and beare Children vnto the yeares of fiftie, and men are able to beget vntill the yeares of seauenty, saith; That they ought to Marrie at such an Age in either; that (at one and the same time) time) they may both ceasse begetting & conceiuing. So that by Aristotles rule, the husband ought to be twentie years (or thereabout) more aged then the wife. Hesiodus the Greeke Poet, and Xenophon the Philosopher, doo graunt them a little lesser time, saying; That when they marrie, the woman should be fourteene yeares olde, and the man thirtie. Licurgus the Law-maker of the Lacedemonians, conformeth himselfe almost with Aristotle: For, by his Law, he prohibited any man to marrie sooner then at thirty seauen years, and the Woman at seauenteene.
